After then he had talked a while of things indifferent, he began to ſpeak: Since you have the reputation (ſaid he unto her) of being one of the moſt generous friends in the world, I deſire Madam you would be pleaſed to do me the honour of affording me ſome faithful counſel in a buſineſs whereon depends all the good fortune, and all the bad fortune of a man, who is very much your ſervant, and in whoſe fortune I have a moſt near concernment. Eliſa hearing Phocilion ſay ſo, ſtood a little ſurprized, for ſhe knew he had much affection to her, though he never told her; yet ſince ſhe knew him to be very diſcreet and wiſe, ſhe did not think he would ſay any thing that would diſpleaſe her; therefore conſidering well with her ſelf for an anſwer, Methinks, ſaid ſhe unto him, you ſhould rather conſult with your own Reaſon for counſel, then ask mine, for I am very unable to give advice unto any: Therefore if you will believe me, ſaid ſhe and laught, you ſhall never reveal the ſecret of that perſon in whom you have ſuch intereſt, leſt two ſeveral inconveniences ſhould befall you at once, the one of receiving ill counſel, the other of making me to deſire to tell that which you ſhould tell me. As for the laſt of theſe, replied Phocilion, I fear it not: Then it ſeems you think me to be more ſecret then prudent (replied Eliſa;) Since you do not fear I will reveal your ſecret, and conceiving that I will not give you bad counſel: However, it be replied he, I beſeech you Madam do me the honour to hear me, and hear me without interruption, promiſing you, that when I have told you the buſineſs, to wait for your anſwer, and to cauſe the perſon who is concerned in it to follow the counſel you ſhall give: Out of meer curioſity, replied ſhe, I will permit you to ſpeak, and therefore tell me what the buſineſs is: Before I obey Madam, replyed he, I muſt beſeech you not to ask the name of him for whom I ask your counſel, unleſs you have given ſuch counſel as he deſires: How now (ſaid ſhe and interrupted him) does he deſire counſel, and yet will not follow it unleſs it ſuit with his inclination? Ah Phocilion, if it be ſo, I am not fit to give it, for I uſe to counſel after my own inclination, and not after others: You may do as you pleaſe Madam, replied he, However, I beſeech you give me leave to tell you, that there is a man in the World, who after he had lived a long time without the happineſs of knowing you, had at laſt the honour to ſee you firſt, the firſt day you were with the Queen, after the death of the late King: What's the reaſon Phocilion (ſaid Eliſa and interupted him) that I am brought into the buſineſs of him unto whom you would have me ſpeak? You ſhall know it preſently Madam, replied he, if you will be pleaſed to hear me without interruption: Be pleaſed to know then (purſued he) that he of whom I ſpeak, no ſooner ſaw you, but he ador'd you, and fixed his reſolution to adore you as long as he lived: Truly Phocilion, ſaid Eliſa, you are a very ſtrange man, for in lieu of conſulting about the buſineſs of another, you talk of nothing but me: Once more Madam, replyed he, I beſeech you hear me: Since I have ingaged my word (replied ſhe ſharply and bluſht) I will do ſo; but remember alſo, that you are obliged unto two things, the one to hearken quietly unto all I ſhall anſwer you, the other, to make him who deſires my counſel to follow it: I know it very well Madam, purſued he, and I will keep my word, To return from whence I digreſſed, I muſt tell you Madam, that this man who adored you upon the firſt ſight, and will adore you eternally, not being able to live, unleſs he can live happily, charged me to aſk you what is your pleaſure ſhall become of him? You are already ſo civil unto him, as he thinks himſelf much your debtor for it: You have given him many marks of eſteem, for which he is eternally obliged: Straton does him the favour to honour him with his friendſhip, his quality is equal unto yours, his fortunes tho much leſs then you deſerve, yet ample enough to make you happy, if riches will do it. And Madam, this man is poſſeſſed with ſuch a reſpective paſſion, and is ſo full of reverent devotion to you, that he durſt never acquaint you with it: And tho he hath ſome reaſon to believe, that Straton would not deny it if he asked his permiſſion to Court you unto his deſires, yet he would never ſo much as think of it, until firſt I asked your counſel for him: But Madam, before you give it, be pleaſed to know, that never man knew how to love more zealouſly nor reſpectively then he; and you muſt not be ignorant, that if you adviſe him to be ſadly ſilent, and to hide the unmeaſurable paſſion of his Soul, you will force him into ſuch an exceſſive deſpair, as he will moſt certainly have recourſe unto death. Conſider alſo I beſeech you, how the reverence he bears you is ſo great, that knowing your ſeverity and your ſcrupulous virtue, he dares not make it known that he dies for the Love of you, without letting you know alſo the innocence of his intentions: I know well Madam, that there are every day Princes at your feet, and that he for whom I mediate is none: But let all your Princes be as amorous as they can, I am moſt certain that his ſoul exceeds all theirs in veneration and Love: Therefore Madam, I beſeech you conſider ſeriouſly what I ſay concerning him: I do ſo perfectly know his thoughts of you, that I aſſure you I do not know my own thoughts better: Speak then Madam I beſeech you, will you adviſe this ſecret Lover to diſcover himſelf unto Straton, or unto your ſelf? and is it your pleaſure I ſhould tell you his name.

Since you have told me, replied Eliſa, that you will not reveal his name until I adviſe him as he would have it, I conceive it beſt not to name him, until I have given my advice, leſt not finding it ſuitable unto his humour, it ſhould diſpleaſe you : Oh Madam, I do moſt heattily beſeech you, ſaid he unto her, to conſider well before you caſt this unfortunate Lover into the Hell of deſpair: To teſtifie unto you, replyed ſhe, that he could never have choſen a more fit mediator to ſolicite his buſineſs, if it were a buſineſs unto which I were capable of perſwaſion, I will open the very cloſet of my heart unto you, as unto one of my beſt friends; and tho I know that I am of a harſh diſpoſition naturally, yet I am confident, that at this time I ſhall not give you any cauſe of complaint againſt me, that I do not give ſuch advice unto your friend as he deſires : Alas Madam, ſaid Phocilion, if you adviſe me otherwiſe, you will doom him unto deſpair,and it will be a very difficult matter for me not to complain againſt you if you deny what he deſires: Doubtleſs then you would complain without cauſe, replied ſhe; But Phocilion, you muſt not condemn me before you hear me: Therefore give me leave to tell you, that I have ſo great an eſteem of you, that I have ſo good an opinion of your judgment, and that I am ſo fully perſwaded, that you have ſome eſteem of me, as I make no doubt, but that the marriage which you would propoſe unto me, would be very advantageous, but for the moſt horrible averſion which I have againſt Marriage : But Phocilion, let me tell you, that this averſion is ſo very ſtrong in me, as I ſhould certainly hate the man that ſhould make any Propoſitions unto my Father, which ſhould cauſe me to marry him : therefore if you ſet any value upon my advice, let not him for whom you intercede ſpeak unto Straton. But to ſhew you that I do not ſpeak this, becauſe I have any ſecret engagement with any other, I do permit him to ſpeak unto my Father, if he can diſcover unto him, that I do refuſe him upon any other reaſon but what I tell you : But Madam, anſwered Phocilion, I beſeech you take a little longer time of conſideration upon a matter of ſuch importance as this; and tho you forbid this unhappy Lover to ſpeak unto Straton, yet allow him the liberty ſomtimes to tell you how he adores you : Hitherto,replied Eliſa, you have ſpoke nothing which I could except againſt; but Phocilion, theſe laſt words are ſomwhat difficult to be underſtood by one of my humour : Yet ſince

I

I have reſolved to temper my ſharpneſs, I will excuſe and pardon them, upon condition you will do as I bid you in all things : Alas Madam, replied he, Is there any man in the world that is more willing to obey you than I am ? Then I conjure you (ſaid ſhe) Cauſe him for whom you ſpeak, never to ſpeak unto me or my Father concerning his paſſion, and be you your ſelf for ever ſilent, and ſpeak unto me no more of it : But Madam, replied he, what hopes can I then give unto this unfortunate Lover ? Hopes never to ſee me grant unto another that permiſſion which I refuſe him, replied ſhe : However Madam, purſued he, give me leave to argue with you a little againſt this your averſion unto marriage ; and I beſeech you promiſe me, that if I convince and convert you, it ſhall be in favour of this unfortunate Lover : Since I am confident that my heart will never alter, replied ſhe, I am contented, but this Lover you ſpeak of will get no advantage by it. Eliſa pronounced theſe laſt words in ſuch a manner, and ſo perſwaded Phocilion of her real averſion againſt marriage, as he was extreamly ſorry ; for knowing her virtue and reſolute conſtancy, he perceived ſhe was not a perſon that would be ingaged into any kind of Gallantry : So that ſtanding in a deep ſilence and looking upon Eliſa with eyes of ſorrow, he fully perſwaded her that he loved her, and that this ſecret Lover, for whom he had ſolicited, was himſelf: As good luck was, both for Eliſa and Phocilion, I came in and found them both extreamly perplexed : Immediately after Lyriope came in alſo with one of her Cozens, for tho ſhe hated Eliſa, yet ſhe would viſit her ; and preſently after all Poligenes and Agenor alſo entred ſeverally. Since divers marriages were then talked of in Tire, and every one told what they heard : But Eliſa, who had ſome ſecret deſign in it, began to condemn the opinion of thoſe who ſay, that there is a neceſſity a woman ſhould either marry or elſe go into a Nunnery, maintaining, that a greater injury could not be offered unto her Sex, then to think that it muſt either be a Husband, or high walls which only can preſerve their virtue : After this, falling into a general diſcourſe of Marriage, Lyriope who was never of Eliſa's opinion, ſpoke as one who thought that much happineſs was to be found in Marriage; and Eliſa on the contrary maintained, that all married people were almoſt unhappy: For truly, ſaid ſhe, take for example one of the moſt accompliſhed men in the world, and one of the moſt perfecteſt women in all Phenicia, though they do love as well as they can, though they be young, handſom, rich, and think themſelves very happy in Marriage, yet I am moſt infallibly confident, that they will not long continue ſo: For my part (replied Lyriope) I am not of that belief, but conceive that much happineſs may be found by marrying a compleat man, who both loves, and is loved: I concur with you, replied Eliſa, That they may ſomtimes eſteem themſelves happy in marriage; but I tell you, this happineſs is not laſting: For conſider a little the qualifications of this condition, her husband muſt be a very accompliſhed man, they muſt reciprocally love each other, he muſt have an eſtate ſuitable to her Quality, he muſt be neither phantaſtical, jealous, or covetous. Moreover, ſhe muſt enter into all his intereſts, and become ambitious if he be ambitious, entirely ſubject her ſelf unto his humour, obey him without murmur, even in things moſt difficult, and never be at liberty or Miſtreſs of her ſelf. She muſt further be turmoiled with the œconomical cares and conduct of a great houſe, be expoſed to all the peeviſh conſequences of Marriage, loſe perhaps her health and beauty both before ſhe be old, be expoſed to be jealous, or ſuffer her husbands, and at laſt perhaps have wicked, ill-favoured, and ungrateful children.

Theſe things Lyriope are ordinary conſequences of Marriage, and whoſoever looks upon ſuch a Precipice, methinks ſhould be ſo affrighted, as they ſhould not dare to throw themſelves into it: Yes Lyriope, Marriage is a moſt terrible thing, and all thoſe who venture upon it, are certainly very fool hardy: Tho I know very well, ſaid Phocilion, that the fair Lyriope needs no ſecond, yet I beſeech her to give me leave to help her in defence of this cauſe which ſhe maintains. Give me leave I beſeech you Madam (purſued he, and looked upon Eliſa) to tell you, that in ſpeaking as you do, you are moſt injurious unto the Gods; for if there be not any two perſons in the world who can love happily together, without any of thoſe inconveniences which you do aggravate with ſo much zeal, it may be ſaid, that the Gods are unjuſt and imprudent: How can you without extraordinary impiety maintain this againſt them? I muſt confeſs, replied ſhe, that I admire their providence, but neither know it, nor will penetrate into their ſecrets; yet in the mean time I muſt maintain, that as they do not accuſe the Gods when they blame a man who is Shipwrackt, becauſe he ſets out to Sea in a Storm, and in a rotten Veſſel, ſo I do not accuſe the Gods when I blame thoſe, who knowing the crabbed conſequences of Marriage, will yet ingage themſelves in it

Whilſt Lyriope, Eliſa, and Phocilion were thus in diſcourſe, Agenor was all ſilence, not daring to enter into the thoughts of Eliſa. In the mean time, ſince he was more in love with her than with Lyriope, he was pittifully perplexed in being between theſe two, for he would not do any thing which might perſwade Eliſa he was in love with Lyriope, nor would he make the laſt of theſe think he loved her leſs than he had: So that to have the delight of looking upon Eliſa without diſobliging Lyriope, he did ſit down by her, but his cheif reaſon was, becauſe ſhe did ſit oppoſite to Eliſa. Thus ſitting on Lyriopes ſide, and a little behind her, he enjoyed the ſight of Eliſa without any notice taken by the envious Lyriope, but otherwiſe by Poligenes, who eaſily obſerved that the cunning Agenor did ſit purpoſely by Lyriope, that he might the better look upon Eliſa: As for Phocilion, he was ſo buſied with his own paſſion, that he never minded others; for ſince he ſaw the high virtue of Eliſa, he never feared his Rivals; and he was ſo confidently perſwaded that ſhe would not marry, as he never doubted her preferring another before him. Thus the company parted with ſeveral apprehenſions: Poligenes went out in a fear that his Brother would become his Rival. Phocilion was extreamly troubled at the inſenſibility of Eliſa, and her averſion to Marriage, Lyriope was infinitely envious that Eliſa was fairer than her ſelf, and Agenor was much leſs in Love with Lyriope, and much more with Eliſa, who never minding the turbulencies ſhe had cauſed in the minds of others, reſted in her ordinary tranquility; yet the procedure of Phocilion did extreamly oblige her, and invited her to do what ſhe could, to convert an obſequious Lover into a real friend. But this miracle was impoſſible to be wrought, he was reſolved to content himſelf with Eliſa's commands of ſilence, yet he offered once to ſpeak unto her again, but ſhe retired her ſelf in ſuch ſort, that he impoſed upon himſelf ſo ſtrict a ſilence, as he durſt not ſo much as ſigh it in ſecret: 'Tis true, Eliſa to comfort him, did make a promiſe, that if ever ſhe changed her mind, and took a reſolution to marry, the change ſhould conduce unto his advantage, yet conjuring him to believe, that ſhe did not think ſuch a time would ever come, ſhe earneſtly entreated him to live with her as if he were her brother: And indeed Phocilion (whoſe moſt ſecret thoughts I knew) durſt never after this be ſo bold, as to ſpeak one word of his paſſion unto Eliſa.

In the mean time, Lyriope ſtill thinking her ſelf more ſure of Agenors heart, did continue her favours, and gave him a thouſand teſtimonies of a violent paſſion; in the mean time all the Court perceived it, and talked broad of her: All the Adviſes of her friends were in vain, for ſhe had a Maxime which was moſt dangerous for ſuch as would keep their reputations unſtained, which was, to believe, that ſo ſhe were not in any crime, ſhe needed not to fear any reports: But her behaviour coming to the Queens ear, ſhe received ſo ſharp a check for it, that ſhe began to find her indiſcretion: Yet perhaps this had not reſtrained her, nor changed her behaviour towards Agenor without another reaſon, which much induced her: For be pleaſed to know Madam, that Poligenes being perſwaded, the faintneſs of Agenors love to Lyriope proceeded from the eaſineſs which he found in her Spirit: he thought, that to help it, and to hinder the growth of that paſſion which he ſaw began to take root in his heart towards Eliſa, his beſt courſe was, that Lyriope ſhould mix ſome ſeverity with her complacency towards him: So that bethinking himſelf how he might compaſs his deſign, he pitched upon one of the Queens women named Phocinde, who was a friend both unto Lyriope and him. Poligenes being full of wit, did ſo negotiate the matter, that he ingaged her to ſpeak unto Lyriope, of whom he ſeemed to have much eſteem; telling her alſo, though untruly, that he ſhould be very glad if Agenor ſhould marry her. So falling inſenſibly into a confidence concerning this adventure, Phocinde told him, how Lyriope found that of late Agenor was grown a little negligent of her, that notwithſtanding ſhe did all ſhe could to oblige him, aſſuring him, that ſhe was never more pliant and affable, nor more ready to do any thing he deſired her. If I had any intimate friend, replied Poligenes and laughed, who were in love with the fair Phocinde, I would be ſure not to diſcover one ſecret unto her, leſt in advantaging Phocinde I ſhould thereby prejudice my friend; but ſince Fate hath ſo ordered it, that I have no intimacy with any of her Lovers, I will diſcover unto her a weakneſs in men, which doubtleſs ſhe is ignorant of, to the end, that ſhe knowing it, ſhe might adviſe the fair Lyriope, that if ſhe would rekindle in the heart of my Brother a paſſion which I wiſh were violent enough to oblige him to marry her, ſhe then muſt follow it: I do extreamly deſire this alliance, (added he, though untruly) and therefore ſweet Phocinde, I muſt acquaint you with the reaſon why the paſſion of Agenor doth ſo faint towards Lyriope: It is, becauſe ſhe is too too ſweet unto him; for you muſt know, that to ſpeak of Love in general, it is never violent, but when the deſires are violent; and ſince it is impoſſible they ſhould be ſo, when whatſoever they deſire is always eaſily granted, it muſt neceſſarily follow, that to make a paſſion violent, a Lady muſt never grant thoſe favours which ſhe is pleaſed to beſtow, but with much entreaty, to the end a great value may be ſet upon them, and that there be always a long interval between the firſt deſires, and the fruition of the thing deſired: It is for Kings (purſued he) to give ſpeedily, and with a free-will; but it is fit Ladies be ſlow, and to give, as if they almoſt repented; they muſt be niggardly in their favours, for otherwiſe they will be received without delight, they will loſe their value, and conſequently be received with a cheap acknowledgment: It is with the favours of fair ones, as with a little River which runneth ſo ſweetly and ſilently between two graſſie banks, as thoſe who walk near can hardly perceive it; but on the contrary, if it be full of little rocks which obſtructs the paſſage, then it ſwells, it twines, it murmures, it runs after moſt pleaſantly, it diverts thoſe who look upon it, it rowzeth them out of that ſtudy, or at leaſt makes them ſtudy with more delight; therefore Phocinde, the favours of Lyriope to Agenor, muſt not be conferred ſo eaſily and ſo often; for I muſt tell you again, that men do ſlight favours eaſily obtained; and ſince I muſt diſcover the imperfection of my Sex, I muſt tell you my thoughts, which is, that it is more eaſie to revive thoſe flames which an exceſſive ſeverity extinguiſhed, than thoſe which are choaked by too many and continued favours. Since Love is a capricious enemy unto reaſon, a paſſion that ſubjects all Rules and Laws, and ſince it often infuſeth into one and the ſame heart, both fears and hopes, inſolency and reſpect, joy and ſorrow, it would alſo have a continual miſcellany of rigours and favours, bitters and ſweets, which ſucceeding each other, do cauſe deſires to revive in the heart of a Lover, and that love there laſt, and continue without glutting; therefore Phocinde, to reduce my brother within the compaſs of his duty, you muſt adviſe the fair Lyriope to mingle a little ſeverity ſometimes with the favours which ſhe confers upon him: And indeed, beſides the general fault of all men, it is his temper in particular which requires ſuch Phyſick as I ſpeak of; for he being a lover of glory, I am certain he would delight in overcoming any thing that makes reſiſtance; and if ſhe could make him believe, that he is not ſure of her heart, he would out of very obſtinacy only Court her to be entirely his. But Phocinde, this rigour which I adviſe Lyriope to make uſe of to cure the Soul of Agenor, is like certain violent Medicines which the Arabian Phyſitians have invented, they will almoſt raiſe even from very death, if a right quantity be taken, and applied at a right time, but they will alſo kill immediately, if too much be taken, or too little; it muſt be therefore Lyriopes diſcretion, to apply a right doſs of ſeverity, which doubtleſs will produce its deſired effects.

All the while Poligenes talked, Phocinde liſtened with an attentive ear, and was ſo fully perſwaded by his arguments, that ſhe reſolved to adviſe Lyriope as Poligenes deſired her : But to the end it might work a better effect, he obliged Phocinde not to tell her friend how they had talked together , which ſhe promiſed and performed, yet ſhe found it not ſo eaſie a matter to perſwade her friend,as Poligenes did to perſwade her; yet notwithſtanding, perceiving that Agenor was every day more negligent, that he often forgot what ſhe ſaid, and that he was nothing joyed when he ſaw her, that he muſed much when he was with her, and was very much altered, ſhe reſolved to do that for the reducing of Agenor, which ſhe would not do for the preſervation of her reputation: But ſhe not being accuſtomed unto ſeverity, ſhe did it with the worſt grace that ever fair one did, yet at firſt the matter ſucceeded very happily; for the firſt time that Agenor perceived her cold carriage to him, he did very importunately aſk her the reaſon, and perhaps if ſhe had carried the matter handſomly , ſhe had reduced this rebellious Slave; but ſhe having ever more ſpirit than judgment, was ſo glad to ſee the advice of Phocinde had produced ſo good effect, did think that the only way to bring Agenor unto reaſon, was to continue ſtill rigorous ; ſo that following her violent and envious diſpoſition, ſhe did not only ſeem ſevere, but phantaſtical and ſomething worſe : Inſomuch as Agenor, who already loved Eliſa very well, and who was much puzled to find a handſom pretence for quitting Lyriope, made uſe of this which ſhe gave him, and began to ſee her leſs and leſs by degrees, till at laſt he left off ſeeing her at all. Thus the counſel of Poligenes being neither rightly underſtood; nor well executed, produced an effect quite contrary to his deſign, for it quenched a paſſion which he would have kindled , and kindled another which he would have quenched : You may eaſily imagine in what a deſperate condition Lyriope was when ſhe perceived ſhe had loſt her Conqueſt, ſhe broke off with Phocinde, becauſe of the counſel which ſhe gave her, ſhe grew more envious, than before, and began ſo horribly to hate Eliſa, with whom ſhe knew Agenor continually was, that ſhe reſolved to take her for the object of her anger and revenge though ſhe did never voluntarily contribute any thing unto the infidelity of Agenor: For as Eliſa did never ſubject any hearts with any deſign ſo to do, ſo I know of a certainty that ſhe looked upon Agenor as a very pleaſing friend, but yet as a very dangerous Lover, and that there was not a man upon earth of whom ſhe was more afraid to be loved than of him: For ſhe being of a moſt piercing Spirit, did moſt perfectly know his, who being full of boldneſs, craft, and vanity, could not love long without prejudice to thoſe he loved, or at leaſt perſecuting them a hundred ſeveral ways. In the mean time, it was ſo natural unto Eliſa to inſpire reſpect unto all thoſe who came near her, and her ſtatelineſs was ſo faithful a Guardian of her beauty and virtue, that Agenor as bold as he was, durſt never attempt to make a ſerious Declaration of his Love, yet he could not forbear ſighing in ſecret, and ſuffer a thouſand torments, which yet he would not ſuffer to appear: And he would often ſay, that thoſe puling languiſhing Lovers, who are continually ſighing and lamenting were good for nothing but to trouble thoſe they loved? but that on the contrary, the way to get Love was to pleaſe, and the way to pleaſe, was to be pleaſant and merry; and that ſince Love is always repreſented laughing, he concluded that ſighs and tears were not ſo fit for him a joy and divertiſements. Alſo, that ſince Eliſa was of a merry nature, he conceived his beſt courſe was to be diverting her, without any ſerious talk of his paſſion. Likewiſe, conſidering her humour, he thought he ſhould never obtain that liberty; therefore his deſign was, to accuſtom her inſenſibly unto a permiſſion of telling by way of railary that he loved her, conceiving, that ſince ſhe knew the world, and underſtood railary, ſhe would not be offended at a thing of this nature, which he told her laughing, and in the preſence of much company, hoping by this way to hide the truth of his paſſion from the eyes of his Brother, whom he ſuſpected to be in Love with Eliſa, as well as himſelf, and whom he would not have thought that he was his Rival: And indeed, Agenor being one day with Eliſa in a great company, they began to tell him of his inconſtancy to Lyriope, (for this imprudent woman was not leſs ſcandalized for breaking off with Agenor, as ſhe was for contracting amity with him) and ſo much the more, becauſe they ſaid that the Queen intended to ſend her home unto her parents, and was much incenſed againſt her for her ill-carriage of the buſineſs.

Agenor then ſeeing them put a hundred queſtions to him concerning his inconſtancy, reſolved not to let a day paſs without putting his deſign in practiſe; ſo that he put them all off with Jeſts, and was wondrous jocund. For my part, ſaid Eliſa and laughed, if I were in your caſe, I ſhould rather ſay that I never loved Lyriope, and that I only made a ſhew of being ſo, than to confeſs as you do, that you are unfaithful, ſince in caſes of Gallantry, inconſtancy is as great a crime as cozenage, for to the laſt of theſe is only requiſite wit, boldneſs, and invention, but the firſt proceeds only from weakneſs: Alſo I am perſwaded (purſued ſhe) it had been leſs diſhonourable for Lyriope, that you never had loved her, then that you ſhould ceaſe loving and quit her. Since my paſſion was quenched by the rigour of Lyriope, (ſaid he with a diſſembling modeſty) I am perſwaded that my inconſtancy is neither diſhonourable to her nor my ſelf: Never excuſe your ſelf by the rigour of Lyriope (ſaid Polygenes, who was glad he could accuſe him before Eliſa) for I am ſure, that before ſhe began to be ſevere, you began to be inconſtant, and out of your own lightneſs left off loving her, before ſhe did contribute any thing to it: 'Tis true, (anſwered Agenor, and laughed, as if he ſpoke only in merry railary) I am forced to confeſs, that I left loving Lyriope, before ſhe thought of treating me with ſeverity, but yet it was not out of my own lightneſs good brother: What other reaſon beſides could you have (replied Eliſa ſharply:) My reaſon was (replied he, looking upon her, and raiſing his voice that all the Company might the better hear him) becauſe you uſe to make all thoſe inconſtant, who look upon you, and becauſe I cannot be with her, and with you too, becauſe I am often weary to ſee no company about the Queen, whil'ſt all the Gallants of the Court are at your feet adoring you; and becauſe I would do as all others do, that is, ſee you, hear you, admire you, and to tell you boldly before all this company, that which I am ſure not one of your Adorers dares do in ſecret. Agenor ſpeaking this with that blithneſs which was his natural way, and which did very well become him, all the company began to laugh, except Poligenes who bluſht: So that Eliſa not daring to take that ſeriouſly, which ſo many accompliſhed perſons took as a piece of Gallant railary, ſhe began to laugh as the reſt did, yet it was after a ſcorning way, and with a bluſh: But ſhe anſwered Agenor as in reaſon ſhe ought, without any anger, and interpreting the matter as a bare piece of merry wit; and indeed Eliſa thinking it to be ſo: I pray Agenor, ſaid ſhe unto him, make not me an umbrage for your weakneſs, nor loade me with the hatred of Lyriope: So you can admit of my love, ſaid he, never care for her hatred, for thanks be to the Heavens, I am very well cured: I aſſure you, replied Eliſa, I had rather Lyriope ſhould love me than you, and I fear her hatred more than I do yours: As for my hatred Madam, ſaid he unto her, You are ſafe; but as for my Love believe it you are not, for ſince I have made you ſome expreſſions of it before ſo much company, it concerns my honour to go a little farther: But replied ſhe and laughed, as it concerns your honour to go further, ſo it concerns mine to hinder you; and therefore I conjure you to be ſilent, unleſs you will very ſeriouſly have me take the part of Lyriope, and chide you extreamly for quitting ſo fair a perſon: And I pray tell me (ſaid ſhe and laughed ſtill) what aſſurance can I have in the affection of a perfidious Apoſtate? The aſſurance is (replied he) That you will not treat me as ſhe did, and that I hope you will invert the order which ſhe kept with me, for ſhe was ſweet at the beginning, and ſevere in the end, and I hope you will be ſweet in the ending, as you are ſevere in the beginning: Indeed Agenor you are much deceived, ſaid ſhe unto him, I am no Changeling like your ſelf, that which I am once, the ſame ſhall I be as long as I live, and ſince I am crabbed now, I ſhall be ſo for ever: That which you call crabbedneſs, does ſo well become you Madam, ſaid Poligenes to her, that you would wrong your ſelf if you ſhould leave it: Affability and mildneſs would become her better, replied Agenor: Eliſa is ſo ſweet and affable unto her friends, (ſaid I unto Agenor) that I am very glad ſhe is not ſo unto her Lovers, becauſe if ſhe were, I am perſwaded ſhe would not then be ſo unto me: It is a gladneſs which you will long enjoy, replied Phocilion: I am much obliged unto you for your good opinion of me, replied ſhe: And ſo am I to you, ſaid Agenor unto her, for receiving a Declaration of my Love with ſo much indifference, as that you are not ſo much as angry at it: I wonder not, replied Eliſa, that Lyriope ſhould be weary of you, for you have been but one quarter of an hour in telling me you are my Lover, and I perceive you do not know what you would have; ſometimes you ſay affability and mildneſs becomes me, and other times that my anger obligeth you; and therefore all I can ſay is, that I repent my ſelf of accuſing you for inconſtancy to Lyriope, and am ſo far from thinking that you quitted her, as I think that ſhe drives you away for troubling her with your impertinences, for truly you have wearied me already, though you have only told me the ſame in jeſt, which you told her ſeriouſly.

After this Agenor would have replied, but Eliſa addreſſing her diſcourſe unto me, did alter the ſubject, and made all the company do the like. In the mean while, Phocilion obſerved a little better than Poligenes, how maugre the mirth of Agenor, that which he ſeemed to ſpeak in jeſt, was really true: And alſo he perceived by the reſtleſsneſs of Poligenes, that his affection to Eliſa was not of the ſame nature he ſaid it was, ſo that Phocilion found two Rivals more than ere he thought of, the one of which concealed his paſſion by diſcovering it, and the other diſcovered it unto Eliſa, by hiding it, or at leaſt gave her ſome cauſe to gueſs at it. Phocilion yet had not that ſadneſs of ſoul which uſe inſeparably to follow the diſcovery of freſh Rivals, for on the one ſide he feared not Eliſa; and on the other ſide Poligenes, who was ſubtil, and experimented in matters of gallantry, after a ſerious obſervation of his brother, he apprehended him to be deſperately in Love with Eliſa, yet the light humour of Agenor, and the auſtere gravity of Eli- ſa eaſed him of his fears. Agenor alſo, intending to deceive his brother, went at night unto his Chamber to ſee him, and began to expreſs his joys at all he had ſaid that afternoon unto Eliſa: For ſaid he, I am ſure Lyriope will know it, and ſo I ſhall be fully revenged on her for her ſeverity to me: Indeed Madam, Agenor did jeſt it out ſo well, as he did much puzle Poligenes, and made him doubt of that which he believed but one quarter of an hour before. In the mean time he continued his way with Eliſa, as he had done the day before, even before Straton, who took much pleaſure in what he ſaid; the preſence of Barcea did not hinder him, as phantaſtical as ſhe was; ſo that Eliſa was forced unto a cuſtom of this publique Gallantry, and the rather, becauſe ſhe did not believe Agenor was really in Love with her, yet ſhe was every day moved unto ſome fits of anger againſt him, but the jocandry of Agenor did preſently pacifie her, ſhe conceived that Agenors aim in it was only to ſpite Lyriope, for when there was much company, Agenor would then be ſure to be full of his Courtſhip, and addreſs himſelf to her with a thouſand pleaſant Gallantries: He would then be always next her, he would look ſeriouſly upon her, commend her to the heavens, obſerve her diligently, and do every thing that Love could prompt the moſt violent and paſſionate Lover unto: All this he did with a moſt admirable freedom of Spirit, which made Eliſa believe that his heart was not at all ingaged. But the rareſt part of this ſtory was, that though Agenor was full of a thouſand Gallantries when much company was preſent, yet when they were gone, and he remained alone with her, then he became as ſilent and timorous as a Sheep, he loſt all his confident boldneſs, he was all ſerious and ſadneſs, and diſcourſed with Eliſa only of things indifferent: But that which Agenor did, with deſign Eliſa ſhould thereby gueſs at his paſſion, was it which kept her from not knowing it, it not being imaginable, that a Lover ſpeaking without any Witneſſes unto the perſon he loved, ſhould not then give her ſome cauſe to think he loved her: However Agenor was always with Eliſa, as much as he could, and ſpoke to her of his paſſion, when there was much company, but not a word to her, when they were alone together : But however, this phantaſtical proceeding of his, procured him a thouſand priviledges ; for ſince he was full of pleaſant diſcourſe, and much delighted Eliſa, it moved her to talk more with him than with any other Moreover, every one did contribute their aſſiſtance unto ſuch a piece of Gallantry, as afforded ſuch jocand diverſion, and to the heart-burning of his Rivals, it procured him great familiarity with Eliſa, and to be continually with her : Alſo he ſo got the love of Straton, as he could not endure he ſhould be a day out of his ſight : On the other ſide, Lyriope knowing of Agenors procedure, did imagine, that perhaps he did not love Eliſa, but that he uſed this open Gallantry as a puniſhment for her ſeverity, and ſtill loved her in his heart : So that this undiſcreet woman practiſed a hundred unprofitable ſtratagems to reduce him, which did indeed drive him further off, and which augmented her hatred and fury againſt Eliſa, when ſhe perceived that really ſhe had no ſhare in the heart of Agenor, who went on in his ordinary cuſtom ; and he ſo uſed Eliſa unto his complacential diſcourſe, as ſhe returned anſwers without any anger. None of his Rivals were jealous, except Poligenes, who could not digeſt this divertiſement, which paſſed only for a piece of merry Wit. In the mean while, Eliſa's ſcrupulous virtue began to fear that Agenor would tell her that ſeriouſly in private, which he in a Railary told her publickly, and ſhe was the ſooner induced unto this thought, becauſe Poligenes and I coming together to ſee her, we found Agenor there, who as ſoon as ever he ſpied us, began his uſual way of Gallantry. This ſticking in the ſtomack of Poligenes, he fell into ſo deep a ſtudy, as Eliſa could not chooſe but chide him, for not hearkning unto what they ſaid, asking of what he thought ? I think Madam, ſaid he unto her, that I had rather know what you did my Brother the honour to ſay unto him when Telamis and I entred, than to know what Agenor ſaith now.

Poligenes had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Eliſa bluſht, and then imagined that her fears were not ill grounded, yet ſhe would not take it as in earneſt, but on the contrary, ſhe told Poligenes, ſhe was much obliged unto him, for hinting unto her, that ſhe ſhould not ſuffer Agenor to talk with her in private: Then Madam, replied Agenor, it ſeems you would have me talk to you of Love perpetually, whereas before I talk unto you of it only in publique, and never in private: However, replied E*liſa*, I will for the future never talk unto you without Witneſſes: I ſhall be much beholding to you for it (ſaid he) for when I was alone with you, I was in ſuch fear of you, and reſpect did impoſe ſuch a cruel ſilence upon me, as I never durſt tell the thoughts of my heart unto you: Truly, ſaid E*liſa* and laughed, I do not think that ever Lover returned the like thanks: However it be, replied ſhe, I had rather you ſhould ſpeak unto me of Love in publique, then of things indifferent in private. But Madam, I will not inſiſt any longer upon relation of trifles, which are not fully pertinent: Let me tell you only, that E*liſa* after this, did warily avoid all diſcourſe with Agenor in private: So that when he determined to talk ſeriouſly unto her concerning his paſſion, and to perſwade her he was in earneſt, he was much puzled to find out a fit opportunity. In the mean time Phocilion behaved himſelf towards E*liſa*, in ſuch a reſpective and obliging manner, that in very acknowledgment of it, ſhe thought her ſelf much ingaged to him, and permitted him once to tell her, that the Lover of whom he ſpoke, and himſelf, were one and the ſame perſon, yet he could draw no further advantage from this favour, but that ſhe promiſed him again, if ever ſhe altered her reſolution, and did intend to marry, it ſhould be in favour with him, but withal ſhe told him at the ſame time, that ſhe believed this time would never come, and therefore conjured him to content himſelf with being in the number of her friends. I ſhall not ſpend any time Madam in telling you how many Slaves the fair eyes of E*liſa* did captivate, for the number is ſo great as it is incredible, all whom ſhe treated with extream rigour; but I will apply my ſelf principally unto thoſe whoſe perſons and humours I have already deſcribed.

To proſecute therefore my intention, give me leave to tell you then, that Agenor ſeeing the more he told E*liſa* in publick, he was in Love with her, the leſs ſhe believed him; he reſolved therefore upon a ſecret way of declaring it unto her, yet he did conſider this deſign as the moſt dangerous that he could attempt: But ſince he could not endure to love, and not be beloved, he reſolved to put it unto the hazard. In the mean time E*liſa* avoiding all occaſions of privacy with him, ſinc the diſcourſe of Poligenes he was many days before h could meet with his deſired opportunity, yet he was th fitteſt man in the World, to put the moſt difficult matters into execution, and to cloſe with any occaſion which offered themſelves; for beſides his being very cunning, diligent, and ingenuous, he had many ſervants and creatures who knew very well how to diſcover whatſoever he deſired to know, and who would follow his directions moſt exactly: Moreover, he was Maſter of a moſt inſinuating and flattering affability, which joyned unto his liberal diſpoſition, did render him an abſolute Maſter of the Domeſticks in the houſes, where he had any intereſt of Gallantry, and by this means he could eaſily know when much company was with E*liſa*, and when none: He was ſo faithfully advertiſed, as he knew ſhe had commanded one morning, that they ſhould ſay ſhe was not within: So that making uſe of the familiarity which he had with Straton, he went to dine with him: After Dinner he would conduct Eliſa, unto her Chamber, who deſiring to ſee no body, would neither ſtay in the Chamber of Straton, nor Barcea's: She would alſo have hindred Agenor from carrying her unto her Chamber, but her Father, who loved Agenor very well, deſired her to accept of the civility of him who was his friend, ſo that ſhe was forced to permit him. When he was at the door, where ſhe believed he would have left her, he ſeemed as if he had a pleaſant matter to impart unto her, ſo that he being accuſtomed to tell ſuch things, ſhe enterated him to enter: After which, Agenor inventing ſome kind of odd ſtory or other, for a pretence of beginning his diſcourſe with her, ſhe thought that he had no farther deſign, but to tell this adventure alone. But after he had told it, and ſhe deſired him to retire, Agenor began his intended Speech. Madam (ſaid he unto her in a low voice, leſt he ſhould be heard by two women who were in the Chamber) I am not yet at the end of my buſineſs, for the truth is Madam, I muſt acquaint you with a buſineſs which I fear will ſurprize you, though it ought not to do ſo, and which is likely to vex you, though alſo it ought not: For ought I ſee, replied Eliſa, you think me to be very unjuſt, ſince you ſay I ſhall be ſurprized and angred at that which I ought not to be; however, I deſire to know what thing this is? It is Madam (ſaid he unto her) That there is a man in the world who extreamly laments that you ſhould not know how he adores you, though he has told you of it a hundred thouſand times. How's this (replied Eliſa, and bluſht for anger, not thinking Agenor did ſpeak of himſelf) Is there any man in the world who was ſo inſolent, as to tell me he loved me? I knew Madam (replied Agenor faintly) that you could not endure to hear me without cholor: Yet I would have you tell me (replied Eliſa innocently) who this man is that has loſt either his reaſon, or memory, or both: I will Madam, replied he, but it ſhall be upon a condition you will not baniſh me, though I ſhould tell you ſuch things as ſhall diſpleaſe you, for unleſs you promiſe me this very ſolemnly, you ſhall never know it: It is not my cuſtom, replied ſhe, to condemn the innocent with the culpable; but ſince you will not truſt my equity, I will promiſe not to baniſh you, though you tell who this Mad-man is which hath a hundred thouſand times told me that which perhaps he never told me ſo much as once: But I pray tell me (purſued ſhe) in what Country was he born, and what is his name? The man of whom I ſpeak (replied this crafty Lover) was born in Tire, and his name is Agenor: Agenor (replied Eliſa and laughed, not beleiving he ſpoke ſeriouſly) he is ſo accuſtomed to talk fooliſhly, as that there is no heed to be taken what he ſays. and though I know him better than ever I did, yet I will not be always overreached by him. Oh Madam, ſaid he, I wiſh to the heavens you did know me, for is it poſſible you ſhould think, that when I told you before all the world I loved you, I told you ſo only, becauſe that kind of diſcourſe ſeemed a diverſion? Indeed I did ſo, anſwered Eliſa, and I think ſo ſtill, and ſhall do ſo as long as I live, and I ſhall never think otherwiſe; alſo I think it is advantagious to you that I ſhould do ſo: Then I have no other buſineſs in this world, but to prepare my ſelf for death, replied Agenor: Was there ever ſuch a fatal accident as this? Can I not perſwade you that I love you, only becauſe I have told you ſo too oft and too publickly? I pray Agenor (replied Eliſa, ſtill thinking he jeſted) do not inveigh ſo againſt my incredulity; and be moſt confident that if I did believe you, you ſhould not talk thus long with me.

It is not perhaps ſo eaſie a matter as you think, ſaid he, to impoſe ſilence upon a deſperate Lover, and ſuch a Lover as is accuſtomed every day to ſay he loves you, without any ſecret confinement of his paſſion. However it be, ſaid Eliſa, I declare unto you, that I cannot endure this kind of Gallantry when none is preſent: Railary ſuits beſt with a tumult, and is fitteſt for a general Converſation, not for a private: Thoſe who jeſt ſhould have many laughters ſtanding by them; they loſe the pleaſure of their conceits when only a ſingle perſon hears it; and certainly when two only talk together, they ought to be more ſerious. I do proteſt Madam, replied he, I did never in my life ſpeak a truth more ſeriouſly then this, when I ſaid in railary that I loved you, and whatſoever I ſaid did really proceed from the very thoughts of my heart. Take heed (ſaid Eliſa and interrupted him) you do not give me cauſe to think you are ſerious, for ſince your company is very pleaſant, I ſhould be very ſorry to baniſh you. It is not in your power to do it, replied he, for I engaged you by Oath to the contrary. No, no (ſaid Eliſa and laughed) do not think me ſo ſimple as to believe you. I wonder Madam, replied he, you ſhould not believe me: Though I had never told you that I loved you, yet methinks my aſſiduous viſits only ſhould have perſwaded you of it. If you had never told me, replied ſhe, I ſhould ſooner and more eaſily have believed you, and you perhaps have been more happy in your deſires. Alas, Madam, replied he, if I ſhould not love you, what ſhould I do with that paſſionate Soul which the Gods did give me when they gave me life? How is it poſſible a heart ſo eaſie to be enflamed as mine is, ſhould know you and not love you, eſpecially knowing you ſo perfectly as I do? For truly Madam, I muſt needs tell you, that there is not one of my Rivals who knows the tranſcendence of your merits ſo well as I do: Since it is my whole ſtudy and care to obſerve you, I may boaſt that I know better then they how ſuperlative your beauty is above others, and how your merit tranſcends all of your ſex and time: And ſince ſo Madam, how can you conceive it poſſible I ſhould not love you? Let me tell you once more Agenor (ſaid Eliſa and interrupted him) that I cannot endure this Railary unleſs it be before much company; nor can I imagine, a man really in love can in a jeſt tell it to the perſon whom he loves, before a hundred ſeveral perſons. Alas Madam, replied he, if you would permit me to tell it you in private, I ſhould never have ſaught unto this weak remedy of my miſery; but ſince I know you to be auſtere even unto Cruelty it ſelf, I thought it beſt to deceive you and my Rivals, and to make uſe of this invention until I had rendred you ſome ſuch ſervice as might in reaſon hope for a pardon of my raſhneſs in daring to adore you. Eliſa hearing this, was much at a ſtand, for on the one ſide ſhe had ſome reaſon to believe that he had a mind to deceive her, and on the other ſide ſhe feared there was ſome truth in his expreſſions, ſince he ſeemed to ſpeak very ſeriouſly: So that chuſing rather to incline unto ſeverity, then to give him any reaſon of belief that ſhe was leſs auſtere than uſual, ſhe was reſolved to afford him no hopes, therefore making all the auſterity of her Soul to appear in her eyes, in her aſpect, and in her language, this Lover, as ſtout and bold as he was, found himſelf put to a pitiful perplexity. Leave off Agenor (ſaid ſhe unto him) leave off ſpeaking thus as you do, unleſs you will loſe my eſteem for ever, either under the notion of a Friend or of a Lover: If the laſt of theſe, I ought not to ſuffer you after all this impudent boldneſs; if the firſt, yet ought I to break off with you, ſince you have ſo little complacence as at my deſire not to leave off that Railary which I endure in publique, leſt I ſhould ſeem fantaſtical, but which I adhor in private.

Agenor, who was acquainted with Eliſa's humors very well, perceived by the tone of her voice, that if he obſtinately continued his telling her ſeriouſly he loved her, that he ſhould be baniſhed; therefore he durſt not do it: ſo that fearing to render himſelf more miſerable by ſtriving to prevent it, he took up another Reſolution, which was to conquer himſelf, to ſhut up all his melancholy in the cabinet of his heart, and to put on a face of Joy. After which, beginning to ſpeak in that frolique tone which he uſed in his Railary: Truly Madam, ſaid he unto her, I am now arrived at that point which I propoſed unto my ſelf, ſince I have made you angry: but for all that (purſued he and laughed) never think Madam, that to appeaſe you I will go and ſay I do not love you, for that's a little too courſe to tell a Lady, eſpecially a Lady ſo ſuperlatively fair as Eliſa is; ſuch words as theſe ſhall never come out of my mouth: be contented I aſſure you, that I am what I ought to be unto you, that I ſee how you receive Declarations of Love from others, and that I may know whether the friendſhip you are pleaſed to honour me with, be ſtrong enough to let me tell you what others do: But upon ſecond and more ſerious thoughts, and ſince I perceive I have no particular priviledg above others, I will begin to behave my ſelf as I did before, that is, to ſpeak upon matters of Love unto you in publique, and of things indifferent in private.

Agenor having the quickeſt and moſt nimble wit of my man alive, he ſaid this unto Eliſa in ſuch a manner, as almoſt perſwaded her, that it was only one of his old humours of railary, or ſuch a pleaſant trick as one knows not how to be angry at; ſo that ſhe being in a kind of confuſion betwixt mirth and anger, ſhe began to laugh with Agenor for company, yet grumbled at the fallacy which he put upon her, as if ſhe were not altogether deceived, and as if the anger ſhe had expreſſed was not real ſaying ſhe never thought him to be in earneſt: However after much bandying betwixt them, Eliſa drave Agenor away from her, believing indeed that it was as he had told her; yet ſomtimes ſhe would think her ſelf only neutral and indifferent towards him, but never thought him poſſeſſed with any violent paſſion to her, imagining, (if it be permitted to ſay ſo) that his ſoul was only poſſeſſed with an amorous friendſhip: As for Agenor, he went from Eliſa in mighty pelt: Have not I (ſaid he to himſelf, as he told me afterwards) ſpoken of Love unto Eliſa, more then ever any did ſince Cupid made any lovers, and can it be that Eliſa ſhould not know I love her? But why was I ſo ſimple, ſince I had ſpoke ſeriouſly enough to make her angry, as to endeavour the appeaſing of her, rather then the perſwading her of a truth which ſhe muſt know, Yet what would that her knowledg have availed me, if upon it ſhe would both baniſh and hate me? What ſhall I do? ſaid he, To what purpoſe is it to tell in publique that I love her, ſince there by I ſhall not be believed when I tell her it in private? And to what purpoſe is it to make her believe it,if it be her reſolution to love no body? Yet I muſt not deprive my ſelf of the pleaſure which I take in telling her that, which none but my ſelf dare tell her. Who knows, but by continuing in this courſe, I may in the end be ſo happy, as that ſhe will tell her ſelf in ſecret, that which I dare only tell her in publique, and make her know the truth without being angry? As auſtere as ſhe is, her heart perhaps is not ſo inſenſible as ſhe thinks it; for ſince it can be tender in point of friendſhip, it is not impoſſible but it may become ſo in point of Love. Theſe Madam were the reaſonings of Agenor, who indeed carried the buſineſs towards Eliſa as formerly he did.

In the mean time Poligenes obſerving by an hundred of his brothers actions, that certainly he was in Love with Eliſa, reſolved to impede the progreſs of this paſſion,not imagining it to be yet grown unto a height of violence, nor doubting but that Agenors obligations to him, and the reſpect which he both owed and uſed to pay, would make him ceaſe his pretentions, ſo ſoon as he ſhould acquaint him that he himſelf loved Eliſa: So that by this means Poligenes reſolved to diſcover unto one of his Rivals that he loved Eliſa, before he had diſcovered it unto her ſelf; but to tranſact more ſurely,and that at the ſame time,he was negotiating with Agenor to caſt off Eliſa,he might alſo oblige Eliſa to caſt off Agenor,he reſolved to have diſcourſe with her unto this effect, the which I ſhall preſently acquaint you with; but ſince he was reſolved to begin with Agenor, he ſought out for a fit opportunity of talking with him, which he could not meet with until the next morning, for of late they did not lodg together. To this end he ingaged him to a ſolitary walk which is in Tire, and which certainly is one of the moſt pleaſant in the world: For be pleaſed to know Madam, that Tire being an Iſle ſeparated from the Continent only by a little diſtance, the banks oppoſite to this ſtately Town make a moſt pleaſant proſpect unto the place where Poligenes carried Agenor.

But ſince it is ſomething neceſſary that I deſcribe unto you the place where they walked, in order to your better underſtanding of the paſſage, let me tell you, that on the Eaſt ſide of the further part of the Town, which hath no other walls in that place, than what Nature fortified by impoſſible acceſs, where the Rocks make a long Tarras of above five hundred paces, upon which eight or ten perſons may walk a breaſt, there being upon the left ſide of this Rocky walk which riſeth and falls ſometimes more, ſometimes leſs, ſeveral Grots extreamly pleaſant and cool, where weary walkers may reſt themſelves, if the Sun or ran annoy them. On the other ſide, is the Sea, which daſhing ſometimes to the very top of this natural Tarras (as I may term it) and making a noiſe mixed both of terror and delight, doth pleaſingly entertain thoſe who walk there alone. Moreover, the ſight of that oppoſite ſhore of which I ſpoke before, adds much pleaſure to the place; for Madam, ſince there is not one rich Inhabitant of Tire, who hath not ſome houſe there, it appears full of magnificent Structures and and pleaſant Gardens. Alſo the Port full of Ships and Gallies, makes rhe moſt pleaſant proſpect in the word, together with the ſight of the main Sea at the end of this Tarras walk, where the eye hath nothing to look upon but Ships which go and come to Tire, and ſeveral Boats of Fiſhers in many places, eſpecially towards the evening, which was the time when Poligenes brought Agenor to this lovely place.

But before I tell you of their being there, be pleaſed to know Madam, that Phocilion whoſe paſſion was as reſpectful as violent, having then no confident of his paſſion did much delight in ſolitary contemplation, when he could not be with Eliſa: So that having paſſed over almoſt all the day, and lodging near this pleaſant walk, he went thither, ſending away all his men, and reſolved to ſtay there very late. When he was at the end of this long Tarras, as he turned back, he ſpied afar off Poligenes and Agenor, who taking no notice of him, were talking earneſtly to each other. Phocilion, having no mind to interrupt either them or himſelf, went into one of thoſe pleaſant Grots of which I ſpoke before, intending to let them paſs by, and to go out when they were at a diſtance from him; but to the end he might not be perceived by them, chance inviting into a Grot that had many crannies and concavites one within another, he paſſed from the firſt into the ſecond. In the mean time, juſt as he entred, there chanced to fall one of thoſe ſudden Summer ſhowers of rain, which unexpectedly uſe to ſurprize, and cannot be foreſeen: This cauſed Poligenes and Agenor to look out for ſhelter, and to enter haſtily into the ſame Grot where Phocilion was: But ſince their deſign was only to avoid the rain, they took up with the firſt, and never looked into the ſecond, out of which Phocilion had come into their company, if he had not heard Poligenes and Agenor name Eliſa: So that ſince it was impoſſible, not to be curious of knowing what theſe two men, whom he ſuſpected to be his Rivals, did ſpeak of the perſon whom he loved, he ſtood ſtill in the place where he was unperceived, and where he might hear all they ſaid, the hollowneſs of the ſecond Grot eaſily receiving the ſound of their voices. They were no ſooner ſet, but Phocilion with a liſtning ear, heard Poligenes begin to ſpeak: I ſee very well (ſaid he unto his Brother) that you were deſirous to know, why I talked yeſterday unto you ſo much concerning Eliſa, and why I am ſo very deſirous to know what you think of her beauty, of her wit, and all the reſt of her charms, and thinking that perhaps you did not anſwer me ſincerely, I will acquaint you with the true reaſon which moved me to ask you what your thoughts of her were; I know very well, that you are very deeply ingaged in Love to her, if you be at all, but fearing you ſhould too much intangle your ſelf in a buſineſs which can never be effected, I thought now to teſtifie unto you, how dear your tranquility is unto me, and what confidence I have in your diſcretion: Know therefore Agenor (ſaid he unto him) that I have loved Eliſa even from her very Cradle: Do you love Eliſa, (replied Agenor with as much aſtoniſhment in his countenance, as if he had never ſuſpected any thing?) Yes Brother (replied Poligenes) I do love her, and love her in that height, as it is impoſſible for any to love her more; therefore perceiving you apt to ingage your ſelf my Rival, I had a deſire to prevent it, by truſting you with my ſecret, which is, that though Eliſa be all virtue, even in the abſtract, yet I believe if her auſterity ever ſuffer any to adore her, it muſt be my ſelf who muſt enjoy that happineſs: Since I have continually ſeen her ever ſince ſhe ſaw the light, and ſince my Love of her began to be known unto her ever ſince ſhe could know her ſelf, my paſſion hath not made ſuch a noiſe in the world, as the paſſions of all the reſt of her Lovers have done; and indeed you may perceive, that I am entertained with more familiarity than they, that ſhe never is ſhy in talking privately with me, and that ſhe ſeems much my friend unto thoſe who do not know I am her Lover; therefore Agenor make uſe of this advice which now I give you, and think, that I do not give it out of jealouſy, but only to the end you ſhould not loſe your time which ought to be moſt precious unto you: For truly, ſaid he and ſmiled, you are juſt now at an age fitteſt to make Conqueſts: If I had not loved you dearly, I ſhould have let you run on in your error, as all the Court doth, and ſhould have taken delight in ſeeing how you deceived your ſelf like all the reſt of my Rivals, but it was my love to you that would not ſuffer it.

Whilſt Poligenes was talking thus without any interruption, Agenor was conſulting with himſelf what reſolution to take, and being fuller of ſubtility than Poligenes, he knew very well, that what he ſaid was only to ſtave him off from Eliſa: So that he reſolved upon a courſe as bold as wicked, and anſwered unto Poligenes in theſe terms, whilſt Phocilion unperceived, did hearken both with wonder and attention; Brother (ſaid Agenor unto Poligenes) I am very unhappy, in that you did me not the honour to acquaint me with your love to Eliſa, at that time when adviſed me to preſerve that affection which Lyriope ſeemed to have towards me, for then the reſpect and duty which I owed you, might eaſily have quenched thoſe ſparks of Love to Eliſa in me, which now are grown to a flame. Since I had then no ſuſpition of your paſſion to her, I muſt confeſs, my ſoul is ſo wholly devoted to her, that it is abſolutely impoſſible for me to diſengage it; Not but that if I were fully perſwaded (added he moſt craftily) you were more in her favour than I, and that ſhe would make you happy, then I would reſolve to make my ſelf miſerable, I would then voluntarily exile my ſelf, and yield Eliſa unto you: But Poligenes (purſued he) I am moſt confident ſhe deludes you, and that you are not in ſuch favour with her as you think you are, and that you have a Rival above you in her thoughts: For indeed by your own confeſſion Eliſa knows you love her, and takes it very well: Do you count that nothing (replied Poligenes) and do you think it is not a greater favour to be ſuffered by the moſt auſtere perſon in the world, than all the beauties in Phenicia can confer? I do indeed believe (replied Agenor faintly) that you have ſome reaſon to take it as a favour, but I believe alſo, that the Lover of whom I ſpeak, has reaſon to think himſelf more in Eliſa's favour than you are. I wonder (replied Poligenes ſharply) that if there were any ſuch thing, you have not ſtaved off ſuch a Rival from Eliſa; for believe it, I, who ſeem not ſo violent as you are, if I knew any ſo happy, as you would make me believe there is, I would not let him continue long ſo: I am very ſorry Brother (replied Agenor, and aſſuming a moſt ſerious countenance) That I muſt needs diſcover a ſecret to you, which I reſolved never to impart unto any, but the condition wherein I find your Soul, and mine, for your ſake, moves me to hazard all the happineſs of my life, rather than fail in point of friendſhip: Hear me then I conjure you, and if it be poſſible for you to be juſt in your own cauſe, I am moſt confident you will condemn your ſelf, and confeſs that I am not able to yield Eliſa unto you.

At theſe words Poligenes bluſht, and Phocilion in his Grot had ſuch turbulent pangs of Soul, that he could not chuſe but make a noiſe as he was ſhifting place, to the end he might hear the better: But they were ſo attent upon their diſcourſe, as they took no notice of it, ſo that Agenor proceeded: I know very well (ſaid he unto Poligenes) that I ſhall make you extreamly ſad, and my joys, of being more in Eliſa's favour than any whoſoever, is exceſſive. Alas, Agenor, ſaid Poligenes, and interrupted him, your green experience deludes you, it may be you think, that becauſe Eliſa was delighted a little with your publick Gallantry, therefore ſhe loves you more than any other: But believe it Agenor, believe it confidently, that the hearts of thoſe who are perſwaded unto love, are never moved by publick talk before ſo much company: However it be, ſaid Agenor, I have told her that in private, which you never did, and I am ſure I never expreſſed one paſſionate word before you and others, but I expreſſed the ſame when I have been alone with her: But I pray Brother, without further moving me to betray Eliſa's ſecrets, why do you not make ſome reflection upon things paſt, and from them draw infallible proofs of my happineſs? Have you not ſeen me ſlight Lyriope, who loaded me with favours, and that Eliſa did burthen me with the weight of her Chains? Lyriope was fair, ſhe loved me, and I did not hate her: Can you think that becauſe Eliſa is fairer than Lyriope, that I would quit her who favoured me, to take one that was rigorous? No, no, Poligenes, I am not of that compoſition, hopes is always as much in my heart as Love is, and I cannot tell whether or no it ſometimes precedes it; believe it I ſhould never have left Lyriope, if I had not ſome cauſe to believe Eliſa would be favourable to me; I know that my way of carriage to her hath been ſomething extraordinary, but I know alſo that by-ways are often the ſhorteſt: Yet I cannot believe, replied Poligenes, that the way which you have taken, will ever lead you to the heart of Eliſa, nor that you have found out this blind way, which ſo many men have only ſought for in vain: I could eaſily let you run on in your error, replied Agenor, but ſince it is advantageous unto my Love, that you be undeceived, I will acquaint you upon what terms I am with Eliſa.

Then began Agenor to tell a thouſand confident lyes to Poligenes, aſſuring him, that he held a moſt intimate correſpondency with Eliſa, that they two had agreed upon a thouſand things, which he repeated one after another; that ſhe took in ſerious earneſt all that he ſeemed to ſpeak in Railary, and that when they were in private together ſhe would tell him all that the reſt of her Loverr ſaid unto her.

If it be ſo, (ſaid Poligenes to try whether Agenor ſpoke truth) you know in what terms I expreſſed my paſſion unto her. Agenor now was put to a non-plus; yet remembring he had heard his Brother ſay that he would never diſcover his Love until he was almoſt ſure of being loved, he imagined (whatſoever he ſaid to the contrary) that he had never openly declared himſelf unto Eliſa: Therefore without any demur to his Queſtion; as for you, ſaid he unto him, I muſt needs confeſs that Eliſa never told me you ſpoke unto her of your Love: Perhaps the reaſon why ſhe would not tell me was becauſe I being your Brother, ſhe would not mock at your paſſion as ſhe did at the reſt of her Lovers: But certainly, ſhe ranked you only in the Catalogue of her Friends when ſhe ſpoke unto me; and therefore I never ſuſpected you to be in love with her, and conſequently I am innocently engaged to be your Rival; but ſo far engaged that I cannot make a retreat. Poligenes hearing Agenor ſay ſo, made no queſtion but he ſaid truly: For ſince he knew very well that he never told Eliſa how he loved her, the concordance of Agenor's talk with this truth, moved him to believe all that he ſaid both before and after: But ſince Jealouſie made him invent a way how to pick out ſome advantage by his knowledge of all the paſſages between Eliſa and Agenor, he confined his anger and his ſorrows unto the cloſet of his own breaſt, and beginning to ſpeak: Go on you happy Lover (ſaid he unto him) and acquaint me with all your good fortune, that by quaſhing all my hopes, I may not diſturb your felicity But is it true (ſaid he unto him ſuddenly) that this auſtere woman, who has ſlighted ſo many Princes and Kings, can ſo far ſuffer her heart to be captivate as to tell you that ſhe loves you?

I dare not ſay poſitively that ſhe did, replied he. But is it poſſible, replied Poligenes, that ſhe ſhould tell you of all thoſe who adored her? I aſſure you, replied he, that ſince the late King went unto Cryſiles, I know all paſſages. Yet Phocilion, anſwered Poligenes, ſeems to be more in her favour, than to be comprized in that Raillary which ſhe uſeth to all her Lovers: Yet he is not, replied Agenor, but is more mockt at than others, Phocilion at theſe words thought out of a rapture of ſorrow to come out of the place where he ſtood concealed; but his deſire of hearing more, though what he had already heard was nothing pleaſant, reſtrained him: Yet he heard not much more which did directly concern himſelf, for Poligenes paſſing from one diſcourſe unto another, talked unto Agenor with extream diſſimulation. I could never have believed, ſaid he unto him, that one of my Rivals ſhould be happy, and I not horridly hate him; yet ſince I know very well that the choice which Eliſa hath made is juſt, I will condemn my ſelf: But ſince it is impoſſible I ſhould ſo ſuddenly fall from Love unto luke-warm indifferency; and ſince I had need to know whether Eliſa confers any freſh favours before I quit all pretentions to her; I conjure you to acquaint me with all that ſhe confers upon you, and not to think it ſtrange, if in waiting till you receive ſuch as ſhall ſtifle my Love, I continue ſeeing her. Agenor, very glad of this Propoſition which Poligenes made, told him of a thouſand imaginary favours, and aſſured him, that he would give him a Diurnal of the happy Progreſs of his Paſſion; asking a thouſand pardons, and profeſſing as many ſorrows for being an irremovable obſtacle unto his good fortune,

After which, theſe two Rivals ſeeing the ſhowre was paſt, went out of the Grot, and walked to the end of the pleaſant Tarraſs, ſtill talking of Eliſa. As for Phocilion, he was ſo aſtoniſhed at what he heard, as that he thought to ſtay and die in the Grot; but at laſt he went out, and taking away quite contrary to that of his Rivals, he went with all haſte home, not knowing any reaſon why he ſhould be ſo haſty. He was no ſooner there, but tells his ſervants he would not ſup, he ſhut himſelf in his Chamber, muſing ſo profoundly upon this cruel adventure, as he was not Maſter of his own thoughts. Is it poſſible, ſaid he to himſelf, that Eliſa whoſe virtues ſeemed always unto me more admirable than her beauty, whoſe auſterity ſeemed invincible who ſeemed to affect glory with ſo much zeal, that ſhe ſhould have any private engagements both with Poligenes and Agenor? all this at the ſame time when ſhe aſſured me, that if hereafter ſhe ever inclined to marry, it ſhould be unto me? Certainly I miſtook them: Yet all theſe cruel words between Poligenes and Agenor were ſo diſtinctly pronounced, and are ſo rivited in my memory, as I have not loſt the leaſt ſyllable. It is too true (added this deſperate Lover) Eliſa has but a ſeeming virtue; her auſterity is but an umbrage to deceive thoſe who think they know her beſt; and that Soul which I thought to be far above all the imbecillities of her Sex, is capable of the greateſt follies, which is, to love many at once. Is it poſſible (cried he) that the proud Eliſa ſhould ſcoff at the poor Phocilion, and ſacrifice him unto the happineſs of Agenor? and could I hear it from the mouth of two Rivals whom I thought worſe treated then my ſelf, and live? If I can endure this, I ſhall merit my misfortune: But I muſt either die for grief, or elſe I muſt kill one of my Rivals, or he kill me. Did ever ſuch a diſaſterous Fate hang over the head of any Lover? I thought I had loved an inſenſible woman, who by her inſenſibility and auſterity together overwhelmed me with jealouſie; or being out of hope my ſelf, I thought none of my Rivals were happier than my ſelf was: yet I find my ſelf in leaſt favour of them all. But who knows (ſaid he and interrupted himſelf) whether all this be true? Ah no, no, alas, alas, it is too too true: Were he only one Rival who boaſted of her favours, I ſhould think he had belched out ſome horrid lye; but there is no likelihood that Poligenes and Agenor both ſhould be cheats, eſpecially being Brothers: Let it then be moſt certainly concluded, that there is no aſſurance in any, ſince not in Eliſa. I have not ſo much conſolation in my miſery, as that can in reaſon call her perfidious, ſince ſhe never promiſed me her affection; only aſſured me, that if ſhe did alter her reſolution of never marrying, then it ſhould be in my advantage: Yet it ſeems ſhe preſerves her liberty only to engage her ſelf unto two at once: But O Heavens! am I not unjuſt in ſpeaking this of Eliſa? Can Eliſa love any, and not Phocilion? Can ſhe ſuffer others to ſpeak of Love, and impoſe eternal ſilence upon me? Alas Eliſa, ſaid he and ſighed, ſince your heart can admit of diviſion, why had not I a part? But what do I ſay (ſaid miſerable Phocilion:) No, no, Eliſa, I will have no ſhares in your affection. I had rather a hundred times you kept your ſelf neutral, and that you mocked at me and all my Rivals, then to enjoy a moiety only of your heart, I had rather Eliſa be hated by you, then to be loved with another: Take heed Eliſa, leſt this divided affection ſhould purchaſe you none at all: As for me, who have entirely given you my heart, I cannot be contented with a half. However, unjuſt and ungrateful Eliſa, I have this ſatisfaction, that I am revenged of you even by thoſe whom you preferred before me, for they talk of favours confered upon them without any rapture of Joy, and without any diſcretion: They talk of theſe favours with delight only becauſe it ſuits with their vanity; and I doubt not but they will ere long be blabbing to the world thoſe things which they talked in private. Alas Eliſa, what an ill choice have you made if you deſire to have ſecret Lovers? But to ſay truth, ſhe who can favour two at once, never thinks upon any diſcretion which they ought to uſe. I, Heavens knew, never had any favour to conceal; but when you did at any time look upon me without ſcorn, I did conceal it almoſt from my ſelf; Yet Eliſa you prefer two men who love you only out of vanity, and who love you more for their own ſakes then yours: If I had but one happy Rival to deal withal, I might hope that after I had defeated him, I my ſelf might be your Favorite: But that Eliſa ſhould have two Favorites, this opens a door for all my Rivals, and renders my happineſs impoſſible, ſince I cannot endure to be in a divided heart: But ſince it is granted, that Eliſa is not the ſame ſhe was thought to be, ought I in reaſon to continue the ſame I was to her? ſhould I adore her that is not worthy of any adoration? or ought I to love her who loves many?

or at leaſt who tampers ſo with two of my Rivals, as if ſhe did love them: But on the other ſide, How ſhould I not love Eliſa? Eliſa, who is Beauty in the abſtract; Eliſa, whoſe charms are inevitable; Eliſa, who has my heart in her hands; Eliſa, whom only I find fair; and Eliſa, whom only indeed I can love. Go on then Phocilion (ſaid he, and reprehended himſelf) hate thy Rivals and not Eliſa; pity only her weakneſs, and be revenged on them for her injuſtice, ſince thy reſpects will not ſuffer thee to do it upon her.

Theſe Madam were the ravelled thoughts of Phocilion all that night, not being able to reſolve upon what courſe to take. In the mean time, be pleaſed to know, that Poligenes and Agenor, after they came out of the Grot, continued their walk, as I told you, and ſtill talked of Eliſa: And ſince Poligenes knew that he never told Eliſa he was in love with her, nor had any hopes of being loved, he took another courſe to defeat Agenor, in faining ſtill to be in Eliſa's favour. Since it is the will of Fate (ſaid he unto his Brother with as much ſeeming ingenuity as he had ſubtilty in his heart) that we muſt be Rivals, and Rivals both in favour: in lieu of diſputing who ſhall yeild up Eliſa unto the other, let us both equally forſake her, ſince ſhe is almoſt equally perfidious to us both, and thus by a generous diſdain, and ſurmounting our paſſions preſerve our friendſhip: and for a full revenge upon her, let us forſake her whole Sex in general: Let us look upon all Beauties only as bare ornaments of the Univerſe, without any doting upon them, but with the ſame freedom of ſpirit as we uſe to look upon fair flowers in meadows, or upon bloſſoms of trees, or buds, or fountains, or ſuch like: Why ſhould we loſe our reſt and reaſon? Gallantry is confeſſedly a delectable thing, but a violent paſſion is meer folly: Let us therefore Agenor quit this unjuſt woman, who cannot content her ſelf neither with your love nor mine, for what ſhe does to us, ſhe does the ſame to all our Rivals: Let us not omit any thing that may blunt the edg and beauty of her charms: My dearest Brother (ſaid Agenor craftily) your expreſſions do infinitely joy me, but ſince you are able to quit Eliſa out of jealouſie, ſpite, and reaſon, doubtleſs you can alſo quit her out of pity, generoſity, and affection: No, no, replied Poligenes, deceive not your ſelf, I am able to quit Eliſa if you can, but I cannot forſake her unleſs you can alſo. As good hap was, ſome company came, and broke off their diſcourſe; for conſidering the diſpoſition of their ſouls, it was to be feared that perhaps they would have quarrelled, if none had come to them. In the mean time, Poligenes and Agenor parted with different thoughts, for Poligenes went away extreamly jealous, but ſo did not Agenor, for he did not give any credit to his brothers words, neither did he fear that Poligenes would tell Elſa how he bragged of being in her favour; for knowing that it was not ſo, and that he never had ſo much as a favourable word from her, as her Lover; he imagined that Eliſa would never accuſe him of any ſuch invention; but that ſhe would rather think it the device of Poligenes to put him out of her favour.

Thus was he extreamly joyed at his finding ſome reaſon for not yielding Eliſa unto his Brother, and at his making him jealous, hoping that very ſpite would make him forſake Eliſa, yet was he not ſure as he imagined; for Poligenes was no ſooner up, but he went unto the houſe of Straton, and to the end he might have the opportunity of ſpeaking with Eliſa without any witneſs, he made choice of the morning; and for a better pretence, he told Straton, that ſome Ladies in the Countty had deſired him to ſend them ſome Jewels, and ſince Eliſa was known to have excellent judgment in ſuch things, he deſired Straton that he might ſhew them unto her in her Chamber, ſhewing him alſo (which he brought on purpoſe) ſome Diamonds, ſaying it was to let his Daughter ſee them. Straton no ſooner heard this, but he ſent to know whether his Daughter were awake, and hearing ſhe was dreſt, he carried Poligenes to her Chamber door, and having ſome buſineſs, left Poligenes with Eliſa, whoſe beauty without any art or ornament appeared in greater luſtre then ever he had ſeen it: At firſt, Eliſa thinking he had ſome buſineſs with her, asked earneſtly what it was: For I do imagine (ſaid ſhe unto him) that it is of ſome importance; ſince you come to me at an unuſual hour for the viſit of Ladies: 'Tis very true Madam, replied Poligenes, the buſineſs I come about is of great importance: But I muſt tell you, (ſaid he, and ſpoke in a low voice leſt any of her women ſhould hear) that the buſineſs concerns you more than me: For indeed Madam, had it been only my own buſineſs, I ſhould not have been ſo uncivil, as to have diſturbed you at ſuch an unfitting hour; and though my buſineſs is only your ſervice, yet I deluded Straton in telling him, that I deſired your judgment in ſome Jewels, for I did not think fit that he ſhould know what I have to tell you.

Eliſa was at the firſt ſurprized at the diſcourſe of Poligenes, but ſince he never uſed to tell any thing which diſpleaſed her, ſince ſhe thought him to be her friend, and never ſuſpected him as her lover, ſhe recollected her ſelf, and imagined, that ſince he had given her heretofore much good advice, ſo now perhaps he was come to acquaint her what Lyriope had ſaid of her; ſo that thinking Poligenes had ſomthing of conſequence to impart, ſhe made a ſign unto her women to go out of the Chamber; after which, turning towards Poligenes, I have a great deſire, ſaid ſhe unto him, to know what you have to tell me: Madam, ſaid he unto her, though in telling you my buſineſs, I ſhall give you good proof of my affection; yet I wiſh things were ſo, that I could omit it; for indeed it is of ſuch a nature, as friendſhip alone is not enough to excuſe the Treaſon which I ſhall commit againſt one whom Nature bids me love; but for all that, ſince it concerns the glory of Eliſa, I ſhall not weigh it; for I am perſwaded, that I ought to forget his intereſt or my own, rather then fail in the reſpects I owe you: I am infinitely obliged unto you (replied Eliſa moſt ſweetly) for your expreſſions of ſo much zeal in any thing which concerns me; but becauſe I will not hinder you from relating this buſineſs which I ſo much deſire to know, I will not therefore at this time return you your due thanks: Though my deſires of telling you, replied Poligenes, are higher than yours, yet I cannot chuſe but tremble at the Treaſon which I ſhall commit; Yet notwithſtanding I conjure you Madam (ſaid he to colour his deſign) that when I ſhall have diſcovered the crime of a man committed againſt you, that you will not then think me a partaker in his crime, but to make uſe of the advice which I ſhall give you, according as your prudence ſhall think moſt conducing to your tranquility: I promiſe to be directed by your advice Poligenes, replied Eliſa, leſt I ſhould diſoblige him who hath ſo much obliged me: Then Madam, replied he, I muſt with ſome ſhame and anger tell you, that the man whom I accuſe is my brother: How Poligenes (ſaid Eliſa and interrupted him) hath Agenor done any thing which will offend me? Agenor (replied Poligenes faintly) doth doubtleſs adore you as much as poſſible he can, but to be ſincere with you, he hath blabbed out ſome things which certainly he ought not: But I beſeech you (ſaid Eliſa ſharply) which way can the indiſcretion of Agenor concern me, for there is no private intimacy betwixt me and him, or any elſe; I wiſh Madam, replied Poligenes, that all he hath told me of you were not true, if it be not, your glory is much more ſafe: How Poligenes, (replied Eliſa and bluſht) has Agenor told any thing to my diſhonour? He hath told me ſomthing, which at leaſt is advantageous unto himſelf (replied Poligenes;) But Madam before I complain, give me leave to ſpeak, and in accuſing Agenor, in ſome ſort to excuſe him; and let me further tell you, that it is almoſt impoſſible to find a man of his age who is diſcreet: Diſcretion is a moſt excellent quality (replied Eliſa ſharply) but yet thoſe who come into my company may fail in it, yet not prejudice me: But Poligenes, I pray unmask this Riddle: Madam, ſaid he unto her, I would gladly talk with you, as if you did not know, that Agenor loves you: Alas Poligenes (ſaid Eliſa and interrupted him) I believe Agenor hath deceived you, as once he deceived me, when he would have perſwaded me, that all thoſe Gallantries which he has uſed in company, were real marks of his Love; for I profeſs unto you, I was a long time very angry with him for it, yet in the concluſion I was well ſatisfied, that all his deſigns were only to divert, ſo that we were reconciled again, and I both loſt and found a friend in one quarter of an hour: No, no, Madam, replied Poligenes, there is more in it then ſo: Agenor who is accuſtomed always to have two or three confidents of this paſſion, to the end he might have ſo many witneſſes of his glory made choice of me for one; and indeed I know all the paſſages between Lyriope and him. Alas Poligenes, ſaid Eliſa, Lyriope and I are of very different humours: 'Tis true indeed (replied Poligenes) he does not boaſt of receiving from you ſuch as he received from her, I mean Letters, Pictures, Tokens, and ſuch like favours as may be kept in a Cabinet, but he is ſo bold as to ſay, he hath received ſuch from you, as can be kept only in the heart with a pleaſing remembrance: I am ſo ignorant in matters of Gallantry (replied Eliſa with exceeding anger) as I cannot tell the differences between favours and favours, all I know is, there be none ſo little as are not criminal, or which I could ever find in my heart to confer upon any perſon: But yet Poligenes, pray ye tell me, what did Agenor ſay I did for him? He ſaid Madam, ſince I muſt tell you, (replied Poligenes) that he has told you a thouſand times in ſecret how he loves you, that you permited him ſo to do without the leaſt anger, and that you and he together did ſcoff at all his Rivals; and that in concluſion you did not hate him, if you did not love him, and I believe he talked of ſomthing more obliging then all theſe; for he talked, as if he often read in your eyes, that he had a little room in your heart: However Madam (added Poligenes, the more to prejudice Agenor) ſince I have diſcovered the weakneſs of my Brother, yet I muſt needs ask your favour for him, adviſing you not to puniſh him: Ah Poligenes (cried ſhe out) You give me moſt obliging intelligence, in acquainting me with the wickedneſs of Agenor, but truly withal, you give me very ill counſel, and I cannot tell whether you do me not a great injury in it, for you ſeem to think that what he ſaid was not invented: Since Agenor is my Brother, replied Poligenes, You may well pardon me if I did not eaſily ſuſpect him guilty of ſo horrid a crime as to invent what he ſaid unto me: If I had thought Agenor had added lies unto his vanity in lieu of advertiſing you of his crime, I ſhould have puniſhed him my ſelf: Then puniſh him, replied Eliſa, for he never ſpoke unto me of his pretended paſſion, but after the manner as I told you, and conſequently all that he ſaid are meer forgeries: But ſince I think it will redound more unto my glory, I will take another courſe, which ſhall be never to ſee him again: Poligenes finding ſo happy a beginning of his deſign, to confirm Eliſa the more in her reſolution, he ſeemed to oppoſe it, telling her, it would be enough if ſhe removed from him all ſubjects for his vanity, and not to grant him the liberty of talking any more in private with her: But the more he pleaded, the more averſe was Eliſa from ever ſeeing Agenor again, of which Poligenes was very glad: But ſince I perceived Eliſa was angry with him, for ſeeming to believe that Agenor had not invented what he had ſaid; he did ſo carry the matter, as he perſwaded her, that indeed he did believe Agenor did forge what he had reported: So that Eliſa thought her ſelf extreamly obliged to him for his intelligence, and looking upon him as her beſt and moſt faithful friend, promiſing to baniſh Agenor, and to find out a pretence for it without reflection upon him.

In the mean time, her anger againſt Agenor was extreamly high, ſhe would not ſtir out that day; and as ſoon as ever Poligenes was gone, ſhe fained to be ill, and to put on her night dreſs, commanding that none ſhould ſee her, but thoſe who received this command, did not exactly obey it: Indeed Phocilion being reſolved to return unto Sidon, and quit Eliſa, as ſoon as he had twitted her with her weakneſs, went to her as ſoon as ever Dinner was done, and found no difficulty of entrance; ſo that going ſtraight to the Chamber of Eliſa, he found her alone, and in a profound ſtudy: She no ſooner ſaw him, but chiding her woman for not telling him ſhe would not be ſeen, ſhe ſent me to renew the ſame command, which was exactly obeyed all the reſt of the day, ſo that Eliſa unawares gave Phocilion an opportunity of a long audience without interruption; for ſince ſhe eſteemed him very much, ſhe could not in civility bid him be gone, yet ſhe would not bid him ſit down, but upon condition he ſhould ſtay but one quarter of an hour, but he told her ſuch things as ſhe could not foreſee her condition was broken, and ſtayed a great part of the Afternoon. Eliſa ſeemed very ſad; and Phocilion was much incenſed: They were no ſooner ſet, but he began to ſpeak: Methinks Madam (ſaid he unto her) that for one who has filled many others with joys, you are very ſad your ſelf: I know not whether I had filled any other with joy, replied ſhe, but I am ſure there is ſome who hath filled me with ſadneſs: I am afraid Madam, replied he, that I am in the number of thoſe you ſpeak of, and that I am troubleſome unto you in rendring my laſt viſit: You need not doubt it (replied Eliſa very obligingly) if you come to bid me adieu, for then you add much unto my ſorrow: But Phocilion, you have not placed this word Troubleſome right, it had been much better, if you had ſaid you come to make me ſad: Your language Madam, replied he, had made me the moſt happy of men, if you had ſaid ſo yeſterday; but to day, I muſt confeſs, the more civil you are unto me, the more rigorous you are: Your language Phocilion, replied Eliſa, ſeems ſo odd, that I know not how to anſwer it: That which I know Madam, replied Phocilion, is ſo ſtrange that I am ſure I know neither what to ſay, nor what to think, and therefore you need not wonder if I be obſcure in my expreſſions, I wiſh if it were poſſible, that I ſhould not be underſtood, and yet I muſt needs complain; but I am reſolved to complain of my own misfortune, and not poſitively againſt you: I profeſs Phocilion, replied Eliſa, the more you ſpeak, the leſs I underſtand you: I pray conſider well whether you underſtand your ſelf, for I muſt confeſs, I cannot believe you have any good reaſon for what you ſay: I would to the Gods Madam, replied he, that I were culpable, and you innocent: Yes, yes, Madam, I am ſo zealouſly devoted unto your glory, that as great as my deſires are you ſhould love me, yet I ſhould be contented with your hate, ſo what I know were untrue: For ought I perceive, replied Eliſa, you accuſe me of ſome great crime: The crime whereof I accuſe you (replied Phocilion and ſighed) is of ſuch a nature Madam, that you would be very innocent, if you were only culpable towards me only: Why Phocilion, (replied Eliſa, and bluſht for anger) Do you believe I love any one? I know not Madam, anſwered he, whether the reſpects I have, and ever will have of you, will permit me to ſay I do believe it: But I am ſure, that what I heard from the mouths of Poligenes and Agenor, is enough to make me fear it.

Eliſa was amazed to hear Phocilion who was ever both prudent and reſpectful, ſpeak ſuch ſtrange language; and ſhe believed there was ſome odd accident in the wind, whereof ſhe was ignorant. Likewiſe her fear was, that the vanity of Agenor had reached his ear: But her greateſt wonder was, to hear him name Poligenes as well as Agenor: So that being extreamly deſirous to know the truth, and concealing a part of her cholor, ſhe importun'd him to tell her what moved him to ſpeak as he did, which he very exactly did, relating his walk, how he went into the Grotto to avoid meeting Poligenes and Agenor, how the Rain made them alſo to enter after him, and afterwards related to a ſyllable all he heard them ſay. Phocilion made this relation with eyes full of ſorrow, he often interrupted himſelf with ſighs, he looked upon Eliſa in ſuch a concerned manner, and ſpake ſo feelingly and reſpectively, that ſhe did not at all ſuſpect him of any forgery, nor did ſhe make any queſtion, but that what he related unto her, were ſpoken by Poligenes and Agenor, and ſhe did the ſooner believe it, becauſe there was much concurrence between the relations of Poligenes and Phocilion concerning Agenor: But the horror of the buſineſs, was her apprehenſions of Poligenes, who never ſolicited her but as a friend, and who came to advertiſe her of his Brothers vanity, that he ſhould himſelf prove as vain as he: In the mean time, as ſhe reſolved to baniſh Agenor upon the report of Poligenes, ſo ſhe reſolved upon the ſame ſentence for Poligenes, upon the report of Phocilion: But to juſtifie her ſelf unto him, and that with her natural auſterity; I am very ſorry (ſaid ſhe unto Phocilion) that when it was in your power to ingage me infinitely unto you, you ſhould ſo cruelly diſoblige me; for you without any offence have told me almoſt dead, tho you have wronged me in the telling of it: You might, if you would have acquainted me with the lies of Poligenes and Agenor, as lies which you thought fit to advertiſe me of, and not as truths; and I do tell you truly, you have more offended me in believing what you heard, than they have done in forging it; and if there be any concurrence, between their crime and yours, it is in that they believed one another, as you believed them: Why

Madam, replied Phocilion, can you think me more culpable than Poligenes? Or more wicked than Agenor? However it be, ſaid ſhe, you are not innocent, ſince you think me capable of extream imbecility. But to let you ſee how you are deceived, I am reſolved upon three things which I will put in execution; the firſt is, to ſwear unto you by all that is Sacred, that neither Poligenes nor Agenor did ever expreſs any affection unto me, unleſs by way of Railary in publick; the ſecond is, that you may judge of what is paſt by the future, and to let you know that I fear them not, I will for ever baniſh them both: The third is, that though I aſſure you I have more eſteem of you than ever I had of any, yet I will baniſh you as well as they, to let you ſee that I am Miſtreſs of my own thoughts when I pleaſe; and to perſwade you by this example, that one who has an abſolute Soveraignty over her heart, is not apt to ingage her ſelf ſo lightly as you believed: I cannot endure the ſight of a man who is ſo ſimply unjuſt, as to accuſe me of a horrid crime, a man who has given me a thouſand expreſſions of eſteem, one who might have perfectly known me, one who I believed could not have harboured a diſadvantagious thought of me, and one whom I thought had eſteemed me ſo much, as rather would give himſelf the ly, than entertain the leaſt ſuſpition which might be prejudicial to me. Alas Madam, replied he, how is it poſſible to be in Love, and not be jealous at the hearing of what I did? And how can one be jealous, and not loſe his reaſon, and be unjuſt? I know not how theſe hang together, replied ſhe, but I know that it belongs not unto me to examine the cauſe of your injuſtice; therefore, without further examination, whether you be unjuſt out of Love, or out of jealouſie, or out of any other cauſe, it ſufficeth, I have cauſe enough to puniſh you: But I beſeech you Madam, anſwered Phocilion, do you make no difference between them and me? Yes, anſwered ſhe, for in baniſhing them, I ſhall extreamly hate and ſcorn them, but I ſhall content my ſelf to have much indifferency towards you: This favour (Madam anſwered Phocilion with a ſigh) is of ſuch a nature, as may be received without any retalliation of gratitude: Whatever it be, replied Eliſa, it is all you are to expect from me, but to comfort you, let me tell you, that none ſhall ever receive a greater from me; for after this cruel adventure which hath fallen upon me, I ſhall be very cautious of ſuch impoſtures as theſe which you have taught me. Phocilion perceiving the firm reſolution of Eliſa, did uſe all poſſible diſſwaſive Rhetorick; he joyned conjurations to prayers, ſighs to words, and with tears he kneeled to ask pardon for his fault; but for all theſe Eliſa was unalterable, and go he muſt without obtaining any thing; yet though he retired with a moſt ſad Soul, yet it was ſome eaſement unto him, to perceive, that Eliſa was innocent; and he did ſo ſeriouſly repent of his facility in believing Poligenes and Agenor, as he hated them as much as if thy were his Rivals, upon whom he reſolved a revenge for Eliſa's rigour. Alſo looking upon them as a pack of impoſtures, he conceived it to be his duty ſo to do in the behalf of Eliſa, though he had no other motive. In the mean while, as Phocilion was full of ſorrows and repentance, ſo was Eliſa of anger, and her anger was ſo full of revenge, that if her Soul had been capable of any violent and unjuſt reſolution, ſhe would have attempted any thing to ſatisfie her revenge upon Poligenes and Agenor. But Eliſa being very wiſe, and knowing that there are ſome things, which the more noiſe is made, the worſe they are, of which revenge would be but prejudicial; ſhe would not therefore ſet her ſelf to puniſh theſe two Offenders, yet ſhe did make them very ſenſible of her actions; for ſince they loved her with extream zeal, they did moſt bitterly reſent her uſage of them. In the mean time, ſince ſhe had taken a reſolution to ſpeak unto them, the one in preſence of the other, ſhe was two days before ſhe could find a fit opportunity for it, which by good fortune did then preſent it ſelf: For theſe two Rivals, both of them deſiring to ſtay the laſt with Eliſa, did ſtay until all the company was gone from her; ſo that at the laſt they were alone with Eliſa, but extreamly, aſhamed, and not daring ſcarce to look upon her, ſo much did their remorſe of conſcience upbraid them. So that Eliſa being confirmed in her belief of all that Phocilion had told her, began to talk to them both with ſuch a ſerious ſeverity, enough to make the ſturdieſt hearts to tremble, and imprint reſpect in the Souls of the moſt inſolent: Since you are Brethren in evil, and guilty of one crime, ſaid ſhe unto them, I think it fit to accuſe you both together, and pronounce the ſame ſentence. Poligenes and Agenor hearing Eliſa ſpeak thus, were ſtrongly ſurprized: Poligenes thought Agenor had diſcovered his crime unto Eliſa as he had his: And Agenor thought now that he was not miſtaken, when he thought Eliſa gave no credit to his words; but as bold as he was, he began to tremble as well as Poligenes, nor had they either confidence or leaſure to ask Eliſa what their crime was, for ſhe went on in bitter ſeverity to them as ſhe begun: Never think, ſaid ſhe unto them, that I will accuſe you by particulars of all your impoſtures, the diſcourſe would be unworthy of my ſelf, let it ſuffice I tell you, that the Gods have revealed unto me all that you ſaid in the Grotto that is in the long Tarras walk by the Sea ſide, I expreſly forbid you both ever to ſee me again, and let me tell you, that now I ſcorn you more than ever I have eſteemed you; alſo I defie you, and bid you ſay the worſt that can prejudice me: Never think to imploy the power of my Father, for if you do, I will acquaint him with the juſt cauſe of complaint I have againſt you; therefore without any reſiſtance, or delay, I expect obedience unto my will without a ſyllable of murmur. After theſe words, Eliſa went into her Cloſet, and made a ſign unto them to be gone; ſo that Poligenes and Agenor not daring to ſtay her, began to quarrel for betraying each other, yet they durſt not ſtay any longer in Eliſa's Chamber, but went out in extream deſpair and fury, not yet directly knowing what was the object of all their cholor. But they had not gone above twenty paces belching out the fury of their Souls, when a friend unto Phocilion met them, and told them, that he expected them both at the Sea ſide which looks towards the North, with as many Swords as were requiſite for two to fight againſt two, adding, that the cauſe of his quarrel was of ſuch a nature, as no other way but this could give him ſatisfaction.

Poligenes and Agenor having ſharp edges ſet upon their Spirits, did kindly accept of this Propoſition, and as men who had a greater mind to fight with one another, than againſt any elſe; yet point of honour not permitting them to deliberate, they told Phocilion's friend that they were ready to go along with him, and did ſo after they had ſent away their men. Since their minds were full, they never conſidered what might Phocilion's reaſon be for calling them to this ſatisfaction, but in the heat of their fury fought, and knew not why: nor would Phocilion tell them directly his reaſon, leſt he ſhould ingage the name of Eliſa: The Quarrel then not being known, the Combat then could not be prevented, the Event whereof was very bloody; it fell to the lot of Phocilion to fight againſt Agenor, and Poligenes againſt Phocilion's Friend, all which four were wounded; Phocilion and Agenor more dangerous than the other two, Phocilion had the advantage of Agenor; but Poligenes had the better of Phocilion's Friend. This Combat made a great noiſe in the world, none knowing the cauſe; for when any asked Poligenes or Agenor, they bad them ask Phocilion, and when they asked Phocilion, he anſwered, that it was ſufficient Poligenes and Agenor knew themſelves not innocent. In the mean time, this Combat produced this good unto Eliſa, for Agenor, Poligenes, and Phocilion being all three wounded, ſhe was at much more quietneſs, nor was any talk of her as the Cauſe, only Lyriope began to chatter a little, but ſhe durſt not vie againſt Eliſa, as formerly ſhe uſed, becauſe her Parents were upon marrying her unto one of the Court named Aſiadates, and indeed did marry her unto him within a few dayes after, more for intereſt of family, then any other reaſon: So that fearing leſt her hatred of Eliſa ſhould ſpeak her Love unto Agenor, ſhe concealed her thoughts of this buſineſs: As for Eliſa, her anger againſt Poligenes, againſt Agenor, and againſt Phocilion alſo, made her think her ſelf happy in being delivered from that fight, yet being of a natural goodneſs, if the thing had been in her diſpoſe, ſhe would not have permitted this combate; but ſince it was not, nor ſince ſhe had no hand in it, it did not grieve her that the Gods had permitted them to fight, and had ridded her of ſuch men as ſhe was reſolved never to ſee again.

This being the ſtate of things, and Eliſa confirming her ſelf more and more in her reſolutions never to marry but to grow more auſtere if it were poſſible. Straton who never enjoyed himſelf ſince the death of the laſt King, but having loſt all his hopes, he fell ſick, and within ſeven daies died of ſo violent a Fever, as he was not able to order any buſineſs ſince the firſt day of his falling ſick. This accident was ſo mournfully reſented by Eliſa, as I wonder it did not coſt her her life, at leaſt her beauty, yet the tears upon her face was only like a dew upon Roſes, which in lieu of changing them, makes them more ſweet and lovely; and as melancholy has a kind of languiſhing ſweetneſs in it, ſo Eliſa doubtleſs was nothing ſo auſtere in her ſorrows as formerly, and conſequently not ſo apt to drive her Lovers into diſpair. Eliſa in loſing Straton, did not only loſe a moſt indulgent Father, but found a ſubverſion of her fortune, by falling under the power of a phantaſtical Mother, who loved her not, but who ſince the death of Straton did perſecute her a hundred ſeveral wayes. However, Eliſa carried her ſelf with as much reſpect, as if ſhe were the beſt Mother in the world; and her generoſity was ſo high, that Barce having left her in the Country, and being returned her ſelf to Tire, ſhe there fell ſick of ſuch a contageous diſeaſe, as Husbands dare not come near their Wives, nor Wives their Husbands; yet Eliſa no ſooner heard the condition wherein Barce was, but ſhe departed immediately, and went notwithſtanding the danger, to help that perſon who reſolved to make her life as miſerable as ſhe could: But the Gods, who doubtleſs were pleaſed to make the virtue of Eliſa more ſplendent, took Barce out of this world, juſt as Eliſa was going into her Chamber, againſt the perſwaſions of all her friends: But ſeeing her Mother was paſt recovery, ſhe withdrew from a needleſs danger, and retired her ſelf unto a Ladies houſe, who was her Cozen, who lived extreamly cloſe, and whoſe virtue was extraordinary. Thus Eliſa made it moſt evident by this action, that ſhe had no deſign of admitting ſo much company as ſhe had during the life of Straton. But to the end Eliſa might make the greatneſs of her ſoul appear, the Gods were pleaſed to abaſe her fortune, that they might elevate her Glory, by ſuch a way as many have loſt theirs. Since Straton had great imployments under the late King of Phenicia, all thoſe unto whom he was indebted did fall upon Eliſa for ſatisfaction, and ſeized upon all her eſtate with ſo much violence and injuſtice, that they made Eliſa almoſt as poor as fair. However, though ſhe ſaw her ſelf in a moſt lamentable condition, yet her high ſoul never trembled at it, but ſhe carried out her bad fortune with as much reſolution, as ſhe did her good with moderation, nor was ſhe leſs auſtere: and when Poligenes, Agenor, and Phocilion were recovered, and would have ſeen her, ſhe did forbid them with as much authority, as if ſhe had been upon a Throne, and they her Subjects, ſhe was more ſevere than before, and ſhe would make it appear, that ſince ſhe was Miſtreſs of her ſelf, ſhe would follow the rules of virtue more exactly than before: But Madam, that you may ſee how great her virtue was, be pleaſed to know, that Aſiadates whom Lyriope had married, did at that time fall ſo deſperately in Love with Eliſa, as he was ready to run out of all his wits and patience for her, and who did more hang upon her then ever Poligenes and Agenor did; Aſiadates is a man of much Spirit, but very violent and haſty which moved him to act his deſires with an unexpreſſible impetuoſity; you may then very well imagine, that he being deeply in Love with Eliſa, would do any thing to enjoy her he loved, if he could find out fit opportunities for it. Since Eliſa would not admit of any viſits, unleſs of her moſt intimate friends, who could not be ſuſpected of any Gallantry, he could not find his deſired opportunity of ſeeing her at that Ladies houſe: At laſt he contracted a great league of amity with a perſon of Quality, who was one of Eliſa's friends: Since few men in all Phenicia were richer then Aſiadates was, and ſince he underſtood the decay of Eliſa's eſtate, he conceived that a woman, who was as high-minded as even unto very pride it ſelf, could never brook poverty, but thought that perhaps exceſſive liberality handſomly carried, would tempt her to admit of him as her friend at leaſt, though not as her Lover, yet he durſt not be ſo forward as to offer any preſents unto Eliſa, with capitulations of giving all his riches for the purchaſe of her heart, but he told her by this friend (whom he perſwaded that generoſity more then Love prompted him, ſince he could not endure to ſee virtue poor) that he made her an offer of all his eſtate, without the thought of retribution or gratitude, but her acceptance: Alſo he put into the hands of this Lady a vaſt number of Jewels, to preſent them unto Eliſa; ſo that any other than ſhe, conſidering the ſtate of her fortune, might eaſily have been dazled by them, for Eliſa then did ſubſiſt only by the generoſity of her with whom ſhe lived.

In the mean time, all the eloquence of his Lady Solicitor could not perſwade her to accept of this magnificent preſent, though ſhe did negotiate very cunningly with her; for having inſenſibly ingaged Eliſa to look upon them, ſhe carried her unto a Cloſet,where this abundance of Jewels did lie upon a Table: Eliſa not knowing how they related unto her,began to look upon them ſhe thought moſt admirably rare, and asked the Lady whoſe they were? Before I return you an anſwer, (ſaid this dangerous friend unto her) let me ask you what you would think of a man who would give you all theſe Pearls, Diamonds, Rubies and Emeralds? I would ſay and think (replied Eliſa) that he were either much in Love, or very liberal, or elſe not very wiſe, for I know not what elſe I ſhould eirher ſay or think: Yet there is ſomthing to be ſaid (anſwered ſhe) unto him that would give ſuch a Preſent. For indeed Eliſa, it muſt needs be confeſſed, that Aſiadates is the moſt generous man alive, and the moſt real friend that ever I knew; and to make it evident, be pleaſed to know, that he is ſo charmed with your virtue, as not being able to endure Fortune ſhould treat you with ſo much injuſtice, he hath charged me to beſeech you, that you will be pleaſed he may do that which Fortune would not, and enrich you with what ſhe has given him; He thinks his eſtate is not his ſo long as you do want it, and is perſwaded that you have more right unto it then himſelf. Moreover, never think that he has any ill intention in it, he will not ſo much as ſee you, if you pleaſe, he expects no retalliation or gratitude, but his liberality is all pure; therefore Eliſa make no ſcruple in accepting the aſſiſtance of ſuch a man, who offers it unto you by me, who would never adviſe you unto any thing which might, be prejudicial unto you, and who would never offer you the aid of another, if I were of ability enough my ſelf: All the while this Lady was talking, Eliſa's reſentments were inexpreſſible, ſomtimes anger made her bluſh, and look with ſcorn upon her which ſpoke, otherwhiles her ſhame made her deject her eyes, and ſomtimes her wonder would bring ſuch paleneſs into her face, as if ſhe were afraid: But at laſt, not being able to keep ſilence, I could never have believed, ſaid ſhe unto her, that Fortune could have brought me into ſuch a condition,that any one ſhould be ſo bold as to make ſuch a Propoſition unto me. But as there are ſome who ſuck poyſon out of the moſt innocent things, ſo by contraries I will draw glory out of the moſt infamous act in the world: And that you may not think I ſpeak this out of an arrogant pride, I will render you a reaſon of my thoughts.

Know then, I am fully perſwaded, that the eſtates of our friends may be ours upon ſome certain occaſions; but I am fully perſwaded withal, that unleſs one will render her ſelf infamous, one ought never to take or accept any thing from a Lover: Yet I have heard you ſay, (replied this intereſted friend) that liberality and love are inſeparable Concomitants: And I aſſure you, replied Eliſa, that woman who receiveth Preſents does give her ſelf, or to ſay better, doth ſell her ſelf: So that when a Lover would be liberal, it muſt be without any gifts un; to his Miſtreſs; but in Feaſts, cloaths, magnificent equipage, not in any thing which are profitable unto the perſon he loves; for indeed I know nothing ſo baſe, ſo wicked, ſo oppoſite to modeſty, nor which begets greater thoughts of ſcorn, then for a woman to take any thing of a man who is in love with her; and truly, for my part, I had incomparably rather receive a benefit of ſuch a nature as this you offer me, from the hand of a mortal enemy, then from any lover, and to beg it upon my knees, then to accept it from a man who is in love with me: I beſeech you think, that as unfortunate as I am, I have ſtill a heart ſo high, as Fortune cannot make it lower; and if I were to chuſe, either death or theſe magnificent

Jewels, doubtleſs I ſhould prefer it before them all, rather chuſing to die with glory then live with ſhame: But Madam (ſaid this corrupt friend) Aſiadates doth not require any thing from you: He doth inſolently ask me all things, replied ſhe, in offering me all theſe riches; and I am confident, that never any woman received any conſiderable preſent from a Lover, but within few houres after he has leſs eſteem of her then if ſhe had refuſed it, and looks upon her as one whom he has right unto, as if he had bought a Slave: Tell therefore Aſiadates, he is undiſcreet in the management of his inclination, which doubtleſs is liberal, ſince in lieu of getting my eſteem by this virtue, he hath got my averſion; if he will be ſhewing his liberality, he muſt beſtow it without any ends, let him inrich many unfortunate Gentlemen, of which the Court is full, and never think of dazling my eyes with Diamonds: Tell him farther, that I will ſhun him as much as civility will permit me, and if I ſhould follow my own inclination, I ſhould be revenged on him with more anger and delight, then if he had ſtole as much riches from me as he offers: And as for you (ſaid ſhe unto her whom ſhe ſpoke unto) I will for my own glory believe, that you thought the intentions of Aſiadates very pure and innocent; but ſince he hath a little corrupted you, I muſt continue no longer with one who will be perſwaded unto any thing oppoſite to Juſtice and virtue: In ſaying ſo ſhe riſe up, and went out, maugre all the perſwaſions of the Lady, and put her ſo out of countenance, as ſhe durſt never after ſee Eliſa. In the mean while, Aſiadates was even dead in ſorrow, when he underſtood how Eliſa had rejected his liberality, yet he acknowledged that he both eſteemed and loved her much more for it, then he did before: But the waſpiſh part of the buſineſs was Lyriope, who till then never believed that Aſiadates was in Love with Eliſa; but perceiving him to be malancholy, ſhe came to diſcover the cauſe, and to be extreamly jealous and ſpiteful: Aſiadates on his ſide, he conceiving that if he had not been married, he might have married Eliſa, he began to hate her abominably: So that Eliſa without any deſign, did make theſe two perſons the moſt miſerable of their time. In the mean time, Poligenes and Agenor being out of all hopes to relent the heart of Eliſa, they begun to quench the flames of their paſſions, yet ſtill had ſuch a high eſteem of her, as obliged them both to juſtifie her, and confeſs their impoſture: But as for Phocilion, who was accuſtomed to love without hope, he continued to love her as before, and was ſo conſtantly reſolute, that in the end Eliſa pardoned him, upon condition he ſhould keep himſelf within the limits of friendſhip, without ever ſpeaking of any Love.

This being the ſtate of affairs, Eliſa followed her buſineſs ſo wiſely and cloſe, and with ſuch good ſucceſs, as ſhe recovered the greateſt part of her eſtate out of their hands who had uſurped it, and was now in a condition able to ſubſiſt of her ſelf according to her Quality without the benevolence of any; yet upon the caſting up of all accounts, ſhe found her ſelf not ſo rich as ſhe imagined; but yet having a ſufficient competency to paſs in the world, ſhe contented her ſelf with her fortune, and ſuited her ſelf accordingly: One loſs ſhe had which grieved her very much, for ſhe loſt that Lady with whom ſhe lodged: After which, ſhe reſolved to be Miſtreſs of her ſelf, and to enjoy that freedom as long as ſhe lived, ſhe being the moſt ſociable company in the world, ſhe had as much care in the culling of her Friends, as ſhe had in avoiding her Lovers: Never did any live a life more pleaſing, more contentedly, nor merrily than Eliſa, after ſhe had quit her ſelf of Poligenes, Agenor, and Aſiadates, who ſince the refuſal of his Preſent, durſt never perſecute her as before, yet ſtill the ſame fire burned in his heart moſt ardently: But Madam, that you may the better underſtand the felicity of Eliſa, it is expedient I make deſcriptions of ſome of her friends which ſhe then entertained, and what manner of lives both ſhe and they lived, by which doing I ſhall add glory to my Country, by acquainting you with the number of the moſt accompliſhed perſons who were with her: Be pleaſed to know then, that after Eliſa ſaw her fortunes to be competent, and in a better ſtate then once ſhe hoped, ſhe had the happineſs to be dearly loved with high eſteem and tenderneſs, by one of the moſt illuſtrious perſons in the world for all Qualities: Eliſa and this Lady, whoſe name was Cleomira were inſeparable. Give me leave to tell you, how Cleomira tho ſhe lived at Tire, yet was an Athenian born, and that her family was as illuſtrious as any of their Kings can boaſt of. But ſince I am not to relate her hiſtory, but only to let you underſtand the merit of her perſon, I ſhall only tell you, that Cleomira married a man of the beſt rank in all Phenicia, and of merit ſuitable to his Quality; after this I will endeavour to give you an Idea of Cleomira: I muſt not deſcribe her, Madam, as our Painters do Venus, for ſhe was not modeſt enough to ſet out Cleomira, nor yet as Pallas, becauſe ſhe was too auſtere; not as Juno, who was not charming enough, nor of Diana, who was a little too ſalvage: But to repreſent Cleomira rightly, is to pick out all the excellencies of all theſe Goddeſſes, to make her picture reſemblant: Cleomira was tall and well proportioned, all the features of her face were miracles, the delicacy of her complexion inexpreſſible, the Majeſty of her perſence ſtrikes admiration, and there is a kind of divine luſtre in her eyes which imprints reverence in the ſouls of all thoſe who look upon her; and for my part, I muſt confeſs, that I never came neer Cleomira, but my heart was ſtruck with an awful reſpect. Moreover Cleomira's eyes are ſo wonderfully fair, that it is impoſſible any tongue ſhould deſcribe them, they are eyes which indeed do produce admiration, yet do not produce the ſame effects which other fair eyes uſe to do in the hearts of beholders, for in producing Love, they alſo produce at the ſame time both fear and reverence, and by a peculiar priviledge they purifie the hearts which they burn. There was alſo a mixture of excellent modeſty with the Majeſty and ſweetneſs which was in her eyes, and I am moſt confident, that there is not any man in the world which durſt entertain the leaſt vitious thought in the preſence of Cleomira. Moreover, her phyſiognomy is the faireſt, the ſweeteſt, and the moſt Noble that ever I beheld, and there appeared ſuch a ſerene tranquility in her countenance, as did evidently ſpeak the Halcion calmneſs in her ſoul; one might perceive all her Paſſions were ſubjects unto her reaſon, and never raiſed any inteſtine rebellions in her heart: I do not think that ever the Carnation in her cheeks was ſeen to exceed its limits, unleſs through heat in Summer, or by a bluſh, but never out of anger or irregularity in her ſoul: So that Cleomira being always conſtantly tranquile, was always conſtantly fair: Indeed Madam, if a body of chaſtity were to be adored throughout all the earth, I would repreſent Cleomira's: If one would embleme glory, then let Cleomira's picture be taken, or for virtue hers alſo. Moreover, the mind and ſoul of this admired perſon did infinitely tranſcend her beauty, ſhe has no equal in generoſity, conſtancy, goodneſs, juſtice and purity: The ſpirit of Cleomira has more in it than the light of Nature, for it is adorned and dreſſed with all the Liberal Arts, ſhe ſpeaks divers languages elegantly, and is ignorant in nothing that merits knowledge, yet ſeems not to know; the moſt ſublime Sciences tranſcend not her knowledg, ſhe is a compleat Miſtreſs in the moſt difficult Arts, ſhe built a Palace after her own ingenuous model, the beſt in the world, ſhe found out the Art of contriving a Palace of a vaſt capacity in a little room, order, proportion, regularity are in all the rooms, all is magnificent, all convenient, the deſign full of conceit and uſeful her Cloſets and Cabinets are full of rarities, which ſpeak the judgment of the chooſer; the Air in her Palice is all perfume, ſeveral rich pots full of flowers make a continual Spring in her Chamber, and the rooms of common uſe are ſo full of pleaſure and phancy, that one would think himſelf in a place inchanted when he's there. Moreover, ſhe had a moſt facetious ingenuity, in compoſing either Proſe or Verſe. But amongſt ſo many high advantages which ſhe received from the Gods, ſhe had the misfortune, that the leaſt diſtemper impaired her health, like certain flowers, which to preſerve their freſhneſs, muſt neither be alwayes in the Sun, nor alwayes in the ſhade, which yet being kept neither cold nor hot, do keep their beauty, or elſe will wither and die: Cleomira therefore being ſo tender, went leſs abroad than any other Ladies in Tire: The truth is, ſhe never needed to go out of her houſe to ſeek for company, for there was not a perſon in all the Court, who had any excellency of wit or virtue, who did not frequent it, nothing did paſs for currant, if it had not the ſtamp of her approbation, not to be known unto her, was thought not to be in the world; a ſtranger never travelled to Tire, who would not ſee Cleomira, and pay her homage; not any excellent Artificer but deſired the glory of her approbation upon their works, all the Poets in Phenicia did ſing her Encomiums, and ſhe had the eſteem of all ſo univerſally, as there was never any that ever ſaw her, which did not extol her, and were charmed with her wit, her ſweetneſs and her generoſity. Moreover, Cleomira was not the only Ornament of her Palace, for ſhe had two Daughters, who indeed were worthy to be hers: The elder, whoſe name was Philonide, has a mixture of much beauty, much complacence, much wit; all her inclinations are noble and generous, her ſtature tall and handſom, her beauty rare, her behaviour the moſt genuine and natural in the world, her wit rhe moſt charming, the moſt eaſie, and the moſt gallant that can be, ſhe writ as well as ſhe ſpoke, and ſhe ſpoke like an Angel; ſhe was wonderfully apt for all excellent things, and was ignorant in nothing that was fit for a perſon of her Quality to know; her dancing was able to make any in love with her, and ſhe was every way ſo apt for the world, for great feaſts, and the honours of a great Court, that it was impoſſible for any to be more, her dreſs did ever ſo well become and fit her, and troubied her ſo little, that one would ſay any thing would fit her, pleaſures and delights, did ſo Court her, that not a day did paſs without a freſh diverſion, and if ever ſhe were ſick, it was ever at ſuch melancholy times, as when no pleaſures were ſtirring; and if ſhe were ill at any time, it was only ſo, as to draw all the Court unto her Chamber, and never ſo ill as to be deprived of their company. Moreover, ſhe had ſuch a prodigious number of friends, (to ſay nothing of her Lovers) as it was to be admired how ſhe could anſwer the friendſhips of ſo many at once, yet ſhe gave them all very ample ſatisfaction; Yet I am confident, ſay what ſhe pleaſe, that it was impoſſible ſhe ſhould love ſo many as ſhe ſeemed to be obliged unto for their friendſhip; and I am certain, there was a great number whom ſhe did only eſteem with common civility and acknowledgments, yet they all were very well contented with her, and loved her as effectually as if ſhe loved them, not but that ſhe had many friends who had deep ſhares in her heart, but that choice number was not eaſily diſcerned from the reſt, and I believe only her ſelf knew poſitively whom and how ſhe loved; yet ſhe had a general tenderneſs to all, which made her the moſt officious perſon in the world, and had ſuch ſecret and particular charms in her converſation towards ſome few men ſhe liked, as to paſs away one afternoon in her Chamber in one of thoſe Summer daies, which Ladies uſe to convert into an artificial night to avoid the heat, was enough to fall in Love with Philonida: But Madam, as Philonida was a great contributer unto the diverſions of Cleomira's Palace, and made it a moſt charming Paradiſe of pleaſures, Anacriſa her Siſter did merit to be her Partner: She was not ſo tall as Philonida, though of a handſome ſtature, but the luſtre of her complexion was ſo taking, and the delicacy of it ſo extraordinary,that though her eyes were not extreamly fair, yet every one did highly applaud her with a thouſand Encomiums. Though Anacriſa was both very fair and amiable, yet there was ſomthing in her aſpect ſo ſprightly, ſo delicate, ſo ſubtil, ſo auſtere, ſo crafty, and ſo ſweet both, as did moſt pleaſing arreſt all eyes,and as did make her both loved and feared at once, and certainly it is no wonder ſhe ſhould inſpire both theſe two paſſions at one time, for ſhe was the moſt amiable and the moſt terrible both, which was in all Phenicia, There was one conſiderable difference between Philonida and Anacriſa, which yet was contributary to their happineſs; the firſt of them was almoſt never diſcontented, in all places ſhe was pleaſed with what ſhe could find in them, and whitherſoever ſhe went, ſhe carried ſuch a ſuitable Spirit along with her, as that ſhe could find pleaſures in Provinces furtheſt off from the Court: But for Anacriſa, there was ſo few things which ſatisfied her, ſo few perſons that pleaſed her, ſo few pleaſures that fitted her inclination,her phancy was ſo delicate, and her humour ſo hard to be pleaſed, as it was almoſt impoſſible for her to find one day of perfect happineſs in a whole year; yet was ſhe ſo happy, as that her diſlikes were alwayes divertiſements; for when ſhe was to paſs over a tedious journey in the Country, or an afternoon in bad company, ſhe would do it ſo pleaſantly, and in ſuch a charming manner, that it was not poſſible but to admire her, and one could not chuſe but pardon a perſon of ſo much beauty and ſpirit as ſhe was, for being very hard to pleaſe in her choice of ſuch as ſhe would honour with her eſteem, or allow them her converſation.

Thus Madam have I deſcribed Cleomira, and her two admired Daughters; and after this, I beſeech you, imagine what delights Eliſa would enjoy in the friendſhip of three ſuch illuſtrious perſons, who were not contented with loving her themſelves, but alſo would have all their friends to love her: Truth is, Eliſa was ſo amiable, that to know her was enough to love her; but though ſhe had been leſs obliging, yet her affection to Cleomira had been enough to purchaſe a reciprocal love, for certainly never did two love each other better, then Eliſa and Cleomira; and her aſſiduity did ſufficiently teſtifie as much, ſince ſhe was continually with her, and did every day partake of each others pleaſures and diverſions:She was continually ſtudious how to divert her with ſome pleaſant invention, ſomtimes by muſick in her garden, and ſomtimes by ſome innocent diſguiſement of her ſelf with ſome other of her friends: And ſince there was nothing excellent which might not be ſeen in Cleomira's Palace, Eliſa was in a continual Paradiſe of joy and pleaſure; but the moſt ſolid and greateſt pleaſure of all the reſt was, that every Evening all Cleomira's moſt intimate friends did rendezvouz at her Palace, and parted not, until handſomneſs and neceſſity of ſleep did invent them. But Madam, that you may the better underſtand the ſweetneſs of this Society, it is requiſite I give you a hint of ſome whereof it was compoſed,I mean of thoſe who were particular friends unto Eliſa, for I ſhould be too long and tedious, if I ſhould ſpeak of all that great number which meet every day at the Palace of Cleomira; and I am perſwaded, that if I ſhould undertake it, I ſhould make you more deſcriptions then there are Statues of gold and ſilver in the Treaſury of Crœſſus: So that confining my ſelf unto more narrow limits,I ſhall only ſhew you the pictures of ſome five or ſix, whom Eliſa moſt eſteemed, and who indeed were worthy to be ſo: Be pleaſed to know then, that amongſt thoſe who came every day unto Cleomira's, there was a man of good Quality, called Megabates, Governour of a Phenician Province, and whoſe rare merit is worthy to be known unto the illuſtrious Cyrus. Indeed he was a man extraordinary, and it was hard to find a man of ſo many excellent qualities; he was big and of a good ſtature, his aſpect was fierce and ſprightly, he had given ſo many teſtimonies of his courage, as he had purchaſed abundance of glory; he has been ſeen to force Colours out of an Enſigns hand in the midſt of a whole Squadron of enemies, and kill him at his feet; afterwards to diſingage himſelf couragiouſly from his crowd of enemies, that would have hindred his retreat: But Madam, it is not courage only which makes Megabates illuſtrious, for the generoſity of his ſoul doth doubtleſs merit as much as his courage; and though he be naturally of a violent temper, yet is he highly juſt. Moreover, he is a moſt zealous honorer of his King, and lover of his Countries good, and the ſame zeal, which he has to his Prince, and to glory, the ſame he hath to his friends; he is not light in the choice of them, but whom he doth chooſe, may be aſſured that he is ſincere, faithful and zealous: As he is juſt, ſo is he a declared enemy unto flattery, he cannot commend where he findes not worth, nor can his ſoul deſcend ſo low as to ſpeak what he thinks not, chooſing rather the opinion of a ſevere man, than of a flatterer; and I verily think, that if he were in Love with a Lady, who had any ſlight defects either in her beauty, her wit, or her humour; all the violence of her paſſion could not make him betray his own thoughts; I verily believe if he had a Miſtreſs that was pale, he would never ſay it was whiteneſs, or if ſhe were melancholy, he would not in a complement call it ſeriouſneſs; all he was able to do, was to ſay nothing, where he could not ſpeak in her advantage; but he was never put to any ſuch extremities, for ſince he was deeply in Love with the fair Philonida, who had all the graces both of body and mind, he was never put to any conſtraint of himſelf, and he might well applaud her ten thouſand times without any fear of flattery. Moreover, Megabates in poſſeſſing all the virtues, had not the leaſt mixture of any vices among them, nor the leaſt tincture of any ill habits, his morals were all innocent, his inclinations were all noble, and the moſt cenſorious obſervers of him, could find nothing too cavil at but the maintaining his opinions with to much heat; but though he was very eloquent, yet when the heat of diſpute did animate him, that others would not be of his opinion, nor he of theirs: For indeed Madam you muſt know, that Megabates was Maſter of as much wit as courage and virtue, a wit that was converſant in fineſt ſcicences, and I dare aſſure you, that ſince Homer unto Ariſtheus, there is not a man who hath written, whoſe works he hath not read, with a judgment able to cenſure, both their excellencies and ther defects; and certainly his critical humour may be born with as an effect of his juſtice. Moreover, he writ himſelf ſo well both in Proſe and Verſe, that it is a great pity he ſhould not do it oftner, or that he ſhould be nice in that Quality: As he writ well, ſo no man could ſpeak better, eſpecially in ſuch company as pleaſed him, and did not oblige him to obſerve a rigid ſilence, as he did ſomtimes with ſuch as pleaſed him not. Moreover, he was ſo exceedingly apprehenſive, and could ſo dive into the hearts of thoſe he liſtened unto, that he would not only anſwer their words, but would very often hit on their thoughts. Again, Megabates for all his auſterity was exceeding civil, and this commendation muſt needs be given him, that he was the moſt regular, the moſt exact, and the moſt conſtant Lover in the world, whoſoever judgeth of him, either by the illuſtrious perſon whom he loved, or by thoſe whom he numbred in the Catalogue of his friends, muſt needs ſpeak much in his advantage, ſince certainly they cannot accuſe him of any Hood-winkt paſſion, or any bad choice in his friends, ſince they were all of them worthy to be ſo: But Madam, I ſhould never make an end, if I ſhould tell you all the excellencies of Megabates: I will therefore end with this for all, that he was a man incomparable and that too much cannot ever be ſpoken in his commendations: Judge then I beſeech you what glory Eliſa had, in having a friend of ſo much merit, a friend who never commended but upon merit, and who did zealouſly commend whereſoever he found worth; he extolled her to the heavens, and doubtleſs ſhe preferred one good word of his, before ten thouſand of others, becauſe ſhe knew he was ſincere. I remember I heard her once ſay in aggravation of his ſincerity, that ſhe would not believe her glaſs, ſo ſoon as ſhe would Megabates, when he told her ſhe was fair. In the mean time, tho ſhe who had ſuch a friend might well eſteem him as a Jewel, yet Megabates was not the only riches of Eliſa, for ſhe had other friends who in their wayes, and in their profeſſions, deſerved that glorious Title.

The High-Prieſt of Tire, amongſt the reſt of her moſt confident friends, was certainly a man moſt admirable, he had a wit ſo quick, ſo ſprightly, and ſo ſuperlative, that there was nothing which eſcaped his knowledge; yet was he naturally merry, and by inclination ſo gallant that before the Gods had took him unto their ſervice, he could not talk of any thing elſe but Gallantry, having ſuch a natural Genius to it, as he would be unawares full of ſuch expreſſions, but it was ſo pleaſingly, as Eliſa told me one day in a merriment, that it was pity when he changed his way of life, he ſhould not bequeath his talent unto ſome other, who with decency might have made uſe of it: But Madam, that you may the better know this Tirian High Prieſt, be pleaſed to know, that the ſolitude unto which he had confined himſelf, when he changed his profeſſion, did not convert him into a ſalvage, but the natural pleaſantneſs of his Spirit remained ſtill, yet in ſuch bounds of goodneſs and modeſty, as reſembled the innocency of the former ages: So that ſince there is nothing more agreeable, then to find a great wit, and much ſweetneſs mingled together, ſo there is nothing more amiable, then the converſation and Society of this Tirian High Prieſt; yet there is ſomthing of abruptneſs in his Spirit, and precipitation in his geſture, but not ſo much as to hinder him from being anſwerable to my deſcription; and this ſudden agitation which appeared in his body and mind, was rather an effect of zealous raptures at ſublime thoughts, then of any diſtemper in his humour: Moreover, his virtue, though moſt exact, yet was not ſo rude and auſtere as in others; he applied himſelf unto ſolid goods, and reſted not upon falſe and deceiving appearances, the equality of his humour was one of the charms of his Society, he was never ſullen nor ſharp with his friends; but loved them with tenderneſs and paſſion, loved them without any ends, he would go from his ſolitude to the Court without any tranſports of joy, and from the Court to his ſolitude without any ſorrow; but the rarity is, this High Prieſt is not only knowing in matters of Divinity, and Sacrifices to the Gods, but he is excellent in a hundred thouſand ſeveral other things; he writes moſt admirably either in Proſe or Verſe, and with ſuch a ſmooth facility, as if all the Muſes were his Dictators, and inſpired with what he writ; his fancies in matters of Poetry is of ſo vaſt an extent, that it comprehends the whole univerſe, he is ſo facetious, ſo ſmooth, ſo ſweet in his writings, that he adds a new fragrancy to the Roſes, and a greater luſter to the Sun, his works do ſo inſinuate, and imprint themſelves in the heart and mind with ſuch a paſſionate Character, as they are exceedingly profitable, and yet this ſoul ſo elevated, has the ſweetneſs and docility of a child, it is free from all preſumption or vanity, and he does ſo charm all thoſe that know him well, as they cannot chuſe but love him, and that with extream tenderneſs, his ſoul is adorned with a moſt modeſt joy which proceeds from his nature, and from the ſerenity of his paſſions, and which doth often communicate it ſelf unto others: The paſſionate inclination of his ſoul is not changed in him by changing his condition, he hath only changed the object of his paſſion, and in lieu of loving as he did heretofore all that was amiable, he now loves only that which is permitted him to love, which is, his duty and his friends: He is alſo much taken with the general beauties of the Univerſe, and makes it his ordinary delight to admire the grandeur of the Gods in contemplation of wonders in their works: The riſing and the ſetting of the Sun is a great diverſion unto him, and more than every one is capable of: A ſerene calm night, under a Canopy of ſparkling Stars, does pleaſingly invite his looks, the murmur of a purling Fountain doth ſweetly charm his ears, and the unmeaſurable vaſtneſs of the Sea does fill his ſoul with ſo much pleaſure, as makes him the more adore that God who is the maker of it. Thus the recreations of this Tirian High-Prieſt, being a ſtudy of wiſdom, you may eaſily imagin, how ſublime is his ſerious buſineſs; and yet his converſation is all affable, all pleaſant, free, and diverting, having the art, when he is diſpoſed unto any Railary, to leave out all bitterneſs and ſharpneſs, and to retain that which is pleaſing and agreeable,which certainly is a thing more difficult than the taming of Lions: Judg then Madam, if this Sidonian High Prieſt be not worthy to be received into the Palace of the great Cleomira, to be eſteemed of Philonida and Anacriſa, to be loved of the generous Megabates, and to be one of the friends of Eliſa, and indeed he is ſo, and in ſuch ſort, as none is more in her favour than he.

After this Madam, I muſt acquaint you, how there is another man of Quality, one of this admirable Society, who the High-Prieſt of Sidon did moſt tenderly affect, called Clearques, whoſe deſcription is ſo difficult, as I know not how to make it reſemble him; yet certainly he merits to be known unto you, and that with much eſteem: I can eaſily tell you, that his ſtature is a common height, his hair brown, and all the features of his face regular enough, and alſo indifferently pleaſing; but as for his Air and Phyſiognomy I challenge any one to deſcribe it: For indeed Madam, there is in his face a kind of ſeriouſneſs and lumpiſh melancholy, and yet there is alſo a kind of blithneſs and jollity in his eyes: Truth is, there is a miſcellany of joy and ſorrow in his compoſition, which ſucceeding each other in their turns, and ſometimes may be ſeen both at a time in his face, makes Clearques to pleaſe infinitely: He hath ſuch a diſpoſition unto mirth, that in the midſt of the moſt croſs affairs in the world, he is almoſt always ready to tell a merry tale, or to take any recreation: But Madam, in ſpeaking of the Spirit of Clearques. I muſt tell you, that he had as much courage as was poſſible,that he had made himſelf eminent in Martial Matters a thouſand times, and that he had all the qualities which were deſirable in a man of honour,but I will not inſiſt upon any deſcription of his virtues,only I muſt tell you,that he had one very eminent Quality, which was, that he would moſt faithfully and zealouſly keep all his promiſes, of this he hath given moſt Heroick teſtimonies, for all Phenicia knows, and hath ſeen him a thouſand times hazard his life and liberty for the intereſt of a great Prince unto whom he was ingaged. But in proſecution of my deſign I muſt let you know, wherein Clearques is the moſt ſingular: Imagine him then Madam to have as clear and delicate a Spirit as a man can have, and as capable of any high buſineſs when he pleaſed to imploy his parts: But the wonder is, there is not a man in the world who knew how to play the fool more pleaſantly than he; for his Spirit had ſuch a Genius ſo apt and particular for it, that nothing in the world made more pleaſant ſport than to hear him talk; yet his way was nothing like unto theirs who make it their profeſſion to tell merry ſtories and tales; that which rendred him moſt pleaſant was, he talked as if he never thought of what he ſaid, yet wit, fancy, and quickneſs were inſeparable from his words. Moreover, he would paſs ſo ſubtilly from a ſerious matter to a merry, that one could not chuſe but take exceeding delight in it: Some days he would be very reſerved and ſerious, as if he were hatching ſome deep deſign, and after he had kept a long and grave ſilence, he would ſuddenly begin to talk of Guegawes and gallantry as jocondly, as if he had never muſed at all: He would alſo addreſs himſelf to the moſt ſerious perſon in the world, as well as unto the moſt merry; and he did ſo well know how to hit the Spirits of thoſe he talked with, as he never ſpoke any thing which would let them take it ill: He would ſometimes act the child, as if he were one indeed, and with as much application, as if he had nothing elſe to do; he would alſo act the old and the young, the wiſe, the ſimple, the ſprightly, the Blockhead, when he was in the humour to make himſelf merry. Moreover, he was born with an amorous ſoul, but it was not after a common faſhion: For the very truth is, Madam, Clearques was the moſt gallant, the verieſt Weathercock, and the moſt conſtant Lover in the world; and though this laſt quality ſeems to be incompatable with the ſecond; yet it is moſt true, that he was both fickle and conſtant; his ſoul hath been ſo full of paſſion, that nothing could never ſtagger it, but maugre this conſtancy,he hath entertained a hundred petty tranſitory Loves; he never ſaw a woman that pleaſed him, but he would tell her of it, and be ready to do a thouſand ſlight ſervices when occaſions preſented themſelves, and to take delight in ſeeing and be ſeen: Yet for all this, there was ſtill a ſuperlative and predominate paſſion in his heart, which was never weakened by this multitude of trifling gallantries which he was in all places full of, and he was ever able to quit theſe tranſitory Miſtreſſes for her unto whom he had really given his heart, and was reſolved always never to abandon her: So that having found out the art of reconciling fidelity and inconſtancy together, he was all complacent unto all the Beauties he met with, and yet preſerved himſelf for his real Miſtreſs: It may be alſo ſaid, that Fortune had a mind to favour his gallant and merry inclination, for he met with fit adventures in every place, and found out occaſions of imploying his talent amongſt many Ladies, and that fair ones; ſo that his adventures were very ſuitable to his humour. Moreover, as he could ſpeak excellently, ſo he could write as well; and I do not think any ever had a more amiable way of trying wit as Clearques had in his Verſes and Letters,ſo gallant and ſo pleaſant as is inimitable: For though all he writ was genuine and natural, yet the wonder is how he could hit upon it, having ſuch peculiar fancies, as none could light upon,or if they did, could not expreſs them comparable to him: In ſhort Madam, Clearques was a man ſo extraordinary,that if the ſweetneſs and pleaſantneſs of his Spirit were ſeparated from the reſt of his good qualities,doubtleſs enough would be found to make up two compleat men out of one. He is alſo univerſally loved and eſteemed of all who know him, eſpecially by the admirable Cleomira, and all thoſe whoſe deſcriptions I have made.

Now Madam, to follow the Rule I propoſed unto my ſelf, I beſeech you give me leave to deſcribe unto you the wiſe Theodamus,who was one of this Society: He of whom I ſpeak, Madam, being infinitely eſteemed of all thoſe excellent perſons I have named, ought in reaſon to be ſo of you; nor do I doubt, but he will as ſoon as you ſhall know him: Theodamus is not originally a Phenician, but of a good extraction and Family, wherein virtue hath appeared with full luſtre a long time. Moreover, though Theodamus by his profeſſion may be ranked amongſt thoſe who are called the accompliſhed men of the Town; yet in reſpect of his great virtue and rare merit, he is ranked amongſt the accompliſhed men of the Court, all who do univerſally eſteem him, and treat him with extraordinary civility. But Madam, ſince the ſoul of Theodamus does merit a thouſand praiſes, I will not inſiſt upon the deſcription of his perſon; and to let you know him, I muſt firſt deſcribe unto you his honeſty, his juſtice, and his prudence; and I aſſure you, that all theſe three virtues are to be found in his heart, as they are in themſelves: Indeed I do not think there is any man in the world more ſincere, more free, nor more faithful than he; he is moſt juſt in every thing, even in ſuch things as he is intereſted in; and there was never any who with more reaſon doth merit the title of Prudent than he; yet there is ſomething in his temper which is not ordinarily found in temperance, for he is extreamly vehement, and if his wiſdom were not accuſtomed to conquer all his paſſions, and ſubdue them unto his reaſon, his cholor would ſometimes ſhake his ſoul: But Madam, this fire which upon ſome occaſion puts him to ſome pain, produceth a thouſand good effects, for it makes him the more zealous to ſerve his friends, it elevates both his heart and ſoul, it contributes much vigor and ſpirit in the tranſaction of any buſineſs he goes about, either in his own affairs or his friends. Moreover, he reſembles the generous Megabates ſo neer, that the love of his Country is ſo deeply imprinted in his heart, as there is nothing which he will not attempt for its ſafety, if occaſion ſerved. Again, Theodamus is the moſt regularly civil of all men living, and the moſt unwilling to diſoblige any one; 'Tis true, his ſoul was open, but unto very few, yet his heart was hard unto none: As the ſoul of Theodamus was great, firm, and generous, ſo his mind was as great, ſolid, and extreamly knowing; but though he was knowing almoſt in every thing, yet had been never verſed ſed in the Greek Tongue, though his name was deſcended out of that Country where they ſpeak no other; yet truly this little piece of ignorance in him, (if the word may be applied unto ſo able and knowing a man) did ſet off all the reſt of his knowledg much better, for though he had not the Grecian Language, yet he knew all the Greeks did know, and there was not any Science unto which he could not ſpeak exceeding well; but in lieu of that Language, he was moſt perfect in the Aſſyrian, which is the moſt univerſal in all Aſia, and he was a Critique in his own natural tongue, inſomuch as there was none who was addicted to write in the Phenician Language, but they conſulted with Theodamus, who had himſelf ſo polite and uncommon ſtile, as never any had more fit, more noble, and more natural expreſſions of himſelf than he: He writ alſo in an excellent Character, which ſet off his works the better; and I aſſure you, without any flattery of him, that there appeared a ſweet regularity in every thing he did, neatneſs was inſeparable from every thing about him, neat in his apparel, neat in his houſe, neat in all things, ſo that the high-prized Cabinets of others, were not worth ſo much as his of leſs value at home, every trifle were effects of the generoſity of his judgment, which could not endure to ſee any thing out of its place. In the mean time, there is ſuch a Sea of goodneſs in his ſoul, that though he can ſee the leaſt blemiſh in thoſe that converſe with him, yet he was never known to ſpeak the leaſt ſyllable of the faults and imperfections of others, unleſs it were in a wild and harmleſs way of acquainting the owners of them, that they might correct them: Nor had this his goodneſs the leaſt tincture of diſſimulation in it, when he thought it fit to ſpeak unto any of his friends; for ſince he tranſacted always by the Rule of reaſon, he never ſought how to pleaſe them he adviſed, but how he might profit them. In the mean time, he is all ſweetneſs, all civility, and will commend, even with the higheſt ſtrains, thoſe whom he ſee deſerve it: He is ſo exceedingly taken with all manner of merit and virtue, as makes moſt evident he is himſelf a man of ſuperlative parts; but my greateſt admiration is, that though his temper be both violent and ſerious, yet his converſation is ſweet, eaſie, mild, agreeable, natural, and gallant, never conteſting in his diſcourſe, letting them ſpeak who have a mind to it, and himſelf full of ability to ſpeak when he will; and though he will ſometimes argue upon things, yet it is without any fury or intemperance, but with ſuch mildneſs, as ſpeaks him an abſolute Maſter of his paſſion, and a lover of reaſon; but when he is at any time high and zealous, he is perfectly convinced, that Right and Juſtice is on his ſide, and knows it requiſite to diſpute with zeal. Moreover, Theodamus makes it evident by his curioſity, that his pleaſures deſerves applauds, for he hath a Study which is adorned with moſt rare Books, having carefully and ingenuouſly collected all the learned, wity, polite, gallant, and pleaſant Writings of all the wits in Phenicia, ſince he came in to the world: In ſhort Madam, I do aſſure you, that Theodamus, both for the beauty of his ſoul, and the goodneſs of his heart, and alſo for the fineneſs of his wit, is worthy of infinite praiſes, and to be ranked in the number of thoſe whom Eliſa prefers before the reſt of the world; and indeed it is moſt certain, that ſhe did prefer him above thoſe ſhe eſteemed moſt, and amongſt thoſe whom ſhe admitted into her heart, he had the higheſt place; and indeed, the truth is, he was a man of ſuch rare merits, that he was worthy to be propoſed as a model of a man of true honour.

After all this, Madam, I muſt beg your favour, and permittance to make two deſcriptions more: The firſt ſhall be of a man of twenty two years of age, called Pherecides, who at that age had the glory to have for his friends all that Phenicia had moſt illuſtrious; and the other ſhall be of the famous Ariſtheus, for though he was a Sardinian, yet I am confident they know him not. But to return unto Pherecides, be pleaſed to know, that he was not only of an advantageous ſtature, but alſo extraordinary handſom, yet of ſuch a beauty, as in his Sex ſpeaks nothing of great and Noble, his complexion was delicate, his eyes gray and tender, the proportion of his face was juſt, even and pleaſing; but for all this, he had no reſemblance of that beauty which is in women; his carriage was high, and though there was an unconceiveable ſweetneſs in the ayr of his countenance, yet there was a kind of ſweet auſterity alſo, which rendred him moſt amiable. Moreover, he had the moſt lovely head of hair in the world, his locks lay in a thouſand round curls without any art, and was of the lovelieſt brown that ever eye beheld. Pherecides being as I have repreſented him unto you, adorned with all the ornaments of beauty, and in the ſpring of his youth, yet he had neither baſhfulneſs nor timidity, nor over-great boldneſs, nor inconſideration: One may ſay he came knowing into the world, ſo wiſely and gallantly did he behave himſelf; the tone of his voice was very amiable, and he had this advantage from Nature, that there was in all his actions an unexplicable conformity. Moreover, his ſoul was ſo noble, his inclinations ſo ſweet, and his heart ſo tender for his friends, and ſo full of zeal and fervency to them, as he merited much commendations. Again, he had naturally a pure wit, and he compoſed Verſes ſo fine, ſo moving, and ſo paſſionate, as it was evident that he had not a neutral ſoul: The Poetry of the great Therpandres his Uncle, whoſe reputation was ſo high, was not more excellent than he; and I am very confident, that never any had a heart more tender in a point of friendſhip, nor more fervent in love than Pherecides; for commonly thoſe who are hot in matters of Love, are cool in matters of friendſhip, and thoſe who are capable of the moſt zealous friendſhip, are ſeldom ſo of any violent love: But as for Pherecides, he loved both his Miſtreſs and his Friend with unlimited ardency. Moreover, he had one peculiar faculty which was at his hours of jollity, to imitate as excellently and plauſibly both, as if he were the very ſame he repreſented: But when he expoſed himſelf unto this paſtime, it was always in a little company, or in the Palace of Cleomira with Eliſa. Again, never could man act both a real gallantry and a counterfeit, nor ſigh ſo fitly as Pherecides; and he had found out the art of making ſuch a miſcellany of reſpect and boldneſs, by his way of acting with thoſe he loved really, and counterfeiting with thoſe he diſſembled, as it was impoſſible he ſhould be ill-treated: Truth is, Madam, I do not think it poſſible to find a more amiable Gallant, nor a more pleaſing Friend, than he; and I am confident, that if he had lived long, he had been as compleat a man as ever was in Phenicia: But, Madam, death raviſhed him from all his friends, in the very Spring of his youth, having the glory of having his Urn bedewed with tears from the faireſt eyes, and moſt illuſtrious perſons in all the Court.

Laſtly, Madam, I muſt ſpeak of Ariſtheus, of whoſe perſon I need not ſay much, ſince you know him; and ſince he hath been in your preſence, it will ſeem raſhneſs in me to deſcribe his Spirit unto you: But ſince I know it to be of vaſt capacity, and ſo incomprehenſible as you cannot fathom it in ſo ſhort a time, I think it permittable to ſpeak of it, as if you knew him not at all: Give me leave therefore to tell you, Madam, that Ariſtheus is illuſtrious in every thing, and is owner of ſo many rare qualities, as I cannot tell how to rank them into order, but I will ſhew them unto you as well as my memory will permit me; yet it is fit that the qualities of his ſoul have the firſt place; and I aſſure you, thoſe of Ariſtheus are ſuch, as anſwers all that is deſirable, for it is great, high, conſtant, generous and grateful: If from his ſoul I paſs unto his heart, I ſhall find it full of a thouſand excellencies, I ſhall ſee a love of true glory, and infinite goodneſs and tenderneſs of his friends, and a ſolid affection unto virtue; and if from his heart I aſcend again unto his mind, what is not to be found there? So clear, ſo great, ſo high, ſo univerſally knowing, as I know none comparable unto him, nor know I any thing which he doth not; if he talk of the moſt ſublime, knotty, and uncommon Sciences, he talks as if he never talked of any thing elſe; if he diſcourſe in matters of Phyloſophy, he renders himſelf intelligible unto the very ignotant; if he ſpeak of the Stars, of their ſcituation or elevation, it is as if he knew the way 'twixt earth and heaven, and as if he viſited all the houſes of the Sun, as frequently as thoſe in Tire; if he diſcourſe of the Morals, he will make it apparent he teacheth no more by his words, than he doth by his manners; if he fall upon any Subject concerning the Politiques, one would think he had governed the Univerſe for many years, it being not poſſible one can imagine, that books without a long experience ſhould infuſe ſo much knowledge; he does not only reaſon upon publick buſineſs, but alſo dives into the Councels of the deepeſt ſecrets; he looks at the cauſes of the moſt ſtrange events, and foreſees the ſequel of things with ſo much Juſtice, as it happens very rarely that he is miſtaken: If from the Politiques we paſs to his Poeſie, he ſpeaks as if he had taught the Muſes, and not they him, for never was any more admirable in that art than he; but the admiration is, he hath reduced that Science into Act; for he hath now compos'd a Poem, of the birth of the Gods, (and for that reaſon called it Theogonia) which is a piece ſo admirable, that ſince Homer never any attempted ſo great a work, it is not only great, but alſo admirable; and thoſe who are able to judge, do ſay, that he hath obſerved a better method, with more judgment and better excellency than Homer did. He is Maſter alſo of many other rare works, which render his name illuſtrious, and which are too long to relate, as well as many other qualities which Ariſtheus knows: For indeed he knows many Languages moſt perfectly, he knows all good books, he is excellent in Hiſtory, Geography, and to ſay all in few words, he is ignorant in nothing; but the greateſt wonder of all is, he knows men as well as manners and ſciences, and there was not harſhneſs in his converſation and Spirit, as uſeth to be in moſt Scholers; but on the contrary, Ariſtheus ſpoke more like a Courtier than a Scholar, he ſpoke moſt elegantly, and without affectation, and thought commonly moſt men who ſpeak much, are accuſed for ſpeaking too much; yet it was not ſo with Ariſtheus, though naturally he loves to talk. Moreover, Ariſtheus is not of that rigid Sect who ſcorns the converſation of women, but he is much delighted with them, and would paſs away whole afternoons in trifling talk with them, whom he knew could talk of nothing elſe: He expreſſed himſelf and his Gallantries with as good a grace, and perhaps better, than thoſe who are Gallants by profeſſion: 'Tis true, he hath been ſometimes blamed for being a little too full of flattery of Ladies, and too univerſally commending them he ſpoke unto; but I know this to be a part of ſo good a principle, as I am none of thoſe who will find any fault for being prodigal of his good Language. Ariſtheus is ſo gallant, that ſometimes he makes it known that he is in Love with an amiable perſon, who is a friend of Eliſa's, and who ſo exceedingly reſembles the fair Doraliſa, as one would take the one for the other, both for her beauty, her wit, and her humours; yet to tell you plainly, I think the heart of Ariſtheus is only full of tender friendſhip unto her: But as for matter of Gallantry, I believe he keeps that cloſe in his heart, for he can hide it and ſhew it when he will, and is a moſt abſolute Maſter of himſelf: 'Tis true, he does and ſays a hundred things which may well be taken for a real Love; and I believe the friendſhip he bears unto this amiable perſon, has a degree of heat in it, which is above that he bears unto others, but for all this I cannot think it Love; all I grant is, that the ſpark which burns in his heart, is not altogether friendſhip: However, this doth produce much ſweet converſation, enough to make the Spirit of Ariſtheus appear: Some alſo do upbraid him with the like affection unto three or four one after another, and yet he cannot endure any ſhould upbraid him with inconſtancy; but in his own defence he ſaith, that he never yet drived any one out of his heart, who once entred into it, and that he only cauſed them to change places, and ſo without abandoning them, or ceaſing to love them, he only reſerves the higheſt place in his heart for the beſt of his friends, who ſweetly diſpute one with another for an Empire, which aſſuredly he never gives without good reaſon: However, this helps our converſation, and makes it more jolly. Moreover, Ariſtheus is ſo full of complacence, as he never contradicts any voluntarily; but my greateſt wonder at him is, his inclination to inhance the merits of others, and to hide their defects, which makes him ſo generally known, as none can be better: Indeed we have not a Prince nor a Princeſs, who do not think themſelves honoured in knowing him, and who do not treat him with abundance of civility: And, Madam, upon a ſerious view of Ariſtheus, I find, that he comes either ſhort of a virtue, or elſe is in the exceſs; for he is ſometimes ſo extreamly treamly modeſt, as thoſe who very well know his merit, cannot endure it, for he will ſo reject their commendations, as if he were not worthy, and ſpeaks ſuch things of himſelf, as it is impoſſible he ſhould ſpeak as he thinks, ſince it is not credible, that he ſhould ſo perfectly know all good qualities in others, and be ignorant of his own excellencies. After this Madam, I believe you will confeſs, that a man who cannot be blamed for any thing but having too much of a virtue, is a man moſt extraordinary, and that ſuch a one is no mean contributer unto the pleaſures of Cleomira's Palace: Did you but ſee the Divine Cleomira, the adorable Philonida, the fair Anacriſa, the admired Eliſa, the generous Magabates, the illuſtrious High-Prieſt, the pleaſant Clearques, the wiſe Theodamus, the merry Pherecides, the accompliſhed Ariſtheus, and five or ſix others, worthy of ſuch a company, with Phocilion, I am moſt confident you would be charmed, and confeſs that Eliſa had reaſon to think greater felicity was in ſuch friends, than in her Lovers. Moreover, Madam, it is requiſite I let you underſtand, that all theſe friends of Eliſa did not entertain her with ſuch a kind of friendſhip as take up with civility, and has ſo little fervency in it, as it can ſcarcely be diſcerned; but on the contrary, it was with a moſt ardent, zealous, and earneſt amity, which ſhewed it ſelf upon all occaſions, an amity full of applauds and commendations, which was carefully to pleaſe and divert, and to ſpeak reaſonable, this affection which they all had unto Eliſa, might be termed Love without deſires, ſince certainly there was much more in it than ordinary amity, though none of the reſtleſs reſentments of Love.

After this, Madam, you may eaſily imagine, that Eliſa being continually in Cleomira's Palace, amongſt ſo many accompliſhed perſons, did live in full ſatisfaction, and was full of complacence, for her auſterity had ſo choaked all her Lovers, that they kept diſtances, and durſt not importune her; yet Aſiadates in his heart was ſtill full of unruly paſſions to Eliſa, and not daring to teſtifie his Love unto her, he reſolved to ſweeten the bitterneſs of his torment, by expreſſions of his hatred of Lyriope, who endured moſt inſufferable reſtleſneſs, that Eliza ſhould rob her of the heart of a Husband, as formerly ſhe had done of a Lover: So that whilſt ſhe was innocently enjoying her diverſions amongſt ſuch and ſo many illuſtrious perſons, Lyriope was plotting how to ruin her, and ſo to cure Aſiadates of his paſſion, yet ſhe was a long time before ſhe could contrive the way: But ſince there is nothing which jealouſie cannot invent, Lyriope knowing Aſiadates to be ambitious as well as amorous, to try if ſhe could take off Eliſa, reſolved to perſwade the King to undertake this Conqueſt, conceiving that Aſiadates durſt not be a Rival to his Maſter. Since ſhe had her education with the Queen, and was of the ſame age with the King, ſhe had great familiarity with him, for there was always a great friendſhip between this young Prince and her. Moreover, ſince he never yet knew what Love meant, ſhe thought it not impoſſible but her deſign might hit, and the ſooner, becauſe ſhe divers times heard him commend Eliſa very highly: So that making uſe of this favourable inclination, which ſhe ſaw he had unto the thing he deſired, ſhe contrived it ſo cunningly, that ſhe engaged the King one day unto a long conference with her; and ſeeming to be infinitely zealous for his glory and intereſt, ſhe perſwaded him that there was no better ſubject for it, than this thing which ſhe had to impart. This Prince being very deſirous to know her meaning, deſired her to tell him ſincerely what it was; Lyriope ſeeing ſo fit an opportunity, did cloſe with it: Then ſhe began to applaud him to the Skies, and to counterfeit a baſhfulneſs which ſeemed natural; ſhe told him that which doubtleſs ſhe never would, if her jealouſie had not been above her reaſon; I muſt confeſs, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him bluſhing, and holding her hand before her eyes, as if ſhe would not have him ſee what ſhe deſired he ſhould) that your commands do perplex me, for I muſt tell you, that which indeed handſomeneſs forbids me, and yet that which my duty tells me you ought to know: Since I am confident of your ſincerity, (replied this young Prince) I conjure you to tell me what it is: Know then, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, that the only fault which can be found in you is, that you are a little too ſolitary, and reſerved, and ſeem as if you were a hater of civil converſation,but eſpecially the converſation of Ladies; your Enemies ſpeak a little broad, and ſay, it is a ſign your heart is not ſenſible of thoſe ſervices which they render you, and that you baniſh your ſelf and them from the pleaſures of the Court; and that which is worſe, they intereſt the people in their reaſonings, ſaying, that thoſe Kings who are lovers of magnificency, feaſts, muſick, and glorious Gallantries, do inrich them in their trades; whereas on the contrary,thoſe who are of other humours do impoveriſh them: So that the herd of people being capable of any impreſſion whatſoever, this report begins to ſpread it ſelf throughout all Tire, and will ere long through all Phenicia; therefore, Sir, I conceive it would be very well, if you quitted your ſerious buſineſs, ſometimes to ſpend ſome hours in diſcourſe with Ladies; and to ſtop their mouths,I know not whether it were not beſt of all for you to ſeem as if you were in love with ſome beauty or other, but I would have her ſuch a one whom you may quit when you pleaſe, when you have ſtifled theſe odd reports which are raiſed among the people.

The King hearing Lyriope deliver her thoughts with ſuch expreſſions of zeal to his ſervice, never examined the truth of her words,nor did at all doubt them:So that ſeeming to credit her advice, he thanked her for giving it: And to teſtifie unto you, ſaid he unto her, that I am none of thoſe who will hear of their faults and not correct them, I will put my heart into your hands, diſpoſe of it as you pleaſe, for I do proteſt unto you, it was never yet any ones but my own, I have eyes Lyriope which can diſtinguiſh beauty; but I muſt confeſs they never loved with any violence of paſſion: Sir, replied Lyriope, I would adviſe you not to be too liberal of ſo precious a Jewel: Diſſemble the matter (ſaid ſhe and laughed) and counterfeit Love:But I pray,ſaid he, aſſiſt me in the choice of her with whom you would have me diſſemble: Then was Lyriope extreamly non-pluſt; for though ſhe wiſhed the King to diſſemble a love to Eliſa, when ſhe was at the very point of naming her, envy and jealouſie did ſo ſparkle in her heart,that it began to beat, her colour changed, and ſhe ſtayed a while with her mouth half open before ſhe could pronounce the name of Eliſa, to perſwade the King unto a choice of her for the object of that feigned paſſion which ſhe would adviſe him to aſſume. Lyriope hath ſince reported, that ſhe was in pitiful perplexity at that time; and indeed it is eaſily to be imagined, that envy and jealouſie conteſting in her heart, did put it into a ſtrange diſorder: On the one ſide ſhe ſaw that ſhe might do a great honour to Eliſa whom ſhe hated; on the other ſide, ſhe might ſpite Aſiadates, and extinguiſh a paſſion which diſturbed her tranquility: But though jealouſie was powerful in her ſpirit, yet ſhe had not overcome her envy, had ſhe not fancied much happineſs to her ſelf, if this project could wean him from the love of Eliſa; for as it is ordinary for envy to make thoſe partial who are poſſeſſed with it, Lyriope began to think Eliſa not ſo handſome as ſhe was, and never to think that the King would fall really in love with her; ſo that the tumultuous turbulency of her ſoul beginning to calm upon a ſudden, ſhe named Eliſa unto the King: But ſhe had no ſooner named her, then this Prince cried out, Oh Eliſa (ſaid he unto her) Certainly you have read my very heart, Eliſa being ſhe who of all the Ladies in the world beſt pleaſeth me, and with whom I can with leaſt pain ſeem to be in Love. Lyriope hearing the wind in that corner, began to tell the King (her envy growing ſtronger than her jealouſie) that ſhe ſhould be extremely ſorry, if ſhe ſhould kindle a real paſſion in his ſoul, and therefore ſhe would diſſwade him from the choice of Eliſa, ſince he had a greater inclination to love her than any other, but her labour was in vain, ſhe could not quench what ſhe had kindled, nor change the Kings mind; at laſt ſhe reſolved to ſtand unto her firſt principle. Thus it was on all ſides reſolved, that the King ſhould ſeem to be Eliſa's ſervant. Since the Feaſt of Neptune was to be celebrated within two days, a fit occaſion of expreſſing his Gallantry did offer it ſelf, ſuch a one as would make all Phenicia his witneſſes. In the mean time, Eliſa knew nothing how Lyriope plotted againſt the tranquility of her life, but enjoyed a thouſand innocent delights in Cleomira's Palace, finding more contentation in the converſation of her friends, than ever ſhe could in the multitude of her Lovers. Phocilion alſo, as amorous as he was, did not think himſelf altogether miſerable, though he was not loved ſo well as he would be, for he had the conſolation to hope that none would ever be more happy than himſelf: Poligenes and Agenor had an infinite eſteem of her ſtill, ſince reaſon and deſpair had cured them of their Love to her; but as for Aſiadates, he was ſtill in moſt horrible torment, the violence of his paſſion was without any hope, he received a thouſand affronts and checks from Eliſa; neither Lyriope's jealouſie nor his own, would permit him any reſt, yet were his ſorrows much augmented upon the Feaſt-day of Neptune: For the King in proſecution of his intended deſign, applied himſelf to commend and Court Eliſa more than any other, and to ſpeak high in her advantage: He took her out to dance at a Ball which was kept at the Court, and made ſuch applications to her, as that the next morning the general noiſe was all over Tire, that the King was in love with Eliſa: But Madam imagine with what a reſtleſs ſoul Lyriope did paſs over the day of this Feaſt: For my part, who by chance was next her the ſame night that this pretended Love of the King made the greateſt flame, I muſt confeſs that I never ſaw any thing more equally carried in my life; for though I did not then know the true cauſe of Lyriopes changing countenance, nor did I imagine that envy only was the cauſe of it, yet did I obſerve all paſſages, I ſaw Lyriope look ſometimes upon the King, ſometimes upon Eliſa, ſometimes upon Aſiadates, and ſometimes upon nothing, though her eyes were open, but ſtood in a moſt profound muſing, I perceived her pronounce ſome words ſometimes half aloud, and perceiving her own error would reſtrain her ſelf. As for Aſiadates, I heard him ſay, that never man was ſuch a ſufferer as himſelf, when he ſaw the King become his Rival; for though he never was in the leaſt hope of Eliſa's love, yet was he as much grieved at it, as if that Prince had taken from him the heart of Eliſa, or hindered him from enjoying her: As for Phocilion, he alſo was troubled at it, but his was with a mixture of ſome tranquility, and the more, becauſe he did not conceive that Eliſa's eyes would ever be dazled at any grandure, ſince ſhe was uſed to treat Princes and Subjects all alike, and was ſo far from being ſtartled at Majeſty, that ſhe ſlighted it: But Madam, the rareſt part of this encounter was, that the King had not talked above three words to Eliſa, but he was really in Love with her, and in as high a degree as poſſible could be: yet was this Conqueſt no joy unto Eliſa, but on the contrary it troubled her: Yet to draw ſome good out of a thing which ſhe looked upon as evil, ſhe imployed all the credit ſhe had over the Spirit of this Prince, to diſpoſe it unto virtue, unto which he had already much inclination; and indeed it may be juſtly ſaid, that all Phenicia was beholding unto Eliſa, for a thouſand excellent things which ſhe infuſed into the ſoul of this young Prince. In the mean time, Feaſts, Muſicks, and all delight were more in uſe at the Court than ever; and though Eliſa, ſince the Kings love, did more affect ſolitude, and appeared in ſight leſs than ordinary, but carried it, as if ſhe would let the Court ſee that ſhe was no way contributary unto the love of this young Prince, nor rejoyced at all in the Conqueſt, yet it was impoſſible that ſhe ſhould not be preſent at theſe great aſſemblies, whereof ſhe was the cauſe, yet ſhe tranſacted ſo wiſely, that without incenſing the King, ſhe perſwaded him, that all he was to expect from her, was reſpect and acknowledgment; and that ſuch acknowledgment only, as ſhould be locked up in her heart without any other outward expreſſions, than wiſhing his glory, and the happineſs of his reign: And indeed this Prince (who was not of his Fathers inclinations) did love Eliſa with a moſt pure flame. In the mean time, Lyriope found her ſelf extreamly miſtaken in her opinion, that the Kings love to Eliſa would quench the flames of Aſiadates; for on the contrary, he ſeeing his choice authorized by the Kings, his flames were hotter, and he began to ſcorn and ſlight Lyriope much more; on the other ſide, this envious woman ſeeing the King did really love Eliſa, and that loving her as he did, it was very glorious unto her, ſhe thought how ſhe ſhould quench thoſe flames which ſhe had kindled, endeavouring to perſwade this Prince, that if he did love Eliſa in earneſt, he would loſe himſelf in the minds of the people more than by his indifferency and reſervedneſs, but her ſecond perſwaſions were not ſo prevalent as her firſt: So that giving allowance unto his violent and reſpective paſſion, he Courted the eſteem of Eliſa,and endeavoured to merit it by a thouſand acts of Juſtice, Clemency, and Liberality, knowing well, that the only way to win upon her was by ſuch ſolid virtues, yet this did not at all hinder his Gallantries. In the mean time Eliſa, though ſhe was naturally inclined unto good deeds, yet ſhe would never ask any thing of the King which might be any ſubject of obligation;ſo that ſhe was in all imaginable credit with the King, and would not make any uſe of it, for ſhe kept her ſelf cloſe unto her Maxim, which was to ſhun all obligations unto a Lover. In the interim, the Kings Love being truly grounded, his heart was all in a flame with the thoughts upon Eliſa, ſo that he tranſacted nothing without imparting it unto her, he conſulted with her in matters of greateſt importance; and though the modeſty of Eliſa obliged her to refuſe thoſe honours which he did her, yet he ſtill continued to ask of her thoſe counſels which ſhe ſtill denied: This Prince was ſo reſpective, as not to term his affection Love when he talked to her, but only to name it eſteem, friendſhip, and a moſt violent paſſion: He endured her to deny him a thouſand trivial things, which ſhe might well have granted unto his Quality, without any injury unto her virtue; and indeed ſhe denied him leave to have her Picture taken,with a ſtrange repulſe; and though there were a hundred of Eliſa's Pictures at Tire, yet ſince they were taken in the life of Straton, and ſince ſhe would never ſuffer any to be taken ſince ſhe was Miſtreſs of her ſelf, they did not perfectly reſemble her, for ſhe was much fairer than all thoſe Pictures. However, he could not by any Rhetorick perſwade her unto ſo much complacence; yet this her refuſal did rather augment than diminiſh his paſſion, as it may evidently appear by the adventure of this her Statue: For be pleaſed to know, that this young King having finiſhed a great Gallery, which the laſt King his Father began to build, his fancy was to place in it two rows of the Statues of Women, and to make his choice out of all the Beauties in his Court: For there being then at

Tire many of the Diſciples of Dipœnus and Scillis, he conceived it an eaſie matter to effect his deſign, which he principally intended unto the eternal memory of his Love to Eliſa, by placing her figure in the higheſt part of this Gallery; So that all the Carvers and Ingravers of any reputation were ſet on work; but the choice of the moſt excellent among them, being imployed to make the Statue of Eliſa, yet he could not make it, all his art could not repreſent that vivacity which was in her looks and action, nor that high air of beauty which was in every part: For my part, I am perſwaded, their over great deſire of doing it to the life, did hinder them, for all the reſt did moſt lively and exactly repreſent the perſons for whom they were intended: The Statue of Cleomira was admirable,that of Philonida could not be better, that of Aracriſa was excellent, and chance would have it, that all were very well but Eliſa's, which was very ill: I cannot eaſily expreſs how the King was vexed at it; ſo that, as you know, upon ſuch an occaſion every one will ſtrive how to pleaſe the King, ſome or other told him, that he knew how he might get a moſt admirable Statue of Eliſa: This was no ſooner ſaid,but the King was extreamly earneſt to know how: After which, he was told,that the moſt rare Statue of Eliſa, which Dipœnus and Scillis made, and which they carried away after the death of the late King his Father, was in the hands of Crœſſus, and that it was probable he would reſtore it,paying what it coſt,

This adviſe was no ſooner given than followed, and the ſooner, becauſe thoſe who had ſeen this Statute, aſſured the King that it reſembled Eliſa more now, then when it was made for her: And the truth is, Dipœnus and Scillis aimed to repreſent Eliſa, rather as they imagined ſhe would be,then as ſhe was at that time,eſpecially in her ſtature, for ſhe being then very young, it was imaginable ſhe would grow. In the mean time, Love being a paſſion which will not admit of long deliberation upon ſuch things as may give it ſatisfaction, this amorous Prince ſent unto Crœſſus a little before the War, or to ask of him the ſame favour which the illuſtrious Cyrus hath granted, but he was obſtinately denied: So that the King of Phe- nicia making no doubt but to obtain what he asked, was exceedingly ſurprized to underſtand at the return of his Ambaſſador, that the King of Lidia had denied him: He did ſo little queſtion the happy ſucceſs of his deſign, that he made a moſt ſtately Pedeſtal to place this Statue upon, and he ſet up all the reſt of the Statues where they were to ſtand: but it ſo grieved him that he had not this of Eliſa's, as he locked up the Gallery, and would not ſuffer any ever ſince to enter.

This Madam was the ſtate of things during the War, to wit, The King was ſtill in love with Eliſa, with a moſt unconceivable reſpect: Eliſa continues ſtill as inſenſible as fair and virtuous, Aſiadates ſtill loving her even unto fury, Lyriope ſtill hating her with as much animoſity, as envy and jealouſie could invent, Phocilion ſtill adoring her without hope, and all the world eſteeming her according to her merit, not excepting either Poligenes or Agenor: And moſt certainly ſhe merited all the reputation which ſhe had, for there was never any whoſe virtue was put unto more difficult proofs than hers.

This Madam was the ſtate of the Kings love to Eliſa, when the Fame of all the Victories of the illuſtrious Cyrus in Lidia, was blazed in our Court, but eſpecially in the Palace of Cleomira: For ſince there was no place in the world where the renown of all illuſtrious Heroes was celebrated, as in that; the valour and all the virtues of Cyrus was the ordinary diſcourſe of Cleomira, Philonida, Anacriſa, Eliſa, Megabates, and the High Prieſt of Sidon, Clearques, Theodamus, Pherecides, Ariſtheus, Phocilion, and all the reſt, whoſe Rendezvous was at Cleomira's Palace, where I had the honour alſo to be admitted.

I remember one Evening amongſt the reſt, when news was brought that Crœſſus had loſt the Battel, and the illuſtrious Cyrus had gotten it, it was the moſt pleaſing and agreeable night that ever I enjoyed, War and Love was the ſubject of all their diſcourſe; the victory of Cyrus, and his love to the Princeſs Mandana, did furniſh them with ſubject ſufficient: Megabates and Ariſtheus had ſome diſputes concerning the policies of Crœſſus; but the pleaſant humour of Clearques, and of Pherecides, made them change their diſcourſe; for ſince it was probable Sardis would be ſuddenly beſieged, they told Eliſa, that ſhe would ere long be a Captive unto Cyrus, meaning her Statue which was there; but ſhe anſwered them, that ſhe had much rather be a Slave to Cyrus, than a priſoner unto Crœſſus.

Then paſſing inſenſibly from one diſcourſe unto another, and the King of Pontus his keeping the Princeſs Mandana in the Cittadel of Sardis, being the ſubject of their diſcourſe, Pherecides asked Clearques, whether he had rather be always as the King of Pontus, or always as the illuſtrious Cyrus is? That choice is eaſily made (replied Clearques) For I had rather be in the head of a victorious Army, able to win Battels, take Towns, and conquer Kingdoms, than to be mewed up in a Caſtle without either Army, Authority, or a Crown: You take not the queſtion as I intend it, replied Pherecides, for I ask you in general terms, which you think the more unhappy, him who cannot ſee the perſon whom he loves, being certain ſhe loves him, and knowing her to be continually under the eye of his Rival, or elſe him who ſees her every day, hath her in his power, but cannot move her heart: There is no difficulty in anſwering this queſtion neither, replied Clearques, for ſince one doth not love but to be loved, doubtleſs then I ſhould chooſe to be ſo, yet upon better thoughts I ſhould not much love, to have my Rival always with my Miſtreſs, eſpecially not being there my ſelf: Confeſs then, ſaid Pherecides, that the choice which I put you unto is not ſo eaſily made: I had rather confeſs, replied he, that I would neither chooſe the one nor the other of theſe conditions, for in the humour I am in, I love to ſee her whom I love, and love not to ſee her who loves me not: Since you love diſputation, replied Cleomira, you have a very good occaſion of it: If I were as able to come off as well as Megabates is, replied he, I ſhould not let ſuch an occaſion ſlip. Clearques had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but all the company looked upon Megabates as the moderator; and indeed after he had anſwered Clearques, that his neutrality and indifferency unto all that concerned him not, cauſed his condeſcenſion unto the opinion of another, he began to maintain, tain, that he whoſe Miſtreſs loved him, and never ſaw her, alſo knew his Rival with her continually, did ſuffer more than he whoſe Miſtreſs loved him not, and he ſaw her continually: Yet, added he, though I very well apprehend the rigid ſufferings of this abſent Lover, who of neceſſity muſt needs be jealous, yet it is ſo very natural to deſire the being loved, that in the choice of theſe two evils, I had rather chooſe that which the illuſtrious Cyrus endures, than to be expoſed unto the King of Pontus his ſufferings: After this (every one maintaining that ſide which they had choſen, with ſo much wit and conceit, as never was converſation ſo ſprightly and pleaſant) all the company parted. Now Madam to finiſh my relation, give me leave to tell you, That the King coming unto Cleomira's at the end of this conference, it was there where he had his firſt thought of ſending to offer his alliance unto the illuſtrious Cyrus, and to demand the Statue of Eliſa, if Sardis was taken: And indeed Madam, he no ſooner had intelligence that this Town was beſieged, but never doubting the taking of it, ſince it was undertaken by a Prince, whoſe valour nothing ever could reſiſt, but he diſpatched this Ambaſſador with whom I came, whom Ariſtheus deſired to accompany with many others, only out of curioſity to ſee the moſt illuſtrious Cyrus, whoſe Conqueſts are greater than thoſe of Eliſa, and whoſe glory is ſpread over all the earth.

Telamis having ended his relation left all the company extreamly ſatisfied with him, for making ſo many excellent perſons known unto them, and for relating the Hiſtory of Eliſa, whoſe rare virtue, as well as beauty, filled them with admiration: But Cyrus had no ſooner told Telamis modeſtly, that he might well have ſpared all his applauds of him: Then Ariſtheus, according to his promiſe returned, but returned ſo changed, and with a countenance ſo full of melancholy, that Cyrus was ſurprized: So that being very impatient to know the cauſe of this ſudden alteration, he began to preſs him unto a relation of what it was: Alas Sir, (ſaid he with extream ſorrow) whoſoever ſhould have told me when I went from hence, that it ſhould be I who ſhould relate the end of Eliſa's life unto you, I ſhould never have believed it; yet you ſee me here in a ſad condition, able to relate the ſad ſtory of her death unto you? How, (cried out Telamis out of his ſad apprehenſion) is Eliſa dead? I hope, ſaid Cyrus, we did not underſtand your words well: I would I could tell you otherwiſe Sir, replied Ariſtheus: But alas, it is too true that Eliſa is dead, and dead in ſo glorious a manner, that her death was ſuitable to her life, and I cannot do her a more glorious office, than to move you unto ſome ſighs by relating it. Since Telamis is ſilent, purſued Ariſtheus, I ſuppoſe he hath finiſhed the relation of her life, until our departure from Tire, and conſequently you know that Aſiadates continued ſtill his violent affection to her, although the King became his Rival, and that Lyriope was ſtill both jealous and envious. Now I underſtand by one of my friends who hath brought this ſad news unto me, that all theſe ſeveral paſſions are ſtill augmented, and he aſſures me, that the Kings love of Eliſa is grown to that height, as that he looks upon her as to be Queen of Phenicia: So that Aſiadates fearing that Eliſa would be enjoyed by another, reſented it beyond all imagination, and reſolved to ruin the Kings deſign at what rate ſoever; So that making his ambition to ſerve his love, he began to plot with ſome male-contents, whereof the beds of Kings were always filled, hoping that if he could raiſe a Party in the State, and himſelf not ſeen in it, he might perhaps cure the King of his paſſion, by being buſied in diſſipating that faction which he had raiſed: On the other ſide, Lyriope ſeeing the power of Eliſa ſo great with the King, ſhe began to be more envious than jealous, and began to plot how ſhe might deliver her ſelf from theſe two Spirits which did continually torment her, though ſhe imployed all the unjuſt means in the world to effect her deſign. Since inhumanity goes againſt the hair of her Sex, ſhe did not at the firſt think upon the applying of extream remedies: But ſeeing that the Kings love did daily increaſe, and that Aſiadates was more and more violent in his paſſions, that be did treat her worſe and worſe; and conſidering that if the King ſhould marry Eliſa, ſhe ſhould then be a ſubject unto her who had taken from her the heart both of a Lover and a husband, alſo unto one whom ſhe ever hated, though ſhe had no other reaſon for it, but becauſe ſhe was fairer than her ſelf: I ſay Lyriope conſidering all theſe things, ſhe reſolved upon a moſt horrid courſe, which was, to find out ſome way or other how to take away the beauty of Eliſa, thinking thereby to take away the cauſe of all her miſeries, in damping the love of the King, and the love of Aſiadates: So that without further delay, ſhe conſpired with an Arabian Phyſician, who was then at Tire, and whoſe reputation in point of honeſty was not over good, and hiring him by rich rewards, he promiſed her what ſhe deſired, but he had much ado to keep his word; for ſince Eliſa never uſed any adulterations of art to help her beauty, he could not find out any means to blaſt her complexion by any exteriour things: So that this man at the earneſt inſtigation of Lyriope, who would not let him reſt, reſolved ſince he could not do it otherwiſe, to take away the beauty of Eliſa, by taking away her health by a kind of ſubtil powder, which had a quality ſo malignant as it would make all thoſe who took it, to grow very ſick within a few days, by cauſing a kind of a Feaver, and it had ordinarily ſuch a quality, as in the operation it would ſo burn the blood, as they would not be knowable: So that Eliſa being often very ill, though to outward appearance ſhe ſeemed to be in excellent health, it was an eaſie thing for this Arabian Phyſician to find out ways of ſuborning him, who commonly carried medicines unto Eliſa, he did it ſo cunningly, as that he did not ſeem to ſuborn him to commit a crime, for he only ſeemed to be very deſirous of ſeeing what remedies the Tirian Phyſicians uſed unto perſons of ſuch a temper as Eliſa's. So that being ſhewed ſeveral things which ſhe was to take, he mingled (unſeen to him that ſhewed them) this dangerous powder, which had ſuch a fatal operation, and fatal indeed, for whether the Doctor was miſtaken in his Compoſition, or that the temper of Eliſa was too delicate for it, the very next morning after ſhe took this powder, the Feaver took her, and ſo extream violently, as ſhe ſaid at firſt that ſhe was dead; but ſhe ſpoke it with ſuch incredible conſtancy of mind, as was admirable, ſeeming ſo little deſirous of life, or fear of death, that ſhe ſurprized all the by-ſtanders; yet ſhe teſtified much tenderneſs unto her friends, but it was a moſt generous and magnanimous tenderneſs which was not expreſſed by tears, or giving any marks of weakneſs: I leave you to imagine how Eliſa's ſickneſs troubled the King, and how all the Court grieved, but eſpecially Cleomira, and all thoſe who commonly were with her.

All helps from Phyſitians were in vain, for not knowing the cauſe of her diſeaſe, they could not cure her. In the mean time Aſiadates, who was upon the point of letting the faction which he had raiſed to appear, thought now of nothing but Eliſa's health: So that thoſe who were ingaged in the Faction, admired to ſee he would meddle no more: As for the King, all intelligence that any deſigns were againſt his eſtate, were never hearkened unto, for ſince the life of Eliſa was in danger, he could not think of preſerving any thing elſe: As for Lyriope, ſince envy and jealouſie had rooted out of her ſoul all thoughts of virtue, ſhe was very glad to ſee that in all likelihood ſhe ſhould be rid of Eliſa, whom ſhe looked upon as the cauſe of all her misfortunes: As for Phocilion, he was unknowable, and never man was in a more ſad condition: But the wonder was, that this powder, which according to the intention of the compoſer, was to take away the beauty of Eliſa, and not her life, did take away her life and not her beauty; for never any breathing was fairer than ſhe was when ſhe was expiring. In the mean time, to imploy her laſt hours as well as the reſt of her life (after all Phyſians declared her deſperate) ſhe gave the King moſt generous and divine advice, exhorting him to be juſt, clement, liberal, to love his people, never to let himſelf be governed by his paſſions; afterwards moſt excellent counſel unto her friends, ſpeaking unto them with wonderful reſolution and generoſity, diſpoſing ſeveral things unto them as pledges of her friendſhip bequeathed unto them: After this, deſiring they would ſpeak no more unto her, but of the Gods, the chief Prieſt of Sidon ſtayed with her; yet his exceſſive ſorrow to ſee Eliſa in ſo ſad a condition, would not permit him to enjoy the freedom of his reaſon; but yet the reaſon of this fair, generous, and divine perſon was ſo quick and free; that ſhe did comfort him, and inſpired him with power to ſpeak ſuch things unto her, as he had not been able to do, if ſhe had not revived him by her conſtancy and reſolution: But why ſhould I lengthen this ſad ſtory? Eliſa died as ſhe lived, which was with abundance of glory, and in looking death in the grim face with as much courage, as the greateſt Hero in the moſt dangerous and moſt glorious occaſions. I will not go about to repreſent the ſorrows of the King, for I cannot expreſs them; but I can tell you, that the deſpair of Phocilion was ſo great, that he died three days after Eliſa; yet this is not the moſt ſurprizing thing which I have to tell you; for be pleaſed to know, that Aſiadates intending not only to abandon his deſigns, but the Court alſo, as he was ready to depart, and paſſing from one Chamber into another, he heard Lyriope, by chance, thanking the Arabian Doctor for ſomething, extream earneſtly, though ſhe did not ſpeak aloud: So that upon a ſuddain ſuſpecting the truth, ſince the cauſe of Eliſa's death could not be known, he went unto them, and being of a violent temper, he did ſo blank them by his ſuddain approach and by his menaces, that finding ſomething more to fortifie his ſuſpicion, he called for his men, cauſed the Phyſitian to be arreſted, who would have eſcaped, and without more delay, cauſed him to be ſo tormented, as he confeſſed the whole truth, which he no ſooner knew, but he went unto the Chamber of Lyriope to run her through with his Sword, but ſhe was already eſcaped, but yet ſhe did not eſcape the Juſtice of the Gods, for the Boat into which ſhe had gotten at the Port of Sinope with one of her women only, was overturned by ruſhing againſt another, ſo that Lyriope was drowned, and in one minute puniſhed for all the extravagancies of her paſſions. Aſiadates could not puniſh the Arabian Doctor, for ſince he ever uſed to carry poyſon about him, he took it, to avoid the ſhame and puniſhment.

Thus the violent Aſiadates was all fury and deſpair, after he knew the true cauſe of Eliſa's death. In the mean time, the King made a moſt magnificent Funeral for this wonder of women, all the Court was in mourning as well as himſelf, the High-Prieſt of Sidon writ her Epitaph, all the refined wits of Phenicia did write in her glory, the King is cauſing a moſt ſumptuous Tomb to be erected, and Eliſa is lamented, as one of the moſt admirable women that ever lived: After all this, there is not a day wherein all her friends do not meet, but they condole and celebrate her name with tears and ſighs, ſtriving to make their illuſtrious friend to revive by their diſcourſe, and Elegies which they made to eternize her memory. But to let you ſee Sir (ſaid Ariſtheus, addreſſing himſelf unto Cyrus) how all humane wiſdom is limited; and to incite your Noble heart unto pity, be pleaſed to know, that the King of Phenicia not doubting but that you would accord unto his demand, hath deſigned a Tomb to be made for Eliſa after ſuch a faſhion; that the Statue which you will reſtore, and which ſhould have been the ornament of his Gallantry, ſhall be placed upon the top of this ſtately Sepulchre.

Ariſtheus cloſing up his Speech with a deep ſigh, he did communicate his ſorrows unto all his illuſtrious Auditors, all whom had extream compaſſion upon the lamentable deſtiny of Eliſa, and did participate in the ſorrows of Ariſtheus and Telamis: Doraliſa her ſelf, as hardhearted as ſhe was, did find a complement of ſorrow for Ariſtheus; after which all the company parted, and mourned for Eliſa: Cyrus collected this conſolation from the misfortunes of another, that he was forced to confeſs unto himſelf, the King of Phenicia was more unfortunate in his paſſion than himſelf, though he was always accuſtomed to think himſelf the moſt unfortunate Lover in the world.

GRAND CYRUS.

PART VII. Book II.

C*Yrus* was no ſooner returned to the Cittadal, but his ſorrows aſſumed freſh forces to torment him, cauſed by the ſight of all theſe happy Lovers about him, for whoſe felicity he had yet taken ſo much care; not but that he was ever a zealous wiſher of their happineſs; but comparing the ſtate of their Fortunes with his own, it was impoſſible but he ſhould ſigh to ſee the difference betwixt the one and the other; though he did confeſs unto himſelf, that he was leſs miſerable than the King of Phenicia, yet he ſaid alſo, that he was more unfortunate than all thoſe about him, but he ſaid it with ſuch ſenſibility of ſorrow, that had Mandana known the agony of his heart, ſhe would have chaſed all unjuſt jealouſie out of her own; for it is moſt certain, that never man did know how to love ſo perfectly as Cyrus. In the mean time, the Phenician Ambaſſador knowing the King his Maſter to be in ſuch a ſad condition, and having nothing elſe to do at Sardis, prepared for his departure, carrying the Statue of Eliſa with him, which Cyrus did accompany with Preſents, much more magnificent than thoſe he received: He writ alſo a Letter of thanks unto the King of Phenicia, for the thirty thouſand men which he offered, deſiring him to furniſh out in exchange of thoſe men as many Ships as he could, for a ſecret deſign which he had imparted unto his Ambaſſador and Ariſtheus. Thus all the Phenicians, except Ariſtheus, departed infinitely ſatisfied with Cyrus: As for Ariſtheus, he ſtayed ſtill with this Prince for three reaſons; the firſt, becauſe the Ambaſſador of Phenicia and himſelf conceiving it would be advantageous unto their King to hold a good correſpondency with ſo great a Conqueror, they reſolved it to be expedient one ſhould remain with him to cement the friendſhip betwixt them: The ſecond was, becauſe indeed Ariſtheus was ſo charmed with the virtue of Cyrus, that he was deſirous to be a longer admirer of him: And the third was the death of Eliſa, which having grieved him unto the very ſoul, he was not willing to return unto the place where he had ſeen her ſo often, and was never to ſee her again; and though he did dearly love one of Eliſa's friends, yet he reſolved to endure this abſence, eſpecially ſince Doraliſa did ſo very much reſemble her, as that one of them did comfort him in the abſence of the other.

Thus the Phenician Ambaſſador departed, and Ariſtheus ſtayed. Alſo within a few daies after, the equipage of Seſoſtris and Timaretta being in a readineſs, thoſe two illuſtrious perſons departed from Cyrus, to return into Egypt, leaving behind them ſo many charmed with their merit, and affectionate unto their intereſts, as they all did make a thouſand prayers for their felicity: The Princeſs of Phrigia, and the Princeſs Timaretta, did bid adieu in the language of ſighs, and all the Ladies of the Palace of Crœſſus were melted into tears: As for Seſoſtris, he expreſſed much ſorrow to leave Cyrus before he had releaſed Mandana, and in acknowledgment of the obligations he had unto him, for reſtoring unto him his dear Timaretta, and for ſaving his life, he left his troops with him, and promiſed to oblige Amaſis to ſend him others. Cyrus for his part gave this generous Prince the moſt obliging language in the world, himſelf waiting upon the Princeſs Timaretta half a daies journey from Sardis, where they took their laſt adieu's; both Seſoſtris and Timaretta did carry themſelves ſo admirably well, and ſpoke in ſuch a noble manner, that it was not imaginable they ever were a Shepherd and Shepherdeſs: Cyrus alſo ſent many perſons of quality to conduct them unto their Ship which waited for them, having given unto Timaretta as many ſervants as ſhe could have had, if ſhe were at Thebes or Memphis.

After the departure of Seſoſtris and Timaretta, the reſtleſsneſs of Cyrus augmented, nor could he endure any converſation, but where Mandana was the ſubject of their diſcourſe: Mazares for his part, he was ſtill in a continual turbulency of thoughts, he imployed all his virtues to hinder himſelf from hating his Rival, and loving his Miſtreſs. As for Crœſſus, what joys ſoever he had at his being ſeated again on the Throne: yet he every day had ſome apprehenſions of the difference between a Vaſſal or tributary King, and a Sovereign or Independent Majeſty: As for Myrſiles, Love did more torment him than ambition, and his not daring to ſpeak unto Doraliſa of his Love, was inſupportable: yet he did ſo much fear to inſence that cruel hearted Lady, as he ſhunned her preſence, though it was a hell unto him to be where ſhe was not. In the mean time the Prince Artamas, and all thoſe happy Lovers whoſe ſorrows were changed into joys, they now had no other grief but in behalf of Cyrus, who indeed did merit their pity, both in conſideration of his high deſerts, and his great misfortunes. Some days being paſſed over in continual turbulency of Spirit, the ſorrows of Cyrus redoubled; for he underſtood that Harpagus, who had orders from him, to bring back the Army which aided Thraſibulus to conquer his Dominions, was taken by the chief Officers of his Troops, and the matter was grown unto that height, as that they were divided into two parties, and came to blows; that there was many of them killed, and that thoſe who did not periſh in the buſineſs, not daring to appear before him, were almoſt all disbanded, reports flying that moſt of the Souldiers were gone into Cumes, whoſe Prince was ſaid to arm very faſt and ſtrongly. Cyrus alſo underſtood that Harpagus, in lieu of keeping his Troops in exact Diſcipline, did permit them all imaginable liberty; ſo that the Xanthians and the Caunians, though they were very well ſatisfied with Cyrus at the return of their Ambaſſadors, yet not finding effects anſwerable unto words, they were revolted, and had entred into league both offenſive and defenſive with the Prince of Cumes, who was levying a formidable Army. Cyrus therefore underſtanding, that he had loſt an Army, and that his Rival did daily fortifie himſelf, he was extreamly grieved; but that which made his ſorrows moſt inſupportable was, that he could do nothing without Ships, and that it was not poſſible to procure them as ſoon as he deſired. In the mean time, the ſeaſon of the year for war went on apace, eſpecially for a Siege, which required a Navy, and the approaching Winter was not fit for it: But not enduring to be ſhut up in a Town whilſt he had any Enemies in the field, he reſolved to look out a good diſtance from Sardis, though he durſt not look towards Cumes, nor ſeem to know that the Princeſs was there, until he had a Navy.

After he had communicated this reſolution unto Mazares, and thoſe unto whom he uſed to impart his ſecrets, he gave orders for every thing according: He left a conſiderable Garriſon in the Cittadel of Sardis; Crœſſus and Myrſiles prepared to follow him: The King of Phrygia, whoſe health was much impaired, was forced to obey Cyrus, who willed him to return unto Apamea, and carry thither with him his fair Daughter the Princeſs Palmis: As for the Prince Artamas, he would not leave him, do what he could.

Thus all this glorious Court broke up: But to ſee how Cyrus was loved of all who knew him; Ligdamis, Thraſimedes, Menecrates, Parmenides, and Philiſton, though they were all moſt uxorious Husbands, yet they quitted their new married Wives to follow this Prince unto the Wars, though he was very willing to diſpenſe with them. Thus Licaſta returned unto Patara with all her company, carrying alſo Arpalice with her, until the return of Thraſimedes: Candiope took upon her the charge of the fair Androclea unto the end of the Wars, where Liſias her Brother alſo was, and wanting none but Menophiles, the Husband of Licaſta to conduct them, though Cyrus ſent a Guard with them. Cleomira alſo returned unto Epheſus with her Mother, and all the reſt of her friends, and all the Beauties parted with much ſorrow. Thus in the laſt three days that Cyrus was at Sardis, there was none left in the Palace but Doraliſa, Pherenice, and Araminta; and they having no mind to ſtay there, they went unto an Aunt of Doraliſa's. Then during the laſt three days, Cyrus went to viſit Araminta, to talk with her concerning his deareſt Mandana, Myrſiles went to ſee Doraliſa, to teſtifie his love unto her, and Ariſtheus did alſo viſit her in way of friendſhip, and to take the ſame delight in her perſon and ſpirit, which he uſed to admire in another: As for Cyrus, his diſcourſe with Araminta was upon nothing but his Princeſs: Sometimes he would make her relate unto him, how ſhe behaved her ſelf towards the King of Aſſyria, when ſhe was in Babylon and Sinope; afterwards to tell him, how ſhe carried her ſelf to the King of Pontus at Suſa and at Sardis: Though he knew all theſe things before, yet he thought that the time which could not be imployed in the ſervice of Mandana, ought to be ſpent in talking of her: As for the Prince Myrſiles, ſince he was upon his departure from Doraliſa, he muſt needs once more expreſs his affection to her, but though his deſign was ſo, yet as ſoon as he came to her his confidence had almoſt failed him, for he perceived in Doraliſa's countenance ſuch unquiet frowns, as he took them for ill Omens, and cauſed him to be ſilent, which did no leſs perplex Doraliſa than his language had, becauſe ſhe imagined by the diſorder of his ſoul, that if no company came in, he would begin to talk of that which ſhe had no mind to hear of; yet to prevent him, ſhe asked a hundred queſtions far off the buſineſs ſhe ſuſpected he would ſpeak of: At the firſt the Prince Myrſiles anſwered unto them, but being at laſt tired with ſuch and ſo many frivolous and impertinent queſtions, I beſeech you Doraliſa, ſaid he unto her, leave asking me ſuch queſtions, as neither concerns your intereſt nor mine, and give me leave to ask you ſome queſtions, which ſhall much import my tranquility, that you anſwer and anſwer favourably: To anſwer then Sir, replied ſhe, I do promiſe you I will, but I will not ingage my ſelf to anſwer favourably, before I know what you will ask: I deſire you to tell me ſincerely, ſaid he unto her, whether it be that natural auſterity which is always in your Phyſiognomy, or whether you reject my affection, out of ſome averſion which you have to me; I beſeech you (added he) give me leave to ſpeak with the ſame freedom which you uſe unto your moſt faithful friends: I aſſure you Sir, (ſaid Doraliſa and interrupted him) that if I tell you nothing but what I tell my beſt friends, I ſhall not tell you any great ſecrets, ſince I do not love to open my ſelf unto any, nor do know any thing which I leſs underſtand, than this trick of confidence, which lays open all motions of the heart, all the thoughts of the mind, and all the reſentments of the ſoul unto thoſe that would know them; for I am perſwaded, that they uſe very often to ſay they think and reſent ſuch things as they did never think upon, or apprehend: For my part, I do confeſs, I am not of this humour; and let me tell you, Sir, that they who would know my thoughts muſt gueſs at them, or know them by my actions, without any obliging me to tell them preciſely what they are, for I will never be ingaged to ſearch into the bottom of my heart, nor will I take ſo much pains my ſelf as to know what I think: For indeed (ſaid ſhe, to prevent the Prince Myrſiles from ſpeaking to her) I have often found in my ſelf, that I have had ſome friends whom I loved more than I thought to have loved, and alſo ſome other perſons whom I hated more than I thought I did: Ah Doraliſa, (ſaid this Prince) I fear that I am not of this laſt order: But I beſeech you, if it be ſo, let me directly know it, that I may regulate the courſe of my life, according unto thoſe thoughts you have of me: Hatred Sir, replied Doraliſa, is a thought which I ought not to entertain of a Prince, whoſe ſubject I am like to be: But Sir, to take the moſt rational courſe, be pleaſed to conceive of me as one that cannot love any: This Sir, I conceive to be the only way conducing unto your tranquility and my own; yet notwithſtanding (added ſhe) I do not intend to throw off that reſpect which I owe you; but on the contrary, will be more obſervant of you than ever: Reſpect indeed (replied Myrſiles) ought to be an inſeparable companion of all a Lovers actions; but yet it is the moſt injurious word that any Lover can hear from the mouth of her he loves; One may reſpect his Maſter, or his Tyrant, but to reſpect an amorous Slave, ah Doraliſa, there is no example for this: This word reſpect, which you have pronounced, is only uſed as an umbrage unto that hatred or averſion of a man, whoſe capricious fortune rather than reaſon, hath ſet him above her whom he loves: But Sir, I beſeech you, (ſaid Doraliſa) Do not you know that you are the King of Lidia's Son? Doubtleſs you would forget it, if you did but know how much I am your Slave, as I wiſh you did: For ſince when I am in your preſence, I forget what I really am, and think my ſelf nothing unleſs your Lover, methinks you might do the like, and look upon me as I would have you: The Gods preſerve me Sir, replied Doraliſa ſharply, from doing as you ſay; for if I ſhould look now upon you as my Lover, and not as the King of Lidia's Son, I ſhould give moſt tart language, I ſhould forbid you ever to ſee me, and I ſhould moſt horribly hate you: But I hope Doraliſa, (ſaid this amorous Prince) you would not hate me. Since I have ſaid it before I was aware (replied Doraliſa with a moſt ſcornful and indifferent ſmile) I will not unſay it again: But Sir (ſaid ſhe and bluſht for anger) there is a vaſt interval between hatred and love: So I were but in a ſtate of indifferency, anſwered he, I ſhould not deſpair of my happineſs, but ſhould ſtill hope: Of all the thoughts, which the paſſion whereof you ſpeak (replied ſhe) can infuſe into the heart of a Lover, there is not one methinks ſo offenſive unto the perſon loved, as hope is; therefore Sir, I would adviſe you, never to entertain it: What then, replied he, would you have me do? I would have you, if this word be not too free (replied ſhe) never to tell me again of this which I ought not to underſtand, nor will give any ear unto without extream anger: For the truth is Sir, I am of ſuch a ſpirit, as though I did not hate a man who loved me, yet I would never have him tell me of it: There is nothing in the world ſo tireth my patience as a Lovers talk, I beſeech you judge then, whether I ought to ſuffer you to ſpeak as you do; therefore Sir, regulate your mind, that you may regulate your language; and let me rejoyce at the glory which you will get in the War, and not make me hate you at your return: To enable me unto the acquiſition of glory (replied he) and to think of any return, I had need hope for more of your eſteem, and to find you leſs ſevere at my return than when I leave you. As they were thus in diſcourſe, Cyrus and Ariſtheus entred, who coming from bidding adieu unto Arianita, came alſo to make his laſt viſit unto Doraliſa, who received the honour with as much reſpect as joy. This amiable Lady was exceedingly grieved to ſee him ſo unfortunate, and wiſhed earneſtly for a period unto all his miſeries, and for the liberty of Mandana, which was the whole ſubject of their diſcourſe.

Since every hour ſeemed an Age unto Cyrus, till he was in the head of an Army, his viſit was not long; but ſince he did not know that the Prince Myrſiles was in Love with Doraliſa, he did him an ill office, for he carried that Prince away with him, to talk upon ſomething which he would have the King his Father do, before he went from Sardis. Thus was Doraliſa delivered from a vexatious viſit, not but that ſhe did extreamly eſteem the Prince Myrſiles, but it was becauſe there was ſuch natural auſterity in her heart, as was oppoſite unto all kind of Gallantries, and certainly it was a moſt difficult task to be a Lover of Doraliſa's, and not diſpleaſe her: However, Ariſtheus having a particular eſteem of her, did bid his laſt adieu by himſelf, and rendred her a viſit the next morning, which laſted until night: As this converſation was long, ſo was it very delighting, and he finding the dimenſion of her Spirit, could not chuſe but have ſuch affectionate thoughts of her, as his heart was capable of, which being neither love nor friendſhip, yet had all the gallantry of the firſt, and the paſſionate tenderneſs of the ſecond; and as long as he ſtayed at Sardis, he held her in the rank of thoſe unto whom he had ſuch an affection as wanted a name, becauſe it was never found in any but Ariſtheus; and indeed he was ſo full of his adulatory and obliging expreſſions, and delivered them in ſuch a manner, that ſhe had not the power to be angry; but though ſhe was not angry when Ariſtheus talked to her, yet ſhe could not endure that Arianita and Pherenice ſhould upbraid her with this illuſtrious Conqueſt, and that they ſhould ſay ſhe was not ſorry for making it; yet Ariſtheus parted upon very good terms from her: After which, he prepared himſelf to wait upon Cyrus, until he heard from the King of Phenicia, after the arrival of that Ambaſſador, who carried away the Statue of Eliſa: As for Andramites, he was not ſo happy as Ariſtheus, for he could not have the honour of bidding her adieu in private, but ſhe ſhunned him. In the mean time Cyrus, after he had left Hidaſpes to command in the Cittadel of Sardis, departed in the Company of Crœſſus and Myrſiles: Thus the Conquered went to War with the Conqueror; thoſe few Lidian Troops that were fit for ſervice, were diſtributed into ſeveral Regiments of Cyrus his Army, who was no ſooner in the Field, but he made a Muſter; but he was extreamly troubled to find, that except the Perſian Troops, there was not one compleat, and he found by experience, that drowſie reſt had conſumed his Army more than any two Battels: So that underſtanding the league which was made againſt him began to be very ſtrong, and finding his own to be weak, both by disbanded Soldiers, and by Garriſons which he was forced to leave in conquered places, he was grieved to the very ſoul. Moreover, conſidering his deſign of beſieging Cumes, he found it a piece of as great difficulty as was imaginable, and greater than his Love did at the firſt permit him to apprehend; he knew that a great part of his Army muſt be incamped upon the black and barren Mountains, where no accommodation was to be found; and another part in moriſh and boggy places, and all in water: He knew alſo, that there was nothing to be found about Cumes neceſſary for the incampment of an Army, that the nakedneſs and ſtirility of the place would not afford the Soldiers any Tents, nor any wood to make themſelves Huts; that the Cavalry would find no fitting Quarters, nor any forrage; and that, according to all intelligence, no Army could lye three days before Cumes and not periſh, the difficulty of getting victuals rendred the deſign impoſſible, for there was no coming by Land but on one ſide, which the Sea did often overflow; to bring in by Sea was dangerous, becauſe the Coaſt was without Ports, and that in a tempeſt there was no landing;

ing; So that this great Prince did ſee, that if any ſtorm came and laſted but three days, he ſhould be forced to raiſe the Siege; Beſides all theſe conſiderations, he ſaw there was no hope of taking Cumes unleſs it were by ſtopping up the very mouth of the Port, nor any other way to hinder the King of Pontus from carrying away the Princeſs Mandana the third time; yet he extreamly feared, that as the ſeaſon was, the Ships he had would not be able to keep the Seas ſo near the Land without eminent danger of Shipwrack, by reaſon of the winds which commonly were always high towards the end of Autumn: Moreover, the place it ſelf was extraordinary ſtrong, all the inhabitants were provided, the publick Magazines were full, and which of all was moſt conſiderable, this place was to be defended not only by the King of Pontus, who was both valiant and amorous, but by the Prince of Cumes, who was a man of courage, and affected glory, but alſo by another of high valour and experience, who was ſo exceedingly verſed in the military art of keeping places, as he hath vaunted, that he would give a ſtop to the Conqueſts of the Conqueror of all Aſia, and that he would have the honour to hinder him from vanquiſhing, whom none could ever yet reſiſt: But how huge ſoever theſe difficulties ſeemed, yet the love of Cyrus unto Mandana, and unto glory, did ſurmount them all, yet notwithſtanding the ſtirility of the place unto which he was to carry his Army did diſquiet his thoughts, out of his fears that the Country could not afford ſubſiſtance ſo long as to take Cumes, and the cutting off a communication which this Town had with others, that might furniſh them with victuals, did much trouble him: Alſo he apprehended, that the enemy might fall upon Thybarra, which he took in the beginning of the Spring: But after all, when this Prince had conſidered all theſe inconveniencies, he reſolved to uſe all remedies to overcome them; he gave orders for the ſubſiſtance of his Army, to fortifie all his Garriſons towards Cumes: He diſpoſed his Troops in ſuch ſort, and dividing them into many little bodies, he concealed his deſign from the enemies, yet always quartered them ſo as he could eaſily call them together again when he pleaſed; pleaſed: And to make ſure of Thybarra, he reſolved to fortifie it, whilſt he expected news from Thraſibulus, in whom he truſted more than in any other for the ſending ſome Ships unto him. This deſign was no ſooner reſolved upon, but marching towards this Town, he put it in execution with ſuch prodigious diligence and ingenuity, as it may be ſaid, that the fortifications of Thybarra were ſooner finiſhed by Cyrus, than any other could have contrived this plot; he himſelf made choice of thoſe who were to work, and for the more expedition, he ſet on the Soldiers; he appointed in every quarter a man of command to overſee the works in that place; the Horſe were appointed to cut and bring Stakes and Faggots which were to bear up the earth which was removed; and for the better managing of their time, whilſt they were fortifying the Town, they victualled it alſo; and in order to that, all the Peaſants round about Thybarra were ſummoned to bring in proviſion, he appointed ſome to conduct them, others to take an account, and others to put them in the publick Magazines, never was ſeen more haſte and more order; never was ſeen at one time a huge Army, a whole time, and almoſt a whole Country follow the will of one ſingle man with ſuch exactneſs, and ſo much regularity: 'Tis true, Cyrus himſelf was preſent ordering the works, with ſuch ſingular ingenuity, and ſo well obeyed, that in fourteen days Thybarra was fortified, victualled, and furniſhed with all manner of military ammunition, and the Prince ready to march as ſoon as he could receive any news of his Ships, and the anſwer of Ciaxares. His impatience to accompliſh an enterprize, which if it took effect, might releaſe Mandana, and get him glory, made every minute ſeem an Age unto him, yet he did not wait above eight days for the joyful news which he ſo much longed for with ſo much ardour; for then he received orders from Ciaxares, which preſcribing nothing unto him poſitively, ſeemed to refer the whole enterprize unto his conduct, and immediately after he received aſſurance from Thraſibulus, that he himſelf would go in perſon with ten Ships into the Channel of Cumes at what day he ſhould appoint, aſſuring him, that this number was ſufficient to block up the Port, without any imploying the Prince of Mytilene: So that Cyrus being even raviſhed with joy, did preſently communicate this news unto the Prince Mazares. But ſince Cyrus feared that this number of Ships which Thraſibulus would bring, would not be ſufficient to prevent the King of Pontus from carrying out Mandana from Cumes, by drawing ſome Bark along the Land in the night; therefore he gave orders to provide many little Veſſels out of the Ports neareſt hand; and indeed they procured twelve from one place, two from another, and one from another, cauſing alſo as many Barks and Boats to be provided as he could: So that making up a great Fleet of petty Ships, he ſent them to joyn with Thraſibulus, appointing that Leontidas ſhould command them under the Prince of Mylet.

After this, Cyrus made no ſecret of his deſign, but called a Councel of War, at which the King of Lidia, the King of Hircania, the Prince Artamas, Mazares, Myrſiles, Perſodes, Gobrias, Gadates, Anaxaris, and many others were preſent; but there was not one of them concerned at the difficulty of the enterprize, ſeeing it was a thing reſolved upon, and a thing which Cyrus deſired with ſo much earneſtneſs: So that the buſineſs of the Council being only to conſult of the way how to advance their reſolved deſign, every one had orders to prepare himſelf for a departure the next morning, during which time one thing befel Cyrus, which ſeemed a happy preſage, for the valiant Megabates, and the generous Clearques, incited by a Spur of a honour, departed from Phenicia, as ſoon as they underſtood by the Letters of the Kings Ambaſſador, that Cyrus would be preſently in the Field, and came unto the Camp, deſiring to be partakers of thoſe perils unto which ſo great a Prince would expoſe himto the end they might be ſharers alſo of ſome part of that glory which he ſhould get. Ariſtheus being extreamly joyed at the arrival of theſe two friends, made it known unto Cyrus who they were, though this Prince did already know them very well, by the deſcription of Telamis, when he related the Hiſtory of Eliſa: Alſo he received them with much joy, and with the ſame civility which he uſed unto all men of extraordinary merit: But in gaining Megabates and Clearques, he loſt Ariſtheus, who at the ſame time received orders from the King of Phenicia to thank Cyrus for all his favours, and to return unto Tire, he having no more buſineſs to imploy him about Cyrus, for ſome reaſons which he mentioned in his Letter; ſo that this excellent man parted from this great Prince ſooner than he intended, but he parted from him ſo extreamly ſatisfied with his Spirit, with his generoſity, with his courteſie, and with all his qualities, as he hath ſince confeſſed, that never ſince he knew the world, had he ever ſeen or heard a man ſo fit to repreſent the grandeur of Heroes, and even of the Gods, as Cyrus; adding, that his acquaintance with this Prince hath extreamly elevated his ſpirit, and made him able to end his Poem better than he had begun it. In the mean time Ariſtheus, after he had taken his leave of Cyrus, and bad adieu unto all thoſe Princes who infinitely eſteemed him, he departed from Thybarra, and though it was not his neareſt way to return unto Sardis, yet the eſteem which he had of Doraliſa, perſwading him, that it was the neareſt, he took that way in his return to Tire. But as the arrival of theſe two valiant Phenicians was a happy preſage unto Cyrus, ſo the arrival of a ſervant, which went with him whom he ſent unto Cumes, gave him a moſt certain aſſurance of happy ſucceſs in his enterprize, for by him he received a Letter from Marteſia, wherein he found theſe words.

MARTESIA unto the Illuſtrious CYRUS.

SIR,

THE carrying away of the Princeſs Araminta, which I have made known unto the Princeſs Mandana, having juſtified you in her reſentments, I thought it my devoire to acquaint you with it, to the end you might tranſact with the more joy for the liberty of a perſon who repents her ſelf of the injuſtice which ſhe hath done you, yet it is without her participation that I give you this intelligence; but yet I am confident, thas if ſhe did know it, ſhe would eaſily pardon me for taking this freedom to write unto you, ſince certainly the reaſon why ſhe her ſelf does not write is, becauſe her great heart will not permit her to confeſs that ſhe has done you wrong. However, Sir, be at quiet concerning the King of Pontus, and be moſt confident, that if Cumes ſhould prove ſo impregnable unto you, as the heart of Mandana is unto him, you will never releaſe her, nor by conſequence

MARTESIA.

The reading of this Letter made Cyrus ſo full of joys, that he forgot almoſt all his paſt misfortunes, and hope did inſpire his Spirit, that maugre all the diſmal Oracles which he had received, and in ſpight of all thoſe bug-bear difficulties which he foreſaw in the Siege of Cumes, he did not queſtion his happy ſucceſs. In the mean time he asked this ſervant, who was of the intelligence, how he came by this Letter, and what was the ſtate of things in the Town? To the firſt he anſwered, that his Maſter gave him the Letter without telling him how he had it, and to the reſt he gave him full inſtructions of all that he deſired to know; for by it he underſtood the order which was kept in the Town, and how they guarded the Princeſs, who is as much unknown in Cumes, as if ſhe were here, and ſo is the King of Pontus: He told him alſo, that the Enemies Army prepared to relieve Cumes, when the Siege was ſet down, and that Pactias, and one whoſe name was Licambes did command it; adding alſo, to the inſtructions which he gave unto Cyrus, that by the orders which was eſtabliſhed at the Gates of the Town the ſame day he came away, it would be hereafter almoſt impoſſible for his Maſter to give him any intelligence: After this, Cyrus conſulted with himſelf, whether he ſhould ſhew Marteſia's Letter unto the Prince Mazares, but he reſolved to ſhew him only the inſtructions concerning the ſtate of things; for though the happineſs of a Rival does commonly quench the flames of Love in the heart of an ill-treated Lover, yet it does not always ſo, for ſometimes jealouſie does awaken that paſſion, and in lieu of ſtifling doth revive it: So that not to put the Prince Mazares unto ſo much torment, as to know the mind of Mandana, he would not ſhew him the Letter. In the mean time, the day of departure being come, and the Army at the Rendezvouz, Cyrus thought fit to divide it into three bodies, ordering the March ſo that the Ships of Thraſibulus ſhould be in the mouth of the Port, before he appeared in ſight of the Town. Thus his march might be the more eaſie, more ſpeedy, and more orderly: Theſe three bodies being able to arrive, almoſt all at once, and fall upon Cumes in an inſtant: Cyrus would take that way towards the Sea, as that wherein was moſt danger, becauſe the Enemy was that way incamped, he had under his diviſion the Perſians, the Medeans, the Cappadocians, and all the Homotimes; the Hircanian Cavalry were alſo with him, Cyrus having forced Clearques to command a part of them in lieu of an Officer newly dead; as for Megabates, he would fight under Cyrus as a Voluntier. Since all theſe Troops which he had made choice of, had couragiouſly and faithfully ſerved under him in all his Conqueſts, he had a great confidence in them.

The other diviſion, which was commanded by the Prince Mazares, and which took upon the left hand, were compoſed of Aſſirian, Armenian, and Egyptian Troops: The third commanded by the Prince Artamas, conſiſted of Gilician and Suſanian Troops, and of all thoſe who were levied in the new conquered Country: The Artillery was commanded by Perſodes, and Cyrus did not think it fit that Crœſſus ſhould have any command in his Army, nor would he permit the King Hircania to have any, leſt there ſhould be any jealouſie or envy between them; ſo that theſe two Kings kept always in the quarters of Cyrus, and were in all the Councels which were held. The march of theſe three Bodies was ſo juſt and even, that they came at one very inſtant before Cumes, the ſcituation whereof was very ſtrange, for it was ſeated between two great Hills of Sand by the Sea ſide, which ſeemed Mountains of Snow to thoſe who ſaw them at a diſtance: On the Eaſt it looked towards Thybarra, on the South, Mylet; Xanthes on the Weſt, and the Sea upon the North: Its Territory was of no large extent, all their Commodities came to it by Sea: This Town alſo was divided into two, the Inhabitants diſtinguiſhing themſelves by the names of the Old Town and the New; but that which rendred it moſt conſiderable was, that it had but one Port and one Channel able to contain a huge Navy in ſafety: This is it which rendred that Town ſo formidable to all her Neighbours: As ſoon as Cyrus ſpied the ſtately Temple of Neptune which was in Cumes, and which ſpired ſo high that it might be ſeen a far off, he was extreamly glad. This is the place, ſaid he to himſelf where I muſt either die or deliver my Princeſs: After which, he diſtributed quarters unto the Army, and that with ſo much judgment, that in all likelihood the Enemy could neither relieve the Town nor force his Camp, lying in ſuch a poſture, as that he might win a Battle whilſt he was beſieging a Town. This Prince having circumſpectly obſerved all about Cumes, and found that there was ſome places which defended themſelves, and others which were very hard to be kept, he gave all neceſſary orders to fortifie thoſe places by Art which Nature had laid open: He alſo built a Bridge over the Channel, and thereby had communication between his Quarters, for the more eaſie paſſage of Victuals: So that Tharſibulus with his Ships ſailing at the ſame time into the Port of Cumes, the Town was in an inſtant beſieged: The next morning Cyrus began his line of Circumulation, at which all the Souldiers wrought with incredible earneſtneſs; the preſence of the Prince did ſo invigorate them, that they wrought and never were weary. But to the end that the work might be more firm, he covered the ſides of the Line with Turf, which did concatinate the looſeneſs of the Sand: He would have had a ſecond Line to fortifie the firſt, but the Banks of Sand being of an unequal height, and ſo many of them which might command the Camp, he was forced to take in all thoſe Hills, and by conſequence was forced to inlarge his works very far: It chanced alſo, that there was one of theſe Sandy Hills in the Quarters of Mazares, which being much higher than the reſt, the Enemy might much annoy the Camp, Cyrus therefore ſeized upon it, and made a Fort upon the top of this Hill, and with a Line did draw it within the Line of Circumulation.

But after all this, the Sea-banks were unfortified, which was as requiſite to be done as any thing elſe, for otherwiſe all the reſt of their works were in vain; and yet the Sand being ſo looſe in that place, they knew not how to do it; for tho this Sea hath neither Flux nor reflux as the Ocean hath, yet it did riſe more or leſs, according as the wind did waft the waves, and did ſometimes ſo impetuouſly daſh againſt the Banks, that ſomething more ſolid than Sand muſt be imployed to make it avoid its violence; and therefore Cyrus, to whom nothing was impoſſible, did drive in abundance of piles and ſtakes, which ſtopped the paſſage of the enemy, and ſo faſt that the Waves could not ſtir them; yet this was not done without much difficulty, for thoſe of Cumes did cut a Rock, which kept in the Sea at the fartheſt end of their Town, hoping thereby to overflow the paſſage whereby Cyrus was to bring his victuals, and indeed the Land having a deſcent from that place their deſign had taken, and the Army had been put to a great neceſſity for victuals, if Cyrus had not prevented this inconvenience, by driving abundance more piles, and rowling great ſtones, filled up with Sand and wreck, which made a new Barraccadoe to the Waves that would have flowed from thence: This work of giving limits to the Sea, ſeemed to proceed from a ſupernatural power. Theſe works of grand importance did not only take up the mind of this Prince, but alſo the leaſt things were as well conſider'd by him, he himſelf was twice every day at the place where the victuals was, that he might ſee the diviſion juſt, and that none ſhould have any cauſe to complain, it was his uſual expreſſion, that great enterprizes could never be happily executed, unleſs a care was had unto trivial as well as important things; but the wonder was to ſee, that tho this Prince had a thouſand ſeveral cares upon him, yet he had ſuch an admirable freedome of Spirit, and ſo much blithneſs in his eyes, as infuſed much joy into all the Army, and did ſo invigorate the Spirits of thoſe that wrought, as in four dayes, maugre the rain, the wind, or any inconveniency, the lines were finiſhed, the Sea-banks fortified, the inundation of the Waves ſtopped, and all the Sandy hills put into a poſture of defence: Never was ſeen ſuch great works in ſo ſhort a time, nor did ever Prince merit more glory than Cyrus did at this time. In the mean time love was ſo predominate in his ſoul, that in giving all theſe orders, he ſtill thought how he gave them for Mandana, and that by making theſe works he hindred his Rival from carring away his Princeſs; and conſidering that if his deſign proſpered; he ſhould ſee Mandana at liberty, and his Rival in his fetters, he was full of unexpreſſible joyes: But as high as his hopes and joyes were, Mazares on the contrary was all ſorrows to ſee how he laboured for another, and that he was delivering Mandana to loſe her, but could never hope for the leaſt fruit of his victory: However ſince he had fixed his reſolutions, that his virtue ſhould ſurmount his love, he endeavoured to compoſe his mind, and to think of nothing but how to relieve Mandana. Thus, forcing his heart and Spirit by his extream generoſity, Cyrus and he agreed very well together, and talked of the Siege, and what was beſt tobe done,as if they had an equal intereſt in the taking of Cumes: The greateſt admiration of theſe two Princes was, that the King of Aſſiria did not appear amongſt them, nor ſo much as ſent unto them. As long as we were at Sardis, ſaid Cyrus, and knew nothing where the Princeſs Mandana was, I did not wonder to hear nothing from him: But now, ſince the Army is marched, hath been at Thybarra, and turned towards Cumes, he muſt needs know where our Princeſs is, and ſhould joyn with us to have his ſhare in the glory of releaſing her: For my (part anſwered Mazares) I muſt needs confeſs I cannot imagine his reaſon, for he was not uſed to give his Rivals any advantage; and therefore ſince he appears not, I neither know what to ſay or think of his abſence: Doubtleſs it is very hard to conceive, replied Cyrus; but may he not be in Cumes? (added he in a rapture of a ſad apprehenſion.)If he were there(anſwered Mazares)he whom you ſent hither would know him,and would have givenyou a hint of it in the intelligence which he ſent you: Let it be then concluded, replied Cyrus, that we cannot gueſs where he is, and let us believe that whereſoever he be, he plots our ruin.

Things being upon theſe terms in the Camp of Cyrus, the Enemies Army being certainly informed that Cumes was beſieged; they met in a place where the Commanders thought moſt fit to conſult upon the beſt courſe, and to execute it as ſoon as it was reſolved upon. Since they were very near the Camp, they hoped to relieve Cumes; for conſidering the diſcommodities of the incampment, and the badneſs of the weather, enough to ruine any Army, they thought that the Army of Cyrus would be ſo weakned by their hard working, and being incloſed by them and the Garriſon of the Town, it might be eaſily overthrown by freſh forces; yet the very name of Cyrus being terrible unto them, they reſolved to ſend out a party of Horſe to take ſome Priſoners, to the end they might have more certain knowledge of the Enemies condition: But at the ſame time, they trimmed and tackled up a great company of Ships, with intention to enter the Port of Cumes by force of Sail, if the winds were favourable, in ſpite of Thraſibulus his Fleet. In the mean time, Cyrus, like a Great Captain, did foreſee, that if the Siege laſted long, his Army would decay, that it might be beaten, and that he might fail in taking Cumes, he reſolved to ſhorten the Siege by force, and to aſſault it with unreſiſtable fury; and certainly this deſign was full of reaſon, for victuals would quickly fail, and the Sea was ſo rough, that the Barks which brought them were often ſplit in landing: Moreover, it was almoſt continual rain, and Winter came on ſo faſt, that the Souldiers endured much hardſhip; the impetuoſity of the wind would ſomtimes blow ſuch a cloud of duſty Sand upon all the Camp, as blinded them; their Tents and Huts were all weather-beaten, and many of the Souldiers did lye in mud; beſides all this, they muſt be continually working to repair what the Sea ſpoiled, and to keep the Ditch from being filled up; ſo that fortune, ill weather, and hard labour, began already to bring divers diſeaſes into the Camp. In the mean time, Cyrus foreſeeing all theſe inconveniencies was not diſmaid, but endeavoured to ſurmount them by ſtorming Cumes, and ſo to ſhorten the buſineſs: He very prudently conſidered, that he ſhould loſe fewer men by hazarding a fight, than by a long Siege: So that this being the reſolution, Cyrus contrived the execution: In order to which, as ſoon as the intrenchments were finiſhed, he went to diſcover all the places where the Town might be beſt aſſaulted, Mazares and Artamas followed him, and after good conſideration, he reſolved upon two ſeveral aſſaults, and prepared for the execution of ſo great a deſign, before the Enemy could oppoſe them, becauſe they were very buſie in their works of defence: Mazares and Artamas were the firſt who fought in erecting a Sconce to facilitate the aſſault, but the Enemy being fully reſolved to diſlodge them, did ſally upon them ſo ſharply, as they came thrice that night to the charge, and that with ſuch vigour, as it was evident that thoſe Souldiers were commanded by ſuch Officers who were reſolved to make a gallant defence: Anaxares who was in this buſtle did miracles, and did moſt contribute to the repairing of that Bank of Sand, where the Sconce was made: But in the laſt ſally which the Enemy made to drive them off, this valiant Stranger being very forward to repulſe them was taken Priſoner, and carried into the Town, but after three hours hot diſpute, Victory declared her ſelf for the Beſiegers, and the Sconce was made before night, able to hold three hundred men: There was killed, wounded, and taken Priſoners of both ſides, but the misfortune of Anaxaris did moſt ſenſibly perplex Cyrus: On the other ſide of the Town the aſſault was in a much more readineſs, for in a ſhort time the Beſiegers had gained the Counterſcarp, and things went as well as Cyrus could wiſh. In the mean time intelligence was brought, that the Enemies Army was upon their march, and ſeemed as they intended to offer battel. Cyrus no ſooner heard this news, but he prepared to receive them: But to prevent ſurprizal, he ſent out Scouts, and was preſently given to underſtand that it was a falſe alarm grounded upon what ſome Peſants had ſeen, who ſeeing a good Party of the Enemies ſent out to take ſome Priſoners, thought them to be the Vantguard of their Army: But the wonder was, that the noiſe of the Enemies march to relieve Cumes, ſhould never move the ſoul of Cyrus, nor diſmay the Souldiers, but all ſtood in excellent order to receive them: The aſſault continued, as if this Alarm had never been, and Clearques who ſhewed himſelf moſt bravely, was already got upon the Counterſcarp, when the Enemy out of their Trenches ſent Clouds of Arrows upon the Pioniers; after which they came to handy blows, and a much more terrible and bloody fight there was than that before, and the confuſion was ſo great, that none knew which were Conquerors, or which conquered; which Friends, which Enemies. Cyrus being advertiſed of this diſorder; went thither immediately, being followed by Megabates, Thraſimedes, Ligdamis, Aglatidas, and all the reſt of the Voluntiers; and he was no ſooner in the midſt of this danger, but his preſence diſperſed all fears, he gave new hearts to his Souldiers, damped the Enemies, re-eſtabliſhed the order, and went on with the work. But whilſt things were in this condition on the Beſiegers ſide, thoſe who commanded the Enemies Army were in great perplexity, for though their Army was ſufficiently numerous, yet after they knew from the Priſoners which they had taken, the manner of the works, they thought themſelves not able to force them, eſpecially having to do with a Prince who was as Prudent as Valiant: Yet ſince Pactias knew, that the King of Pontus would never pardom him if they attempted nothing for his relief; and ſince Lycambes thought it would go againſt the Hair of his honour, to ſtand ſtill with his hands in his Pocket, they reſolved to ſeem at leaſt as if they would do ſomething, though when they conſidered that they were to cope with the moſt valiant Prince in the World, a Prince accuſtomed to vanquiſh, whoſe men were admirably diſciplined, whoſe reputation robbed their Souldiers of their hearts, and whoſe capacity left them no hopes that he would commit any error which might facilitate their deſign: All theſe, I ſay, conſidered, they thought it madneſs to attempt any thing againſt him, and they confeſſed it folly, ever to hope for any good iſſue in their attempt: But making a ſhow as if they would make ſome attempt, they marched as if they would aſſault the lines, themſelves ſpreading a report of it, to ſee if any tumult would chance in the Camp, which might encourage them to fall on. Cyrus hearing this went out of the works with a Body of Cavalry, and ſome Voluntiers, deſiring to inform himſelf, and face them, before they aſſaulted him; but he was extreamly amazed when he ſaw only ſigns of quitting their Quarters; and when he underſtood by ſome lazy Souldiers which ſtayed behind, that Pactias and Lycam- bes underſtanding the manner of the works; did think it impoſſible to force them, and that it were better to keep their Forces to defend the reſt of the Country, than to loſe them in relieving Cumes, which they could not hinder from being taken: So that Cyrus having vanquiſhed without a blow, returned into the Camp with freſh hopes of carrying the Town, and ſpeedy releaſing of Mandana.

In the mean time, the beſieged did defend it with moſt reſolute valour, and ſo ſtifly, that they could not get a foot of ground without a ſharp combat for it: The King of Pontus ſeemed to be indefatigable, and took all the pains which is inſeparable from Seiges: The Prince of Cumes, his liberty being at ſtake, did fight with invincible courage; ſo that it may well be ſaid, that never did aſſailants fall on with more vigour, nor ever any aſſailed defend themſelves more valiantly: 'Tis true, the King of Pontus had ſuch a Sea of ſorrows flowing upon him, as the courage of any but himſelf would have been overwhelmed; for indeed the more ſubmiſs he was unto Mandana, the more unalterable ſhe was; yet for all his ſorrows, he treated Anaxaris very well in his Priſon, who obtained all the liberty of the Caſtle where Mandana was, except permiſſion to ſee her: But ſince he retained the Idea of her beauty in his memory, ever ſince the time he ſaw her in the Caſtle of Hermes, when ſhe releaſed Cyrus, he ſought out for an opportunity of ſeeing her again, and eaſily found it; for Marteſia having ſeen him in the Caſtle Court out of her Chamber Window, and and knowing by the Guards that he was a Priſoner, ſhe had a great deſire to ſpeak with him, and to enquire concerning Cyrus: ſhe cunningly gained the hearts of her Guards, and perſwaded them upon ſome pretence which ſhe invented, to bring him into the little Garden where the Princeſs and ſhe had liberty to walk, and to tell him, that there was a Lady of his Party who deſired to ſpeak with him. Since the King of Pontus and the Prince of Cumes were continually buſie about the defence of the Walls, they were not ſo circumſpect as to mind every thing; ſo that they intirely truſted a ſingle and diſarmed Priſoner with the Guards which they had appointed over him. Then Anaxaris coming into the Garden unperceived ceived, but he ſaw Marteſia, who no ſooner ſaw him. but ſhe advanced towards him with a bluſh: Though I have not the honour to know you (ſaid ſhe unto him after the firſt ſalute) yet I have ſome hopes to obtain a favour from you; for ſince you have ventured your life for that Princeſs whom I ſerve, and have endeavoured her liberty at the price of your own, I may well believe you will not deny me the favour to tell me how that Prince doth, who muſt be both her Deliverer and ours, and to tell me in what condition you left the illuſtrious Cyrus. Anaxaris hearing Marteſia ſpeak thus, anſwered her with as much civility as ſpirit, that he would moſt joyfully obey ſuch a Lady as her ſelf; adding, that though he was not in a condition to imploy his courage for the Princeſs Mandana's releaſment, yet he would acquaint her what Cyrus did for her. After this, Marteſia asking a hundred queſtions, he informed her of all that Cyrus ever did, ſince the taking of Sardis, unto the carrying away of the Princeſs Araminta, and ſince her carrying away until the Siege of Cumes, with all poſſible aggravations that might be advantagious unto that Prince; So that Marteſia, who did much intereſt her ſelf in the happyineſs of Cyrus, and who was exceeding glad to find any ſubject which might eradicate all memory of that unjuſt jealouſie which Mandana had out of her Spirit, ſhe reſolved to contrive it ſo, that Anaxaris might ſee her; and indeed, after ſhe had thanked him, and obliged him to tell his name, ſhe deſired him to return the next day at the ſame hour at the ſame place, where the Princeſs Mandana might underſtand from his mouth all he had told her: She had no ſooner made this requeſt unto Anaxaris, but he expreſſed abundance of joy, aſſuring her ſhe would do him the greateſt favour in the world, in letting him have the honour of ſeeing Mandana: After which, going out the ſame way he entred, Marteſia went unto the Princeſs to acquaint her with all the ſtory, but eſpecially with what concerned the carrying away the Princeſs Araminta, obſerving to her, how Cyrus had contented himſelf to give fifty horſes unto Spitridates, and would not go himſelf to follow her Raviſher, but returned unto Sardis, in expectation of thoſe whom he had ſent unto Epheſus, Guides, and many other places to enquire news of her ſelf. And Madam, ſaid Marteſia, it is impoſſible to meet with a more exact relation than I have, for this honeſt ſtranger told me, that he was with Cyrus, when he firſt knew of Araminta's carrying away.

This circumſtance created ſuch a freſh curioſity in Mandana to ſee Anaxaris, as ſhe reſolved to make good Marteſia's promiſe: But yet ſaid Mandana unto her, who is this which you would have me ſee? Madam, replied ſhe, though he told me not his name, nor who he is, yet I am moſt certain, that he is a man of ſome very high quality, I ſee it by his garb, his behaviour, and his actions, alſo by his manner of ſpeaking; and I ſee it alſo plainly, by what Cyrus told him; that he is ſuch a man as I ſpake of: But I pray, ſaid Mandana, doth Cyrus think he can take Cumes and releaſe us? Truly Madam, replied ſhe, I was ſo inquiſitive of what concerned Araminta, to the end I might fully juſtifie the illuſtrious Cyrus in your opinion, as I muſt confeſs, that I talked not a word of the Siege, ſuppoſing, and with reaſon, that ſince Cyrus beſiegeth Cumes, he will infallibly take it: Ah Marteſia (ſaid Mandana and bluſht) in deſiring to juſtifie Cyrus, you ſtrangely accuſe me, ſince you do thereby upbraid me with my weakneſs, or an humour which may be termed jealouſie: Did you but know Marteſia (added ſhe) how much aſhamed I am, you would not ſpeak of it any more; for truly I can hardly abſolve my ſelf, for letting Cyrus ſo raſhly know the anger which I conceived againſt him, when I thought he preferred Araminta before me; and though my thoughts of diſpleaſure againſt him were rather reſentments of glory than any real jealouſie, yet I muſt confeſs he might interpret what I writ as he pleaſed: For my part Madam (replied Marteſia and ſmiled) were I in lieu of that Prince, I ſhould rather to my conſolation think that you were jealous, than that you were proud: The more you ſpeak, replyed Mandana, the more you make me aſhamed, and let me ſee my folly in truſting too much to my ſelf: For truly Marteſia, Do you remember the time when Cyrus was only Artamenes? The time, I ſay, when Feraulas thinking him dead, did bring me a Declaration of his Love, that I read it in tears and was not angry, becauſe

I thought that Artamenes was dead? I remember it very well Madam, replied Marteſia, nor have I forgot how pity then would not permit you to be angry with him: Then you have not forgot, added Mandana, at what a non-plus I was when Artamenes was received, and how I thought never to ſee him, becauſe I imagined he would come to know how I ſteeped his Letter in my tears: Judg now, I pray you, if he ſhall be ſo happy as to take Cumes, how infinitely ſhall I be aſhamed to ſee him, when I ſhall remember that I writ ſuch things unto him, as will make him believe I was jealous? In good earneſt, I am ſo vexed at my ſelf for my fondneſs, and inconſideration which I have expreſſed unto him, I had rather then ſeem guilty of ſuch a fault, ſee Cyrus prefidious a thouſand times: Ah Madam, replyed Marteſia, the paſſion whereof you ſpeak cannot be hid when one pleaſeth, but ſhall ſhew it whether one will or no, and ſhew it ſometimes by hiding it: Yet were it abundance of indiſcretion and imprudence to ſhew it, (anſwered Mandana) for whether it be well or ill-grounded, it will procure hatred; and therefore though one ſhould be ſo unhappy as to be capable of it, yet one ſhould not ſhew it: For all your ingenious arguments which ſeem to be juſt, anſwered Marteſia, yet I am moſt certain Madam, that as you need not doubt of the fidelity of Cyrus, ſo you may be very glad to have it from the mouth of Anaxaris, that he left Spitridates to go after Araminta; and hath neglected no oppertunity to releaſe you: You pitileſs woman, replyed Mandana, what delight can you take in making me aſhamed? Do not think, that if I have a deſire to ſee this Priſoner, but it is becauſe I would know from him the ſtate of the Siege, then for any ſuch reaſon as you ſpeak of, for I do profeſs unto you, that I cannot endure to upbraid my ſelf for having any ſuch thoughts as are equally injurious, both unto Cyrus and my ſelf: However Marteſia having a moſt infinite confidence with Mandana, did ſtill diſpute the buſineſs very reſpectively with her, knowing ſhe would not take it ill.

However, the next morning according to the reſolution, Anaxaris ſaw the Princeſs, who was ſo well ſatisfied with him, as it was impoſſible ſhe ſhould be more. At the firſt he was mighty high in his commendations of Cyrus, and all he did for her; he expreſſed himſelf with ſuch zeal and aggravations, as he could not impoſe ſilence upon himſelf: But at laſt he leſſened his talk of this Prince, and Marteſia obſerved, that he was ſo taken up with contemplation of Mandana's beauty, that he could not take his eyes off her: Since this Princeſs had a deſire to oblige him, ſhe asked him of what Country he was? But Anaxaris anſwered, Madam, ſaid he, ſince ſeveral reaſons oblige me to conceal what I really am, I have denied the illuſtrious Cyrus twenty times, that which you do me the honour to ask, and that which I am extreamly ſorry I cannot tell you, though perhaps it would be in ſome ſort advantagious to me, that you did know it. After this, Mandana asked him very inquiſitively what news Cyrus heard from Ciaxares? And afterwards enquired of all the Army, but eſpecially of Chriſantes and Feraulas. Anaxaris anſwered unto all theſe queſtions, but it was like a man who was ſurprized with an over-violent reſpect, though he gazed upon her moſt attentively: Since he could receive better intelligence from his Guards, then the Princeſs could from hers, it was reſolved between them, that he ſhould ſee her every day, or at leaſt ſhould ſee Marteſia, and indeed ſo he did as long as the Siege laſted. In the mean time, the King of Pontus was in a moſt deſperate condition, eſpecially when he ſaw the Port of Cumes ſo blocked up by the Fleet of Thraſibulus, that there was no hopes of his carrying away the Princeſs: On the other ſide, the Prince of Cumes began to think he took an ill courſe in giving a retreat to King of Pontus. But whilſt he was full of this vain repentance, the man whom Cyrus ſent into the Town, who had ſpoken twice with Marteſia, who took a Letter from her for Cyrus, and who had ſent it unto him by a ſervant, this man did cajole with the people as well as he could to move them unto murmur, at their being thus ingaged in a troubleſome unlucky war.

Thus whilſt the illuſtrious Cyrus was in the toilſome works of Siege, he had ſome in the Town who were negotiating in his ſervice. In the mean time, this indefatigable Prince being gone to viſit ſome new works, as he was giving ſome orders about it to an Ingeneer, this man was ſlain at his feet with an Arrow, but as if this day were fatal unto Cyrus, and as if ſome malignant conſtellation were predominate, as he was returning in the evening unto his Quarter, he deſired to go and give ſome orders unto a place where he conceived them to be neceſſary: But he was no ſooner in the Trenches, then the Enemy ſhooting off an Engine which carried ſtones with ſuch an impetuous celerity as was irreſiſtable, one of Cyrus his Pages which followed him, had his head ſtruck off: The danger came ſo near this great Prince, as that the skull of this Page being ſhivered in ſeveral pieces, did wound him in five or ſix places in the face and neck; ſo that Cyrus was all ſprinkled with his own blood, and the blood of this unfortunate Servant. In the mean time this Prince had ſuch a ſweet tranquility in his Countenance amidſt this great danger, that he cheared up the hearts of all his men, and made it appear that his courage was incapable of fear, and that nothing could ſhake it: Megabates and Perſodes had their ſhares in this glorious danger, for they were very near them: On the other ſide, Pactias and Licambes, ſeeing they could not attempt any thing by Land or relieve Cumes, reſolved to try what they could do by Sea, hoping that the bad weather would force Cyrus perhaps to raiſe the Siege. To this end they tackled up all their Ships, and ſet out to Sea, as if they would force Thraſibulus to give them paſſage. The ſight of this Fleet filled all the Inhabitants of Cumes with as much joy, as it did Mandana with ſorrows, who looking out of her window, which was towards the open Sea, did with inconceivable ſorrow ſee this Navy, which ſeemed to deſire a fight with Thraſibulus: This Princeſs imagined, that if one Fleet ſhould defeat the other, Cumes would be relieved, and feared that if the Sea were once free, the King of Pontus would remove her unto ſome other place where Cyrus could not releaſe her; yet ſhe was not long in theſe ſad apprehenſions, for this Fleet was no ſooner in ſight of Thraſibulus, but fears did ſo poſſeſs the Spirits of thoſe which commanded it, that they ſteered about, and betook themſelves to flight, the wind being not favourable to them for fighting. Leonti- das who commanded the little Veſſels and the Barks, did chaſe them out of the ſight of the King of Pontus, who beheld this diſaſterous diſorder with unexpreſſible ſorrow: But in exchange Mandana ſaw her Deliverers ſtand firm, and her Enemies fly to her unutterable joy. In the mean while, Cyrus ſeeing the reſolute reſiſtance of the King of Pontus and the Prince of Cumes, who loſt not a foot of ground without diſputing for it with extraordinary valour: Seeing, I ſay, that all his Enſigns and Stratagems could not do any good wherewith to carry the Town, becauſe they could not make any conſiderable breach, bethought himſelf of a device, which nothing elſe but Love could invent, and this it was, Cyrus was advertiſed that in a place of the Ditch towards the Sconce, which they had made neareſt the Town, there was a great Cave, whoſe mouth was ſtopped by thoſe of Cumes, that this Cave did extend it ſelf by many turnings and windings very far into the earth, ſo that the walls and fortifications of the Town did ſtand upon the Cave. Cyrus no ſooner knew this, but he reſolved to croſs the ditch, and to make a Sconce at the foot of the walls, juſt at the mouth of this Cave, and did effect it. This Sconce was no ſooner made defenſible, but Cyrus cauſing the mouth to be opened, made a great number of Pioneers and workmen to enter in the night, with tools fit to break the ſtony roof of this Vault, which bore up a part of the Town: So that moving them to work with incredible alacrity, they came at laſt to find the foundation of the Walls of Cumes; but leſt they ſhould totter too much, and too ſoon, and ſo ſmother thoſe who were in the Cave, they no ſooner diſcovered the foundation of the Walls, but they underpropped it with Billets; ſo that imploying as many Billets as they diſcovered ſtones, the Wall ſtood firm. But leſt the noiſe of the Workers ſhould be heard by thoſe in the Town, Cyrus cauſed an aſſault to be given at the other ſide of the Town, purpoſely to draw the people thither, and buſie them; commanding thoſe forces at the ſame time which were on that ſide where the Miners were, to make falſe Alarums very often, that is, to make many great ſhouts, and as much noiſe as they could: But at the laſt, after they had diſcovered enough of the Walls foundation, to hope for a reaſonable breach, and after they had underpropped it with as many Piles as were neceſſary to ſupport it, Cyrus cauſed abundance of combuſtable ſtuff to be brought unto the feet of theſe Piles, ſuch as very dry wood, which was made apt to burn by Pitch, Brimſtone, and certain Gums which they added to it; ſo that when the hour of execution came, and all the Workmen retired out, and all things in readineſs, Cyrus about two hours after noon, cauſed fire to be put unto this huge maſs of combuſtable matter, which he had placed at the feet of theſe Piles; ſo the fire did kindle in an inſtant, the Piles were conſumed immediately, the foundation of the Wall wanting Supporters did fall, and the Walls wanting foundation followed, ſo this cauſed the moſt horrible object that ever could be beheld; for one might ſee at the mouth of the Cave a blaze of ſeveral coloured flames, mingled with a thick cloud of ſmoke; but the moſt affrighting part was to ſee, when the foundation of the Wall failed, the horrid ſubverſion which was in an inſtant, the Souldiers upon them periſh'd in their ruins, a thouſand flaſhes of lightning flame flying up in the air, the terrible noiſe which the ſtones made in their fall, the Battlements in ſome places, to tumble with ſuch impetuoſity, as that they reached as far as the Sea; the duſty ſmoke which was made by the falling of the Wall would not let one ſee a long time, whether the breach was conſiderable or no: But after the wind had a little diſſipated the muddy miſt in the Air, one might perceive that the breach was as much as one could wiſh: So that Cyrus cauſing an aſſault to be made, and finding no reſiſtance, becauſe this ſtrange invention had amazed the Enemy, they began to make a Sconce there: But at laſt, the King of Pontus coming unto that place, and the Souldiers recollecting themſelves, they did moſt couragiouſly beat back the forces of Cyrus, and hindred them from finiſhing the work which they had begun: The fight was very obſtinate and bloody. In the mean time, though the Wall in falling at the mouth of the Cave had choaked the fire which flamed thereout, yet there were ſome Crannies in this huge heap of ruins, out of which there came ſo thick a ſmoke, as it deprived the Combatants of light and knowledg, who friend, who foe: So that the Souldiers of Cyrus, and thoſe of the King of Pontus, not knowing what they did, fell into ſuch a confuſed diſorder, that thoſe of Cyrus thought the beſieged had the advantage, and thoſe of the Town alſo thought that the Aſſailants had it: So as in this error and diſorder both ſides retreated, and left the Sconce to it ſelf; yet the ſmoke being vaniſhed, the Souldiers of Cyrus were the firſt who ſaw it, and returned to the Combat, which they did ſo proſperouſly, that they finiſhed the Sconce and kept it.

Whilſt they were getting this advantage on that ſide, Clearques obtained another on the other ſide where he did aſſault; and he got ſo much honour during this Siege, as Cyrus gave him a thouſand commendations: All the Voluntiers approved themſelves moſt brave men, eſpecially Megabates. This being the ſtate of things, Paſtias and Licambes did make another attempt, which was to get ſome men into Cumes by the way towards the Sea, and indeed they did happily begin the deſign, never being diſcovered by the Scouts; but Cyrus being advertized of this enterprize, took horſe immediately with Mazares and all the bravery of his Army, and went to look upon their Enemies, who ſeeing they were diſcovered, retired in ſuch haſt, that Cyrus could not overtake them: So that he returned to the Camp, where he found all things in a good condition, and looked upon Cumes as a Town that would be preſently taken: His greateſt perplexity was his fear, leſt the King of Pontus ſhould find out ſome way to ſteal away Mandana: Wherefore conſulting with Mazares upon the beſt courſe, he believing the Prince of Cumes repented of his giving Sanctuary unto the King of Pontus, for involving him into all this miſery, it was thought expedient to offer him his Dominions if he would reſtore Mandana, and that he would give liberty to the King of Pontus, becauſe he would not move him to betray a Prince unto whom he had given retreat: Cyrus hoping that if this Prince would not accept of this offer, yet it would ſtir up the people againſt him, and would hinder the King of Pontus from carrying away Mandana: So that having ſent a Herauld unto the Prince of Cumes, to tell him, that having ſome advantageous Propoſitions to make unto him, he deſired a man of ſome credence might be ſent to receive his intentions. This Prince, after a conſult with the King of Pontus, anſwered, that their two intereſts being inſeparable, he could not receive his meſſage without his participation, but that they would ſend jointly the next morning to know what the will of Cyrus was, that in the interim there might be a ceſſation of Arms: Though this anſwer of the Prince of Cumes was not according to the wiſh of Cyrus; yet he took him at his word, and to obtain his ends, he reſolved to tranſact with equal generoſity unto his Rival: So that the next morning after the Truce was publiſhed, and after he who the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes ſent unto him, were come into the Camp; Cyrus would needs ſhew him all his works, to the end the negotiation might better proceed: So that he carried him from Line to Line, from Fort to Fort,and let him ſee there was no hopes of ever relieving Cumes by Land: Alſo, what Cyrus ſaid unto him was ſo full of generoſity, that he could ſee no reaſon why any of his offers ſhould be refuſed, for he demanded of the Prince of Cumes Mandana only, and yet offered unto the King of Pontus all the conditions which the Princeſs Araminta heretofore offered from him, which was, an Army to reconquer his Dominions: I do not offer this, (ſaid he unto the man) out of the leaſt doubt of taking Cumes preſently, but it is becauſe I am obliged unto the King of Pontus, ever ſince I wore the name of Artamenes, and having a high eſteem of the Prince of Cumes courage, I ſhould be ſorry any occaſion ſhould force me to ruin them; and to tell you truly, I deſire to ſhorten the Captivity of Mandana, by a happy Negotiation.

After this, Cyrus did much oblige the man to whom he ſpoke, and without any unworthy Propoſition, he made him extreamly ſatisfied with his generoſity; but the more reaſonable the Propoſitions were, the more ſharp were they unto the King of Pontus, and he laboured to put things unto the utmoſt extremity, and the Prince of Cumes proteſted never to ſhrink from his intereſt; and though he was moſt deſperately in Love, yet he could not chuſe but conſider, that ſince he was not able to keep Mandana, it were injuſtice wilfully to ruin a Prince who had given him retreat: But for all this, though he did know it to be both unjuſt and imprudent, yet his paſſion had no ear to hear of any Propoſition, which had any clauſe of Mandana's reſtitution in it; yet notwithſtanding, not daring to tell the Prince of Cumes in plain terms, that rather than reſtore Mandana into the hands of Cyrus, he was reſolved to ſee both him and himſelf to periſh, he gave him ſuch language as might gain a little time, and if poſſible recover ſome hopes; and therefore he thought it expedient to tell Cyrus, that they could not return him any poſitive anſwer, without imparting theſe Propoſitions unto the Xanthians, and Caunians, and alſo until they knew from Pactias and Licambes in what condition their forces were, and therefore deſired, until they were ſatisfied in theſe things, that the Truce might continue; ſo that they ſent back this anſwer unto Cyrus, who accepted of it, provided there were a time limited unto this Negotiation, and that the term were not long; and thus the Truce was continued: The King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes ſent out an Envoy unto the General of their Army, and another unto the Xanthians and the Cauneans, Cyrus ſending Heraulds with them to carry them thither, and to bring them back. In the mean time, the King of Pontus, who had never conſented unto this Negotiation, but that he might thereby have longer time to conſider which way he might ſave himſelf, or at leaſt defer his ruin a little longer, he now pumped all his invention for an expedihow to get Mandana out of Cumes: But whilſt he was vainly ſeeking for that which was ſo difficult to be found, Cyrus and Mazares admired what was become of the Aſſyrian King, they could not imagin where he ſhould be, nor how it was poſſible he ſhould be living, and not be before Cumes: Sometimes Cyrus thought him dead, and otherwhiles had a jealous fancy that he was in Cumes, and ſome way or other tranſacting his ruin, though yet he could not imagin which way he was able to do it. In the mean while, the Truce being publiſhed as well in the Sea as Land-Army, there was a general idleneſs amongſt the Souldiers on both ſides, and a kind of a dim image of Peace amongſt them all.

Things ſtanding upon theſe terms, and Cyrus being one morning upon the top of a Fort which he had made upon a hill in the Quarters of Mazares, he diſcover'd a Fleet, which with full Sail made towards his. He no ſooner ſaw this, but his paſſion moving him to ſuſpect ſome foul play, he changed colour, and would ſend unto Cumes to clear his ſuſpitions, but as he was upon the point of ſending, an Envoy came unto him from the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes, who came to ask him whether this Fleet did come to ſtrengthen his Army, and whether he would keep within the limits of the Truce? So that knowing by this the Fleet were not his Enemies, he concluded they were for him, knowing how he had negotiated for Ships in ſeveral places, and indeed he was not miſtaken. After this, he diſmiſſed the Envoy with orders to aſſure the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes, that he would make no attempts until the Truce were ended or broken: And as for the Fleet which appeared, they had no orders from him to approach, nor knew he from whence they came, yet he would engage his word to make no uſe of them, until thoſe Princes had refuſed the Propoſitions which he made them. After this Envoy was gone, Cyrus and Mazares ſaw that Thraſibulus ſent out two little Veſſels to meet thoſe which were making towards him, and that thoſe two Ships returned with the Fleet as friends towards Thraſibulus; ſo that rejoycing to ſee freſh aid, he thought it would conduce much to make the people of Cumes revolt, if thoſe Princes ſhould not accept of thoſe offers which he made them: Alſo he conceived freſh hopes of ſeeing his dear Princeſs very ſhortly, yet he was very impatient to know from whence this Fleet ſhould come, but he was not long without full ſatisfaction; for the two Fleets were no ſooner joyned, and thoſe who commanded them had conference, but Thraſibulus (according to the liberty of Truce) ſent Leontidas in a Barque with Philocles, who was Lieutenant General unto him who commanded this Fleet unto Cyrus, to inform him of all paſſages, ſo that Leontidas arrived at the Camp juſt as Cyrus entred into his Tent with Mazares, Myrſiles, and many others: But to the end he might know how to receive Philocles, he went to Cyrus before him, and acquainted him, how Philocles was ſent by the Princeſs Cleobuline, who was then Queen of Corinth, after the death of the wiſe and valiant Periander her Father; and that he came to offer him from the Queen this Fleet, which he ſaw arrive.

Cyrus no ſooner heard this from Leontidas, but he diſpoſed himſelf to receive Philocles with extraordinary civility, not only becauſe he did very much eſteem, and becauſe he brought him powerful Auxiliaries, but alſo becauſe he came from one of the muſt illuſtrious Princeſſes in the World, whom he had ſeen very young when he travelled by Corinth. Having then appointed Chriſantes to go and entertain them whom ſhe had ſent, and Leontidas to bring him thither; Philocles was brought, who preſented a Letter unto him from the Queen of Corinth, which contained theſe words,

The Queen of Corinth to the invincible CYRUS.

SIR,

TO teſtifie how dear the remembrance of the illuſtrious Artamenes is unto me, and how much I intereſt my ſelf in that glory which he hath gotten, I have ſent unto him the beſt Ships which are on our Seas, being extreamly ſorry, that he would not acquaint me with his neceſſities, but demanded aid from Princes, who could not help him with a more willing heart than mine: The Souldiers which I have made choice of to ſend him, hath all of them heretofore returned from Wars mith Lawrels on their heads under the late King my Father; and leſt they they ſhould forget the art of vanquiſhing, I ſhould be glad to have them fight under ſuch a Conquerour as your ſelf, nor can they have a greater honour, than to have a helping hand in the Princeſs Mandana*'s delivery, and fighting under your Enſigns; and this is my advantage, that when you ſhall ſend them back, I ſhall be more terrible to my Neighbours;* Philocles, who knows my thoughts of you, will more preſiſely interpret them; and if he follow my inſtructions exactly, will tell you, that I do eaſily believe all the wonders which are reported of your life, and there is none in the world who doth more honour your virtue then my ſelf, nor who wiſheth your happineſs with more zeal then

CLEOBULINE.

This Letter being full of Noble expreſſions, it did moſt infinitely oblige Cyrus, who teſtified unto Philocles ſo many cordial acknowledgments of this great Queens goodneſs unto him, as made it apparent, that his heart was moſt ſenſible of ſuch a generous overture. After this, Philocles acquainted Cyrus, how the Queen who ſent him underſtood that the Prince of Cumes had ſent ſecretly unto Corinth, to cauſe Ships of War to be made, and that ſhe was diligent to enquire (by ſome intelligence which ſhe hath in the Town) what might be his reaſon for arming? by which means ſhe came to underſtand, that it was becauſe he had given retreat unto the King of Pontus, who was eſcaped from Sardis, and had taken the Princeſs Mandana with him: Philocles further told him, that this great Queen ſuppoſing he knew where that Princeſs was, and not queſtioning but that be would preſently beſiege Cumes, ſhe made ready this Fleet which now ſhe ſent unto him, which could not poſſibly come ſooner unto Cumes, becauſe of the contrary winds: Philocles extolled the eſteem which Cleobuline had of Cyrus, with ſo many aggravations, and ſuch eloquence, as it was evident he came from the Court of a Princeſs, where ignorance did not paſs for a vertue, like many other Courts in the world: Though Cleobuline was very young when Cyrus was at Corinth, yet he remembred her to be then very fair, and of an admirable Spirit as well as Beauty; and being obliged unto a more particular curioſity, he asked Philocles a hundred queſtions, concerning this great Princeſs and her Goverment; but the more Philocles anſwered, the more his curioſity augmented, for he told him ſuch wonders of this Queen in diſcourſing with him, of her great ſoul, ſpirit, wit, prudence, juſtice, liberty and goodneſs, as this Prince was all admiration, and had no longing deſire to know more. In the mean time, to teſtifie how much he eſteemed of any thing that came from her, he ſent Chriſantes unto him, who commanded this Fleet, with ſeveral Barks loaden with all manner of things ſuitable for a Preſent at Sea, keeping Philocles with wim, and Leontidas alſo until the Truce was ended.

The next morning, he who commanded the Fleet, whoſe name was Timochares, came alſo to viſit Cyrus, who treated him with magnificence worthy of himſelf, and worthy of that Queen whom he deſired to honour, by honouring him who commanded her Arms. Since the Truce allowed him leaſure enough, and ſince his hopes of ſeeing his Princeſs at liberty had infuſed much ſerenity into his ſoul, his civilities were more exact and regular than ordinary; therefore as often as Philocles and Timochares were with him, he talked with them continually of the Queen, of whom he ſtill heard ſomthing that was admirable, and indeed ſo many miracles, as would have ſtaggered his belief, and ſuſpected Philocles and Timochares of groſs flattery, if he had not known the firſt of them to be a man moſt ſincere.

However, this Prince always thought that he committed a crime when he thought of any thing but Mandana, and would not perhaps have been ſo forward in the buſineſs of this Queen, if Timochares, according to her orders, had not asked him, whether ſhe approved of her deſign never to marry, adviſing with him afterwards upon ſeveral things which related unto her Dominions: So that Cyrus infinitely wondred at the reſolution which this young and fair Queen had taken, and afterwards talking with Timochares, and then with Philocles, who for divers reaſons wiſhed that this Queen would not ſo obſtinately perſiſt in her reſolution. Philocles reſolved to acquaint Cyrus with ſomething which almoſt none but himſelf could, to the end that he might adviſe Timochares, who had ſome credit with Cleobuline, to perſwade her not to perſiſt in her deſign: So that after they had augmented the curioſity of Cyrus, by a thouſand circumſtances concerning this Queen; and after Philocles had told him, that a relation of this Queens life would concern him, Cyrus who infinitely eſteemed Philocles, promiſed to give him audience ſome night when every one was retired to their their reſt. But before he would let him begin this relation, he asked how Philiſta did? and how the ſtate of his Love did ſtand? Oh Sir (anſwered he, with ſuch a ſmile as teſtified that he was either cured of his paſſion, or happy) the ſtate of my fortune is changed, ſince I left you in Armenia. Since, I hope, replied Cyrus, that the change is for the better, I ſhould be glad to know it: Sir, replied Philocles, I am much obliged unto you for your expreſſion, but in my acknowledgment of this honour, it would not be juſt in me to trouble you with any long relation of my own adventures, ſince I have others more illuſtrious to acquaint you withal: It will be enough I tell you, that hope is a thing which a Lover never ought to loſe, ſince never any had leſs grounds of hope then I had when I was at Jaliſſa, after I heard the Husband of Philiſta was dead: Yet Sir, that extream averſion which I thought invincible, was ſurmounted by my perſeverance; and that heart, which with ſo many ſervices, ſighs and tears could not melt, was at laſt diſſolved by my conſtancy: So that when I did return unto Corinth, I did return the Husband of Philiſta; at my arrival there I received a Letter from Thimocratis, which intimated unto me, that he had married Teleſile. Thus, Sir, thoſe two Lovers, whom you ſaw in ſuch a miſerable condition at Synope, as that none had misfortunes comparable unto theirs, are now both of them become moſt happy, though then there was no likelihood of their ever being ſo: I aſſure you, replied Cyrus, I am infinitely joyed at it: I am infinitely obliged unto you, replied Philocles; But to return unto the Queen of Corinth, I ſhall moſt humbly beſeech you, Sir, not to ſuſpect me of any flattery, when you ſhall hear things reported of her, for believe it, Sir, her merit is above all commendations or flattery: She was ſo lovely and accompliſhed, replied Cyrus, when I was at Corinth, that I queſtion not but ſhe will merit the Character you ſhall give her, therefore you need not, Philocles, to prepare me with any ſuch Prologue. After this, Philocles began the relation thus.

The Hiſtory of CLEOBULINE Queen of Corinth.

THough it be the cuſtome of thoſe who relate the lives of any one, to begin afar off, and to give as large a Character of the Anceſtors, as of the Party who is moſt concerned in the adventure in hand, yet I do not intend to imitate them; therefore Sir, I ſhall only hint unto you in a conciſe method, that Periander the Queen of Corinths Father was branched from the illuſtrious Race of Heraclides; that his valour had rendred him a Conquerour of his Dominions, though his Juſtice made him to raign quietly ? that he had waged many glorious Wars, eſpecially againſt thoſe of Epidaurus, and that his great ſoul had made him merit the name of Wiſe, as well as his courage had got him the name of Valiant. After this, I ſhall tell you, that having loſt the Queen his wife, and two Sons, he died himſelf, and left the Princeſs his Daughter Queen of Corinth, at ſuch an age as could not be imagined ſhe could bear out her Royal Authority as ſhe did. I know again, Sir, that it is the cuſtome, leaſt Auditors ſhould be ſurprized at the extraordinary merits of a perſon, to relate how they were educated, and what they were taught, and to derive their Hiſtory even from their very Cradle. But ſince it is the Queen of Corinth I am to ſpeak, I will ſhew you her upon her Throne, and not mention her further then ſince ſhe wore a Crown. Yet of her perſon, Sir, ſince ſhe is much embeliſhed ſince you ſaw her, it is requiſite I ſpeak ſomething; yet ſhe is a little bigger than when you were at Corinth, for her ſtature could never reach unto the rank of the middle ſort, but yet I aſſure you, Sir, ſhe has all the Characters of Grandure and Majeſty in her aſpect, ſuch as imprints fear and reverence in the hearts of all that look upon her, though this be a priviledge which commonly is reſerved only to ſuch unto whom Nature hath given a high and lofty ſtature. But though Cleobuline be not ſo high as her heart is great, yet in exchange ſhe hath the faireſt gray Eyes that e'er were ſeen; her Hair the lovelieſt fair in the world; her Garb and Behaviour ſuperlatively rare; and though her Noſe be a little above the true exactneſs of proportion, yet her Phyſiognomy is ſo Noble and Heroique, as it pleaſeth infinitely, and as I ſaid before, inſpires reverence into the hearts of all beholders. But Sir, I do not only render her commendable unto you by the graces of her perſon; but alſo by the grandure of her ſoul, the nobleneſs of her inclinations, the generoſity of her heart, and the incomprehenſible altitude of her wiſdom and ſpirit: For it is moſt unqueſtionably certain, that never any one living had greater and more admirable qualites than this Princeſs hath, ſhe ſpeaks unto all Ambaſſadors which come unto her Court in their own National Language, and that with ſuch eloquence, with ſo much eaſe, and with ſuch a grace, as puts them all to admiration. Moreover, her knowledge is not limited to the languages which ſhe ſpeaks and writes as well as her own, but there is no manner of Science whereof ſhe is not capable. Yet the thing which in my phancy merits moſt eſteem is, that ſhe hath ſuch a venerable opinion of all perſons that are either knowing, or virtuous, or excellent in any Art, that at this very preſent ſhe hath intelligencers in all places of the World to enquire out thoſe who have any extraordinary merit, and by this means there is not any man of any tranſcendant parts, who hath not taſted of her liberality. For Sir, be pleaſed to know, that this great Queen doth give, as if the Gods had eſtabliſhed her to inrich all the knowing men in the world; and certainly ſhe has good reaſon for it to look upon them as her Subjects, ſince I am confident there is not one who does not reſpect her as if ſhe were his legitimate Queen; ſhe does not only give to thoſe who ask her, but unto thoſe who never pretend unto any thing, ſhe gives quickly ſhe gives much, ſhe gives with a good will, ſhe gives with joy, and liberallity is a virtue, which ſhe practiſeth in ſuch a Noble and Heroique manner, as ſhe never thinks ſhe gives too much. But the wonder of all is, that this virtue is no blind hood-wink't virtue, which beſtows without choice or diſcretion; but, on the contrary, ſhe gives only unto thoſe whom ſhe thinks do merit her gift, yet ſtill meaſuring them by the rule of her own generoſity, more then by the virtue of the receivers; much rather chooſing to give more than is deſerved, then not to give as much as her Quality, and liberal Inclinations prompts her unto. Moreover, this vertue of liberality, which is ſo proper unto Kings and Princes, is not the only vertue which ſhines in her, but alſo ſhe is exceedingly good, profoundly prudent, and exactly juſt, ſo juſt that ſhe will violate all her ſtrongeſt inclinations, rather than do the leaſt injuſtice to the meaneſt of her ſubjects; and if this vertue, which is the very Baſis of all other, do at any time tranſgreſs, it is only when clemency prompts her to pardon ſome Noble Delinquent; indeed ſhe knows ſo well how to mix the ſeverity of Juſtice with the mildneſs of clemency, that from theſe two vertues do flow a million of good effects, which makes her to be both feared and loved by all her people. Moreover, ſhe is able to give advice; ſhe is knowing in all affairs, and underſtands them ſo admirably well, that it is a hard matter to poſe her in any thing; ſhe never frequents any but magnificent Feaſts in her Court, and ſtately recreations; but the predominate paſſion of her ſoul is Love unto the Sciences, and ſhe may as well be called Queen of the Muſes, as Queen of Corinth; and indeed they do in all places pay her homage, in perpetual Elogies and Panegeriques; both in Verſe and Proſe the name of Cleobuline is celebrated in all Places of the World, and her glory is above any additions. But Sir, to omit any relations of her Government, ſince we have nothing to do with the Politiques at this time: Be pleaſed to know that there is a man in the ſame Court, whoſe name is Myrinthus; who is not originally a Corinthian, ſince his Grandfather was a Lacedemonian: This Myrinthus is a man of excellent parts; for he is not only Tall, Handſome, Fair, and of a good Garb, but he has as much Heart, and as much Spirit as any one can have: He had alſo this advantage, that his Grandfather and Father, having both of them very Noble Fortunes, both of them had the moſt honourable Imployments in the State: By this means Myrinthus ever [illegible] his firſt budding in the World, had much familiarity [illegible] with the Queen, and with all the men of higheſt Quality in Corinth: 'Tis true, Myrinthus was of a very conſiderable Rank in his Country; yet the truth is alſo, that Fortune carried him higher than his birth, but never higher than his virtue: Yet, Sir, he need not be looked upon as the only foundation of thoſe honours which I ſhall tell you he received, ſince I am very confident, that the Queen of Corinth had ſome reaſon to ſay, one never loves, but becauſe they cannot chooſe, and becauſe there is ſome compulſive power which forceth us, whether we will or no, to love and hate, without any help of our reaſon: But Sir, ſince in order unto my deſign I muſt diſcover a ſecret unto you which few know, a ſecret which doubtleſs the Queen of Corinth would not have you know; therefore I muſt tell you, that there is in our Court a Prince whoſe name is Baſilides, a man doubtleſs very amiable, both for the Qualities of his Perſon, for thoſe of his Wit, and thoſe of his Soul. Moreover Baſilides looked ſo near the Crown, that by the Law he is to ſucceed Cleobuline, if ſhe married not. This Prince had ever a moſt reverent and violent paſſion unto this Princeſs, but ſince ſhe made her ſelf feared as well as loved, the Rank ſhe kept, did enjoyn him ſilence; yet I know very well that the Queen was not ignorant of his paſſion, though he never told her of it, and I am ſure that if ſhe did not love him, it was not becauſe ſhe was ignorant of his Love, but becauſe her ſoul had a ſecret ingagement which ſhe her ſelf knew not of; For Sir, let me tell you, Cleobuline was born with a moſt ſtrong inclination unto Myrinthus: But that you may not wonder how I came to the knowledge of all theſe ſecret particulars, be pleaſed to know that Steſilea who dwelt at Corinth, of whom you heard at Sinope, and who married the Brother of Philiſta, ſhe, I ſay, was of confidence with the Queen a long time, and Philiſta being intimate with her, ſince her return from Corinth, I knew from her all theſe paſſages which I relate unto you. I know therefore, Sir (as I told you) that none can have a ſtronger inclination to love another, than Cleobuline ever had to love Myrinthus, and this affection was ſo bred in her from the Cradle, as ſhe perceived not the greatneſs of it until ſhe was a Queen: She knew before that the ſight of Myrinthus did pleaſe her more than the ſight of any other, that his company did more divert her, that in her eye he had a better Garb than any in the Court, that his cloaths did better become him, that he had a better Grace than any elſe, that his Spirit was more pleaſing, and that ſhe eſteemed him more than any ſhe knew, but ſhe thought all theſe to be pure effects of her reaſon, and of Myrinthus his merits, not thinking her inclination had any other ground: But the truth is, ſhe loved him, and knew it not; and ſhe went on ſo long in this error, that her flame could not be quenched when ſhe diſcovered it: As for Myrinthus, the vaſt diſtance between the Quality of this Princeſs and himſelf, did ſo limit his veneration of her virtues, as that it did not produce thoſe effects which perhaps it would have done, if Cleobulines quality had been equal unto his; for he knew very well, that in all reaſon he could not look upon her, but only with an eye of reſpect, and not with the leaſt thought of Love; he knew ſhe was the moſt accompliſhed Perſon upon earth, but this knowledge produced only admiration, and if he did bear any affection to her, it was only to her glory, and to do her ſervice, but not unto her perſon; yet was he very officious in rendring moſt exact reverence unto this Princeſs, becauſe being of a very ambitious temper, and knowing ſhe was to be Queen, he conceived that ſhe might advance his fortunes, and indeed he was not miſtaken, for after Periander died, Cleobuline conferred upon him one of the greateſt Offices in the State: yet ſhe did believe that in conferring it, he would execute the Office better than another, and that what ſhe did was conducible to her ſervice: But ſhe was not long in this ignorance of her own heart, for ſhe began preſently to conceive that ſhe was not her own Miſtreſs. Since Myrinthus had his Queen in high veneration, ſince he was obliged unto her, and ſince he expected much from her, doubtleſs he failed not in any thing of duty to her as the Queen of Corinth, yet ſhe confeſſed ſince unto Steſilea and Philiſta, that ſometimes, though, ſhe knew no reaſon for it, yet ſhe was not ſatisfied with his obſequiouſneſs, with his reſpects and ſervices, and that ſhe was vexed at him though ſhe did conceal it, and not being able to reach the cauſe, ſhe knew not whereof to complain.

Thus not knowing what her heart would have of Myrinthus, ſhe only knew that ſhe was not contented: But thought theſe diſorders did often take her, without any outward expreſſions of them, yet ſhe could not believe that ſhe was in love with Myrinthus, and ſhe had rather accuſe her ſelf of being phantaſtical, than of entertaining any ſuch paſſion as that in her heart; yet for all that, ſhe confeſſed, that ſhe had once ſome ſuſpitions of ſuch a thing, which ſhe rejected with a ſtrange violence; adding, that ſhe would not admit of any ſuch thoughts into her ſoul, which ſhe ſhould be obliged to combat withal, and which ſhe thought perhaps already that ſhe could not eaſily vanquiſh: So that deluding her ſelf, ſhe continued loving Myrinthus, and would not know it; ſhe never called her heart to give an account of its ſecreſies, as at other times ſhe uſed. So that in ſome ſort ſubmitting her reaſon unto the conduct of her paſſion, this illuſtrious heart was ſo engaged to love Myrinthus, that when it would have diſingaged it ſelf, it was not in its power. In the mean time Myrinthus was as happy as a man could be that was not in Love, for the Queen caſting a favourable eye upon him, all the Court courted him, and he taſted all the ſweets that ambition uſed to afford thoſe whoſe projects proſper. Myrinthus never asked any thing of the Queen which he obtained not, and ſhe often gave him when he did not ask, her ear was always ready to his deſires, all the friends of Myrinthus were ſure to find protection, and it may be ſaid, that he was infinitely happy and knew it not. Baſilides for his part, though he durſt never ſpeak a word of his paſſion unto the Queen, and he was not loved ſo well as he wiſhed, yet he was not very miſerable; for beſides his hopes that time and his ſervices might move her heart, he had this conſolation alſo to know, that if ever ſhe married, all reaſon and policy in the world would require ſhe ſhould marry him. So that contenting himſelf with that natural civility which this Princeſs uſed towards him, he lived in tranquility enough, his hopes of being hereafter loved, ſweetning his ſorrows for not being loved at the preſent. As for the Queen, it may be ſaid, that ſhe had neither Roſes nor Thorns in her love; for ſhe had neither the ſweetneſs to be loved, or almoſt to know that ſhe loved, nor was ſhe ſtung with that reſtleſs anguiſh which that paſſion often procures, ſince ſhe was neither angry, nor impatient, nor jealous, yet ſhe was not long in this ſerenity of ſoul, which kept her ignorant of her hearts ingagement, and ſhe ſoon perceived that Love is a moſt dangerous paſſion. But, Sir, to let you know how the Queen of Corinth came to know the ſtate of her own heart, be pleaſed to underſtand, Sir, that Baſilides had a Siſter named Philimena, who then was one of the greateſt Ornaments of the Court; not that her beauty was ſo exact, but becauſe ſhe had ſuch a ſweet agreement of features as was preferrable before beauty: Philimena was of a brown Complexion, yes, extreamly brown, ſhe was rather little than great, every part of her face was not regularly handſome by it ſelf, but being put together, ſhe was fair and infinitely charming, ſhe had bright, ſweet, and lively eyes, her mouth was infinitely handſome, her teeth were admirable, and had a plumpneſs which gave her an air of youth that did extreamly well become her: But above all theſe, ſhe had ſuch a kind of ſweet Gallantry in her perſon, as ſhe pleaſed all that ſaw her. Moreover, ſhe had an attractive Spirit, and ſuch a Spirit as was able to keep thoſe Conqueſts which her beauty made: You may well imagin, Sir, that Philimena having the honour to be the Queens Cozen, and being Miſtreſs of ſo much merit, that ſhe was often with her, and that there was no Feaſt in the Court whereat ſhe was not: So that by this means Myrinthus did ſee Philimena every day, either with the Queen, or at her own lodging, or in ſome other place. But at laſt, Sir, he ſaw her ſo often, that he ſaw her too often, for he fell moſt deſperately in Love with her: Since, as I told you, he was naturally ambitious, he never oppoſed a paſſion which had ſuch a Noble cauſe, nor ever went about to hide it, not being ſorry they ſhould report him to be in Love with the Siſter of that man, who in all likelihood was to marry the Queen; So that finding in one perſon a fit ſubject to ſatisfie his love and ambition both, he applied himſelf highly to Court Philimena; but the beſt conceit was, that he built all the happy ſucceſs of his deſign upon the Queens favour, never dreaming what thoughts ſhe had of him; yet he did not carry it at the firſt as pretending to marry her, but as a man, who preferred her before all the Court, and could not chuſe but love her: Since he thought it would avail him, that the Queen ſhould think him in love with Philimena, hoping that ſhe would further the buſineſs, he was as forward to make the Queen know it, as Philimena, knowing that Baſilides would not deny the Queen any favour, and ſo he thought the enjoyment of Philimena did depend as much upon Cleobuline, as upon Philimena her ſelf.

Myrinthus then having theſe thoughts, was extreamly diligent to make the Queen believe him as amorous as he was, and loſt no opportunity to perſwade her that he was not able to live without Philimena, he would ſometimes on ſet purpoſe, when Philimena was with the Queen, fail in thoſe reſpects which he owed unto Cleobuline, only to let her ſee the greatneſs of his affection to Philimena: You may imagin, Sir, how the Queen was troubled at this knowledge, I aſſure you it was ſo great, as now ſhe knew what ſhe was ignorant of before, for ſhe could never tell what was in her heart, until Myrinthus thus loved Philimena. But as ſoon as it appeared to be Love, there was no poſſibility of hiding this paſſion of her ſoul from her ſelf, and ſhe had enough to do to hide it from others; ſhe would not at firſt believe her own thoughts but did ſtrive to believe that the reaſon why the love of Myrinthus to Philimena did vex her, was becauſe his deſign was too raſh, and with too little reſpect unto her: Yet ſhe had no ſooner accuſed Myrinthus of raſhneſs, but ſhe found ſomething elſe in her heart, all her thoughts were in ſuch a ravelled diſorder, as ſhe was fain to examin them one after another, to know what it was. From whence proceeds (ſaid ſhe to her ſelf, and called all her thoughts to an account) this great turbulency in my heart, ſince Philimena conquered the heart of Myrinthus? What intereſt have I in the Conqueſt, that I ſhould deſire to oppoſe it? and what expect I from a man whom Fortune hath made ſo much my inferiour? I know not well what I would have (ſaid ſhe and chid her ſelf) but I know very well that I would not have him love Philimena: But can it be poſſible I ſhould love Myrinthus more than I thought I did? Myrinthus who is a thouſand degrees below me, Myrinthus who loves not me, nor, thanks be to the Fates, knows that I love him. No; fie, fie, Cleobuline is not capable of ſo much weakneſs, ſhe is too zealous an adorer of glory to love Myrinthus, though he ſhould infinitely love her.

At theſe words Cleobuline ſtopt, and was a while in examination of her ſelf; but not being able to be her own Judge, ſhe broke out into expreſſions again: However (ſaid ſhe and bluſht) this ſame Cleobuline who is ſuch a lover of glory, and who thought ſhe had not loved Myrinthus, cannot endure that he ſhould love Philimena, and finds ſomething in her heart which tells her, ſhe ſhould not be ſorry if he loved Cleobuline: But what's this I ſay (ſaid ſhe and reprehended her ſelf) am I in my wits? and can I approve of my own thoughts? No, no, I utterly diſclaim them if they be unworthy of my ſelf, I will magnanimouſly contend with my ſelf for my own glory; and ſince all the world commends me, I will not give them any cauſe to blame me: Surmount Cleobuline this puſilanimity which thou haſt diſcovered in thy heart; and never conſent that the Daughter of the wiſe Periander ſhould be capable of ſo much folly, nor that the Daughter of a great and valiant King ſhould be ſo poorly baſe. But is Love a voluntary thing? (ſaid this Princeſs to her ſelf.) Is it not a paſſion? And yet I argue as if one might love or hate, whom, and when, and how they pleaſe. Oh you moſt juſt Gods (cried ſhe out) I would what I ſay now were true! and that I could hate Myrinthus! 'Tis much better to be unjuſt than weak: Proclaim war againſt thy ſelf Cleobuline, and to make the conqueſt more eaſie, imagin, that Myrinthus hath done thee an injury, to reſpect thee as he hath done; and that he hath affronted thee by loving Philimena, that he was obliged to gueſs at thoſe thoughts which you had of him, and to anſwer them, and let him paſs for a perfidious and ungrateful man, who ſhould know that you loved him and he never love you: But alas, ſaid ſhe, how can I accuſe Myrinthus? He does not love me, 'tis true; but the reaſon is becauſe he thinks that he ought not to preſume to love me, if he had any ſuſpicion that I loved him, had he not then done me wrong? and had not good cauſe to be offended at him? of what then can I accuſe Myrinthus? can I accuſe him of any raſhneſs in loving Philimena, ſince I think him not worthy to look upon my ſelf? If I muſt find a cauſe, (ſaid ſhe) either in him or my ſelf to hate him, or at leaſt not to love him: Is it not cauſe enough, that he is the cauſe of that weakneſs whereof I accuſe my ſelf? Is it not a ſufficient cauſe to drive him from my heart, that he diſturbs the tranquility of my life? Baniſh him then couragiouſly Cleobuline from that place where he does not know he is, and reign over thy ſelf as Soveraignly as over thy Subjects. After this violent conteſt, this Princeſs thinking that ſhe did not love Myrinthus, becauſe ſhe deſired it, did what ſhe could to keep cloſe unto her reſolutions, and to gain that victory at one blow, and put her ſelf to the laſt teſt, ſhe appointed many days of Hunting, and other recreations, where Philimena and Myrinthus always were; ſhe gave the Ball unto Philimena very often, thinking to accuſtom her ſelf to ſee Myrinthus with Philimena, without any other Sorrow or Intereſt. Thus ſtriving to quench that flame which burned in her heart towards Myrinthus, ſhe augmented the flames of Myrinthus to Philimena, by giving him ſo many occaſions of ſeeing her; and ſhe her ſelf would ſometimes cauſe Philimena to anſwer the affection of Myrinthus; for indeed, ſince Cleobuline intended to conquer her ſelf, during theſe three days of feaſting and diverſions, ſhe expreſſed as much friendſhip unto Myrinthus, as he expreſſed love to Philimena: So that by this means the fair and young Philimena ſeeing her Lover in ſuch favour with the Queen, did alſo look upon him with a more gracious eye. Baſilides, who feared nothing more than to diſpleaſe Cleobuline, durſt not expreſs any miſlike that Myrinthus courted his Siſter. Thus the Queen, without any conqueſt of her ſelf, helped Myrinthus to conquer the heart of Philimena, who certainly eſteemed him with as much affection as her virtue would permit her.

But whilſt Cleobuline was contributing unto the felicity of Myrinthus, ſhe diſturbed her own; for the more ſhe ſaw him, the leſs able ſhe ſaw her ſelf to ceaſe loving him, and to endure he ſhould love Philimena, when ſhe ſaw him talk in a low voice unto that fair and young Lady, ſhe would change colour, her heart would beat a Lovers pace, and ſuſpecting that he was expreſſing his Affection, her ſoul ſuffered inexpreſſible tortures: If he at any time chanced to commend Philimena, ſhe was ſtrangely troubled, and if Philimena commended Myrinthus, Cleobuline could not hold from contradicting her, though ſhe eſteemed Myrinthus above all the world. In the mean time, though the Queen found a ſtrange rebellion in her heart, and that there was a continual contrariety betwixt her reaſon and her ſelf, yet ſhe did obſtinately ſtrive many days to vanquiſh her paſſion; but at laſt, ſhe found that all her attempts were in vain, and that the moſt ſhe could do was to hide it; and ſhe thought that alſo to be a piece of difficulty, unleſs ſhe ſhould hide her ſelf and all: And indeed Cleobuline not being able to reſtrain her ſelf, did feign ſickneſs, to the end ſhe might not ſee either Myrinthus or Philimena, hoping ſtill that this abſence from them might recover her liberty, yet this reſtraint and retreat had not that operation which ſhe hoped: For when Myrinthus was out of her ſight, ſhe imagined him always at the feet of Philimena: So that in lieu of releaſing her mind, ſhe did the more ingage it. It often chanced, that ſhe deſiring to know where Myrinthus was, ſhe would ſend ſeveral commands unto him concerning his office, and ſtill ſhe was told, that they found him with Philimena: So that her paſſion being blowed by the bellows of Jealouſie, in lieu of extinguiſhing, it flamed, and ſo ſcorched her, that ſhe would accuſe her own folly and weakneſs, for her torments. Since Steſilea was much in her favour, and more in her confidence than any one in the Court, ſhe would have her with her even at thoſe times when her torments did moſt torture her. In the mean time, ſince this Princeſs was naturally merry, Steſilea much wondred to ſee her ſo melancholy, not being able to imagin what the cauſe was, for ſhe was infinitely adored by all her people, peace and abundance did flow over all parts of her Dominions, all her Neighbour ſtates did highly eſteem her, her reputation reach'd over all the world, and there was nothing viſible which could moleſt her happineſs: So that Steſilea ſeeing ſuch an alteration in the Queen, reſolved to take the liberty of asking her the cauſe, at the firſt opportunity which offered it ſelf; and ſhe was not long before ſhe found it, for the Queen did her ſelf give it one night when they were alone together: Tell me truly, Steſilea, ſaid the Princeſs to her, Do you not deſire to know the cauſe of my melancholy? Did I as well know how to divine your Majeſtys thoughts, replied ſhe, as you do mine, I ſhould quickly ſatisfie my curioſity of knowing what it is that troubles you: The truth is, Madam, the condition wherein I ſee you makes me moſt ſadly inquiſitive, for knowing you to be wiſe and prudent, I am moſt confident you are not melancholy without a cauſe, and not knowing what it is which diſquiets you, I thought it the duty of my love to you, to be ſorry in your behalf, Cleobuline hearing Steſilea ſpeak ſo feelingly, and knowing that ſhe did love her with much tenderneſs, ſhe reſolved to unburthen her heart, ſince it was not poſſible that any one ſoul ſhould contain all thoſe reſentments which ſhe had of her own glory, of her love to Myrinthus, and of her jealouſie of Philimena: But ſince ſhe was ſtrangely aſhamed of her own weakneſs, ſhe drew the Tiſſue Curtain of that bed whereon ſhe ſate, to the end that darkneſs might help her in diſcovering unto Steſilea thoſe torments of her ſoul. After that, ſhe had prepared Steſilea with a long preamble, and Steſilea had promiſed inviolable fidelity, ſhe began to ſpeak as if ſhe had committed ſome horrid crime: You have good reaſon Steſilea (ſaid ſhe unto her) to ſay I am changed from what I was; for the truth is, I am not that woman whom all the world takes me to be; I know very well that I have the happineſs of a reputation high enough, and that all Princes do either eſteem me, or look upon me with an eye of envy, yet I muſt tell you, that if they knew my heart, they would look upon me either with an eye of pity, or elſe with an eye of ſcorn: O Madam (replied Steſilea) the laſt of theſe can never be: Yes, replied the Queen, ſooner then the firſt, if my condition were but known: But Steſilea, the greateſt comfort of my misfortune is, that I hope none will ever know it, and that though I tell it unto you, yet it will ſleep in eternal oblivion. Certainly, Madam, you may be confident, anſwered Steſilea, that I will never reveal any ſecret which you ſhall honour me with the participation of; therefore I beſeech your Majeſty to tell me what it is which diſquiets you, that I may endeavour a remedy. As ſoon as I offer to open my mouth, replied Cleobuline, to tell you the cauſe of my miſery, anger and ſhame ſhuts it again: I cannot find words to expreſs my thoughts, and I do find ſuch a confuſion in all my thoughts, that I can give no order unto my words; one while I would deſire you to excuſe my folly, before I acquaint you what it is; ſometimes I have a deſire to tell what the matter is, and preſently after I alter my mind, and reſolve to tell you nothing at all; therefore my dear Steſilea, if you can gueſs what the cauſe of my grief is; But hold (ſaid ſhe and reprehended her ſelf) I would not have you gueſs, and though you have ſome ſuch ſuſpition, I conjure you not to tell it, for if you ſhould gueſs it, I ſhould believe all the world might do the like, and ſo I ſhould be the moſt miſerable Princeſs upon earth. Since Steſilea naturally had a paſſionate ſoul, ſhe knew by the manner of the Queens diſcourſe, that love was the cauſe of her ſorrows, but yet ſhe could not imagin with whom it ſhould be that ſhe was in Love: but very ſweetly replied, that ſince ſhe deſired to know no farther than ſhe was pleaſed to allow her, ſhe would not dive deeper into the buſineſs than her Majeſty pleaſed: Though I am perſwaded, (ſaid ſhe) that one may impart all things unto one that is faithful: But Madam, (ſaid ſhe purpoſely to ſcrue out the ſecret) what can it be that is ſo difficult to be diſcovered? All the world knows all your actions to be innocent and moſt illuſtrious, and if you be culpable in any thing, certainly there is none that can teſtifie againſt you but your ſelf, and that perhaps for entertaining ſome thoughts which were too high: Oh Steſilea, replied the Queen, ambition is no part of my crime, were I as free from all other paſſions as from that, my ſoul would be at more tranquility; but ſince I muſt tell you that which I cannot conceal, know Steſilea, that there is one in the world, who whether I will or no, hath ſuch a ſhare in my heart, as that I cannot hate him, though I would, and though I have a ſtrange deſire unto it: I thought (replied Steſilea) that your Majeſty had ſome horrid deſign to ſubvert all the Laws of your Dominions, to begin ſome unjuſt War, and to eſtabliſh ſome Tyrannical Government, ſince you did ſo highly accuſe your ſelf; but for ought I ſee you are culpable of nothing, unleſs in that you will not permit one to adore you, or in that you have not hated ſome illuſtrious Slave, who doubtleſs doth love and adore you with a moſt reverent paſſion: Ah Steſilea, ſaid Cleobuline, my fate is worſe than you imagin it, and ſince I muſt diſcover the very root of my heart unto you, know, that I love one who knows it not, and one who loves another, yet ſuch is the violence of my Love, that I cannot chuſe but love him, nor can I endure he ſhould love another, though I would not have him know I love him, nor that he ſhould ever tell me that he loves me, though he did; I pray therefore judge Steſilea, whether my condition be not deplorable; and whether I have not good reaſon to be much aſhamed of my weakneſs. Since I cannot condemn your Majeſty (replied Steſilea) unleſs I ſhould condemn my ſelf, I beſeech you give me leave to tell you, that I cannot accuſe you at all, for ſince I know you are not ignorant of my cruel diſaſter at Jaliſſa, where I fell in love with a man, who made me the confident of his affection unto another, I thought good then to accuſe and condemn my ſelf as your Majeſty doth: But I moſt humbly beſeech you Madam, who is this happy man that hath made this illuſtrious Conqueſt? This Conqueror replied Cleobuline, is the Slave of Philimena: Judge therefore Steſilea, if I have not good reaſon to be aſhamed, for though I know you are culpable of the ſame crime that I am, yet I cannot excuſe my ſelf, and to ſay the truth, there is ſome difference betwixt you and me, for he whom you loved was your equal, and you were not obliged to render an accompt of your actions unto any but your ſelf: But Steſilea, I muſt render an accompt of mine unto all the world, I have a tranſcendant glory to preſerve, and I prefer that glory above my life; yet I love one of my Subjects above my ſelf, and which is worſe, I love him, and am not loved, but ſees him deſperately in love with another; had I ſo much happineſs as to be ſo blinded by my paſſion, that I could think my ſelf in no fault, I ſhould be leſs miſerable, and more excuſeable; but to my torment, the Gods have left me ſo much reaſon as to ſee my own weakneſs, and yet have not left me power enough to ſurmount it. But Madam, replied Steſilea, ſilea, to juſtifie you by your own words, it is not ſufficient to ſtop all accuſations, that you have done all you were able to ſubdue the paſſion of your ſoul? For, truly, Madam, I cannot conceive that vertue conſiſts in having no paſſions, Nature gives them unto all, and they can never be totally ſubdued but by death; I am confidently perſwaded, that ſo theſe paſſions prompt us not unto any thing which is againſt true glory, we are not culpable, though we cannot ſubdue them; therefore Madam, in lieu of accuſing you, as you do your ſelf, you ought to be commended, for ſtriving ſo couragiouſly againſt that which is the moſt powerful of all paſſions; and you ought to conſider with a little more tranquility, which way you may vanquiſh them, or render them leſs intollerable. As for vanquiſhing them, replied the Queen, I will never hope for it, though I am reſolved to ſtrive as long as I live; and as for making them leſs intollerable, the way is very difficult to be found. Moreover, Steſilea, there is one thing which doth extreamly torment me, for I am perſwaded that if Myrinthus knew my thoughts of him, they would ſtagger his fidelity unto Philimena; and ſometimes again I have thoughts, that the Crown I wear keeps him from loving me: I believe I have an infallible way to make him break off with Philimena, but it is a way I will never take, for there is nothing in the world I fear more, than that Myrinthus ſhould know I love him: Then Madam, ſaid Steſilea, What will content you? That I had never loved Myrinthus, replied ſhe: For to talk of ceaſing from loving him, is to talk of a thing impoſſible, neither my heart nor by reaſon will ever conſent unto it: Then Madam, replied Steſilea, I cannot eaſily think you can be in ſuch a miſerable condition, but you may find out ways to be happy: Truly Steſilea, replied Cleobuline the ſtate of my fortune is ſuch, that I know no way to happineſs, but only to wiſh it: For ſince the fate of Myrinthus is not fit to be a King, I cannot be any thing elſe but a lump of misfortunes, yet I do conceive ſomething that would render me ſomething leſs miſerable than I am: I beſeech you Madam, ſaid Steſilea, what is it that will be any eaſe unto your miſery? I would have Myrinthus (ſaid ſhe) not to love Philimena, but would have him love me, but love me without ever telling me of it, or without ever knowing that I love him, and I would have all the world ignorant of that paſſion which is in our ſouls: I pray judge then Steſilea, whether there be any poſſibility of my happineſs, truly I can never pretend unto ſo much as to hope it, all that I wiſh is, that Myrinthus did not love Philimena; yet truly I have no ſooner told you my wiſh, but ſhame moves me to alter my opinion, for I feel my love to Myrinthus converts it ſelf into hatred againſt my ſelf, and that my jealouſie of Philimena turns fury againſt my own reaſon; therefore Steſilea, I will pauſe a while until ſecond thoughts have better digeſted my firſt, and until I am better reſolved upon what I would have you do: This is a moſt certain and infallible Maxim which is for ever unalterable, that I will never do any thing that ſhall be oppoſite unto glory, and that Myrinthus ſhall never know that I love him. After this, Steſilea had a long conference with Cleobuline, at the concluſion of which nothing was reſolved upon; yet this Queen found ſome eaſe in her ſpirits, ſince ſhe had diſcharged her heart unto Steſilea, whoſe tender and paſſionate ſoul was very fit to be a confident of ſuch a Noble paſſion, and ever ſince ſhe was inſeparable from the Queen, who could not live without her: So that according to the cuſtom of all Courts, which is, that as ſoon as any is admitted into the favour of the Kings or Queens, they are courted by all the Court: So Steſilea by her new admittance into the Queens favour, was loadened with civilities and addreſſes: Baſilides himſelf was very compliant with her, and among the reſt Myrinthus, as powerful as he was with the Queen, yet courted the friendſhip of Steſilea, to the end ſhe might procure him that Queens conſent unto his deſign of marrying Philimena; ſo that by this means ſhe was upon very good terms with Myrinthus, who not knowing the cauſe of this new favour, did attribute it as all the reſt of the Court did, unto the merit of Steſilea, and unto the recommendation of the Princeſs Eumetis; with whom ſhe ſpent all the beginning of her life. Thus Myrinthus not knowing the true cauſe of thoſe many favours wherewith the Queen honoured Steſilea, did court her favour, in hopes of her doing him a good office by favouring his deſign. Moreover, in order unto this deſign, he became more obſequious, more exact, more reſpectful, and more compliant about the Queen; but the more regularly he demeaned himſelf, the more did her love and her jealouſie both begin to flame; the more obſequious he was the more ſhe thought him amiable; but alſo conſidering that his reaſon for being ſo officious about her was, only becauſe he was every day more in love with Philimena, a ſpiteful jealouſie did ſo rouze her heart, as ſhe fancied as much pleaſure in hindering Myrinthus from marrying Philimena, as this Lover did in enjoying her. So that conſulting about it one day with Steſilea, ſhe both prayed her, and conjured her to contribute all her endeavours unto the breaking off of this match: I know well (ſaid ſhe unto her) that I can do it my ſelf by virtue of my Soveraign authority, but there is two ſtrong reaſons which reſtrain me: The firſt is, becauſe I am extreamly afraid that Myrinthus would gueſs at the cauſe, and therefore I will not run that hazard: The ſecond is, (if I could not do it without a bluſh) becauſe I would not have Myrinthus hate me, as doubtleſs he would, if he ſhould know it to be I who broke off his marriage; therefore Steſilea, I conjure you to imploy all your wits to make him alter his opinion of Philimena, or at leaſt to keep him from marrying her; not that I do intend that Myrinthus ſhall ever know I love him, though you ſhould effect my deſired project; but it is ſo great a pleaſure unto any one who is in love, to quaſh any paſſion that ſhall oppoſe their own, as I would do any thing in the World to ſee Myrinthus out of love with Philimena: I profeſs Steſilea (ſaid ſhe) if you can drive her out of the heart of Myrinthus, you ſhall have as great a ſhare in my heart almoſt as he hath; for then I imagin I ſhall with leſs pain hide that paſſion which thus rants it in my heart, I ſhall more eaſily vanquiſh it, or at the leaſt ſhall love him leſs.

Steſilea hearing Cleobuline expreſs her ſelf ſo earneſtly, did promiſe all her endeavours for her ſatisfaction, and indeed ſhe omitted no opportunity of tranſacting it: Since ſhe knew Myrinthus to be very ambitious, ſhe undertook one day to perſwade him, that to marry ſo ſoon was the only way to choak all his ambitious thoughts, ſince Fortune is always more favourable unto thoſe who are not married, then unto thoſe who are: Afterwards, ſhe told him he was undiſcreet, in thinking of any alliance with a Prince whom the Queen loved not, and that if he would take her counſel, ſhe would adviſe him to devote himſelf inſeparably to the Queen, without any thoughts of any other intereſt. But ſince Myrinthus was chained in the Fetters of Love, the policy of Steſilea did not reliſh; and though he was very ambitious, yet he could not fear what ſhe deſired he ſhould; therefore he told her, that he ſhould not recede from the intereſts of the Queen by marrying Philimena; but on the contrary, ſhould more adhere unto them, ſince ſhe was the Siſter of a Man, who muſt almoſt of neceſſity (if ever the Queen marry) marry her: So that Steſilea ſeeing ſhe could not work upon the ſpirit of Myrinthus, ſeemed to yield unto his opinion, to the end he might ſtill think her one of his friends: And ſhe plotted another ſtratagem to ruine his paſſion, which was to intimate unto Philimena by a friend of hers, who was very intimate with her, that ſhe did her ſelf the greateſt wrong in the world, by thinking to marry Myrinthus, who though indeed he was a very accompliſhed man, yet was of too inferiour quality for her. But ſince Philimena's ſoul was more ſenſible of Myrinthus his merits, than of any ambition, this counſel was given in vain: So that Steſilea ſeeing ſhe could no way quench theſe flames of affection in either of them, yet ſhe reſolved to hinder their marriage, and thought ſhe had found an excellent way for it. I told you already, Sir, that Baſilides did very much court the friendſhip of Steſilea, to the end ſhe might do ſome good offices to the Queen, of whom he extreamly doted. And I alſo told you, that the reaſon why he did not thwart the affection of Myrinthus to Philimena, was becauſe he feared to incenſe the Queen, by croſſing the man that was ſo much in favour with her: Now I muſt tell you, Sir, that Steſilea could not deviſe any better way to choak the deſigns of Myrinthus, than by Baſilides: So that talking one day with him, ſhe ordered her diſcourſe ſo handſomly, that ſhe began to talk of Myrinthus, and his love to Philimena na. After this, Steſilea did ſo prepare his Spirit, that ſhe engaged him unto her deſires, and moved him to ask her what the Queen thought of that buſineſs. Steſilea finding that Baſilides was brought unto her own bow, ſhe went on as handſomly as ſhe begun: At firſt ſhe told him, that ſhe did not very well know the Queens thoughts, and that if ſhe did, ſhe ought not to tell them; afterwards yielding by degrees unto the requeſt of Baſilides, ſhe made him ſwear a thouſand oaths to be faithful unto her: After that ſhe told him, how ſhe knew certainly that this marrying would diſpleaſe the Queen, and that the Queen wiſhed with all her heart it were broken off, without her being ſeen in it. Alas, Steſilea (ſaid Baſilides to her) the matter had never gone ſo far, If I had not feared the Queens diſpleaſure in oppoſing it: But ſince you aſſure me, that ſhe doth not approve of this marriage, and that I ſhall not incur her diſfavour by breaking it off, it ſhall be quickly quaſhed.

Steſilea hearing Baſilides ſpeak with ſo much violence, feared leſt ſome quarrel ſhould be betwixt Myrinthus and him; therefore to prevent any ſuch diſaſter, ſhe told him further, that he ſhould not by any means croſs theſe deſigns with a noiſe, becauſe the Queen would not take it well that Myrinthus ſhould be openly affronted, but that his beſt courſe would be to make uſe of the Princeſs his Mother to command Philimena from any thoughts of Myrinthus, and to treat him as a man whom ſhe would never marry. Baſilides followed Steſilea's counſel with a thouſand thanks, not thinking that in breaking off the marriage of Myrinthus, he tranſacted againſt himſelf. In the mean time, Steſilea's ſtratagem was not long before it took effect, for Baſilides having ſet on the Princeſs his Mother, Philimena was put into a ſtrange perplexity: Since ſhe did moſt tenderly affect Myrinthus, ſhe could not upon any terms reſolve to treat him ill. Alſo being exceedingly tender of her glory, ſhe was very loath to diſobey the commands of a Mother: So that taking the middle way, and that ſhe might neither loſe Myrinthus, nor diſobey the Princeſs her Mother, ſhe reſolved to acquiant him with the commands which was upon her: At firſt ſhe had much ado to reſolve upon this courſe, knowing very ry well that ſhe could not do it, without being very obliging towards him: But at laſt, love being predominate, ſhe reſolved to tell him, and to deſire him he would ſee her no more; and all this in ſuch obliging language, as ſhe had not ingaged him ſo much to ſee her, as if ſhe had abſolutely commanded it; for he made a thouſand vows that he would ſee her in ſpite of all the world, and told her peremptorily, that he would love her; yet Philimena would not upon any terms let him ſee her at her own lodging; but in lieu thereof they agreed to ſee each other at the Queens. Thus Steſilea in doing his Princeſs a good office one way, did her an ill one another way, for ſhe helped her unto the object which of all the world ſhe leaſt deſired to ſee, to wit, Myrinthus often with Philimena: But afterwards, Baſilides being aſſured by Steſilea, that the Queen deſired that the marriage might be broken off, he obliged the Princeſs his Mother to carry Philimena into the Country, ſo that this abſence was an intolerable torment upon Myrinthus, yet he was not a ſufferer by himſelf, and perhaps this is the firſt time that ever the abſence of a Rival cauſed ſorrow; yet certainly Cleobuline could not look upon Myrinthus ſo ſad for the abſence of Philimena, without extream anger and ſorrow; one paſſage happened which was a great addition to her perplexities: Be pleaſed to know, Sir, that ſhe being obliged to make a great Feaſt for the entertainment of ſome Ambaſſadors which came to her Court, Myrinthus appeared in ſuch a negligent manner, as if he were neither to ſee, or be ſeen by any, he thinking that ſince Philimena was not there, it was no matter for dreſſing himſelf; and knowing that ſhe had a friend in Court who would ſend her word of every paſſage, he hoped that this his negligence would be recompenced another way, not fearing at all that the Queen would intereſt her ſelf in it. In the mean time, this trivial paſſage do ſo incenſe her ſorrows, as ſometimes ſhe was in hopes not to love him any longer; but this hope was quickly quaſht. Did ever any ſee ſuch an odd adventure? (ſaid ſhe one night unto Steſilea) all that I ever do to cure my ſelf, or to comfort me, doth more augment my miſery: The abſence of Philimena, from which I hoped for ſuch ſweetneſs neſs, cauſeth nothing but bitterneſs; and I had rather ſee Philimena, than ſee that ſorrow for her in the face of Myrinthus. Is it poſſible I ſhould be capable of ſuch phantaſtical thoughts? I am confident, that thoſe who ſee me enter into my Cloſet ſo often by my ſelf, to think that I am meditating upon ſome grand deſigns, and that the good of the State is all my thoughts. Yet weak woman, that I am buſied only in thinking whether Myrinthus be ſad or pleaſant, whether Myrinthus be handſome or negligent in his cloaths. Ah Cleobuline, what thoughts are theſe? Call to memory what heretofore thou waſt. Read over all the Elogies that were preſented to thee, to the end they may put thee in mind of deſerving them, and be unto thy ſelf the ſame thou ſeemeſt to be unto others. Thou art talked on over all the world, as if thou wert a Lover of virtue and glory, and yet thou loveſt Myrinthus who loves not thee, though thou knoweſt very well, that thou canſt not do it without doing that which is unworthy of thy quality. Thou loveſt Myrinthus, I ſay, who loves none but Philimena, and who ought not to enjoy thy affection, though he did love thee as well as he loves her. Be thy own Judge, Cleobuline, what baſeneſs of ſoul it is to do as thou doſt. Conſider ſeriouſly with thy ſelf, what abundance of folly it is to be a Slave unto thy own unruly paſſions. Remember how the wiſe Periander thy Father hath told thee a thouſand and a thouſand times, that tranquility of mind was the greateſt goodneſs; that this tranquility of mind was in the ſoul, like health to the body, without which one could not enjoy any manner of pleaſure. Recall thy memory, and think how he told thee, that the love of glory was the only innocent paſſion; quench thoſe flames of affection which is in thy ſoul unto Myrinthus; conſider that thy whole reſt and glory conſiſts in conquering thy ſelf, and thy crime does lie cloſe in the ſecret corners of thy ſoul, yet it will procure thee as much ſhame as if it were publick. How canſt thou without a bluſh receive thoſe commendations which are given thee, ſince thou knoweſt thy ſelf unworthy of them? How canſt thou enjoy the eſteem of others, when thou doſt not eſteem thy ſelf? Conſider, Cleobuline, conſider ſeriouſly, that if Myrinthus rinthus whom thou thus adoreſt, and ſo tenderly loves, did but know of thy puſilanimous affection to him, he would eſteem thee leſs, and perhaps ſcorn thee; never be ſo ſimple as to think, that if he knew of thy affection to him, he would then quit Philimena; but be confident on the contrary, that he would hate thee. It ſeems Madam, (ſays Steſilea and interrupted her) that love is a paſſion which you are not acquainted with, ſince you think to vanquiſh it by reaſon or violence. Alas, my dear Steſilea (ſaid ſhe unto her) with what other arms would you have me vanquiſh my ſelf? Would you have me ſubmit and render my ſelf without any reſiſtance? No Madam (replied Steſilea) but in wiſhing you to ruine your paſſion, I would not have you ruine your ſelf. But Steſilea, replied ſhe, what would you have a Perſon do, whoſe heart is as full of ſhame as love, as full of jealouſie as ſhame, and as full of anger as jealouſie? What would you have a Princeſs do, who has a thouſand oppoſite thoughts in her ſoul? Who would ſometimes always ſee Myrinthus, and ſometimes again never ſee him; who ſometimes wiſheth he knew how ſhe loves him, and who in a minute after believes that ſhe ſhould die for ſhame if he did know it; who hates Philimena with as much violence as ſhe loves Myrinthus, and who often hates her ſelf, even unto death? Sometimes, my dear Steſilea, all the extraordinary paſſages in Hiſtory cauſed by Love comes into my memory. I find ſome Kings of Egypt, who have made Slaves Queens; and I think I have read of ſome Queens who have made Slaves Kings; From hence my reaſon wandered, and looked upon Myrinthus as one of Noble Quality and extraordinary merit. I thought his hand ſtrong enough to hold up the weight of a Scepter, and that he who reigns in my heart might well reign in my Kingdoms. But after theſe fond and unworthy imaginations had roven in my mind, my reaſon began to rouze, and diſperſe thoſe muddy Clouds, which obſcured it, and made me ſo abhorr my own thoughts, that I hated both her who entertained them, and him alſo who was the ſubject of them; judge then Steſilea, what a reſtleſs life I live; and the greateſt horror of all is, that in the concluſion of all my raptures, I ſtill find Myrinthus innocent, and Myrinthus worthy of my eſteem: For truly he is a man of courage, ſpirit, and fidelity, and if I could not look upon him as my ſubject, I had all the reaſons in the world to be contented with him, yet I complain, and know not why I accuſe and juſtifie him, I excuſe and condemn my ſelf all at once; yet there is always in my heart ſuch a deſire of glory, as often moves me, maugre the violence of my paſſion, to render thanks unto the Gods that Myrinthus loves me not, though this be the thing which moſt of any thing upon earth grieves me. But I had no ſooner rendred thanks unto them for ſuch a cruel favour, than I was ready to petition, that they would inſpire the heart of Myrinthus with the ſame paſſion that they did mine. Thus being toſt from one turbulent thought unto another, I found not reſt in any. After all theſe violent expreſſions, the Queen was ſilent: At laſt ſhe told Steſilea, that ſhe thought it ſo unworthy a thing to take ſo much fruitleſs pains in breaking off the Marriage of Myrinthus, as ſhe would meddle no further in it, but was reſolv'd to leave it to a hazard a while: For I am perſwaded (ſaid ſhe) that I do but augment the love of Myrinthus by all my obſtacles.

This reſolution being pitched upon, Steſilea ceaſed her negotiations. In the mean while Myrinthus, whoſe paſſion would never let him reſt, endeavoured to gain Baſilides, who indeed was perſwaded by one of his Friends, that for the advancement of his deſigns upon the Queen, it extremely concerned him not to incenſe Myrinthus, who was ſo gracious with her; but yet he was at a ſtand in the buſineſs, for he knew by Steſilea that the Queen did not approve of his deſign to marry Philimena; yet he himſelf knew, that one could not be more in her favour than he was, and therefore he thought it concerned him to link him unto his intereſts: So endeavouring not to appear in conſenting unto a marriage which the Queen diſliked, and not to hinder Myrinthus, he reſolved to truſt him, and to tell him upon what reaſons he oppoſed his deſign, not caring to ſacrifice his Siſter unto his Love. After the place where they might talk in ſecret was appointed, Baſilides told Myrinthus, that the reaſon why he oppoſed his affection was, becauſe Steſilia aſſured him that the Queen did not approve of it: After which, linking their intereſts together, Myrinthus promiſed Baſilides to ſerve him in all things that he was able, and Baſilides promiſed Myrinthus not to oppoſe him any more, provided he got the Queens approbation. In the mean while, Baſilides, to begin his favours, cauſed Philimena to return unto Corinth, upon ſome ſlight colour of the buſineſs. But as the grief which the Queen ſaw in the countenance of Myrinthus during Philimena's abſence did much perplex her; ſo the joys which ſhe ſaw in him at her return, did drive her into abſolute deſpair.

Yet for all this, the ſatisfaction of Myrinthus was not over-full of tranquility, for now knowing that the Queen was not ignorant of his deſign, he found it more difficult to bring it to paſs, than when he thought Baſilides only did oppoſe him: It was in vain to ſearch out the cauſe, for he ſaw he was as much in her favour as ever; and he did not ſo much as ever ſuſpect, that ſhe thwarted his paſſion, only becauſe he was too deep in her heart; yet he thought it his beſt courſe to ſeem as if he were ignorant of her diſapproving of his paſſion; and he thought alſo, that if he had ſo much confident boldneſs as to ask her favour unto his deſign, that perhaps ſhe would not deny it. Thus after he had well conſulted upon the matter with Baſilides and with Philimena, it was reſolved that he ſhould take that courſe, and a very favourable opportunity did offer it ſelf, ſince Myrinthus had done a very conſiderable piece of ſervice to the Queen, in negotiating with Ambaſſadors from Lacedemonia, who were then at Corinth, which he tranſacted with ſo much wiſdom and ſpirit, that it may well be ſaid he prevented a great and dangerous War. Myrinthus ſpoke not a word of his deſign unto Steſilea, for ſince ſhe was not ſo open-breſted to him as Baſilides, he had no mind to ſpeak unto her of it, leſt ſhe ſhould diſſwade him, or elſe by her telling Cleobuline of it, ſhe might have more cauſe to deny him, by giving time to ſtudy her reaſons for not conſenting unto his deſires. After he had well thought upon it, he went one morning to the Queen at ſuch an hour, when he knew he might have the conveniency of talking with her, and he went with abundance of hopes to ſpeed well; for when he remembred what honours he had received from this Princeſs, the great offices ſhe had given him, and all things ſhe had done for him, it could not ſink into his belief, that ſhe would deny him the only thing which crowned all his felicities; therefore he reſolved that if he found any difficulty in obtaining his deſires, then to aggravate his affection unto Philimena in ſuch a manner unto Cleobuline, that ſhe ſhould ſee he could not live without her. Myrinthus then having thus reſolved upon the matter, and being come unto the Queen, he behaved himſelf as he was wont, when he had buſineſs of importance to talk on: So that Cleobuline gave him the opportunity of talking with her in private, without the leaſt ſuſpition of the truth, imagining he would tell her ſomething which related unto his Office; but ſhe wondered, when ſhe knew by the very firſt words of Myrinthus that ſhe was miſtaken: Did I not know Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that I have the honour to be known very well unto your Majeſty, I ſhould have cauſe to fear, that in lieu of granting me a moſt humble Petition, which I intend to preſent unto you, that you ſhould accuſe me of raſhneſs, and of extream ambition. After all that I have done for you Myrinthus, replied ſhe, I have very little reaſon to accuſe you of raſhneſs; and I muſt confeſs, I cannot underſtand what you can deſire of me, which may move me to think you ambitious. Yet Madam I am ſtrangely afraid your Majeſty ſhould miſtake one paſſion for another, and that I having an intention to beg your Majeſty's leave to love Philimena, and to protect me againſt Baſilides, you ſhould think me not contented with your benefits, but that I ſhould draw others upon my ſelf by this illuſtrious alliance: But Madam, I muſt proteſt, that ambition is not the cauſe of my boldneſs; and if I had only that paſſion in my ſoul, I ſhould certainly be the happieſt man alive: For indeed Madam, you have honoured me with ſo many Offices, and put me upon ſuch Glorious Imployments, that I know not how to wiſh for any greater: But Madam, if your Majeſty will be pleaſed to let me open my heart, to the end I may excuſe my boldneſs, I ſhall tell you, that Love is the tyrannical paſſion of my ſoul, which moves me to Petition your Majeſty with abundance of earneſtneſs to grant my deſire. If you had been only ambitious, (replied Cleobuline and bluſht) you ſhould ſooner obtain your deſires; for ſince I am as well able to ſatisfie the guſts of that paſſion, as you can deſire them, I ſhould perhaps continue on my favours to you; but to intereſt me in matters of Love, and ſuch a Love as yours, this Myrinthus is a thing which I cannot meddle in: Many reaſons, beſt known unto my ſelf, which I cannot impart unto you, makes me diſlike your deſired Marriage, yet not that I think you unworthy of Philimena: For to teſtifie unto you (added ſhe) being tranſported with raptures of Love) that I do not deny my aſſent out of any diſadvantageous thoughts of you, I do confer upon you the beſt Office in my Dominions, which lately became vacant. Alas Madam, replied Myrinthus, rather command me to ſurrender all thoſe honours you have formerly conferred upon me, than deny me Philimena. Since Love is often a fading paſſion, replied ſhe, and ſince ambition on the contrary, is a paſſion which follows thoſe who are once tainted with it, even unto death; when the Guſts of your Love is a little blown over, you will be glad I ſatisfied your ambition. I beſeech you Madam, replied Myrinthus, judge not of me according unto the common Rules of others; and believe that I am more Amorous than Ambitious, and ever ſhall be ſo. Since that belief will not be advantagious unto you, anſwered the Queen, I will not entertain it, but will continue in the ſame opinion I was. I know very well Madam, replied Myrinthus, that you may juſtly deny me all things, and I cannot juſtly complain: But ſince the paſſion which reigns in me is not accuſtomed to acknowledge any Soveraignty unto reaſon, I cannot chuſe but tell your Majeſty, that it is ſomething ſtrange you ſhould deny me this favour which I do ask of you, after conferring ſo many favours upon me which I never asked, all which are nothing to me without this: Yes Madam (ſaid Myrinthus, being tranſported with the violence of his Love) Philimena is ſo eſſentially neceſſary unto the felicity of my life, that I cannot live without ſome hopes of enjoying her: As for hopes (replied Cleobuline with extream grief and anger) I will not take it from you, for ſome men will often hope againſt all manner of probability, but as for Philimena, I will never permit it; and if you marry her, it ſhall be without my conſent: I know very well, ſaid ſhe, that after ſo much goodneſs as I have formerly extended towards you, it may ſeem ſomething ſtrange I ſhould deny you a thing which you ſo earneſtly deſire, and deny it without giving you any reaſon for my denial: But know Myrinthus, that this reaſon is of ſuch a nature, that I cannot tell it; yet it is ſo ſtrange a reaſon, that it is invincible; and if you did know it, you would confeſs, that if you were in my room, you would do the like: And I aſſure you, it will not be a greater difficulty for you to caſt off Philimena, than for me to conſent that you ſhould ever think on her; therefore Myrinthus ſolicite me no more in the matter, for all will be in vain: Let it ſuffice, that of two paſſions, I ſhall ſatisfie that which is uſed to be moſt difficult to content; and if you will be happy, overcome the other couragiouſly. Alas Madam (ſaid Myrinthus and ſighed) it ſeems your Majeſty is only a lover of glory and vertue, ſince you think it ſuch an eaſie matter to drive out of my heart a hot-burning paſſion which keeps a moſt violent poſſeſſion. No, no, Philimena will not out ſo eaſily: Doubtleſs I may reſolve not to marry her and die, but I cannot leave loving her and live; therefore Madam, it is in your choice, whether you will give me death or Philimena. The reverent duty which I owe your Majeſty, can go no further: If you doom me to death, I will endeavour to receive it without murmur, but if you grant me life and Philimena, what would I not do to teſtifie my acknowledgments? Conſider Madam, I beſeech you, that your laſt words will be a ſentence either of life or death unto a man whom you have ſo much eſteemed, as to honour him with abundance of favours and benefits: Conſider, I ſay, that if you permit me to enjoy Philimena, I ſhall ſerve you all the reſt of my life with unutterable zeal: And conſider alſo, that if you forbid the bains, thoſe cruel words will be poyſon; which paſſing from your mouth into my ears, will paſs from my ears unto my heart, and there moſt infalliby will be my death; a death the moſt ſevere and tormentive in the world, ſince pronounced by the greateſt Queen upon the earth, and whom I hold in ſuch a reverent eſteem; for the moſt certain truth is Madam, that I have been as zealouſly devoted unto your glory, as unto Philimena's; and I do proteſt, that I am as faithful a ſubject unto you, as I am a faithful Lover unto her: Then yield obedience, replied Cleobuline, unto thoſe orders which I command, and obey them willingly: I wiſh unto the Heavens Madam, that I could, replied he, but ſince I cannot unleſs I die, I beſeech you command them no more; let it ſuffice I wiſh that I loved Philimena leſs; and believe it I moſt humbly beſeech you, that if I were able to quench thoſe flames which offend you, I ſhould moſt joyfully do it, knowing very well, that a Princeſs whoſe heart is ſenſible only of glory, would the more eſteem me, if mine were not ſo ſenſible of Love: But the caſe is unalterable with me Madam, 'tis you muſt pronounce the fatal words of life or death: Live then (ſaid Cleobuline unto him, ſcarce knowing what ſhe ſaid) but live without Philimena, unleſs you will both live and die in my diſpleaſure: I will live Madam if I can, replied he, ſince you command it; but ſince I am confident that I cannot, I ſhall die in my ſorrows that I cannot know why I die; but I ſhall die with this ſatisfaction, that I ſhall die the moſt faithful, though the moſt unfortunate of all your Subjects. After this, Myrinthus made a moſt low and reverent Congee unto the Queen, with ſuch a ſad and drooping Countenance, that any other than a Lover would would have pitied him. No ſooner was Myrinthus gone out of the Queens Cloſet, but Steſilea entred, and ſhe was no ſooner entred, but Cleobuline commanded that none elſe ſhould enter; and then ſhe related unto her all the paſſages between Myrinthus and her ſelf, and that with ſo much agitation of ſpirits, that the paſſion of her ſoul was very diſcernable: Did you know, ſaid ſhe unto her, with what zealous earneſtneſs Myrinthus asked leave to marry Philimena, you would wonder how I could deny him, or you would wonder I ſhould not hate him, and admire how I could conceal the jealouſie of my ſoul; yet to my unſpeakable miſery, the more he ſeemed in Love with Philimena, the more he blew the flame of my affection unto him: Alas, (ſaid I unto my ſelf whilſt he was talking) how happy ſhould I be, if Myrinthus were as affectionate unto me, as unto another? And when he proteſted that he was as much devoted unto my glory as unto Philimena's, I had much ado to withhold from ſaying, that his neareſt way of happineſs was to be as much devoted unto my perſon as unto my ſervice: But thanks be to the Heavens, rowzing up my reaſon to aid me, I abhorred a thought ſo baſe and unworthy of my ſelf, and I was more than half reſolved to allow the marriage of Myrinthus and Philimena, thereby to drive Myrinthus out of Cleobulines heart; but my mouth would not obey the offers of my mind, which neither my heart nor reaſon did not command.

Thus my dear Steſilea, I have denied Philimena unto Myrinthus, and I have ſtill kept Myrinthus in my heart, notwithſtanding his extream love of Philimena; yet ſometimes theſe violent flames of affection which I ſaw in his ſoul, did inſpire ſuch cholor in mine, as I could not be more angry if Myrinthus had been ungrateful and perfidious: But preſently after my anger ceaſed, and I accuſed my ſelf of the moſt horrible injuſtice in the World: Indeed I muſt confeſs unto my ſhame, that one could not be more unjuſt than I was in this buſineſs, for as violent as my affection to Myrinthus was, yet I could never endure that he ſhould know it; and that though he had loved me, yet I would not allow him ſo much boldneſs as to tell me of it; ſo that it muſt needs be confeſſed the greateſt folly and injuſtice in the world to make Myrinthus miſerable: But for all that, I phancied ſo great a conſolation in ſeeing him out of love with Philimena, and I found ſo much delight in making my ſelf believe that he loved me, and knew not that I loved him, as I could not by any means conſent that he ſhould either love or marry Philimena; yet for all this, I am perſwaded that he will marry her, maugre all my commands to the contrary; and that he will force me to baniſh him my Court, to withdraw all my favours from him, and to puniſh him for contempt of my authority: But alas what's this I talk, ſaid ſhe, Can I think of baniſhing Myrinthus my Court, ſince I cannot baniſh him my heart, that there is much more juſtice in that, than in baniſhing him out of my Dominions: For my part Madam, replied Steſilea, I am not of your opinion, for I am perſwaded that Myrinthus will not marry Philimena without your conſent: Though he do not marry her without my conſent, replied Cleobuline, yet aſſuredly he will ſtill hate me, and love her; ſo that whether he marry, or marry her not, I ſhall ſtill be miſerable. However Madam, replied Steſilea, I beſeech you deviſe ſome ſtratagem or other, and ſee whether I can contribute any thing to your ſatisfaction: I have deviſed more than you imagine (ſaid ſhe) for in lieu of one ſtratagem, I have two continually in my mind, but yet they are very oppoſite unto each other, and therefore I think that neither of them will take effect; for truly I have a mind to make Myrinthus love me, and I have a mind to ceaſe loving him; judge then Steſilea, whether two ſuch impoſſibilities can ever conduce any thing to my ſouls tranquility. After this, Cleobuline told Steſilea a hundred things, which teſtified the grandeur of her paſſion, and the grandeur of her virtue. In the mean time ſhe became ſo bad, ſo unquiet, and ſo extreamly melancholy ſince the day that Myrinthus asked leave to marry Philimena, as Steſilea much feared her falling ſick. On the other ſide, Myrinthus was in ſuch a horrid deſpair, that never man was fuller of ſorrows; for he knew that Baſilides (notwithſtanding the league between them) would never let him marry Philimena without Cleobulines conſent: Alſo conſidering his obligements unto the Queen, he knew it a moſt unworthy act to diſobey her: Moreover, having a ſoul very ambitious, he could not ſee how he could have wherewith to ſatisfie his love, if he ſhould loſe his fortunes, ſo that he ſuffered intollerable torments; but the greateſt torture of all was, that he could not gueſs at the Queens reaſon to oppoſe his deſign: And to compleat his miſeries, Philimena underſtanding that the Queen would not conſent unto her marriage, ſhe told Myrinthus, to try his fidelity, that ſhe would not have him ruine his fortunes for her ſake; and therefore conjured him to think no more of it. Phi- limena told him this in ſuch a manner, as that he could not gueſs at her deſign; but on the contrary, did think, that ſhe ſaid ſo, becauſe ſhe feared to leave the Court. Afterwards, he ſuſpected that ſome Rival was perhaps more in her favour than he imagined: So that he was as ill ſatisfied from her, as from the Queen, and yet he made a thouſand vows and proteſtations of love unto her, the moſt tender and paſſionate in the world; he complained againſt her taking ſo much care of his fortunes, he ſwore that he would not value them at a ſtraw, but only becauſe he was loth to make her miſerable; and he was ſo full of ſuch tender and obliging expreſſions, that Philimena being delighted to hear ſuch generous teſts of his love, did ſtill oppoſe him, though it was with a deſign to tell him afterwards, that provided he could get her Parents conſent, ſhe would not care for the Queens. In the mean time, Myrinthus not knowing her deſign, did leave her with a very little ſatisfaction, and carried with him a heart full of ſorrow, and ſome jealouſie.

At his going from her, he went unto Steſilea, to deſire her ſhe would be pleaſed to tell him what the Queens reaſon was to be ſo croſs unto his deſign, after ſo many favours ſhewed unto him. The firſt complements being paſt, Myrinthus began to entreat her ſhe would be pleaſed to do him a favour: It would be ſo great a happineſs (ſaid ſhe unto him) to do ſuch a moſt accompliſhed man as your ſelf any ſervice, that you may almoſt be certain to obtain whatſoever you ſhall deſire, ſo it be within the compaſs of my power: Yes Steſilea, ſaid he unto her, you can tell me what it is which ruins me in the opinion of the Queen: I aſſure you, replied ſhe, I cannot tell you that, but I am moſt certain, that you are not in any disfavour with her: Ah Steſilea, replied he, it is impoſſible I ſhould be at all in her favour, for ſhe hath denied me the only requeſt that ever I asked, and the requeſt is of ſuch a nature, as I admire why ſhe did not conſent unto it: I know very well that Philimena is above me, but I have received ſo many graces, honours, and benefits from the Queen, that I could not imagin a denial of this from her: For heavens ſake Steſilea, tell me the cauſe of my misfortune: Have I at any time done any thing that diſpleaſed the Queen? Have I any ſecret Enemy that does me any ill offices? Hath Baſilides betrayed me, and deſired her under-hand to deny me a thing which openly he ſeemed to wiſh? Or is it ſo, that the Queen thinks me in love with Philimena only as a cloak for my ambition? Does ſhe fear, that when I have married her, I ſhall preſs her to marry Baſilides? Does ſhe look upon me as a factious perſon, who would ſtir up the people, and raiſe a war againſt her? Speak Steſilea, tell me, for I am ſure you know all that I deſire to know: In thinking me Sir (ſaid ſhe) in ſuch favour with the Queen as to know her ſecret thoughts, doubtleſs you honour me, and have a good opinion of me; but all that I can tell you is, that I do not know one thought ſhe hath which is not advantagious to you: When I call to memory all the honours which I have received from the Queen, replied he, I do eaſily believe what you ſay; but when I conſider what ſhe hath denied me, I have reaſon to think ſhe hath changed her mind, and does not eſteem me. The laſt office which ſhe conferred upon you, replied ſhe, will hardly permit you to ſpeak thus: I pray then tell me, ſaid he unto her, What is the motive which induceth the Queen not to let me love Philimena? You know (ſaid Steſilea unto him) that there are ſome things which policy forbids to tell the cauſe of them: I know, replied he, that the Queen may have ſo good an opinion of me, as to honour me with the truſt of her reaſons why ſhe denies me, if policy only were in the buſineſs; ſo that I muſt of neceſſity conclude, that her reaſon is, either becauſe ſhe hates Philimena, or becauſe ſhe hates me; and therefore Steſilea I conjure you to tell me what you know in the buſineſs; never fear that I ſhall be ever ſo indiſcreet as to reveal the leaſt ſyllable you will truſt me with the participation: A perſon in love, replied ſhe, was never fit to keep ſecrets; Believe it, Steſilea, replied he, as deep in Love as I am, I may be truſted, for I am moſt confident, that Love will never make me do any thing againſt honour or honeſty: Be aſſured, that if I promiſe not to tell what you you truſt me with unto Philimena, I ſhall perform it: I beſeech you pity a moſt unhappy man who ſuits with you in this, that he loves the Queen as well as you do: It is my misfortune to think, that if Baſilides croſſed my deſign, I ſhould be leſs unfortunate than I am: But that the Queen, whoſe glory I value at ſo high a rate, that I would die to advance it, that ſhe ſhould render me the moſt miſerable of her Subjects, that is ſuch a thing Steſilea that I muſt needs lament: Since Cleobuline is of a Quality ſo high, that it becomes me not to tell her what thoughts I have of her, I am ſure ſhe knows mine, but very imperfectly; doubtleſs ſhe thinks me devoted to her ſervice, and that I am her moſt faithful Subject; perhaps ſhe does not think me obliged unto it, but by honour, by intereſt, and by gratitude; yet I muſt tell you, Steſilea, (to the end I may the more oblige you to tell me what I deſire to know) that I am a thouſand times more obliged and devoted unto her by inclination, than by any thing elſe: Yes, Steſilea, I love the Queen with ſo much devotion, that I have not more love to Philimena, than I have tenderneſs to Cleobuline: Nay more, I am fully perſwaded, that if this Queen had been of a lower quality, perhaps I ſhou'd have been ſo bold as to have Courted her with a very affectionate eye: Judg then, I beſeech you, how ſad a thing it is to receive a death from a hand that is ſo infinitely dear unto me; for heavens ſake therefore, tell me the cauſe of my misfortune, that I may know either how to overcome it, or to ſubmit my mind unto it; for I do profeſs unto you, that if you do not ſomething more inform my underſtanding, I ſhall be forced to take ſome deſperate courſe with my ſelf.

Whilſt Myrinthus was thus talking, Steſilea was ruminating upon what courſe to take, ſhe ſaw that reaſon bad her not diſcover the Queens ſecrets: On the other ſide, ſhe ſaw him in ſuch a deſperate ſadneſs. that ſhe much feared it would kill him. Moreover, though Cleobuline had told her ten thouſand times, that ſhe would not have Myrinthus know her paſſion; yet ſince ſhe thought his knowledg of it might quench his flames of affection unto Philimena, and kindle them unto her, ſhe thought that the Queen would not be much offended at it; ſo that knowing Myrinthus to be of an ambitious temper, and hearing from his own mouth that he had much inclination tion to love the Queen, ſo that ſhe doubted not but if ſhe told him the reaſon why the Queen croſſed his deſign, it would hinder him from marrying Philimena. Alſo, Steſilea perhaps looking upon the advancement of her own fortunes (which ſhe hoped for by this confidence) as well as upon the Queens tranquility, ſhe conſulted with her ſelf whether ſhe ſhould acquaint him with it or no. Since ſhe knew Myrinthus to be very diſcreet, ſhe was the much bolder to venture upon it, and more, when upon ſecond thoughts ſhe found that ſhe ſhould run no hazard at all: For truly (ſaid ſhe to her ſelf, hardly hearing what Myrinthus ſaid unto her) if what I ſhall tell him do not ſtagger his conſtancy, yet for his own intereſt he will never let the Queen know he knows ſhe loves him, ſince that would be an affront which would reflect upon himſelf; and if what I tell him do make him quit Philimena, and love Cleobuline, I need not fear her anger, though ſhe charged me not to let Myrinthus know ſhe loved him, and though ſhe would never have Myrinthus to tell her that he loved her. Steſilea then conſidering the pitiful caſe wherein the Queen was, ſhe thought it fit, for her reſts ſake, to hazard the matter, and for her ſervice to reveal her ſecret, ſince ſhe knew no better way; therefore ſhe began to think into what language ſhe ſhould put ſo delicate and nice a buſineſs. In the mean time, Myrinthus having done talking, and ſeeing that Steſilea was more intent upon her own thoughts than his words, began to think more than before, that there was ſome myſterious cauſe in the matter, and that Steſilea's ſilence argued her incertainty, whether ſhe ſhould, or ſhe ſhould not tell it unto him: So that applying his earneſt prayers to prevent her from any reſolution contrary unto his deſires; For heavens ſake, dear Steſilea (ſaid he unto her) ſtudy no more upon the matter, but tell me plainly whether the Queen denied my requeſt out of hatred, or out of ſcorn, or out of any other prejudicate thought? The thing you ask, replied Steſilea, is of greater conſequence than you imagin, and it is a ſecret of ſuch a nature, as I cannot truſt you, unleſs you will moſt ſolemnly ſwear never to reveal it unto any one living, not excepting Philimena her ſelf; and I will have you make a particular oath concerning her alone, who of all that lives upon earth muſt not know it. Myrinthus hearing Steſilea ſpeak thus, his curioſity did double: So that he made as many promiſes,vows,and oaths as ſhe deſired,never to ſpeak one ſyllable of any thing ſhe ſhould impart, either unto Philimena or any other. All this was not yet enough to ſecure Steſilea,for ſhe would have him ſwear alſo,never to make it known unto the Queen,neither by his words,nor any other action,that he is knowing in what ſhe is going to tell him.

Myrinthus now being more ſurprized, and more inquiſitive than before, did ſwear and promiſe all ſhe deſired: After which, ſhe aſſuming a very ſerious look and low voice, though none was near that could hear her,but himſelf: I make no queſtion (ſaid ſhe unto him) but you wonder to ſee me ſo cautious in relating a thing which only concerns your ſelf; but your wonder will be much more, when you ſhall underſtand, that this which I would have you ſo cloſely conceal, is the moſt glorious thing in the world for you: Yes Myrinthus, purſued ſhe, this which makes you thus ſad, this which moves you ſo to complain of the Queen, that which you ſo bitterly murmur at, that which makes you think ſhe hath changed her opinion of you; that this, I ſay, ſhould be the moſt glorious adventure of all your life; and that when Cleobuline in confirming ſo many offices, ſo many Governments, and ſo many honours upon you, did in them nothing ſo obligingly for you, as when ſhe denied you the marrying Philimena. Ah Steſilea, (ſaid he unto her) You will have much ado with all your wit to perſwade me unto this belief: If I have but the power to tell you all I know (replied ſhe) you will eaſily believe it: But Myrinthus (ſaid ſhe and bluſhed) Cannot you ſpare me the labour of telling that which I have promiſed never to reveal?Can you not gueſs at what you deſire to know? Let it ſuffice,I tell you for the opening of your apprehenſion, that it is neither policy,nor hatred,nor ſcorn,which moves the Queen to deny you Philimena.After all this Myrinthus, I pray tell your ſelf that which I have not power to tell you, eſpecially when I call to mind the promiſes which I have made to the Queen, never to tell it. Myrinthus hearing Steſilea ſpeak in this manner, began to apprehend what ſhe hinted at, but he apprehended it with ſo much aſtoniſhment, and ſo much perplexity of Spirit, as he thought that he miſapprehended her; his thoughts were ſo ravelled, as he could not unwind them to the bottom; yet to run no hazard, he anſwered Steſilea a little from the matter. The thing which it ſeems you would have me apprehend (ſaid he unto her) is ſo very full of wonder, as I fear that I ſhould commit a crime in ſeeming to apprehend it: No, no, Myrinthus, replied Steſilea, it is no crime to underſtand me; but you will be extreamly to blame, if after you underſtand me, you do not what I conceive you are obliged unto: Alas Steſilea (cried Myrinthus) I cannot comprehend how I can believe you, unleſs I ſhould fail in my reſpects unto the Queen; no, no, her denial is not cauſed by any reaſon you would give me; and I think it better to miſunderſtand you, and to accuſe you as an Impoſture, rather than to accuſe the greateſt Queen upon Earth of ſo bad a choice. Steſilea ſeeing Myrinthus either would not, or would not ſeem to believe her, did ſo circumſtance the matter unto him, as at laſt ſhe convinced his belief; and he calling to memory a hundred ſeveral paſſages, eſpecially the manner how the Queen denied his Marriage with Philimena, he did not at all doubt of the truth: Since he was not at all ſatisfied at the laſt conference with Philimena, he could not imagin himſelf loved by the moſt illuſtrious Queen in the world, without ſome thoughts which elevating his heart did exhilerate his ſpirits, and ambition did ſo ſwell his ſoul, as his imagination was full of Thrones, and Scepters, and Crowns: The beauty, ſpirit, wiſdom, and virtue of Cleobuline did ſo ſtagger his thoughts, as for a while there was an Interregnum in his heart. In the Interval of which, he thought he could give it unto which he pleaſed, and ſtrongly fancied to give it intirely unto Cleobuline, and that he could quit Philimena: But this inward tumult, which glory and ambition had raiſed in his ſoul, being a little calmed, his love to Philimena began to revive, and made him think this honour which the Queen did him, as a thing which would render him the moſt miſerable man alive. This ſerenity of ſoul was no ſooner eſtabliſhed in his heart, but turbulent clouds began to bluſter again, and he was ſo full of contradictions in his talk to Steſilea, as the trouble of his Spirits was evident: I beſeech you Steſilea, ſaid he unto her, before I tell you my thoughts, promiſe me never to tell the Queen that you have acquainted me with any thing: for Steſilea, if ſhe ſhould know I know it, I have nothing in the world to do but die at your feet, ſince it is impoſſible I can appear before her the moſt ungrateful and unjuſt perſon that lives amongſt men. I have already told you Sir, replied ſhe, that I would not have the Queen know I have diſcovered her ſecret unto you: 'Tis true, ſaid he, but I am ſo ſenſible of ſhame, that I am not ſo joyed as I ought to be, and I am at an extream Dilemma; for I muſt confeſs unto you, that my fidelity to Philimena makes me aſhamed of my crime againſt her, as well as againſt the Queen; and I am perſwaded, that if Cleobuline and Philimena did ſee the thoughts of my heart, they would both of them be equally incenſed: I am forced to confeſs, that I cannot apprehend my obligations to the Queen without ſuch agitation of mind, as I am not able to expreſs, I would willingly die a thouſand times to do her ſervice, I would leave loving Philimena, and only adore her; I would, I ſay, ſacrifice my life, and render her eternal homage: but preſently after, when I think upon Philimena, I wiſh the Queen to hold me in a ſtate of neutrality and indifferency, and indeed to hate me, provided ſhe will let me love Philimena: Judg then, Steſilea, I beſeech you, in what a ſad condition that heart is which is tormented with ſuch various and contrary thoughts: However it be, ſaid ſhe, I conceive you owe ſo much reverence to the Queen, as not to think any more of Philimena: I wiſh to the heavens (replied he) that I were able to follow your counſel: I do not aſk any thing which is unjuſt (ſaid ſhe): For ſince the Queen would not have you know ſhe loves you, and though you did love her, yet would ſhe not have you tell it unto her; I will not oblige you of neceſſity to love her, but only to eaſe her of ſo much ſorrow, as not to ſee you love another; and this I conceive to be the leaſt you can do, for the moſt wiſe, virtuous, and moſt accompliſhed Princeſs in the world: Alas Steſilea, ſaid he, I know that my duty is to do all things, but the great difficulty is to know what I am able to do againſt my ſelf, and againſt Philimena: All your arguments are not ſtrong enough to ſtagger my conſtancy, or render me perfidious; you would have me leave Philimena for the greateſt Queen in in the world, 'tis true; but it is for a Queen who will not have me know ſhe loves me, and who would have me love her, and never ſpeak of it: No, no, Steſilea, ſuch a paſſion as this is not able to make a man perfidious, who is accuſtomed to tell her he loves, that he loves her. A man, I ſay, who has leave to ſigh, and liberty to let his love be ſeen in his eyes, and to ſeek for ſome advantageous thoughts in the eyes of his Miſtreſs, which her tongue dare not utter. But what if upon capitulation the Queen ſhould let me know her thoughts, and let me tell her mine? Am I yet the Maſter of my own heart? Can I diſpoſe of it as I will? Alas, alas, (ſaid he and ſighed) how miſerable am I? and how far from that power? Could I be innocent either towards the Queen or towards Philimena, my heart would be at ſome eaſe: But to ſpeak truth, ſince I cannot be faithful unto Philimena, until after I have tried not to be ſo, my conſtancy is almoſt guilty; and as for the Queen, though I am culpable againſt her with abundance of repugnance, ſhame, and repentance, yet ſtill I am guilty. Thus not knowing well what I am, I dare neither juſtifie nor accuſe my ſelf, but ſtill remain in the moſt lamentable condition in the world: Since it ſeems impoſſible for you to be happy, replied Steſilea, therefore take that courſe which may eaſe the Queen of thoſe ſorrows which you have cauſed; you may eaſily do it, ſince all is but to think no more upon Philimena: Eaſily do it (replied Myrinthus and looked upon Steſilea) if I were able, I would immediately become perfidious: Yes, Steſilea, ſince you have told me the Queens reaſon for denying my requeſt, there is nothing which my heart hath not already invented againſt Philimena: I have oppoſed againſt her the Queens beauty, her ſpirit, her wiſdom, her virtues, her grandure, and all my obligations to her; and the ſooner to vanquiſh, I have racked my imagination even unto folly, I have fancied things that might accrue unto me, I have allowed my ambition all the ſwinge that vanity it ſelf can imagin, and I have ſet my thoughts ſo near a Crown, that ſome ſecond thoughts correcting the firſt, I have bluſhed at my own audacity and raſhneſs: But for all this Steſilea, this great Queen who reigns ſo abſolutely in the hearts of all who know her, and who indeed hath right to reign, cannot drive Philimena out of my own heart; therefore if you have any generoſity, pity my imbecility and miſery: Tell the Queen as from your ſelf, that I am moſt unworthy of her affection, that ſhe abaſeth her ſelf too much in looking upon me; and ſince I dare not preſume to lift up my eyes ſo high as her, I am not worthy of her looks: But yet I beſeech you, do not drive the nail too far, and do not make her paſs from love to hatred; for indeed Steſilea, I muſt profeſs unto you, that I ſhould be almoſt as ſorry to be hated by Cleobuline, as not to be loved by Philimena, therefore I beſeech you tranſact with all your diſcretion; for ſince I muſt die, I deſire I may with the glory of her favour. I have yet one Petition more unto you, which is, that you would keep her from hating Philimena; and in order to that, perſwade her, that in conquering my heart ſhe will never diſpleaſe Philimena: And perſwade her alſo if you can, that I deſerve ſome commendations for reſiſting her charms. Theſe are things ſo full of contrarieties, replied ſhe, that I think my beſt courſe is to do none of theſe things you ſpeak of: Yet I do moſt conſtantly tell you, replied he, that I ſhall ever love Philimena; but withal, I tell it with a ſigh, and with a bluſh, and that I cannot reſent the happineſs which I enjoy for thinking of that which I loſe. Oh heavens (cried he out) why is't not poſſible to reconcile the Queen and Philimena in my heart? For my part, I conceive it may be? for as you expreſs the affection of the Queen, methinks ſhe ſhould be ſatisfied that I hold her in infinite reverence, that I reſpect her as they uſe to do the Gods; that my Spirits and my reaſon doth acknowledg her power, that I vow all my ſervices unto her, that my valour ſhall be ever imployed unto her glory, and that ſhe only leave my heart unto Philimena. But what do I ſay (ſaid he and reprehended himſelf) it ſeems my reaſon wanders, in offering to preſcribe Laws unto Love, and to divide that which will not admit of any diviſion: I muſt confeſs, the Queen deſerves a thouſand hearts if I had them; but confeſs alſo, that ſince I have but one, and that one already given, it is not in my power to retake it,and that it is only Philimena's.

As Steſilea was ready to reply, Baſilides entred,who was much ſurpriſed to find ſo many ſigns of a troubled mind in the face of Myrinthus. This thought did ſo much diſquiet him,as when Myrinthus riſe up to go away,he riſe up alſo to ask him what the matter was, though he was newly entred, yet Myrinthus did not tell him what the matter was, but to ſay ſomething to colour the matter,he told him,that having deſired Steſilea to do him a good office to the Queen, ſhe told him how reſolute the Queen continued in denying his Marriage with Philimena: So that Baſilides having ſome reaſon to think, that the diſorder he obſerved in the Spirit of Myrinthus proceeded only from the obſtruction which he found in his deſign, did make him new proteſtations, and profeſſed he would uſe his utmoſt endeavors to effect it; after which they parted; Myrinthus carrying with him the moſt reſtleſs heart that ever was. Since his ſoul was of an ambitious temper, and ſince he naturally bore much affection to the Queen, this love of this Princeſs did puff him up: and when he conſidered with himſelf what glory it was unto him to be loved by a Queen ſo fair, ſo illuſtrious, and ſo charming, it was a thing impoſſible but he muſt needs be joyed at it; and to deſire that he were able to be perfidious unto Philimena; yet when he began to think, that by preſerving the one, he muſt loſe the other, his ambition began to yield unto his love, and all his cares was to find out wayes how to enjoy Philimena: But ſince theſe wayes were hard to find, the Queen not conſenting unto it; he was moſt extreamly grieved. Moreover, he had cauſe to think that if he married Philimena againſt the mind of Cleobuline, ſhe would than abaſe him as much as ſhe had formerly exalted him: So fearing leſt Philimena who loved him when he was in favour, ſhould not love him whem he was in diſgrace, his ſorrows were an inſufferable torment: and as an augmentation to his miſery, he durſt not acquaint Philimena with it, or put her fidelity to the teſt: ſo that fearing all things, and hoping in nothing, he ſpent the reſt of the day in extream reſtleſſneſs, and all the night following without a wink of ſleep. But that he might not be miſerable by himſelf there chanced a buſineſs which did not a little perplex Baſilides: For Sir, be pleaſed to know that in order to his deſigns upon the Queen, his care was to get himſelf creatures in her houſe, both amongſt the officers and amongſt the women: and there was one amongſt the reſt, whom he had entirely gotten: This Perſon then, watching upon all opportunities to obſerve the Queen, eſpecially when ſhe ſeemed moſt melancholy, told him all that ſhe at any time obſerved: But at the laſt, ſhe obſerved ſo cloſely, that ſhe one day heard all that Steſilea ſaid unto the Queen concerning Myrinthus, and all that the Queen ſaid unto her; and ſhe heard enough to collect, that the reaſon why the Queen would not let Myrinthus marry Philimena, was becauſe ſhe did not hate him her ſelf. At the firſt ſhe reſolved not to make it known unto Baſilides, knowing that it would not pleaſe him: but upon ſecond conſiderations ſhe changed her reſolution, and the next morning told him word for word all that ſhe heard. The ſurpriſe of Baſilides was ſo great that if he had had only the teſtimony of this woman, he had not given credit unto her words: But upon a ſurvey of a hundred of the Queens actions: her melancholy ſince Myrinthus was in love with Philimena: and ſuch like; alſo conſidering, that though ſhe denyed the earneſt requeſt of Myrinthus, yet he continued ſtill in her favour; this put him out of all doubt, and by conſequence, made him moſt exceſſively ſad: How's this (ſaid he unto himſelf as he afterwards told me) does Cleobuline love Myrinthus, who loves not her? And does ſhe not love Baſilides who loves her above his life? Why then it is Myrinthus who is the Remora in the Queens heart which hinders me from the conqueſt of it: Then muſt I become his enemy in lieu of Protector: And though he cannot be my Rival; yet ſince he is the obſtacle unto my happineſs, I muſt conſider him ſo: I muſt by all means ruin all his pretenſions, and oppoſe all his deſigns: But what's this I ſay (ſaid he and reprehended himſelf) my ſorrows have diſtracted my Reaſon: And I do not underſtand my own intereſt; ſince my odd deſtiny is to endeavour the making that man happy whom the Queen prefers before me in her heart, it concerns me more than it doth Myrinthus, that he marry Philimena; and I muſt labour for his quietneſs who is the cauſe of all my reſtleſneſs, and endeavour his felicity, leaſt he prevent mine.

Baſilides having well conſidered of the matter, reſolved in order to the better diſcovery of the Queens thoughts, to ſpeak unto her himſelf concerning the marriage of Myrinthus with his ſiſter: deſigning that though ſhe refuſed him, yet to cauſe that Philimena ſhould move Myrinthus to marry her without the Queens conſent, hoping that this would ſufficiently incenſe her to baniſh him her Court, not being ignorant that ſhe was very jealouſe of her authority. Baſilides then in purſuance of this reſolve, went the next day unto the Queen: But in his way thither, he underſtood that Myrinthus, after a whole night without ſleep, was very ill in the morning; ſo that taking this occaſion to ſpeak of him unto the Queen, he no ſooner came into her preſence, but looking attentively upon her, he told her this news. Since the Queen did not think it poſſible, he ſhould know the thoughts of her ſoul, ſhe took no heed of reſtraining her ſelf: So that not being able to hold in the firſt conceptions of her heart, ſhe could not hear of Myrinthus being ſick without ſome viſible diſorder in her face, enquiring very carefully of what nature his diſeaſe was, and how he came to know it. As for his diſeaſe Madam (anſwered he) I cannot directly tell you what it is: But if your Majeſty will pleaſe to command me, I ſhall teach him the art how to cure himſelf, by telling him the cauſe: Methinks (anſwered the Queen, who knew very well what Baſilides would ſay) it is a very hard matter to know the cauſe, when you do not know the diſeaſe: Yet I do know it Madam, anſwered he, for I am moſt confident that if your Majeſty would permit Myrinthus to marry Philimena, he would quickly recover his health, ſince certainly the diſeaſe of his mind cauſeth the diſeaſe of his body; and if you would cure the laſt you muſt begin with the firſt. Since thoſe who govern Kingdoms (replied the Queen with a tart kind of railery) are not to conſult with Phyſitians, nor fit their Policies unto their temper; this which you tell me ſhall not alter my Reſolution of not giving my conſent unto a marriage, which for divers reaſons I cannot approve of. You may well think Madam, replied Baſilides, that I ſhall not think Myrinthus unworthy of Philimena, ſince your Majeſty thinks him worthy of your eſteem. The Queen hearing Baſilides ſpeak thus, did bluſh, not that ſhe thought he ſpoke ſo as knowing the thoughts of her ſoul, but it was becauſe whoſoever hath any ſecret thought, hath alſo an imagination ſo quick, and a heart ſo ſenſible, that the leaſt thing gauls them; and ſhe was no leſs perplexed than Baſilides, for to authorize her denial of Myrinthus ſhe muſt in ſome ſort, not ſpeak advantagiouſly of the man whom of all the world ſhe moſt eſteemed: And Baſilides alſo to perſwade her conſent unto this marriage, uſed a thouſand expreſſions of eſteem of Myrinthus, whom he heartily wiſhed ſhe did not eſteem.

Thus ſeeing themſelves both put to the neceſſity of betraying their thoughts, they were both of them much perplexed; yet both of them reſolved in their hearts to betray them as little as they could. The Queen then anſwered Baſilides, That it was very true, Myrinthus was owner of a thouſand good qualities which had got him much into her eſteem and repute; but ſince he was not a Corinthian originally, ſhe thought this reaſon, with many other that ſhe could give, would not permit her to conſent unto his marriage with Philimena: I do believe Madam, replied Baſilides, that your Majeſties concealed reaſons are very prevalent, but as for that which you are pleaſed to honour me with the participation of, is not ſo deniable as I conceive: The truth is, the Anceſtors of Myrinthus have been ſo faithful, as they may very well paſs for natural Subjects unto your Majeſty: I know very well that there is much inequality between my Siſter and Myrinthus, and if your Majeſty had not by your Noble Favours raiſed him above his Quality, his deſign had been raſh: But Madam, though this inequality may be a conſiderable obſtacle to hinder a Marriage; yet the high eſteem which your Majeſty honours him withall, and the violent affection which he bears unto Philimena, moves me to wiſh it no leſs than himſelf. For Madam, I am moſt confident, that if Myrinthus were a King, and my Siſter a very Slave, yet he would make her a Queen: Therefore I moſt zealouſly beſeech your Majeſty to ſatisfie his love, and give me leave to ſacrifice a Siſter for the preſervation of a man whom you are pleaſed to honour with your eſteem. To retaliate ſo generous a thought, (replied the Queen, with a ſoul ſo full of ſadneſs as ſhe had much ado to hide it) I ought to ſacrifice Myrinthus for your ſake, and not ſuffer you to ſacrifice Philimena for his; and therefore for your own ſake, the more you importune me for Myrinthus, the more reſolute am I to deny you.

After this, Cleobuline upon a ſudden took her leave of Baſilides, who was in a hundred minds to put off all due reſpects, and to let her underſtand he knew the thoughts of her ſoul. But the very ſame paſſion which ſpurred him unto this boldneſs, letting him alſo ſee, that if he affronted the Queen, he might chance loſe her for ever, he curbed himſelf, and went with her without a word, which might make her poſitively think he knew ſhe loved Myrinthus; and though he harped much upon her eſteem of him, yet he thought that ſhe would not expound it love, and indeed ſhe did not at that time; but her wearineſs of Baſilides company had another cauſe, for truly ſhe could not endure without infinite grief to hear him aggravate the violent affection of Myrinthus to Philimena; nor without a ſtrange confuſion hear of the great inequality of his quality and his Siſters: But that which ſtung her moſt was, to ſee Baſilides deſiring this marriage, and ſhe was the only one who did not wiſh it; and to conſider how ſhe incurred the hatred of Myrinthus, whom in ſpite of all her power ſhe loved with extream tenderneſs, ſo that the very thought of being hated did exceſſively grieve her, but yet ſhe had a more ſenſible cauſe of it afterwards; for Myrinthus being recovered, and having ſome important buſineſs of State with the Queen, he went unto her, and ſhe found him ſo altered ſince ſhe ſaw him laſt, as thinking his alteration rather an effect of his ſouls ſorrow, than any ſickneſs, ſhe was fretted to the very heart; yet that was not the only cauſe which put Myrinthus into ſuch a Meager complexion, ſince certainly his ambition did alſo much perplex him: For Sir, before I relate their diſcourſe, I muſt tell you, that Myrinthus being forced to go unto the Queen, with whom he had not been, ſince Steſilia acquainted him with her affection unto him, his heart was full of inexpreſſible apprehenſions: His greateſt diſquiet was his fears leaſt the Queen ſhould know that Steſilia had acquainted him with her amorous thoughts of him: Alas (ſaid he in himſelf) if ſo, how dare I look upon this Princeſs, or how can ſhe look upon me? But afterwards, upon his conſideration of the Queens great virtue, he believed the thing to be as Steſilea had told him, ſo that his ſoul enjoyed a little more ſerenity. But when he came unto the Palace Gates, and ſaw the Guards there, and likewiſe ſaw there the great concourſe of people going and coming in and out, which deliniates the grandeur of Kings; when he ſaw, I ſay, abundance of all ſorts of men in the Halls, Preſence Chamber, Privy Chamber, and every where elſe in the Court, waiting all only for a very ſight of the Queen. When he ſaw all the magnificent furniture wherewith the Chambers were adorned, his imagination was ſo ſwel'ed with a thouſand ſeveral Idea's of grandeur and magnificence, as he began to be ſenſible of the ſweetneſs in being loved by her, unto whom theſe Guards, this Palace, all theſe ſtately magnificences belonged, and unto whom all thoſe men with bended knees did pay their homage; inſomuch as his ambition beginning to revive in his heart, there was a new combat between this proud paſſion and his love of Philimena, which was not decided, when word was brought that Cleobuline asked for him. Myrinthus no ſooner received this Summons, but he ordered himſelf for entrance into the Queens Cloſet, where then ſhe was; but in the way, how full of phanſie was his mind? He had a mind to exclude Philimena out of his heart, and immediately after he reaſſumed the image of his deareſt Philimena into his fancy, to the end he might better guard her againſt the Queen; and indeed, not well knowing whether he was faithful or perfidious, he went unto the place where Cleobuline was; but he entred with ſuch a melancholy countenance, and ſo much diſorder in his eyes, that the Queen thinking the alteration proceeded more from his ſorrows that ſhe denied him Philimena, than from his ſickneſs, ſhe could not chuſe, but out of a ſecret ſpight, look with leſs ſweetneſs upon Myrinthus than ſhe was accuſtomed: So that Myrinthus beginning to fear that Stefilea had told the Queen all his and her diſcourſe, he was ſo diſmaid, as he did not anſwer her much to the purpoſe. The Queen ſurprized at the diſorder in Myrinthus his mind, asked him from whence this confuſion of thoughts and words proceeded, which ſhe was not wont to obſerve in him? Is it, becauſe I do not well underſtand them, or becauſe you did not hear me? It is neither Madam, replied he, for your Majeſty doth always both underſtand and ſpeak very well, and I always hearken with a moſt attentive ear, in hopes you will command me ſome ſervice: But it is ———— But it is (replied Cleobuline and cut him ſhort) becauſe you have left your mind where you have beſtowed your heart: If I had power to have beſtowed it (replied Myrinthus pitifully non-pluſt) Philimena ſhould not have had it, but I ſhould have otherwiſe diſpoſed of it; yet Madam, Philimena hath violently taken it from me whether I would or no: Since the Law of Nations, replied the Queen, permits one to repulſe force by force, and that one may take ones own where e're he finds it; take back from Philimena with the ſame violence, that heart which ſhe took from you: But if you will take my advice, be ſure you do not take hers in lieu of your own, for you will be a loſer by the bargain: I wiſh to the Heavens Madam (ſaid he unto her) that I were able to do as I ought, in doing as your Majeſty would have me; for I am ſo devoted unto your commands, that I had rather be an obedient Subject, than a faithful Lover.

Myrinthus pronounced theſe words with ſuch a faint and hollow accent, as he ſurprized the Queen; for his tone did teſtifie, that he had ſome mental reſervation in his words; ſhe no ſooner had this conceit, but ſhe changed colour; ſo that Myrinthus ſeeing her bluſh for anger, he grew pale with fear, and bluſhed preſently after for ſhame. The alteration in the Queens face cauſed the alteration in Myrinthus; and the new diſorder which appeared in the mind of Myrinthus, did alſo diſorder the Queen: So that the confuſion of the one redoubling the ſhame of the other, they could not endure each others looks, but heartily deſired a ſeparation, and indeed they parted; for the Queen diſpatching her buſineſs with Myrinthus in two words, ſhe diſmiſſed him by a ſign from her hand, without one look upon him, and ſtayed by her ſelf in an unconceiveable turbulency of mind. Myrinthus did ſtrive with himſelf, and would have ſaid ſomething, but ſhe beckned again with her hand to be gone, and go he did, with a heart ſwelled with two violent paſſions, which did moſt ſtrongly tyrannize over it. But as the ſoul of Myrinthus, ſo the ſoul of Cleobuline was moſt cruelly tormented, for ſince ſhe had a moſt penetrating wit, ſhe perfectly diſcovered by the looks, by the words, and by the tone of Myrinthus, that he either knew, or gueſſed at the thoughts which ſhe had of him, inſomuch as extraordinary ſhame, and ſorrows full of anger againſt her ſelf, did make her an intolerable ſufferer. Is it poſſible, ſaid ſhe, that my own words and my own eyes ſhould betray me, ſince they have both of them been ſo long ſo faithful? For I know very well, that at that time when Myrinthus asked my conſent unto his Marriage with Philimena, he had then no ſuſpition of my paſſion. But what's this I ſay? (ſaid ſhe and reprehended her ſelf) It cannot be either my words, or my eyes which have diſcovered the ſecret of my heart unto Myrinthus, becauſe I never ſaw him ſince, and yet there is none but Steſilea in all the world which knows my thoughts: Steſilea who hath promiſed inviolable fidelity; Steſilea, I ſay, who knows that I fear nothing more, than that Myrinthus ſhould know I love him. As the Queen was in this perplexity, Philiſta, who was newly come to Corinth, and had not been there a long while, and whom the Queen ever loved, ſhe entred into her Chamber: So that this Princeſs, who dearly loved her, made a Truce with her ſorrows, and began to talk of ſeveral things with her; and paſſing from one diſcourſe unto another, Philiſta, who knew nothing of the Queens Love to Myrinthus, thus, nor of that intimate confidence between her and Steſilea, ſhe began to tell the Queen what day ſome paſſage happened, ſhe told her it happened the very ſame day when Steſilea came not unto her until night. Cleobuline not remembring at firſt that Steſilea was ever a whole day from her, did contradict Philiſta: But Philiſta to remember it by more circumſtances, told her, that it was the very ſame day Myrinthus and Steſilea were a whole afternoon together, adding to prove her words, that Baſilides came to them at the concluſion of their conference.

The Queen hearing what Philiſta ſaid, began to ſuſpect the fidelity of Steſilea, ſince ſhe never ſpoke a word to her of Myrinthus his viſit, her ſuſpicions a little after did increaſe; for Steſilea coming in, Philiſta to make her own words good, asked her whether it was not true that Myrinthus came ſuch a day to ſee her, and whether Baſilides came not alſo.

This queſtion ſo ſurprized Steſilea, ſince ſhe had kept the viſit of Myrinthus ſecret from the Queen, that ſhe did ſo bluſh in confeſſing it, as that the Queen did undoubtedly conclude her culpable, and therefore was exceſſively ſad: Yet ſince it concerned her to know preciſely what Myrinthus knew, ſhe reſolved to ſet the beſt ſide of her ſorrows and anger outward, and to make Steſilea confeſs the truth. But the thing which moſt grated npon her apprehenſion was, that ſince ſhe thought Myrinthus knew her thoughts, ſo likewiſe did Baſilides, grounding her thoughts of it upon the great familiarity which had been of late between them: So that as paſſionate perſons always uſe, ſhe was full of divers imaginations, and concluded for certain, that Steſilea had diſcovered her ſecret unto Myrinthus, and he unto Baſilides: You may judge Sir, whether a Princeſs who pretended unto glory ſo much as Cleobuline did, could have any ſuch thoughts as theſe, without extream ſorrow; and indeed hers was of ſo deep a ſtrain, that ſhe could not reſt till ſhe had talked with Steſilea, and falling inſenſibly into diſcourſe of Myrinthus, ſhe asked her without any ſhew of anger, how it came to paſs ſhe never acquainted her with the viſit Myrinthus made her? Steſilea having no better a reaſon, told her, that ſince ſhe obſerved how ſhe never heard Myrinthus named without ſorrow, ſhe avoided the talking of him as much as ſhe could, unleſs it were her ſelf who firſt began to talk of him: But Steſilea (ſaid the Queen, and looked earneſtly upon her) I talked the laſt night with you of all the paſſages which chanced that ſame afternoon. Steſilea ſeeing her ſelf put to it, did think to mend the matter with another lie: Since I know Madam, ſaid ſhe unto her, that your Majeſty deſires nothing more zealouſly than to conquer the paſſions of your ſoul, I would never acquaint you with the diſcourſe I had with Myrinthus, leſt it ſhould increaſe rather than diminiſh them: For truly Madam, he came to ſee me, only to proteſt how ſorry he was for incurring your diſpleaſure by thinking upon Philimena. Did he not ask you (ſaid the Queen) what my reaſon was for oppoſing the Marriage? Yes Madam, anſwered Steſilea and bluſht, but I aſſured him that I could not tell it: Fie Steſilea, (cri'd out the Queen in a rapture of anger and grief) either you have betrayed me, or elſe your own words have betrayed you, for moſt certainly Myrinthus knows more than he ſhould do: However (ſaid ſhe, leſt Steſilea ſhould not tell the truth) if you will tell me ingenuouſly all that Myrinthus ſaid unto you, and all that you anſwered him, I will pardon your fault: But Steſilea, be ſure you tell me all, and hide not a ſyllable from me. Steſilea ſeeing her ſelf touched to the quick, did a while deny all, but at laſt the Queen ſpeaking to her with ſuch authority, and promiſing a pardon if ſhe told her all paſſages, ſhe reſolved to confeſs part of the truth: She told her then and truly, how Myrinthus did moſt highly commend her, and afterwards he was very importunate to know the reaſon why ſhe obſtructed his Marriage, and how before ſhe was aware, ſhe only told him, that her reaſon was much conducing unto his glory; how he put all the advantagious interpretation that could be poſſible upon thoſe words; and how after all, Myrinthus did expreſs abundance of tenderneſs towards her: Since Steſilea thought to appeaſe the Queen, by telling ſuch things, ſhe concealed no obliging expreſſion which Myrinthus uſed, and hinted not a word of what he ſaid in advantage of Philimena; yet ſhe durſt not tell her how Myrinthus offered to quit her, leſt the actions of that Lover ſhould belie her words: But ſhe only told the Queen, that it was not impoſſible but that he might be brought to quit her. Yet this diſſembling Artifice of Steſilea did not hit; for after the Queen had got out of Steſilea all that ſhe could, ſhe was ſo tranſported with anger, that though ſhe was reſolved to make no noiſe of it, becauſe ſhe ſaw her weakneſs, yet ſhe could not chuſe but expreſs all that a moſt violent paſſion could invent; Fie, fie, (ſaid ſhe unto her with a torrent of tears) have I truſted you in a buſineſs upon which the whole glory of my life depended, and muſt you go and tattle it unto the man, whom of all men living I moſt feared that he ſhould know it? Your imprudence and indiſcretion hath deprived me of all conſolation, and brought me into ſuch a condition, as to ſee Myrinthus ſcorn me: Doubtleſs he believed that all you ſaid unto him proceeded from my orders; for what likelihood is there he ſhould think any other? Could he imagine, that you having ſo much wit and ſpirit, ſhould otherwiſe be ſo weak and imprudent? Fie, fie, Steſilea unto what a cruel adventure have you expoſed me? Muſt Myrinthus know I love him, and not know I would not have him know it? And muſt Myrinthus know this from Steſilea? For my part, I believe you thought I told you that I loved Myrinthus, on purpoſe you ſhould let him know it, and that I did forbid it, only that you might the ſooner tell him; but if you had any ſuch thoughts you were extreamly deceived, and have been injurious as well as perfidious. Steſilea would then have had ſome frivolous excuſes to the Queen, but the Queen would not hearken to them: Be ſilent Steſilea (ſaid ſhe unto her) be ſilent, all your inchanting reaſons cannot juſtifie you; and ſince your crime hath been in talking too much, it muſt be ſilence rather than weak excuſes that muſt appeaſe my anger. In the mean while order it ſo, as Myrinthus may not either by his looks, or by his actions, or by the leaſt ſyllable, give me any cauſe to think that he remembers what you ſaid unto him; for if I find he do, I profeſs I will not only baniſh him my Court, but my Kingdom, though perhaps I cannot my heart: Carry the buſineſs ſo, that Myrinthus may never know I underſtand he knows the thoughts of my ſoul, for if ever I perceive he do, I ſhall baniſh you as well as him. But why ſhould I impoſe ſuch orders of ſilence and ſecreſie upon one who is tatling all ſhe knows, and is not Miſtreſs of her own tongue? Steſilea then kneeling down at the Queens feet, with eyes full of tears, ſeemed ſo repentant, that this Princeſs whoſe ſoul was infinitely glorious, thinking it a ſhame to pardon ſuch a crime ſo ſoon, and fearing leaſt her repentant tears ſhould molifie her, did command her to retire, and not to ſee her any more, until ſhe ſent for her; commanding her again to negotiate the matter ſo, as Myrinthus ſhould never know ſhe knew what Steſilea told him. After ſhe was gone, this Queen was in a moſt unſpeakable perplexity, and that which did moſt exaſperate the matter was, that as every one is apt to believe what they deſire, ſo ſhe believed it to be within the compaſs of poſſibility to wain Myrinthus from Philimena, if ſhe infuſed ſome ingredients of ambition into her love; and on the contrary, ſhe perceived by the extream diſorder of Myrinthus his Soul, that if ſhe ſhould offer him a Crown, yet he would never offer her his Heart, nor quit Philimena. So that this conſideration, and her perceiving a poſſibility of keeping Myrinthus from the enjoyment of Philimena, by making him a King, did exceedingly aggravate her ſorrows: Since it is allowed the people, (would ſhe ſay ſometimes when Love had the predominancy of her heart) to chuſe a King when they have not one, why is it not allowable in a Queen to chuſe one, eſpecially when her choiſe is good? Is it juſt, that becauſe I am born upon a Throne, therefore I ſhould be deprived of that liberty which all my Subjects have? And that I ſhould be more a Slave than any of my Slaves, in a thing upon which the felicity of my life depends? But what's this I ſay? (ſaid ſhe and reprehended her ſelf) methinks I ſpeak as if I could be happy without glory: Fie, fie, Cleobuline, wander not ſo far from the right way of reaſon; it is not thy part to examine the uſe of it, but to follow it: 'Tis true, Myrinthus is worthy of a Crown by his merit, but ſince he is not ſo by his Birth, 'tis fit thou beeſt ſtill his Sovereign, and that he be for ever thy Subject; but alas, this Subject knows thou loveſt him more than becomes thee; at this very hour perhaps he is at the feet of Philimena, and reporting thy weakneſs unto her, and proteſting, that though thou ſhouldſt offer him thy heart and thy Crown, yet he would willingly refuſe them both for the leaſt of her favours. On the other ſide, if Baſilides knew, as I believe he does, what thoughts thy ſoul harbors of Myrinthus, doubtleſs he would not value thy affection at a ſtraw, but only becauſe he would be King; and as for Philimena, I am confident ſhe would look upon thee with ſcorn, and triumph in reigning over the heart of him who reigns in thine: Steſilea alſo, ſhe would hold unworthy thoughts of thee; for ſince ſhe revealed the ſecret unto Myrinthus, doubtleſs ſhe thought thou didſt deſire to contract a particular friendſhip with him, and may be ſhe imagined, that this friendſhip had ſome virtuous deſign in it: So Cleobuline, ſee what dangerous conſequences thy fond paſſion hath brought thee unto, examine thy heart well, truſt not too much unto thy own virtue and ſtrength, reduce thy ſelf Cleobuline into ſuch a condition, as that thou canſt not commit a fault if thou wouldſt? find out ſome ingenious expedient which may juſtifie thy ſelf in the opinion of Myrinthus, as well as of Baſilides, Philimena, and Steſilea, call all thy virtues and ſtrengths to thy aſſiſtance, remember the glory thou haſt got, and do all thou canſt to preſerve it, and recover thy eſteem with Myrinthus, which perhaps thou haſt loſt: But alas (ſaid ſhe after a ſerious conſideration) I can find no way in the world to effect theſe things but one: But oh heavens, how difficult it is? and how hard to be reſolved upon?

As ſhe was in theſe thoughts Philiſta who was to render an accompt unto the Queen of ſome buſineſs wherein ſhe was imployed, came unto her, but ſince ſhe obſerved her very reſerved and ſad, after the diſpatch of her buſineſs, ſhe offered to go out again: But the Queen being fuller of ſorrows than any one heart was able to contain, did call her back again, and imagining that ſince Steſilea had revealed her ſecret unto Myrinthus, ſhe might alſo impart it unto Philiſta, who was always very kind with her, ſhe thought it beſt to tell her her ſelf, and to bid her keep Steſilea hereafter from ſuch faults; ſo that conſulting more with her choler than her reaſon, ſhe began to complain of Steſilea unto her: But ſince ſhe could not accuſe Steſilea, unleſs ſhe accuſed her ſelf alſo, ſhe acquainted Philiſta with her own unhappy condition. Do not think (ſaid ſhe unto her) that as much as I eſteem you, I would ever make any new Confident of my weakneſs, unleſs I were fully reſolved either to ſurmount it, or elſe to die: Yes Philiſta, I believe I have found out a way to juſtifie my ſelf in the thoughts of Myrinthus, Philimena, Baſilides, Steſilea, and your ſelf: And I think I have hit upon it ſo happily, that I ſhall arrive at that point which I have ſo long deſired, which is, to ſee Myrinthus out of love with Philimena: I perceive you can hardly conceive what this invention ſhould be: But to make a diſcovery of it unto you, know Philiſta, that to keep my ſelf from ever committing any crime, I will conſent unto that marriage which I have ſo obſtinately hindred. How, Madam, replied Philiſta, will you allow Myrinthus to marry Philimena? Yes Philiſta, replied ſhe, I will, and I will principally, to the end I may never think of marrying Myrinthus, nor ſhew him any ſigns of love, and to the end alſo he may think, that whatſoever Steſilea told him of me is not ſtronger than my virtue; and alſo to perſwade Baſilides, that all which perhaps is told him is not true. Thus far Madam, replied Philiſta, I do agree unto what you have ſaid, and I muſt infinitely commend your generous deſign; but I muſt confeſs, I cannot ſee how you can ever hope to ſee Myrinthus out of love with Philimena: Yes, I do hope it, replied ſhe, eſpecially by his marriage; for ſince the love of Myrinthus to Philimena is augmented by my obſtacle, I am confidently perſwaded, that it will cool again when it finds no oppoſition; the full fruition of Philimena will glut him, and more quaſh his affection, than all my authority is able to do: I beſeech you Philiſta, (ſaid this Princeſs in the rapture of her paſſion) do not tell me that Philocles, though now your Husband, is ſtill in love with you, ſince there is no love that is eternal: And if I did not hope to find ſome little ſatisfaction in ſeeing the affection of Myrinthus to Philimena to fade by marriage, perhaps I ſhould not have power to accompliſh that deſign, whereupon the ſafety of my glory doth depend; therefore I conjure you to concur with me in my hopes, to the end I may more couragiouſly put my reſolutions into execution: Yet do not think, purſued ſhe, that I deſire Myrinthus ſhould be out of love after he hath married Philimena, nor in any thought he ſhould anſwer my affection unto him; no P*hiliſta*,that's not my aim,and doubtleſs I have not power to ſay, I wiſh that Myrinthus ſhould not love me: But I can aſſure you, that none of my actions ſhall ever let him know I love him, though I am confident I ſhall love him as long as I breath; yet it would be much ſatisfaction unto me, to ſee Myrinthus out of love when I have executed my deſign. But oh heavens (added ſhe, and gave P*hiliſta* no time to anſwer her) am I able to do as I would? and am I well aſſured that I deſire it? When I conſult with my reaſon, I find my ſelf inclined unto it, though it ſhould coſt me my life; but when I conſult with my heart, I am ready to alter my mind, this Rebel heart reſiſts me, and if I did not call glory to my aid, I ſhould relaps into my firſt fond weakneſs: But as ſoon as I conſider it as a means to keep me from any poſſibility of committing a fault which my paſſion prompts me unto a thouſand times in a day, and which all the world would upbraid me with;& as a means, I ſay,to make Myrinthus eſteem me,and perhaps to quench thoſe violent flames of affection which he bears unto P*hilimena*; Honour and Love both joyning together do ſo fortifie my mind, that I am in hopes of an abſolute victory over my ſelf, though I am out of all hopes of not loving Myrinthus, and though I muſt ſtill love him without any fear that this paſſion will draw me unto any baſeneſs. After this, P*hiliſta*, who wiſhed in her heart that the Queen would marry Baſilides, told her, that the beſt way of ſecurity againſt that paſſion, was to marry him; and hinted unto her all the politick reaſons of State which might induce her unto it. Ah P*hiliſta* (ſaid the Queen unto her) your advice goes a little too far, and further than I am able to follow: 'Tis well, if I can reſolve to render P*hilimena* happy by permitting her to marry a man whom I love more than ſhe doth, without moving me to marry one whom I do not love, nor ever ſhall:

For the truth is Philiſta, if it were poſſible, I ſhould ceaſe loving Myrinthus, (as I think it is not) I ſhould certainly never love any elſe: Therefore Philiſta be contented that I do what I think fitting for my honour and juſtification, and do not wiſh me to groan under any new torment. After this, the Queen diſmiſſed Philiſta, and would not be ſeen all the reſt of the day; but as the day was tormentive to her, ſo the night much more, never did amorous heart endure more torture than hers, ſhe altered her reſolution a hundred times, and as oft reſolved to put it in execution; ſometimes her paſſion would be ſo high, that ſhe was perſwaded ſhe did Myrinthus the greateſt injuſtice in the world, if ſhe did not put the Crown upon his head, ſince it was in her power to make him King, ſhe imagined the injury as great, as if he had been legitimate King, and ſhe had wrung the Scepter out of his hand; and there was ſo fierce a combat in her ſoul betwixt honour and love, that the Sun brought day into her Chamber before it was ended; She riſe before ſhe was reſolved what to do, and as ſoon as ſhe caſt her eyes upon a great glaſs, by which ſhe paſſed in her way to her Cloſet, and ſpied in her face the alteration which Love and an ill night had brought upon her, ſhe bluſhed for ſhame, that ſhe ſhould be no more a Miſtreſs of her ſelf: Would not any ſay (ſaid ſhe to her ſelf) who ſaw this ſorrow in my eyes, that I am told of ſome loſs of a great battel, which either reflected upon my State, or the tranquility of my people? and yet in lieu of lamenting for the loſſes of my people, I am lamenting my own loſs; and all this ſorrow which ſits ſo ſadly in my eyes, hath ſo poor and weak a cauſe, and ſo unworthy of my virtue, as I wonder how I can endure my ſelf; rouze up thy ſelf Cleobuline couragiouſly, and conquer thy ſelf. The Queen finding more power in her heart than ſhe imagined, would not let ſlip ſo good an interval; and leſt ſhe ſhould relaps once more into a repentance, ſhe ſent immediately to command Baſilides and Myrinthus to come both together unto her; but ſhe had no ſooner given this order, than a freſh tumult rebelled in her mind, which put her ſoul into a new diſorder, yet it was preſently layed, for ſhe was ſo exceedly pleaſed, that ſhe was able to force her mouth unto words ſo oppoſite unto her hearts deſire, as her very joys of vanquiſhing, made her able to execute her deſign with a kind of tranquility: So that her deſire of glory, and deſire of juſtifying her ſelf in the thoughts of Myrinthus and Baſilides, fortifying her ſoul, ſhe prepared her ſelf in good earneſt for executing her deſign: Then arming her ſelf with a reſolute mind, ſhe ſhut up all her ſorrows in her heart, and ſo well compoſed her countenance, as ſhe ſeemed only a little ſerious, and not unquiet or troubled. In the mean time Baſilides and Myrinthus being ſurprized at this ſudden meſſage, they could not deviſe what the Queen ſhould have with them, yet they did not impart their thoughts unto each other, for Myrinthus out of his reſpect and diſcretion would not tell Baſilides what he knew of the Queens Love; and Baſilides out of his jealouſie would not tell Myrinthus what he thought he knew not, and which he would never have him know, yet both of them imagined that the Queens ſending for them was abſolutely to forbid the banes of Philimena's Marriage: So that though ambition was high in the heart of Myrinthus, yet his Love of Philimena having got the predominancy, he went to the Queen with a ſoul full of melancholy thoughts: On the other ſide Baſilides thinking that the Queen oppoſed the Marriage of Myrinthus, only becauſe ſhe her ſelf loved him, and fearing alſo that ſhe would break it only, perhaps with a deſign to make him King, he was ſo far from looking upon Myrinthus as a Husband unto his Siſter, as he hated him as a Rival, though he knew him to be in love with Philimena, and not with Cleobuline.

Theſe two Lovers then being both of them fall of reſtleſs imaginations, came both of them to Court together. They were no ſooner entred, than the Queen hearing of their coming, cauſed them to enter into her Cloſet; She had no ſooner given this order, but ſhe had ſome ſuggeſtions in her heart to talk of ſome other buſineſs, and to defer the execution of her deſign unto ſome other time. But as ſoon as ſhe ſaw Myrinthus, and looked upon him as a man who knew her weakneſs, and who perhaps blamed her for it, her very deſire to re-admit her ſelf into his eſteem, as well as to juſtifie her ſelf in the opinion of Baſilides, did rouze up a greater ſtrength in her reſolution than ſhe imagined; and Philiſta, whom the Queen ſent for to be preſent at this action, told me, ſhe admired that a perſon ſo paſſionate as Cleobuline was, could ſo well overcome her ſelf: She therefore no ſooner ſaw Baſilides and Myrinthus enter into her Cloſet, then cauſing them to come to her, ſhe began to ſpeak unto them both in a moſt ſurprizing manner: Since I know (ſaid ſhe unto them) that the buſineſs which I am to ſpeak of does concern you both, I deſired to ſpeak unto you both together. Know then (ſaid ſhe, and addreſſed her ſpeech unto Baſilides) that as I have hitherto hindred the marriage of Philimena and Myrinthus, out of ſome prevalent reaſons which I never told you; ſo now thoſe reaſons being changed, I have alſo changed my opinion, inſomuch as ſince I do now like of that which I diſliked then, I do not only conſent unto this marriage, but I deſire that it may be conſummated, as ſpeedily as preparations for ſuch a ſolemnity will permit. Baſilides and Myrinthus, both were ſo ſurprized at the Queens words, as they never thought of any anſwer; but the wonder was, to ſee the Brother of a Lover to thank the Queen ſooner than the Lover himſelf: For though Myrinthus was unexpreſſively in love with Philimena, and was extreamly joyed to hear that he ſhould e're long enjoy her, yet knowing what thoughts the Queen had of him, he durſt not be too forward in expreſſions of gratitude, for the favour which ſhe did him, for fear of incenſing her. Alſo his ambition ſtrugling a little in his heart, he could not ſo ſuddenly quit a Queen for Philimena, without ſome little regret of mind; ſo that not knowing upon a ſuddain what to do or ſay, he let Baſilides ſpeak firſt, who apprehending that nothing could be more advantagious unto his deſign upon the Queen than this, he was tranſported with ſuch a joy, as permitted him the full freedom of his ſpirits, and he returned his thanks in very crafty phraſes: I aſſure you Madam, ſaid he unto her, your Majeſty hath not only done an Act of Juſtice in conſenting unto what Myrinthus ſo much deſired, but an act of Clemency alſo, in preſerving that life which the tyranny of his paſſion would have ruined. Myrinthus hearing Baſilides ſpeak in this manner, though he had a good mind to contradict him, yet he durſt not; nor durſt he out of his reſpect unto the Queen aggravate a paſſion which he knew would but diſpleaſe her; therefore puting a handſome gloſs upon his reſentment, he began to ſpeak: Since I cannot evidence my gratitude unto the Queen, (ſaid he unto her) without giving her ſome cauſe to think that I murmur'd againſt her, when ſhe denied me that, which now ſhe is pleaſed to grant, I had rather publiſh her goodneſs unto all the world, than to thank her my ſelf: Therefore Madam, I beſeech your Majeſty to diſpence with thoſe thanks which I owe you, and in exchange give me leave to applaud you, in ſpeaking of thoſe many honours which I have received from you; and to publiſh unto all the world, that though I die a thouſand deaths in your Majeſties ſervice, yet the vaſt debt of my gratitude is not diſcharged: In ſaying you will give me no thanks, replied the Queen and bluſhed, you have given me too many. In the mean time, I do not only diſpenſe with you for your thanks, but alſo for all thoſe high applauds you give me; and I hold you diſcharged of all you owe me, provided you will be fully perſwaded, that both in denying and giving you Philimena, I always had ſtrong reaſons for thoſe contrary acts, though they were unknown unto you; and as I place Juſtice in the firſt rank of all Kingly virtues, ſo I do abhor that my Subjects ſhould ever upbraid me with any deficiency in that virtue: If you can be accuſed of any injuſtice Madam (replied Myrinthus moſt reſpectfully) it is in conferring more favours upon me than I can merit: But ſince goodneſs is a virtue as well as Juſtice, I ſhall hope that without any blame to your Majeſty for the favours you have done me, that may be attributed unto your goodneſs, which cannot be unto your Juſtice: However it be (ſaid ſhe to finiſh the diſcourſe) ſince the greateſt joys are doubled, when they are made publick, we will not hinder you Myrinthus from publiſhing yours; go therefore and tell ——— This Princeſs would have ſaid Philimena; but ſhe abruptly ſtopped, and the diſorder of her ſpirits was ſo great, that in lieu of ſaying Philimena, according to her firſt intention, ſhe ſaid, unto all the Court, and ſaid it with a bluſh: So that fearing leſt her conſtancy ſhould ſtagger, ſhe diſmiſſed Baſilides and Myrinthus, who both of them retired very well ſatisfied; yet Myrinthus had ſome ſecret pangs of ſorrow in his heart, for as he went out of the Queens Cloſet, and turned his head back, and ſaw her lifting up her eyes unto heaven with a ſigh, ſo that not doubting but that he was the cauſe of thoſe ſorrows in the moſt illuſtrious Queen in the world, his joys were ſo dejected until the fair eyes of Philimena did revive them, as he could hardly ſpeak unto Baſilides; yet he was no ſooner in the preſence of that fair One, but Love began to fill his heart with extream joy. Yet whilſt he was taſting, all thoſe delicious ſweets which he had a long time moſt earneſtly wiſhed for, and which a full ſatisfied hope could afford, the Queen did find ſome tranquility in the Victory which ſhe had obtained over her ſelf, and was ſometimes joyed at it: Well thou imperious paſſion, (did ſhe ſay before Philiſta) which are accuſtomed to conquer the ſtrongeſt reaſons, thou haſt now been conquered by mine: Thou Tyrant, I ſay, who haſt cauſed the moſt illuſtrious perſons to run headlong into a thouſand crimes and inconveniences, and does often put the whole Univerſe into a diſorder; yet as proud as thou art of thy Triumphs, one ſimple deſire of glory hath forced thee out of my heart, and made my ſelf a Soveraign Miſtreſs of it: I do profeſs, Madam, (ſaid Philiſta to her) I do extreamly admire at your victory over your ſelf; I could never think that it were poſſible to baniſh a moſt violent and tyrannical paſſion out of ones ſoul in ſo ſhort a time: Ah my dear Philiſta, (replied the Queen and ſighed) I have conquered this cruel paſſion I confeſs, but in lieu of baniſhing out of my heart ſo fierce an Enemy, my reaſon hath only inchained him there, and I am in continual fear leſt he ſhould break thoſe chains which holds him captive: I find him doing what he can to get at liberty; but I find alſo, that he cannot break them unleſs my reaſon betray me: I pray Philiſta ſtrengthen it by your commendations, and tell me that I have done the moſt glorious act in the world; perſwade me if you can, that it was more grandeur of courage to do as I have done, then it was weakneſs in me to be ſo vanquiſhed as I was: It is an eaſie matter for me, Madam, replied Philiſta, to commend mend an act ſo Heroick, whereof ſo few are capable; the Sacrifice you have offered unto glory is ſo great, that as by all the reſt of your actions you merit Statues, ſo by this you merit Temples and Altars, ſince you have done a thing which the Gods themſelves have not always done: Fie Philiſta, replied the Queen, do not commend me ſo exceſſively, for if I ſhould chance to relaps into my firſt folly, and repent of what I have done, both you and I ſhould be abominably aſhamed of all theſe applauds which you have given me; therefore, though I did entreat you to commend me, yet I pray keep ſome meaſure in your commendations; for the very truth is Philiſta, that I did never in my life love Myrinthus more than now I do, nor hate Philimena more, yet I made them both happy, becauſe honour required it, and my Quality would not ſuffer me to commit crimes, ſince I muſt do nothing but what is great and Noble, and Soveraignly juſt. Moreover Philiſta, if you did but know my joys, to ſee Myrinthus expreſs no gladneſs when I gave him leave to marry Philimena, you would wonder: But wretch that I am, (ſaid ſhe and bluſht) I rejoyce at that, which doubtleſs I ought to grieve at, and be aſhamed; for it is to be thought, that Myrinthus did only hide his thoughts becauſe he knew mine: Stifle therefore this ill-grounded joy, and rejoyce Cleobuline at nothing but the Victory which thou haſt got over thy ſelf. In ſhort Sir, the Queen did ſo encourage her ſelf in the deſign which ſhe had taken, that it was as generouſly executed, as it was reſolved, yet not without a thouſand ſeveral perplexities, for ſince all the Court thought they pleaſed her in intereſting themſelves in the joys of Myrinthus, and in commending the marriage which ſhe had made, they ſpoke of nothing elſe. Some ſpoke loud in commendations of Myrinthus, others of Philimena, all of nothing elſe. In the mean time, ſince ſhe would not truſt too much unto her ſelf, ſhe haſted on the marriage, as if upon the accompliſhment thereof depended all her felicity: And the better to colour her affection to Myrinthus, ſhe ſhewed abundance of kindneſs to Philimena, and ſent her very rich Preſents, though ſhe gave her not one ſweet word which had not a bitter reliſh in her own heart: She her ſelf would alſo be at the expences of the marriage, which was ſolemnized with extraordinary pomp: She dreſſed her ſelf, as if it were the day of her Coronation; and as long as the Feaſt laſted, ſhe was a moſt abſolute Miſtreſs of her own countenance, and of all her actions, though Heavens know not without inconceivable ſorrow at heart, in the midſt of this publick rejoycing. The truth is, ſhe carried it ſo, that Myrinthus thought ſhe had changed her thoughts of him, that Baſilides thought himſelf wrongly informed, and that Philiſta her ſelf thought Cleobuline leſs engaged to Myrinthus than ſhe was, yet ſhe was not long in that thought; for the day after the ſolemnity, the Queen cauſed all the Grandees of State to aſſemble, as if ſhe intended ſome notable alteration in the Government; and without communicating her deſign unto any whoſoever, ſhe appeared in the Noble Aſſembly with ſo much Majeſty, as ſhe inſpired reverence into the hearts of all beholders. Baſilides, according to his Quality, had the firſt place, and Myrinthus, by reaſon of his Offices, the next. This Aſſembly was in a great Hall ſupported with Marble Pillars, whoſe Baſis was of Corinthian Copper, ſo famous over all the world: Between theſe Pillars and Pilaſters was hung ſeveral Enſigns gotten in the Wars by the late King of Corinth: And in the midſt of this Hall was erected a ſtately Throne of three degrees; upon the firſt was the Queen, upon the ſecond Baſilides, and upon the third Myrinthus. All the reſt of the Aſſembly being round about this Princeſs, who after ſhe had by her looks impoſed ſilence upon all the company, ſhe made ſuch a moſt admirable Eloquent Oration, as ſhe charmed all the Auditory; but her reſolution did aſtoniſh them; for after ſhe had prepared them to hear her pleaſure, ſhe declared, That it was her reſolute determination never to marry; adding, that it was her will Baſilides ſhould be looked upon, as him who was to ſucceed her in the Throne,to the end his authority ſhould be more firm, and that he ſhould raiſe no Factions in the State: Adding after all this a thouſand admirable Arguments to authorize her reſolution: You may judg, Sir, how this Oration ſurprized the Aſſembly, eſpecially Baſilides and Myrinthus.

As it is the cuſtom when the Queen hath ended her Speech, for every one to give their opinions in order, ſo Baſilides ſpoke firſt; and though the Queens Declaration was much in his advantage, and confirmed him in thoſe rights which nature gave him, yet his love prompted him to contradict the opinion of the Queen, and one could not ſpeak more eloquently, nor more reverently than he did, to perſwade her that ſhe would change her mind. And though the place would not permit him to add his paſſion unto many other reaſons, which might induce her to marry, yet he did hint upon that point very delicately, declaring unto her, that he would never have any right unto a Grown which ſhe wore by ſo ſad a way, as that which ſhe propounded, and ſpoke as elegantly, as if he had been prepared for it. But when it came to the courſe of Myrinthus to ſpeak, and when he concurred in the opinion of Baſilides, the Queen bluſhed; and at night ſhe told Philiſta, that her conſtancy began to waver, when ſhe ſaw him for whoſe ſake ſhe reſolved never to marry, to adviſe her to it. The diſcourſe of Myrinthus was not long, for ſince he knew the Queens thoughts, he was more limited in his Spirit; yet he ſpoke very well, and mixed ſo many applauds with his contradictions, that it may be ſaid he choaked all his own reaſons, and confirmed her in her deſign. Afterwards, every one who ſpoke, beſeeched her to change her mind; but after they had all ſpoken what they would, ſhe repeated all their reaſons in a ſhort method, and cloſed up the Aſſembly with a diſcourſe more prevalent than the former, and made it appear that her reſolution was unalterable: So that according to cuſtome, the Declaration of it was publiſhed unto the People, and all circumſtances were performed to make it more Authentique. To tell you Sir, how great was the grief of Baſilides, and aſtoniſhment of Myrinthus, is a thing not eaſie. Baſilides knew not what to think of her deſign, whether it proceeded out of love to Myrinthus, or averſion unto himſelf; but as for Myrinthus, he durſt not think himſelf to be the cauſe of this her reſolution, nor knew he unto what to attribute it. In the mean time, this Declaration made a mighty noiſe in Corinth, and never did a ſecret cauſe produce greater events; yet the general opinion was, that the Queen was jealous of her Authority, and would not divide it with any by marriage: Some ſaid it was her love to the Liberal Sciences, which inſpired her with an averſion unto Marriage; but there was not one did vote it to be for the love of Myrinthus. Philiſta her ſelf not being able to comprehend it, took ſo much liberty as to ask the Queen: I beſeech you Madam (ſaid ſhe unto her) what ought I to think of your Majeſties deſign? Is it policy which ſuggeſted it unto you? No no, Philiſta (ſaid ſhe unto her and ſighed) This reſolution which ſeems to be grounded upon reaſons of State, is grounded only upon reaſons of Love: For indeed my dear Philiſta, by giving Philimena unto Myrinthus, I ſhall drive Myrinthus, out of my heart, and by conſequence make it incapable of entertaining any other affection, or eſpecially the love of Baſilides: And thus, that I might at leaſt in appearance, though not in reallity, enjoy my liberty, I have reſolved never to marry; and to keep Baſilides from any murmur, I have ſettled my Crown upon him: Madam, replied Philiſta, were Baſilides only ambitious, this might peradventure keep him from diſcontent, but ſince he is in love, methinks it ſhould grieve him: Since I am full of phantaſtical and extraordinary thoughts, replied the Queen, I have one for Baſilides, which I confeſs is very unjuſt: For truly, Philiſta, though I am ſure I can never love him, and though his affection is extreamly troubleſome unto me, yet ſometimes I wiſh that he would love me ever; love me ſo far, as never to marry as long as he lived, that ſo the Crown which now I wear may fall upon Myrinthus. This is the only innocent way I know to make him a King, which ſhall be if this phantaſtical reaſon do hit, not but that my imagination is ſhrewdly wounded, when it phancieth my Crown upon Philimena's Head: But for all that, the pleaſing thought that perhaps the Scepter may fall into the hands of Myrinthus, does tranſport me above all other conſiderations; and I cannot for my life but wiſh, that Baſilides ſhould extreamly love me, that the Crown might fall upon the head of Myrinthus. In the mean time, to teſtifie that this paſſion which yet reigns in my heart is as pure as phantaſtical, obſerve I conjure you, how I will live with him who is the cauſe of it: For after I have done that which becomes my glory, I muſt go a little further, and ſo fully perſwade Myrinthus, that I am an abſolute Miſtreſs of my own thoughts, that he ſhall be forced to eſteem me as much as I love him. And indeed Sir, though the Queen hath ever ſince done all that was in her power to advance the fortunes of Myrinthus, yet ſhe never moved him unto any more familiarity with her, than he uſed to have before Steſilea acquainted him with the thoughts ſhe had of him. But Sir, the greateſt wonder of this adventure is, that Myrinthus, whoſe ſoul as I told you was naturally of an ambitious temper, did preſently cool the heat of his affection to Philimena: for in a very ſhort time after his marriage, he grew ſo melancholly and reſerved, as it was evident, that ſhe had not compleated his happineſs. But though one is naturally apt to ſhare in the ſorrows of that perſon whom one loves, yet the grief that appeared in the countenance of Myrinthus never troubled Cleobuline, for ſhe quickly knew that Myrinthus did not love Philimena, and that he was her Husband, but not her Lover; her ſatisfaction reſted not here: For be pleaſed to know Sir, that after ambition had quenched his flames of Love to Philimena, that very ſame ambition kindled his Love of Cleobuline, and ſo deſperately, as he was ready to run out of his Wits and reaſon: He did what he could to hide his paſſion, both from Baſilides and Philimena, and ſince he knew by Steſilea how nice ſhe was in ſuch things, he durſt not ſo much as give the Queen the leaſt hint of it. The Queen for her part diſguiſed her thoughts as much as ſhe could, and endeavoured with all her power that Myrinthus ſhould not perceive that ſhe loved him ſtill, or that ſhe knew that he loved her; and the more ſhe knew Myrinthus was in love with her, the farther ſhe was off. On the other ſide, Baſilides perceiving the paſſion of Myrinthus, began to hate him; and Philimena alſo having ſome ſuch jealouſie, did wiſh ſo ill unto Cleobuline, as ſhe laboured all ſhe could with Baſilides to raiſe a Rebellion in the State: And it is moſt ſure, that Myrinthus had never any further ſatisfaction, than to imagine that the Queen did love him, becauſe he knew ſhe did ſo formerly; and the Queen for her part never looked further than to know that Myrinthus loved her, without giving him the leaſt ſign of her love. In the mean time Sir, ſince it is to be feared that the paſſion of Baſilides is in the concluſion to raiſe a Civil War, I moſt humbly beſeech you Sir, to ſignifie unto Thimochares who hath a great influence upon the Queen, that you are perſwaded her reſolution of never marrying may produce dangerous conſequences: As there are very many obligations upon me to Baſilides, doubtleſs I ſhall be ready to do him any good office; but I do proteſt unto you Sir, that it is more the Queens intereſt, than that of Baſilides which moves me unto this requeſt; for it is almoſt impoſſible that any ſhould know her, and not devote himſelf more unto her ſervice, than unto any other. For Sir, to end the hiſtory of this Princeſs as I begun it, I do moſt confidently aſſure you, that there is not any lives on earth who can ſurpaſs her in virtue.

Philocles having ended his relation, Cyrus made an Elogy in Praiſe of the Corinthian Queen, as high as poſſible, repeating all her vertues one after another, and inſiſting principally upon that power which ſhe had over her ſelf in hiding a moſt violent paſſion: For truly, ſaid he, I know by this, that ſhe muſt needs have a ſoul much greater than mine; ſince when I was at Sinope, and fell in love with Mandana, I was never able to vanquiſh that paſſion, though I had then ſtronger reaſons to decline loving that Princeſs, than Cleobuline had not to declare her affection unto Myrinthus; Therefore Philocles, I muſt conclude the Queen of Corinth to be worthy of all thoſe glorious Characters which you have given her: And I do aſſure you, that if I do tell Thimochares what you deſire, I ſhould tell him, it ſhall be only for the love of you: Since certainly to follow the pure dictates of my own heart, I ſhould never adviſe a Princeſs who is in love, to marry a Prince whom ſhe loves not. However, ſince I do believe your intentions good, and ſince you know the people better than I do, and in what ſphere the Spirits of the Court do move, I promiſe you to do as you deſire. After this, it being very late, Philocles retired unto the Tent which was provided for him, and left Cyrus in thoughts of envy againſt Myrinthus, wiſhing with moſt paſſionate zeal, that Mandana as tenderly loved him, as the Queen of Corinth did Myrinthus.

ARTAMENES,

OR THE

GRAND CYRUS.

PART VII. Book III.

THe next morning, Thimocares coming to Cyrus, that Prince performed his promiſe unto Philocles; but yet he knew very well, that he gave ſuch counſel as the Queen of Corinth would not follw: Yet to teſtifie how much he eſteemed that Princeſs, he doubled his civilities upon Thimochares, to whom he ſhewed all the works. After which, and after a moſt Princely Banquet, Thimochares returned unto his Fleet, deſiring to be on land no longer, leaſt ſome unforeſeen accident ſhould fall out. He was no ſooner gone, but one of thoſe men whom Cyrus ſent with Spitridates came into the room; he no ſooner ſaw him; but being extreamly impatient to know what news, he deſired him to acquaint him; but firſt he gave a Letter from Tigranes, in which he found theſe words.

TIGRANES unto the Illuſtrious CYRUS.

SIR,

THe Prince Spitridates being wounded in his right hand, it muſt be mine that muſt let you know, how he is ſo unfortunate, as that he cannot accept of thoſe generous offers which you made him: For after he had met with the Raviſher of the Princeſs Araminta, whom I cannot call Brother; and after he had fought with him whilſt I was another way in queſt of that Princeſs, he eſcaped his revenge, after he had ſlightly wounded him in the right hand, and imbarqued at the Galatian Port, whether he followed him, and where we imbarqued alſo, though we know not directly which way he hath taken. After this Sir, I have no more to ſay, but to tell you, that the acknowledgments of Prince Spitridates to you, are as great as his ſorrows, and that my anger againſt Phraartes doth equal them both, though it doth not exceed my zeal unto your glory.

TIGRANES.

After the reading of this Letter, Cyrus enquired very particularly of him who brought it, how Spitridates did meet Phraartes? and by him underſtood that it was in a Wood; that Phraartes at firſt taking Spitridates for him, would have fled, but one of the men knowing him to be Spitridates, did firſt aſſault him; that all their men fought, but in concluſion, Phraartes ſeeing Tigranes afar off with his Squadron, he ran away, and got into a thick wood, where we loſt the ſight of him; that afterwards they underſtood, Araminta during the combat was in a Shepherds Cabbin; ſome two hundred paces from the place where they fought, and that Phraartes went and took her away, and carried her into a Port within thirty furlongs of the place, where thoſe who guarded her had provided a Ship; and that he was no ſooner come unto this Port, but he imbarqued; ſome reporting that he was wounded. This man related further ther, That Spitridates and Tigranes making towards that place, did come too late; and that they reſolved to imbarque alſo, and to carry with them thoſe whom you gave unto them, and at laſt ſent him to relate the paſſage.

When Cyrus had heard all that concerned Spitridates, he underſtood from Feraulas, that Arianita making no queſtion but Cumes would be taken, was gone out of Sardis to Thybarra with Doraliſa, whoſe Aunt had there ſome Eſtate and Buſineſs; and therefore ſhe was gone unto that place where ſhe might be near her Princeſs and Miſtreſs, when ſhe was releaſed: Feraulas ſaid further, that Pherenice having no mind to leave her was gone along with her. The Prince Myrſiles, who was preſent when Feraulas told this news unto Cyrus, was much joyed in his hopes of ſeeing Doraliſa at the end of the Siege. But Cyrus had no ſooner done with Feraulas, than an Envoy from the Prince Philaxippes was brought unto him, and another from the Prince of Cicily, who ſent Ships unto him, inſomuch as Cyrus ſeeing freſh hopes of vanquiſhing and releaſing Mandana, his ſoul was all tranquility; but this calm laſted not long: For Mazares remembring that the King of Pontus had ſtill the ſame Heliotropes wherewith he got Mandana out of Sardis, was extreamly ſad; and deſiring to communicate his ſorrows unto his Rival alſo, he told Cyrus of it the very ſame hour, who was ſo ſurprized at the apprehenſion of it, that his wonder was as great as his grief: Alas Mazares, unto what end is this Siege, to caſt up any works, to have a puiſſant Navy, to have made a conſiderable breach, to have begun a Treaty, which in all probability will produce happy effects, if our Rival can ſtill ſteal himſelf out of ſight, and carry our Princeſs from us? Alas Mazares, I know not what to think, nor can have any conſtancy of hope; I cannot chuſe but fear this accident, againſt which there are no orders to be given: Oh heavens, how comes it to paſs I ſhould be ſo forgetful, and ſo blind, as not to foreſee this miſery? Doubtleſs the Gods have permitted, replied Mazares, to the end you ſhould go on with the Siege of Cumes ſo glorioully as you have done. But alas, replied Cyrus, to what purpoſe is it to have ſo happily advanced it in ſpite of all the obſtacles that Nature and men could block in our way, ſince the quality of one little ſtone can render all our travels unprofitable? Perhaps at this very hour Mandana is not in Cumes, but that our Rival hath carried her away the third time: Truly Mazares I know not what to ſay or think, but I am ſure, that I will never pardon my treacherous memory; Oh heavens, that ſuch a drowſie ſleepineſs of ſpirits ſhould poſſeſs my thoughts, in a buſineſs upon which depends all the good and bad fortune of my life. Alas, alas, I did but flatter my ſelf with falſe hopes; for I muſt confeſs, that when I ſaw all things in ſo good a condition, I did not only begin to hope, but alſo to believe that I had ill expounded the menaces of the Gods in their Oracles; alſo ill underſtood the anſwer of Sybil, as likewiſe the anſwer of Jupiter Belus unto the King of Aſſiria: But now I plainly perceive, that deceiving my ſelf, in thinking I was deceived, and that I am not yet at the end of my misfortunes. As ſoon as Cyrus had pronounced theſe words, a Souldier was brought unto him, who ſaid he had a Letter to preſent unto him; Cyrus then asked him from whom it was? But he anſwered, that he could not tell; all he knew was, that it was written by a Priſoner who was carefully guarded in a Bythinian Caſtle, which joyns upon Galatia; and that it was given unto him by one of his Guards whom he had ſuborned, with orders to bring it unto him. Cyrus then taking this Letter, not knowing from whom it came, he opened it, and found theſe words.

The King of Aſſiria unto CYRUS.

SIR,

Fortune, which is reſolved to load me with all ſorts of miſeries, is not ſatisfied that I ſhould owe you my life, but will alſo have me a debtor to you for my liberty: Remember Sir, that you can never enjoy Mandana, as long as I am a Priſoner to Arſamones; ſince you can never overcome me unleſs you releaſe me, nor have the poſſeſſion of that Princeſs unleſs you do overcome me, according unto your promiſe at Sinope. Remember it, that Cyrus is obliged to make good all the promiſes of Artamenes, and deny not an unfor- unfortunate Lover the ſatisfaction of hoping, either to be revenged, or dye; and let him never be a Spectator of his Rivals Triumph.

The King of Aſſiria.

See generous Prince (ſaid Cyrus unto Mazares, and gave him the Letter after he had diſmiſſed him who brought it)See here,that our Rival is not dead: And conſider I pray you, unto what odd adventures Dame Fortune doth expoſe me. Mazares then taking the Letter read it, and then agreed that the deſtiny of Cyrus was moſt ſtrange: But though he was reſolved to love without hope, and never to pretend any thing unto Mandana,yet he could not chuſe but be a little pleaſed at the root of his heart, to ſee a new obſtacle unto the happineſs of Cyrus, yet he was ſo generous as to hide this thoughts from a Rival who was ſo kind unto him, and to lament in appearance at the thing which he inwardly rejoyced at. In the mean time, though it was a moſt cruel task for Cyrus to releaſe a Rival, and ſuch a Rival as would not value liberty, but only to diſpute with him for the enjoyment of Mandana, unto whom he could not pretend any right; yet he did not pauſe upon it at all, but preſently took a reſolution worthy of his great heart. For ſince he had another Rival for a witneſs of his carriage in the buſineſs, he ſurmounted his repugnancy of doing ſervice unto an Enemy. Though I did never promiſe the King of Aſſiria (ſaid he unto Mazares) but only to fight with him, and not to fight for him, yet I will conſent unto his demand, and that as ſoon as I can, to the end, that if by good fortune the King of Pontus do not make uſe of that fatal ſtone, whoſe prodigious quality hath coſt me ſo much trouble, but that we do deliver Mandana, I may then be the ſooner a Conqueror, or Conquered. Mazares hearing Cyrus ſpeak thus, could not choſe but out of a thought of deferring the liberof one Rival, and the good fortune of the other, tell him that his generoſity went abundantly too far: But Cyrus being prompted both by honour and love to make his reſolution good, did not alter it. No, no, Mazares (ſaid he unto him) I muſt not let the King of Aſſiria think that his valour is terrible to me, nor give Mandana any cauſe to think, that I ſpare my ſelf a combat, to aſſure my ſelf of her Conqueſt. After this, both theſe Princes began to imagine, how the King of Aſſiria could be in Bithinia, and why Arſamones ſhould retain him; and after good conſideration of it, they conceived that this Prince at his departure from Sardis, had received ſome falſe intelligence concerning Mandana, which made him bend his courſe that way, and that being known, Arſamones arreſted him, yet they could not well imagine his reaſon: For though they knew that the Princeſs Iſtrina, whom the King of Aſſiria ſo ſlighted at Babilon, in the time of the Queen Nitocris, was the Niece of Arſamones, and was then with him, as well as the Prince Intaphernes, whom the King of Aſſiria did ſo affront; yet they could not conceive this to be a ſufficient reaſon for arreſting this Prince; nor could they imagine why Arſamones having arreſted him, ſhould make a ſecret of it.

But at laſt, not being able to comprehend the reaſons Cyrus bethought himſelf how he ſhould releaſe the Aſſyrian King; and after a ſerious conſideration, he reſolved upon two ways; The one, to give orders for the drawing out of all Galatian and Cappadocian Garriſons, and of them compoſe a flying Army, which ſhould quarter as neer the Frontiers of Bithinia as they could: The other, to ſend unto Arſamones to demand the King of Aſſiria, with orders to offer a Ranſome proportionable unto the Quality of the Priſoner, and to the Magnificence of the Offerer. After which, if Arſamones ſhould refuſe to reſtore him, then, he who is to command the Forces quartering upon the Bithinian Frontiers, ſhould advance towards the Caſtle where he is kept, and endeavour to ſurprize it. But Cyrus did not conceive it juſt, to weaken that Army wherewith he was to releaſe Mandana, to go and releaſe his Rival.

This deſign being reſolved upon, he looked upon Hidaſpes as the fitteſt to go and put it into execution, commanding him to take the man who brought the King of Aſſiria's Letter along with him: and for the quicker expedition of the buſineſs, he diſpatched his Orders the ſame day into Galatia and Capadocia by the Poſts which he had placed in all the Dominions of Ciaxares, to the end, that when Hidaſpes came, he might find things ready for the execution of his deſign. But oh heavens (ſaid Cyrus, as he was giving his laſt Orders about this enterprize) ſince I am obliged to imploy a'l my cares for the liberty of my Princeſs, muſt I be alſo neceſſitated to take care for the liberty of my Rival? However, were I aſſured to ſee him ſhortly in ſuch a condition, as that I ſhould ſee him with a Sword in his hand, I ſhould cheer up my ſelf: But knowing the malignity of my Fates, I am almoſt certain to releaſe my Enemy before Mandana. In the mean time Mazares, who knew he had carried this Princeſs from the King of Aſſiria at Sinope, repenting himſelf of his firſt thoughts, and to repair his fidelity towards him, had now a mind to contribute unto his liberty: But ſince he had more wronged Mandana than the King of Aſſiria, and conſequently it more concerned him to repair the one than the other, he ſtaid in the Camp, to the end he might be preſent at the taking or rendition of Cumes, though the very imagination of the enterview between Cyrus and Mandana would cut him to the heart. In the mean time, ſince the Fates were reſolved to put the generoſity of Cyrus to the utmoſt teſt, there arrived a meſſenger from Arſamones, who having demanded private audience, obtained it from Cyrus, who received a Letter from Arſamones under his own hand; but it being only a Letter of credance, it was from the man who brought it, which Cyrus knew the propoſition which the King his Maſter made.

This Envoy being a man of parts, he prepared the mind of Cyrus by a very long Prologue, aggravating the unjuſt uſurpations of the Pontean Kings upon thoſe of Bithinia, and what violent affronts the King of Aſſiria had put upon a Prince and a Princeſs, who were ſo near related unto Arſamones: After which, deſiring to induce Cyrus unto a conſent unto what he ſhould deſire: The King my Maſter (ſaid he unto him, after he had ſufficiently aggravated all cauſes of complaint againſt thoſe two Princes) doth think himſelf to be happy amidſt his misfortunes, tunes, in having ſuch Enemies as yours, and cannot think that you will protect them againſt him. In this thought he hath commanded me to tell you, that knowing the King of Pontus will ere long be in your power, ſo the King of Aſſiria is already in his; and that if you will be pleaſed to put that uſurping Prince into his hands, he will put the King of Aſſiria into yours, unleſs you had rather have him keep him a Priſoner to rid you of an Enemy. I do not uſe, replied Cyrus, to rid my ſelf of my Rivals by any ſuch ways; and I cannot chuſe but wonder, that a Prince who hath ſo glorioully reconquered his Kingdom, ſhould deſire to rid himſelf of his Enemy in ſuch an ignoble way: But ſince Arſamones hath been ſo unjuſt, as to hold Spitridates in a rigorous Priſon, who is one of the moſt illuſtrious Princes upon earth, I need not think it ſtrange he ſhould deſire to uſe his Enemy ſo. However, though the King of Pontus be mine, and the King of Aſſiria alſo, yet I will never deliver the firſt unto the King of Bithinia, nor ſecure the other, as he adviſeth me; but on the contrary, I have ſeveral times offered the King of Pontus to reconquer his Dominions for him, if he will reſtore the Princeſs Mandana unto me; and I have this day ſent to offer the King your Maſter, the King of Aſſiria's Ranſome for his liberty. I pray judge after this, whether I can hearken unto any ſuch Propoſition as you make: But, Sir, replied the Meſſenger, theſe two Princes are your Rivals, your Enemies, and the Raviſhers of Mandana: It is moſt true, replied Cyrus, and therefore I am the more obliged to be revenged by honourable ways, and not to give them ſo much advantage, as to wound my reputation, which thanks be to the heavens, did never yet receive the leaſt blemiſh: Tell therefore your Maſter, that I neither can, nor ought to do as he deſires; and that if he be well adviſed, he will call home the Prince his Son, and ſuffer him to marry the Princeſs Araminta, whoſe virtues are high, to the end he may have a legitimate title to the Kingdom of Pontus, if the Fate of Arms ſhould chance to make him periſh in this War, to whom it now belongs. And as for the King of Aſſiria, I do intend to follow my firſt deſign in ſending to Arſamones about him.

This

This Envoy would have given farther reaſons unto Cyrus, but this Prince was ſo conſtant unto his firſt Principles, as he impoſed ſilence upon him: However, he gave Orders that he ſhould be treated well, and kept him two or three days in the Camp, to the end the Troops might have the more room to rendezvous. Whilſt he was there, Gadates underſtanding that he was a Bithinian, and ſent by Arſamones, did much wonder that he ſhould hear nothing from Intaphernes his Son, nor from the Princeſs Iſtrina his Daughter: But this Meſſenger telling him that they knew not of his journey, his wonder ceaſed; and he writ unto them by him when he departed with Hidaſpes. After which, Cyrus had more reſtleſs thoughts than he was able to Maſter; for as oft as he thought that Mandana was not in Cumes his ſorrows were unexpreſſible. The ſad diſaſter at Sinope, and that which he had at Sardis, made him apprehend ſuch fears of taking Cumes, and not finding Mandana in it, that he was not in leſs ſorrow than if the misfortune had happened already. In the mean time, theſe his fears, which ſeemed ſo well grounded, proved ſhadows, and the King of Pontus was as much perplexed at the loſs of this Heliotrope, as Cyrus was in the belief that he ſtill had it. Indeed, as oft as he remembred, that as he imbarked at the Port of Atarnes in ſuch haſte, when he took Spitridates for Cyrus, that he gave all his Heliotropes unto one of his men to carry, and when he remembred that he to whom he gave them did in the Tumult let them fall into the Sea, he was in a moſt deſperate condition, accuſing himſelf of extream indiſcretion for making ſo bad a choice of him he truſted, for the nearer the Truce was at an end, the further off was he of finding out any ways of eſcaping with Madana. The Prince of Cumes, who ſaw his State loſt if this Princeſs got out, had always a moſt watchful eye over the King of Pontus; ſo that which way ſoever he looked, all ſeemed diſaſterous to him: If he looked upon Mandana, he ſaw her ſtill incenſed againſt him: If he looked upon the Prince of Cumes, he ſaw his Protector become his Spy: If he turned his eyes towards the Sea, he ſaw a puiſſant Navy: If he looked towards the Land, he ſaw Works, Forts, and Souldiers reſolved to vanquiſh or dye: If he looked upon upon the Walls of Cumes, he ſaw ſuch a breach, as would let in Cyrus upon the firſt aſſault: If he looked upon the Inhabitants of that Town, he heard nothing but murmures againſt him; and if he conſidered himſelf, he found that he was the moſt unfortunate man in the world, whether he looked upon himſelf as a Lover, or only as a King without a Kingdom, or as the Enemy of Cyrus; for though he was obliged unto him, and might be more, if he would have accepted his generous offers, yet now he was nothing but a lump of black melancholy, ſince he could ſee no way to eſcape, and could not reſolve to part with Mandana. In the mean while, that faithful Agent which Cyrus had in the Town, negotiated under-hand with the people, and diſpoſed them to revolt, in caſe the Prince of Cumes and the King of Pontus ſhould not accept of the offers of Cyrus, at the return of thoſe whom they had ſent to Licambes, to Pactias, to the Caunians. and to the Xanthians. This man was ſo active, and ſo fit for ſuch an imployment (his name was Tiſernes) that he alone had inſpired the Spirit of Revolt through all the Town: There was not one publick place in all Cumes unto which he did not go two or three times in a day: If he ſaw any two men talking together, he would be ſure to make the third, and with a cunning ingenuity, bring them unto his opinion: There was not a day on which he had not ſome horrid news or other to affright the people, which was circumſtanced and diſperſed, as it grew into a general belief. On the other ſide, Anaxaris, he was not without his ſhare of perplexities, not but that he was treated with all the civility that a Priſoner of War could be, nor was his Priſon ſuch a place as that he could complain againſt it; and if his ſoul had not been more a captive than his body, he would eaſily have endured his misfortune.

But ſince there is nothing more dangerous to look upon than a Beauty in Miſery; and ſince the Princeſs Mandana was the faireſt unfortunate that ever was, Anaxaris, whoſe ſoul was of a paſſionate and tender temper, could not look upon her but needs muſt love her. At the firſt he did attribute all his tender thoughts which he had of that Princeſs unto the compaſſion which he had of her misfortunes; tunes. He thought alſo for a while that it was as much the intereſt of Cyrus as the intereſt of Mandana, which made him ſo ſenſible of all that concerned her: But at the laſt his paſſion did ſo augment, that he knew the greatneſs of it, and knew it without any power to reſiſt it: Since he ſaw Mandana every day, the fair eyes of this Princeſs did kindle ſuch a violent flame in the heart of this violent unknown one, as all his reaſon could not not quench it; not but that he ſaw very well that never any love could kindle with ſmaller hopes than his; but yet not being a maſter of his own heart, he could not rule the motions of it, all that he was able to do, was to know he ought not to love Mandana; yet in excuſe of his irregular paſſion, it muſt be ſaid, that he ſaw Mandana in ſuch a manner, as it was a very hard matter not to love her; he ſaw her in ſecret, and with ſome difficulty; and ſince it was by him ſhe knew the ſtate of the Siege, ſince ſhe found him a very accompliſhed man, and looked upon him as the friend of Cyrus, and as a Priſoner of War in her behalf, ſhe uſed him with as much civility as it was poſſible for her to expreſs. Moreover, ſince they were both of them Priſoners, this conformity made ſuch a kind of equality between them, as rendred her civilities more ſweet and obliging. It may be further ſaid in his excuſe, that Mandana was never fairer than at that time: Indeed it may be ſaid, that her Priſon did only keep her from being Sun-burnt, and preſerved the freſhneſs of her complexion, he ſaw her then fair, ſweet, civil and in miſery, and he ſaw her thus every day: So that his heart being tentered by the tears of Mandana, Love did more eaſily wound it, and wounded it with ſuch a poyſoned Arrow, that the wound was incurable. Alas, ſaid he unto himſelf, (when he conſidered the misfortune into which he was fallen) What can I ever pretend unto by this paſſion? Is it not the madeſt fondneſs in the world to love ſuch a perſon, who neither can, nor ought to love me again, though ſhe did know the violence of my paſſion towards her? For her heart belongs only to Cyrus, by ſo many ſeveral rights, as it would be the greateſt extravagancy that ever was, to pretend any thing unto her; the inclination of Mandana is only to him, Ciaxares hath promiſed this Princeſs to him, and his incomparable valour hath conquered her; he hath fought and won ſeveral battels for her, he hath ſubjected ſeveral Provinces and Kingdoms to her, and will e're long take Cumes, and reſtore her to liberty: Judge Anaxaris what hopes thou haſt of Mandana, thou whom ſhe knows not, who dares not make thy ſelf known unto her, and whom ſhe could not love, though ſhe did know thee: Never think to conquer that heart which the Conqueror of Aſia hath conquered. Conſider, that thou canſt not do as the King of Aſſiria, the King Pontus, and the Prince Mazares did; reſolve couragiouſly to baniſh that Princeſs out of thy heart who can never give thee hers. But alas (ſaid he and reprehended himſelf) what good will it do me to oppoſe reaſon againſt an unruly paſſion, which glories in ſcorning it? The more unfortunate I ſee my Rivals, the more I excuſe my own error; and ſince the King of Aſſiria, the King of Pontus, and Mazares were not able to defend themſelves from the charms of Mandana, why ſhould I be aſhamed in my non-ability to reſiſt them? The firſt of theſe loved her when he was unknown as I am; the ſecond, though at the rate of whole Kingdoms, yet muſt love her, ſo far as to become her Raviſher; and the third, though he knew ſhe loved Cyrus, though he knew he was both Cozen and friend unto the King of Aſſiria, could not chuſe but love her, and commit a double treaſon in carrying her away. Know and believe Anaxaris for thy juſtification, that the charms of this Princeſs are inevitable; and that to fail after three ſuch great Princes as I have named, is no weakneſs; ſubmit then Anaxaris, ſubmit unto Mandana, ſince thou canſt not reſiſt her; and without knowing why thou loveſt, or without conſidering the ſequel of ſo fond a paſſion, endeavour only to pleaſe her. Who can tell (ſaid he further to himſelf) whether all my Rivals will not ruine one another? and whether I may not thrive by their ruines? Alſo ſince I cannot chuſe but love Mandana, I have no way elſe but to delude my ſelf as long as I can, for ſuch is the compoſition of my ſoul, that though I were certain Cyrus were to enjoy her to morrow, yet I could not chuſe but love her. In the mean time, as hot as the love of Anaxaris was, yet he had reaſon enough to rule himſelf ſo far, as not to make his paſſion known unto the Princeſs who cauſed it; ſo that behaving himſelf towards her with a profound reverence, and unparallelled complacency, ſhe grew very friendly towards him. But to render himſelf more acceptable, and that he might the oftener ſee her, when he heard no news, he would invent it; and ſince he could not invent any wherein Cyrus was not brought in, and to be acceptable unto Mandana, he muſt needs bring him in advantagiouſly; therefore he was extreamly troubled to contrive it: His paſſion brought one extream perplexity upon him; for knowing that the King of Pontus ploted how to get Mandana out of Cumes, he was at a ſtand, whether he ſhould wiſh that Cyrus ſhould releaſe her, or the King of Pontus carry her away: If the firſt happened, he concluded that Cyrus would preſently be happy, and Mandana at his diſpoſe; but if the King of Pontus carried her away, perhaps he ſhould never ſee her again: So that chuſing rather to ſee her enjoyed by Cyrus, than never to ſee her, he was very vigilant that the King of Pontus ſhould not execute his deſign. Alſo knowing by Perſodes, that Cyrus and the King of Aſſiria were to fight before any marriage of Mandana, love moved him to fancy more advantage to himſelf by Cyrus releaſing her, than by the King of Pontus his carrying her away: So that making uſe of that correſpondency which he had with thoſe Guards whom Marteſia had ſuborned, he carried the buſineſs ſo, as he gained almoſt half the Garriſon. But ſince he had nothing to give them, he tampered with them, by telling them of the liberality of Cyrus, and put them in hopes to be highly recompenced, if they kept the Princeſs Mandana for him.

Thus, making uſe of his Rivals virtue to forther his deſign, he advanced it ſo happily, that he was almoſt as powerful in the Caſtle where Mandana was, as either the King of Pontus, or the Prince of Cumes; and if to make himſelf Maſter of it had been enough to releaſe Mandana, doubtleſs he had tried it. But ſince that Caſtle commanded only one little part of the Town, that was not ſufficient; alſo, ſince he might poſſibly fail in the enterprize, prize, he feared leſt in attempting to releaſe Mandana, he ſhould make her more miſerable: So that to run no hazard, he deferred his deſign until he had got more Souldiers.

This being the ſtate of things, thoſe who were ſent unto the Xanthians, to the Caunians, to Licambes, and to Pactias, returned, and reported unto the King of Pontus and the Prince of Cumes, that all of them thought it his only courſe to accept of the Propoſitions which Cyrus offered; Pactias and Licambes ſent word, that fear was in their Army, and how they were perſwaded, that if Cumes were taken without compoſition their Troops would all diſperſe the next day out of apprehenſions that Cyrus would fall upon them; ſo that they were jealous of the Event, if the Treaty were not concluded: As for the Xanthians and the Caunians, they asked no more, but a ſpeedy agreement to what was offered. Theſe Meſſengers then bringing with them words of peace, and being come to the Gates of Cumes, the people being incited by Tifernes, did in an inſtant flock about them, and asked them in a tumultuous and violent manner, what news they brought? So that the Meſſengers to appeaſe them, ſaid they brought news of Peace. This word Peace was no ſooner pronounced, but paſſing from mouth to mouth, it cauſed ſuch loud acclamations, that all the people ran to the place where thoſe ſhouts of joy made the air ring a pleaſing peal unto men that were weary of a tedious Siege. The Meſſengers were ſo environed with men, that they could not walk; do what they could, the crowd increaſed, before they had gone through one ſtreet, the greater half of all the people in Cumes had flocked into two or three ſtreets. In the mean while Tifernes, who would not let ſuch a favourable opportunity ſlip, went into the midſt of this preſs, to bring things unto ſuch a paſs as he deſired: He encouraged ſome in their deſires of Peace, unto others he ſaid, that he heard ſay that the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes would not accept of it; adding further, that it might be made without them, or elſe to force them to it: That the way to have Peace, was to open the Gates of Cumes unto Cyrus, who of an Enemy would become their Protector, if they would de-the Princeſs Mandana to him. Tiſernes had no ſooner ſpoken this, but every one repeated it unto their companions, and they to others, adding more or leſs tartneſs, according to the temper of the rabble. Thus he did ſow ſuch ſeditious ſeeds amongſt the multitude, as it was eaſie to be underſtood by their cryes, which were heard from all parts, that if they refuſed Peace, the people would fly to the laſt refuge, and make it by force: When any Agents of the King of Pontus offered to oppoſe ſuch tumultuous opinions, they threatned to kill them, and ſtopped their mouths. On the other ſide, the Prince Anaxaris being advertiſed of what paſſed in the Town, he began to tamper with the Souldiers, as Tiſernes did amongſt the people, ſtill uſing the name of Cyrus to bring them unto his bend. Sometimes he would tell them of the high recompences he would give them, otherwhiles he would intimate the glory which they would get in fighting for the future under ſuch an illuſtrious Conquerour, perſwading them, that they would all loaden themſelves with riches under him. Then to take from others all ſcruple of Treaſon, he added, that by this act they would render the State unto the Prince their Maſter, and that he would ingage his word to ſerve him as much as he could: So that taking all ſhame out of their action, by talking of Glory, of Recompence, and of Riches, he brought them to promiſe that they would do whatſoever he deſired them. In the mean while, the meſſengers having rendred their anſwers unto the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes; the firſt of theſe was extreamly perplexed, for he ſaw plainly that the other wiſhed Peace: So that not daring to oppoſe his Protector in downright terms, he only conjur'd him as his laſt favour, to protract the buſineſs a few daies longer, under pretence of ſecurity for the Treaty, hoping, that ſince it was in a month when the winds uſe to be high, and the Sea rough and turbulent, a ſtorm might happily ariſe, and diſperſe the two Fleets which blocked up Cumes, and ſo the Town might happily be ſaved, or at leaſt be able to get away Mandana. The King of Pontus being very importunate, he perſwaded the Prince of Cumes, yet their conteſt about it was ſo long, as the people had cauſe to think that theſe Princes did not accept thoſe offers of Peace which were made unto them. On the other ſide, Cyrus having ſeen the Meſſengers as they paſſed; and underſtanding by the Heraulds who convoyed them, that they reported words of Peace, he did not doubt of it: So that this Prince ſeeing himſelf upon the very point of being either happy or miſerable,to releaſe Mandana, or to loſe her; to make a Peace, or to begin a War; he doubled all his diligence and cares, and began to beſtir himſelf, as if the Truce ended the very ſame hour, and to order all things for a general aſſault; Phiocles and Leontidas returned in all haſte to their Fleet: The Prince Mazares to his Quarter; The Prince Artamas unto his; Perſodes to the place where the Artillery was, and the generous Megabates with all the Voluntiers about Cyrus waited with much impatience for an anſwer from thoſe who were beſieged: But the greateſt fear was, that perhaps the King of Pontus would ſteal away Mandana by the help of the Heliotrope; yet ſometimes his hope was, that this Princeſs remembering her adventure of Sardis, would not be ſo eaſily deluded: But for all this, his fears were above his hopes; ſo that every minute ſeemed an Age unto him. And ſince the conteſt between the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes was very long; and ſince he all that while received no anſwer, he ſent a Herauld to demand it, thinking that this might more eaſily induce the people to revolt.

But for the better furtherance of his deſign, he commanded the Herauld to tell thoſe beſieged Princes,that if they would not that very hour give him a poſitive anſwer, he would give an aſſault upon the Town, appointing the Herauld alſo to diſperſe this report amongſt the people as they went through the ſtreets; and indeed the man did perform his charge ſo very well, as he ſtruck terror into the hearts of all the People in going to the Caſtle; and Tiſernes cloſing with this occaſion, did blow their terror into fury, and made this multitude reſolve to take Arms in their hands if this Herau'd received not a favourable anſwer unto his meſſage. They alſo reſolved to ſeize upon the perſons of the two Princes, to ſeize upon the Gates, to let Cyrus enter, and to go afterwards unto the place where Mandana was. In the mean time, Anaxaris having a deſire to ſignalize himſelf,and to make Mandana in ſome ſort obliged unto him for her liberty, he hearing that this Herauld was with the Princes, and fearing that they would not conclude ſuch a Peace as he wiſhed, he began to make uſe of thoſe Souldiers which he had gained, and to make himſelf Maſter of the Caſtle, which the People called the Prince of Cumes his Palace, to the end that ſeizing upon the King of Pontus and Mandana, he might have that glory which he pretended unto. In the mean time, the Herauld which Cyrus ſent, having received no poſitive anſwer to his demands, prepared for a return; but he no ſooner appeared at the Gate of the Caſtle, then the People, who did with much impatience expect him, began to ask him whether or no a Peace was concluded? Inſomuch as the man perceiving how much they deſired it, did boldly anſwer them (purpoſely to make them revolt) that their Princes would not hearken to it, and that Cyrus therefore, as ſoon as ever he was returned to the Camp would give a general aſſault. Theſe words were no ſooner heard, but a tumultous grumbling was amongſt the People, and Fury paſſing from Spirit to Spirit, did in a moment diſperſe it ſelf through all the Town, ſo that all the Inhabitants took up Arms, and laying aſide all reſpects, would break open the Gates of the Caſtle.

Anaxaris hearing this tumult, incenſed the greateſt part of the Garriſon; ſo that the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes being environed on all ſides with Enemies, they found themſelves in a pitiful condition: If they ſhould offer to go out of the Caſtle, they ſhould find the People all in fury with Arms in their hands; if they ſhould ſtay in the Caſtle, they ſaw they were not Maſters of it; that one part of their Souldiers would fight againſt the other, and that there was ſafety no where. The King of Pontus would then have gone to Mandana's Chamber, but the Guards, in lieu of obeying him, would themſelves ſeize upon her perſon, which Anaxaris coming then to that place, did moſt couragiouſly oppoſe.

The King of Pontus having got ſome Souldiers to his Party, would force his paſſage to her; ſo that Mandana out of her Window did ſee a very fierce combat between thoſe two Princes: 'Tis true, ſhe hardly ſaw them, but Marteſia ſaw more than ſhe did, yet ſhe ſaw enough to obſerve that Anaxaris fought for her with Heroick fury. In another place, the Prince of Cumes, to appeaſe the People, deſiring to ſhew himſelf unto them he was forced to retire; but he being come unto the place where the King of Pontus and Anaxaris fought, the skirmiſh was more bloody. But in concluſion, the Party of Anaxaris being the ſtronger, and the King of Pontus being wounded in the right arm, he muſt ſubmit; yet this Prince did not render himſelf, but remembring a back-pair of Stairs from Mandana's Chamber which went into a back-Court, he endeavoured to get up that way, leaving the Prince of Cumes hard ſet with thoſe who were upon him: But Anaxaris, who uſed all imaginable prudence in this buſineſs, had placed a Guard there, ſo that this unfortunate King not being able to have ſo much advantage as to die at Mandana's feet, and fearing to fall under the power of a Rival, whoſe generoſity he feared as much as his ſeverity, he ſought out how he might ſteal himſelf from the Victory of this great Prince: So that finding himſelf not able to fight, and ſeeing a Souldier, who was none of thoſe whom Anaxaris had gained, he got him to open a ſecret door which was in the Wall of the Caſtle, that Anaxaris did not know of, and out he went, reſolving to ſee if poſſible he could move the People to make ſome reſiſtance. He was no ſooner out, but he heard a moſt horrid noiſe, and underſtood from him with whom he lodged when he came firſt to Cumes, that the People had already ſeized upon the Gates of the Town, that they talked of letting the Troops of Cyrus to enter, that the greateſt part of the Souldiers were revolted, and that there was but three ways for him to chuſe, either to hide himſelf, or to be taken, or to be killed.

The King of Pontus being in this deſperate condition, and deſiring at leaſt to hide his ſhame, did accept of an offer which this man did make, which was, to go into a Garden of his that looked towards the Sea, and therefore might in the night time give him an opportunity of ſome Fiſhers Bark, when things were a little better ſettled, and the Fleet of Cyrus left blocking up the mouth of the Port: So that this unfortunate Prince leaving himſelf to the conduct of his angry deſtiny, followed this man in ſuch an extream rage and deſpair, as would have pitied the moſt cruel of his Enemies, if they had ſeen him in that pitiful condition: The abundance of blood which he loſt, had died all his cloaths ſanguine, his Sword was red with the blood of them he had killed, but he carried it in his left hand, his right hand having received a wound, which cauſed him to withdraw out of Combat.

As he walked in this poſture,his mind was full of ſuch ſad and violent thoughts, that if he had had ſtrength enough to kill himſelf, doubtleſs he had freed himſelf from all his misfortunes at a blow, but he had loſt ſuch abundance of blood, that he was forced to live only becauſe he could not die, and he was forced to lean upon a Souldier; and enter into that Garden which was to be his Sanctuary. In the interim, Anaxaris having none in Head before him but only the Prince of Cumes, he redoubled his valour the more furiouſly: But though his valiant Enemy was forced to fall at his feet when the King of Pontus parted from him, yet he made reſiſtance with extraordinary valour, being ſeconded by him who took Anaxaris Priſoner, whoſe name was Thraſiles. Thus the Conquered became Conqueror, and the Captive took his taker Priſoner: Valiant Prince (cried Anaxaris to the Prince of Cumes) do not force me to deſtroy you, I only deſire to releaſe the Princeſs Mandana, and not to hurt you: But in concluſion, ſeeing he would not yield, but ſtill reſiſted, he fell upon him with ſo much fury, that after many wounds received, he fell dead at his feet: His death yet did not end the combat; for the valiant Thraſiles ſeeing the Prince of Cumes dead, in lieu of yielding, did whet his courage, to revenge the death of his Prince, and to prevent being a Priſoner unto his Priſoner. But all he could do to vanquiſh or die, was in vain; to vanquiſh was impoſſible, and the generoſity of Anaxaris would not let him die; for deſiring to acknowledg thoſe civilities which he received during his impriſonment, he would not ſuffer any of his Party to kill him, but cauſing him to be ſurrounded by ten or twelve,he was forced to yield, as well as thoſe few of his men which remained. He had no ſooner laid down his Arms, but Anaxaris leaving him to be guarded by four Souldiers, went unto the Tower of the Caſtle, to ſee whether he was an abſolute Maſter of it, and to ſeek for the King of Pontus; but he found that he was eſcaped out of that little door which ſtood open; and that there was no other tumult, than what the People made at the Caſtle Gate. Anaxaris than preſenting himſelf unto theſe furious people; and having impoſed ſilence upon them, he let them underſtand, that the King of Pontus was not in the Caſtle, that he himſelf was Maſter of it, that their Prince was dead, and that the Princeſs Mandana was in his Power: That if they would permit him to ſend unto Cyrus, he would promiſe them to obtain for them more advantagious conditions than ever their Prince would aſſent unto. He had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but the Inhabitants, without any ſorrows for the death of their Prince, who had he lived would have puniſhed them, did all cry out with one voice, that they would all do as he would have them, & that they had already a deſign to ſend unto Cyrus with offers to deliver up unto him the Gates of the Town, of which they were already Maſters. Anaxaris deſiring to diſpatch one unto Cyrus, eſpied among the crowd the Herauld which that Prince ſent unto Cumes, who ſince he could not get out becauſe of the Tumult, ſtayed there to ſee what this diſorder would come unto: So that thinking it beſt to make uſe of him, he commanded him to come unto him, yet it went againſt the grain of Anaxaris to ſend this Meſſage, for had he followed the violent ſuggeſtions of his paſſionate ſoul, he would have defended the Caſtle both againſt the Inhabitants, & againſt Cyrus alſo.

But ſince this deſign was void of all reaſon, and without any ſhadow of thriving in it, he rejected the thought of it. But as ſoon as he deſired to ſpeak with the Herauld, the People bandying together in ſeveral herds, and after they had held a tumultuous Councel, began to cry, and ſay, that they would ſee the Princeſs Mandana before any was ſent unto Cyrus: The Inhabitants of Cumes having no mind to open their Gates unto that Prince, until they were well aſſured that they were able to render him that Princeſs whom he would releaſe, and until that Princeſs made them a promiſe to preſerve their Town. Anaxaris then being deſirous to give them ſatisfaction, ſaid that he would go unto her; and indeed he went unto the Chamber of that Princeſs, who was with much impatience and fear expecting the ſucceſs of this great tumult. But as ſoon as ſhe ſaw Anaxaris, ſhe began to hope the ſucceſs was happy, eſpecially when he came unto her, and in a moſt humble manner told her what the deſires of the Inhabitants were: Madam (ſaid he unto her) the ſtate of your Fortune is changed, for in lieu of being under the power of the Pontean King, the People of Cumes would ſhelter themſelves under your protection, and by me deſires to be honoured with the ſight of you: Generous ſtranger, replied Mandana, How great are my obligations to you? What does not the King my Father owe you? And how much acknowledgments may you expect from the illuſtrious Cyrus, for whom doubtleſs you did undertake this which you have with ſo much courage and good Fortune executed? As long as I was in the Army of Cyrus (replied Anaxaris and bluſhed) doubtleſs I fought for you, for the love of you only: And Madam, I beſeech you do not give unto him any part of what I have done in Cumes, ſince moſt certainly I did it only for the Princeſs Mandana, without the conſideration of any but her: However (added he, and would not give her leiſure to reflect upon his words) ſince the people, Madam, are impatient, ſince they have Arms in their hands, and ſince they may in a moment alter their reſolutions, I beſeech you, Madam, take a little pains for your liberty, to the end you may owe it unto none but your ſelf. Alas, generous Anaxaris, replied ſhe, that is impoſſible; and though I ought rather to ſay, that I am a debtor for it unto a hundred thouſand men, then unto my ſelf, yet I will confine it unto more narrow limits; and aſſure you, that it is unto two, whereof you are one, unto whom I am particularly obliged for it.

After this Mandana under the conduct of Anaxaris went unto a Balcone which was over the Gate of the Caſtle, Marteſia following her, where ſhe no ſooner ſhewed her ſelf, but the people did make huge ſhouts of joy: Yet they did not content themſelves with the ſight of her, but appointing ſix among themſelves, as Deputies for the reſt, Anaxaris let them enter into the Caſtle, and preſented them to the Princeſs Mandana, who received them as men who deſigned her delivery; and they were ſo charmed with her ſweetneſs, and dazled with her beauty, as they hardly knew what they ſaid: Some demanded that their Town might not be plundred, others that Cyrus would pardon them, and all peaking confuſedly together, it was not an eaſie matter to anſwer them. But at laſt, Mandana not only promiſing that their Town ſhould be preſerved, but alſo be endowed with new Priviledges, they conſented that ſhe ſhould ſend the ſame Herauld which Anaxaris would have ſent; yet upon conditions ſhe ſhould write unto that Prince, ſaying in a rude manner, that perhaps he would not give credit unto the Meſſenger; beſeeching the Princeſs further, for their greater ſecurity, that ſhe would be pleaſed to meet Cyrus at the Gate of the Town, and to preſent them unto him, with the Keys which they would offer him. Mandana not thinking it good to contradict thoſe men whom fear might make furious, conſented unto their demands; and without more delay, Marteſia gave her Pen, Ink, and Paper, wherein ſhe writ theſe words.

MANDANA unto CYRUS.

SIR,

Ince the valour of Anaxaris hath put me into a condition able to protect the Inhabitants of Cumes, I intreat you to incline unto clemency, to pardon a people who have done nothing but abeyed their Prince, to preſerve their Town, to forget it hath been my Priſon, and to obſerve the day of my liberty by a general Act of Oblivion: You have uſed to be ſo ſweet after a Victory, that I am confident you will not deny me; nor am I leſs confident, that you will keep that promiſe which I have made, as exactly, as I ſhall keep that which I make unto you, which is, to acknowledge, as long as I live, thoſe infinite obligations which are upon me.

MANDANA.

As ſoon as this Letter was written, Mandana gave it to the Herauld, who had orders alſo to tell Cyrus, that he ſhould advance with his Troops towards the principal Gate of the Town, where this Princeſs, with the Inhabitants of Cumes, would be ready to receive him; and ſo the Herauld making as much haſt as a man who carries good and great news, he came unto Cyrus juſt as he was ready to ſend another, to know what was the meaning of that tumult, which his Souldiers who were neareſt the Town did hear: As ſoon as Cyrus ſaw him, he asked him why he ſtayed ſo long, extreamly fearing to hear that the King of Pontus was vaniſhed with Mandana, by virtue of his inviſible Heliotrope: Sir, ſaid the Herauld, when you have read this Letter which I ſhall preſent unto you, I ſhall tell you the reaſon. But Cyrus no ſooner opened the Letter which the Herauld gave him, but knowing the hand of Mandana, he was ſo pleaſingly ſurprized, that abundance of joy diſſipating all fears, and chaſeing all melancholy from his heart, did ſo ſparkle in his eyes, as all thoſe who looked upon him might eaſily know he had received good news. But when he read the Letter, and ſaw hopes of ſoon ſeeing his Princeſs, and ſeeing her at liberty, all the eloquence upon the earth could not expreſs his joys, yet was he a little vexed, that another ſhould have a ſhare in the liberty of Mandana, for the zeal of his love was ſuch, as he wiſhed (if it had been poſſible) that he had delivered her without an Army, without any ſtratagems, and without the help of any but himſelf; yet this trivial perplexity laſted but a moment, and after it was over, he was raviſhed with joy, that the glory of ſerving the Princeſs in ſo high a manner, was reſerved for Anaxaris, whom he infinitely eſteemed. As ſoon as he had read Mandana's Letter, the joys which appeared in his countenance, paſſed into the hearts of all the Souldiers, as ſoon as ever this great news was publiſhed; he cauſed the Herauld to relate how all things paſſed, inquiring particularly concerning the King of Pontus: After which, he gave out all neceſſary orders, commanding all to be in Arms: Then in the Head of the Voluntiers and Homotimes, he went within Arrow-ſhot of the Gate, where he was to ſee Mandana, being alſo followed by as many Troops as he thought requiſite to ſecure Cumes when he was entered.

But ſince Cyrus could not go towards this Gate, but he muſt paſs through the Quarters of Mazares, therefore he acquainted him with the ſtate of things, and could not deny this generous Rival that favour which he asked: Sir (ſaid Mazares unto Cyrus, and ſighed, though glimpſes of joy appeared in his eyes for the liberty of Mandana) I beſeech you give me leave, as a puniſhment for carrying away the Princeſs, to be a witneſs this day of your glory and felicity; and let me find ſo much favour from you, as that I may aſſure the incomparable Mandana, that my repentance is Real: You know Sir, ſhe did me the honour to promiſe me her eſteem and friendſhip, if I would fight on your ſide, I beſeech you prompt her to be as good as her word; and the more to move you unto it, and alſo to force my ſelf unto an obſervance of my word unto you, I will make a new ſolemn oath unto you, never to fail, before the ſight of that divine Princeſs do put my virtue unto a new Teſt: Oh moſt generous Rival, ſaid Cyrus to him, I do profeſs that if the Princeſs Mandana did but know you as well as I do, ſhe would be unjuſt if ſhe preferred me before you. In the mean time, though out of reſentments of Love I ought to wiſh you could make a thouſand proteſtations in lieu of one, that you will never pretend to any thing further than to the friendſhip of this Princeſs; yet that you may not be always my Conquerour in point of generoſity, I will abſolutely truſt you, and be contented with your firſt promiſe, without any new Proteſtations: Come then (ſaid he unto him) come along with me, and be aſſured, that if you keep within thoſe limits which your virtue hath preſcribed unto your ſelf, you ſhall find a moſt real Friend in the perſon of a Rival, and infinite glory in the eſteem and friendſhip of our Princeſs. After this, theſe two generous Rivals rid together, and went towards the place where they were to ſee Mandana, but they went with very different thoughts, for the joys of Cyrus were only troubled by his impatient longing to ſee this Princeſs, and the joys of Mazares were troubled whether he would or no, at thoſe joys which he foreſaw Mandana would have at the ſight of Cyrus; yet he did ſo couragiouſly bridle the violence of his Love, that his vertue did keep within his preſcribed limits. In the mean while, Cyrus being come, as I told you, within Arrow-ſhot of the Gate of Cumes, he ſent a Summons unto the Inhabitants of the Town, to keep their word with him; and they, reſolving not to let him enter the Town, before he promiſed the Princeſs Mandana to preſerve them, went to conduct her to the Gate where they intended Cyrus ſhould enter: She not being in a condition to deny them any thing, conſented unto them, and in a Coach with Marteſia went to the Gate of the Town. Anaxaris leaving the ſubtil and couragious Tiſernes to command in the Caſtle in the mean time; not that the deſires of his paſſionate ſoul was to be preſent at this enterview; but becauſe he would not leave Mandana to the conduct of a furious multitude, therefore he followed on Horſeback; but he followed with a mind ſo full of unquiet thoughts, as he had much ado to reſtrain or hid them.

In the mean time, ſince a timorous and mutinous people do all things out of a giddy fancy without any reaſon, ſo the Inhabitants of Cumes, who had invited Cyrus to approach, took a toyiſh fancy, and would not let Mandana receive him within the Town, but would by all means have her come out of her Coach, and go out of the Gate, beyond the Bridg, to preſent unto him thoſe men who would offer him the Keys of their Town. On the other ſide, Cyrus who could not imagine that ever Mandana would come out of Cumes to meet him, but on the contrary, thought that he was to go into the Caſtle; therefore he waited with extream impatience on horſeback, untill they opened the Gates. He was that day in moſt glorious Armour, of ſo high a Garb, ſo Noble and ſo Pleaſing, as he attracted the eyes of all the world. Being then in all the impatience that ſtrong hopes of a near happineſs could inſpire, he fixed his eyes upon the Port of Cumes: Mazares looking that way as well as he, though with leſs hopes and impatience of another nature. And as theſe two generous Rivals were thus in expectation; they ſaw the Gates open, and Mandana immediately to appear conducted by Anaxaris, but ſhe appeared more fair and fuller of Charms than ever, her joys to ſee Cyrus and her ſelf at liberty, did ſo ſparkle in her eyes, and elevate her ſpirits, that her Beauty was fuller of luſtre. In the mean time Cyrus and Mazares no ſooner ſaw her, but they allighted immediately from their horſes, and went towards her.

As ſoon as Cyrus came near, Anaxaris, as well to hide the agitation of his ſpirit, as out of his reſpects, did quit the Princeſs hand, and let Cyrus have the liberty of taking it, and Mandana to receive him, and preſent the twelve Inhabitants of Cumes which followed her, one of which number carried the Keys of the Town in a rich Baſon: ſo that Cyrus walking in the head of all the Voluntiers in his Army, and Mandana before the Inhabitants of Cumes, behind whom was a huge crowd of people, they both did meet. After Cyrus had ſaluted Mandana with all the reverence of a real Adorer: I am come Madam, ſaid he unto her, to make good all that you have promiſed for your liberty, though it be at the rate of my life: My liberty Sir, replied ſhe, would be bought at too dear a price, if it ſhould coſt the life which is ſo glorious and ſo pleaſing unto me: Nor am I engaged any further Sir (ſaid ſhe in preſenting the Inhabitants of Cumes unto him, who were all upon their knees) than to obtain of you, that you be pleaſed to uſe theſe men well, who offer you their hearts, in offering you the Keys of their Town, and who aſſure you, that they will be more obedient unto a juſt Prince, than they have been unto one who was not ſo, in protecting the King of Pontus: Madam, replyed Cyrus, their diſtiny is in your hands, not mine, ſince I am fully reſolved never to do any thing but what ſhall pleaſe you, and poſitively without any exception, do all that you ſhall command me: I conjure you then (ſaid ſhe unto him) to uſe theſe Inhabitants of Cumes as well as you would uſe the moſt faithful of my Fathers Subjects: I have already profeſſed Madam (replied he) that I am all obedience; therefore if you pleaſe to command it, they ſhall themſelves keep the Keys of their Town, which they have not loſt, but to make themſelves more happy by it, ſince they are under your protection. Cyrus had no ſooner ſpoke theſe words, but the Inhabitants gave ſuch ſhouts of joy, as they went from ſtreet to ſtreet, till the Eccho did ring at the further end of the Town. Then, after Mandana had confirmed what Cyrus ſpoke, ſhe did moſt obligingly preſent Anaxaris unto him: Though this valiant ſtranger, ſaid ſhe unto him, would have me acknowledg you only for my Diliverer; yet I muſt needs tell you, that he hath done incredible things for my liberty, and that I am more his debtor than I know how to expreſs. Anaxaris then holding down his head to hide the diſorder of his countenance, did modeſtly and with much delight receive the commendum which Mandana gave him, and received the thanks which Cyrus gave him with much ſorrow: After which, Cyrus to keep promiſe with Mazares, preſented him unto the Princeſs Mandana, Madam (ſaid Cyrus unto the Princeſs) you would do abundance of wrong, if you ſhould ſay, that you owe your liberty only unto me, for without all doubt, the valour of Mazares hath much contributed unto thoſe victories which I have gotten; and ſince he hath given me a thouſand teſtimonies of a generous repentance, I beſeech you to readmit him into that friendſhip and eſteem which you had of him when you were in Babilon, I beg it Madam, replied Mazares, upon the ſame conditions which I propounded at Sardis, when it was not your pleaſure I ſhould have the glory of delivering you: I do conſent unto it, replied ſhe with much joy, ſince that I have recovered an Noble friend whom I thought for ever loſt.

Thus might be ſeen that which perhaps might never be ſeen again; for Mandana preſented unto Cyrus one of his Rivals, and Cyrus preſented another unto Mandana. In the mean while, ſince the place was not fit for any long diſcourſe, Cyrus beſeeched the Princeſs to go into her Coach which he ſaw within the Gate. But ſince he would prevent all ſurpriſals, and ſince he would not let Mandana enter into the Town where his Forces was not, he commanded her Coach to come out of the Town, beſeeching her ſhe would be pleaſed to ſee thoſe Troops paſs who had both the honour to fight for her, and now to guard her. Mandana underſtanding his deſign, went into her Coach with Marteſia, and the Coach ſtood ſo that the Souldiers might all march juſt before it: Cyrus, Mazares, and Anaxaris did ſtand next the Princeſs, all three with different thoughts. After which, the Troops began to march and paſs by the Coach, all the Officers and Souldiers ſaluting as they paſſed by, holding down their Javelines. All this while, Cyrus who was next the Coach, and who only talked with Mandana, was ſenſible of ſo much delight as filled his heart, his ſpirit, and his ſoul. Mandana for her part ſeeing her ſelf at liberty, and ſeeing Cyrus next her, ſhe was alſo full of pleaſing ſatisfaction, but being a Perſon of ſuperlative modeſty, ſhe did much conceal it. Alſo ſhe deſired to avoid all occaſions of Cyrus his ſpeaking to her of his paſſion in that place; therefore beginning the diſcourſe firſt, as ſoon as he came into the Coach whilſt the Troops marched by: Sir (ſaid ſhe unto him) I hope you will not think it ingratitude, if before I thank you for abundance of obliging favours, I deſire you to tell me what news you hear from the King my Father? You never need to fear Madam, replyed he, that the man who by all his ſervices can never oblige you, can accuſe you of any ingratitude: But I am more afraid you will accuſe me of incivility in telling you only in three words, that the King your Father is at Ecbatan, perparing to defend himſelf againſt Thomiris, whom they ſay intends to aſſault him; that he is in good health, that he ſhould be infinitely joyed at your liberty, and that he ſtill doth me the honour to love me: However Madam, though I do infinitely reverence you, and though you do deſire to know more, yet I beſeech you give me leave Madam (ſaid he in a low voice) to ſpeak unto you of nothing during eight days, but concerning my ſelf: For truly Madam, I have a thouſand things to impart unto you, which do infinitely concern me you ſhould know. If you will be pleaſed to relate all your Conqueſts, all your Victories, and all your glorious Acts (replied ſhe moſt obligingly and ſmiled) ſmiled) the term you mentioned is not long: No Madam, replied he, I ſhall not talk of War, nor Conqueſts, nor Victories, for if I ſhould ſpeak of them, I ſhould ſpeak then only of the King your Father, ſince it is his Arms that have Conquered: But Madam, I ſhall ſpeak to you concerning all the ſorrows I have had ſince I left you at Themiſcira, and the infinite joys which I have to find you at Cumes, which I miſſed of at Sinope, at Artaxates, at Babilon, and at Sardis. But Madam, to compleat my joys, I beſeech you to do me the honour to confeſs, that the moſt illuſtrious Princeſs in the world was once in her life unjuſt, in ſuſpecting the moſt faithful man alive of infidelity: Oh Sir, replied Mandana and bluſhed, I muſt confeſs my ſelf injurious, and will never go about to juſtifie my ſelf in a thing which I entreat you to forget, and conjure you, as you love me, never to ſpeak of again. However Sir, ſince it is not civil to regard ſo little thoſe who have helped to crown you with Lawrels, it were good we deferred the relation of your diſaſters and mine until a more fit time and place; and that now I look upon ſo many brave men, to whom I am beholding for their indefatigable labours they have endured for me; nor can I do any leſs for thoſe who helped to conquer your enemies and mine: Since Madam, I can deſire nothing but what you pleaſe, replied he, I muſt obey you, though I could perhaps complain a little that your joys are ſo calm in your Spirits, as they will permit you to keep ſuch exact civilities: But ſince it were crime to complain of any thing on a day whereon I have ſo much reaſon to commend my fortune, I will impoſe ſilence upon my ſelf, and ſince you are pleaſed to honour with your looks thoſe men who have had the glory to fight for you, I conceive they are thereby better recompenced, than if I had given them all the Treaſures of Crœſſus. After this, Mandana without any other anſwers to the civility of Cyrus, than an obliging ſmile, began to ask the names of thoſe Commanders who paſſed by, which he told her; and to do Juſtice unto ſo many brave men which had ſo couragiouſly followed them into all dangers whereunto they led them; he did not only tell Mandana the names of thoſe ſhe asked, but alſo he related unto her the occaſions wherein they did ſignalize themſelves, commending all the Commanders one after another as they paſſed by.

Mandana alſo asked him the names of the Voluntiers, and among the reſt of Magabates, of whom Cyrus gave a moſt excellent Character, deſiring her to receive him as a man extraordinary when ever he preſented him unto her. All this while Mazares and Anaxaris were ſo wholly taken up with their Paſſions, that they looked upon nothing but Mandana and Cyrus, but looked upon them with very various and different thoughts. Anaxaris who before he was a Priſoner in Cumes, and in love with Mandana, was an infinite admirer of Cyrus, did now envy, and almoſt hate him; and the leſs hopes he had, the more did his love encreaſe. On the other ſide, Mazares ſeeing Mandana with the ſame Beauty, and very ſame charms which forced him to love her, and conſtrained him to hate the King of Aſſiria, had much ado to keep within thoſe limits which his virtue had preſcribed unto himſelf, his ſpirits were rebellious, his heart trembled, and all his deſires ſo diſordered, that he was in a moſt reſtleſs condition; but his hopes were ſo very low, that he quickly recollected himſelf, eſpecially when he remembred the pitiful condition wherein he left the Princeſs the laſt time he ſaw her, when the Scarfe broke looſe by which he held her, and held her up upon the Waves. Fie Mazares (ſaid he unto himſelf, and looked upon Mandana whilſt Cyrus talked to her) Canſt thou that was a cauſe of that Princeſs death, thou that deceived her, thou that carried her away, thou that left her upon the merciless Waves ready to periſh if the Gods had not relieved her, canſt thou be ſo fondly impudent as to hope for any thing but a Pardon for thy crimes? Fie, fie, no, no, thou canſt never pretend to any more, thou muſt love her as thou didſt before, becauſe thou canſt not chuſe; but thou muſt call thy love friendſhip, leſt ſhe ſhould refuſe what ſhe did promiſe.

In the mean while, all the Troops being entred into Cumes, and Cyrus knowing that they were Commanders of all the Ports, Publick places, and the Caſtle, did appoint the Princeſs her Coach to enter: This Prince following, accompanied with Mazares, Anaxaris, all the Voluntiers and the Homotimes. But when the Coach began to go forward, and as Mandana turned her head, Cyrus ſaluted Marteſia, and made certain obliging ſigns, which intimated that he had an extream deſire to talk with her. After which, this little triumph, the beauty of Mandana, and the good deportment of Cyrus being the chief ornaments, was beheld with acclamations of the common People, the like was never heard: The Streets, the Gates, the Windows, and Houſe tops were full of People; The air ecchoed with ſhouts of joy in praiſes of Mandana and Cyrus, and with wiſhes of their felicity. In the mean time, Tiſernes foreſeeing that Mandana would return to lodg in the Caſtle, cauſed the Prince of Cumes corps to be taken away, and carried into the Temple: Alſo he cauſed the bodies of all thoſe Souldiers to be carried away, which the valour of Anaxaris had ſacrificed unto the liberty of that Princeſs, and he locked up the valiant Thraſiles in one of the Towers: So that when the Princeſs came there, not any ſad objects were to be ſeen.

Cyrus underſtanding by the Herald he ſent, what ſervice Tiſernes had done him, did make very much of him as he entrred into the Caſtle, in which he was no ſooner come, but he preſented his hand unto Mandana to help her out of the Coach, and turning very ſweetly towards Anaxaris, he addreſſed his ſpeech unto him: It is you, valiant unknown One, ſaid he unto him, that muſt command in a place which your valour hath conquered, and it is you muſt tell me whither I muſt conduct the Princeſs: Sir (replied Anaxaris, with a ſtrange confuſion) it appertains not unto an unknown one to command ny where; but doubtleſs, the man who hath had the honour to bear the ſame chains Mandana did, may ſhew you which was her Priſon; therefore Sir, if you pleaſe, you may go up thoſe ſtairs upon your right hand: For my part (ſaid Mandana unto Cyrus, purpoſely to oblige Anaxaris) I do not wonder this illuſtrious unknown One ſhould ſo well know the way of a Priſon, whoſe doors he knows ſo well and ſo couragiouſly how to open: But it's ſtrange methinks (added ſhe, and looked upon Cyrus with a ſmile) that my Deliverer ſhould go about to bring me again unto it; and that the Conqueror of all Aſia ſhould need a guide, he who knows how to find out Victory whereſoever he will look for it, though it be the moſt difficult thing in the world to find: You do me wrong, Madam, replied he, if you think that victory was my only aim in all my enterprizes, ſince I never regarded it, but only as a means to conduct me unto you. Since Mandana's Chamber was but juſt one pair of ſtairs high, ſhe had not time to anſwer Cyrus, for as ſoon as ſhe was in the Chamber, Cyrus preſented the renowned Voluntiers which followed him unto her, amongſt the reſt Megabates, whom the Princeſs received with civility equal to his merit. In the mean while, ſince it grew late, and ſince prudence prompted Cyrus to take care for the ſecurity of the Town, and in it Mandana, eſpecially ſince the King of Pontus could not be found, he had at that time no long diſcourſe with the Princeſs, yet he could not poſſibly leave her, before one quarter of an hours talk in private, and before he had given her new aſſurances of his fidelity and reſpectful Paſſion You ſee here, Madam, ſaid he unto her, the very ſame Artamenes who at the firſt in the Garden of Sinope, did proteſt that he would love you as long as he lived, and you ſee him now at Cumes ready to aſſure you by new Proteſtations, that he is ſtill, and ever will be the ſame. You have given me ſuch magnanimous teſtimonies of your affection, replied Mandana, that it is not neceſſary to confirm them by words; a thouſand glorious actions, and as many important ſervices have ſufficiently perſwaded me of it: But it is my part, who have nothing but words to give, to make choice of my beſt eloquence, whereby to aſſure you, Sir, that I am as full of acknowledgments, as any ſenſible and generous heart is capable of: Oh Madam, replied Cyrus, though all your words be moſt precious, and though you gave me the moſt favourable language in the world, yet that's not it which I would have; and I ſhould be much better ſatisfied with one thought of that heart which you ſay is more ſenſible and generous, than ten thouſand words of thanks, civility, or acknowledgments: Never trouble your ſelf, Madam, I beſeech you, to ſtudy words, as it ſeems you deſign; let the eloquence quence of your eyes only tell me, you are not ſorry that you reign in my heart: Let me, I ſay, to my felicity think, that your liberty is not the only cauſe of joy in your countenance, and that if Cumes had been taken by any than my ſelf, you would have been leſs ſatisfied: Though you do not much value my words, replied Mandana and ſmiled, yet I will tell you, that you have reaſon to believe that I think my liberty ſweeter from your hand, than from any other; and I will add further yet, that ſince I have been the cauſe of all your ſorrows, I ſhould be unjuſt, if I did not allow you to think, that the joy which you ſee in my eyes proceeds from the ſatisfaction which I have in ſeeing you again. O Madam, (ſaid Cyrus) when I ſaid that I did not value your words, I knew not what I ſaid, for I find them ſo ſweet, and ſo glorious unto me, that I am fully recompenced for all the ſorrows I have ſuffered, ſo they be not ſpoken only out of a bare civility, ſuch as might perhaps be due unto a Prince whom Fortune imployed for your delivery: Therefore, Madam, if you will be pleaſed to compleat my happineſs, do me the honour to confeſs unto me, that all theſe your infinitely obliging expreſſions, are addreſſed unto me as your Captive, and not as unto a Prince whom Fortune hath made a Conquerour of others: If I could ſeparate Cyrus from the Conquerour of Aſia, replied Mandana, and laughed, I would divide my civilities to content you; but ſince they are inſeparable, give me leave without any diſtinction to ſpeak equally to them; and ſince I find in one and the ſame perſon, a great Prince, a great Conquerour, and my Deliverer, give me leave to render unto him what I think is due: I beſeech you Madam, (ſaid Cyrus and interrupted her) take from me the two firſt of theſe qualities which you attribute unto me, and give me another, which would better ſuit with me: I have been ſo long amongſt men, to whom I denied all they asked (replied Mandana in a moſt obliging kind of raillarie) that you need not think it ſtrange, ſince I cannot ſo ſoon loſe the habit of denying, if I do not now conſent unto all you ask; for I aſſure you, I am not yet ſo well perſwaded that I am free, but ſometimes I fancy that I ſee the King of Pontus appear. To prevent that, Madam, replied Cyrus, it is requiſite I leave you, that I may go and give all neceſſary orders for it. So Cyrus, after a moſt profound reverence unto Mandana, went out of her Chamber: Mazares, Anaxaris, and all the reſt followed.

Theſe two thought the conference between Cyrus and Mandana ſo long, that the virtue of Mazares was put unto a difficult trial, and the impatience of Anaxaris was ready to break out; yet they followed Cyrus with faces and hearts full of melancholy unto all places where he went to give orders. In the mean time, though the ruin of a Rival be a thing which every one would endeavour, yet Cyrus who was once obliged to the King of Pontus when he went under the name of Artamenes, and who, maugre his love, looked upon him as Brother to the Princeſs Araminta, whom he exceedingly honoured, he was not ſo angry as he would have been without theſe two conſiderations; Firſt, that he was eſcaped his revenge; Secondly, that he was not to be found; not that he was reſolved if he had found him, to alter his generous way of uſage which he ever obſerved to him when he was his Priſoner, and when he gave him his liberty at Sinope: But yet he was not ſorry, that Fortune did not put him to the neceſſity of treating a Rival ill, if he had fallen in his power: And therefore in the Evening he ſent a Bark unto the Prince Thraſibulus, and unto Thimochares, to bring their Fleets into the Port of Cumes the next morning, that by this means the King of Pontus might more eaſily eſcape if he were hid in the Town, as very likely he was. Moreover, Cyrus leſt any ſtirring ſhould be amongſt the People, who are much moved at ſad objects, he commanded, that the next night the Prince of Cumes ſhould be buried, without any noiſe or much ceremony; yet deſiring that his aſhes might be put into the Sepulcher of his Fathers, and that all the honour ſhould be done him which the preſent conjuncture of affairs would permit. After he had given all neceſſary orders, both for the ſafety of Mandana and of the Town, he returned to the Caſtle where the Princeſs was; yet he could not ſee her until after Supper, for he was ſo Courted by abundance of company, that he could not get ſooner from them: All the ſeveral Corporations of the Town came to ſalute him, and went afterwards unto the Princeſs Mandana, whether Cyrus ſent them. But at laſt, after he had ſhaken off all hindrances of ſatisfaction unto his extream deſire of talking with his dear Princeſs, he went unto her Chamber, without the company of any but Chriſantes and Feraulas: As for Mazares, his ſoul was not ſo firmly ſetled, as that he durſt ſee the Princeſs any more that day: And as for Anaxaris, love, jealouſie and ſpite, made him retire unto ſome place where he might vent his melancholy.

Cyrus then being delivered from all his Rivals, and from all his friends too, who in ſuch occaſions are as troubleſome as Enemies, went as I told you, unto Mandana's Chamber. But meeting Marteſia in the outer Chamber, he muſt needs ſtay a little with her, unto whom he was ſo infinitely obliged, and principally for affirming his fidelity, when Mandana accuſed him with ſo much injuſtice: If you did not know (ſaid he moſt civilly unto her) how much I am devoted unto our Princeſs, and what power ſhe hath over my heart, I ſhould have ſome cauſe to fear you would complain againſt me; for I confeſs, my ſweet Marteſia, that I have not yet either looked upon you, or ſpoke one word unto you, and which is more ſtrange, until I have ſpent eight days in talking with, and looking upon Mandana, I do not think I ſhall be able to talk with, or look upon any elſe; yet I do profeſs Marteſia, to eſteem you as much as is poſſible, and that I am extreamly beholding unto you for taking my part, and have the greateſt deſire in the world to talk with you, though as I told you before, I cannot do it yet this eight days.

To loſe no time in tedious anſwers (replied Marteſia) I do believe, Sir, all that you are pleaſed to tell me, though if I did conſider only my ſelf, I ought not to believe you, and though I will not trouble you, yet I hope you will not take it ill if I ask Feraulas concerning all that I deſire to know of you: Feraulas (replied Cyrus and laughed) hath ſo much to ſpeak of himſelf, that I doubt whether he can tell you any thing concerning me: Since I ſhall begin the diſcourſe, replied ſhe and bluſhed, he muſt needs anſwer me: No, no, replied Cyrus, I will not do the man who hath ſo well ſerved me ſo ill an office; therefore Marteſia, I will diſpence with you this day for talking of me unto Feraulas, provided you will talk of me unto my Princeſs, and ſtill perſwade her, that my extream affection deſerves to be preferred before any of my Rivals. After this, Cyrus left Marteſia, and went into Mandana's Chamber, where he found none with her, but two women whom the Prince of Cumes preferred to wait upon her; ſhe no ſooner ſaw him, but ſhe did riſe to ſalute him, ſhe received him with as much civility as the Conqueror of Aſia did merit, and with as much joy as the ſight of a faithful and reſpectful Lover, and Liberator could inſpire into her: Since there was none to obſerve their actions, ſhe allowed her eyes to ſatisfie her ſoul in looking upon Cyrus, yet it was with ſo much modeſty, as that Prince was a little afraid in accoſting her; for ſince he never had any abſolute permiſſion from her to ſpeak openly of his Love, and ſince when he departed from Themiſcira unto Thomiris, he obtained no further from Mandana, but that if he did not find out a way to make himſelf known unto Ciaxares, and to procure his liking, he ſhould then for ever abſent himſelf, he had apprehenſions of this ſtill; therefore, to let her ſee how this obſtacle was removed, his deſign was, after the firſt civilities were over, to talk of Ciaxares, and to let her know how much he was in that Princes favour, but that labour was ſaved; for this Princeſs, who did ever regulate her thoughts according unto the King her Fathers, and who had an extream deſire to know upon what terms Cyrus ſtood with him, ſhe began firſt to ſpeak of him.

I pray Sir (ſaid ſhe unto him) before you make any relations of what hath happened unto you, tell me whether the King my Father be pleaſed with you, and whether he receives all thoſe Lawrels wherewith you have Crowned him well from your hand? He is ſo well ſatisfied, Madam, replied Cyrus, and hath made me ſuch glorious promiſes, as if you will be pleaſed to confirm them, I am the happieſt amongſt men. You may very well conceive Sir, (ſaid ſhe, and bluſht) that ſince I was ever reſolved to obey him, even in things moſt contrary to my own inclination, and leaſt agreeable unto you, that I ſhall moſt willingly obey him in things moſt ſuitable unto my deſires, and moſt advantagious unto you: But though I do not queſtion the truth of your words, yet I will promiſe you nothing, until I know from his own mouth what he hath promiſed; yet let me aſſure you, that if he be as full of acknowledgments as I am, you have good cauſe to be well ſatisfied. Though your language Madam, be moſt obliging, replied Cyrus, yet I may find ſome cauſe of complaint: But ſince you have ever accuſtomed me unto extream ſeverity, I am moſt ſubmiſſive unto your pleaſure, Madam, provided you will give me leave to relate all my ſufferings: ſince it were high injuſtice, Sir, not to hear of thoſe miſeries which my ſelf hath cauſed during ſo long a War, I ſhall be very glad you acquaint me with all the hardſhips you had in Armenia, all the miſeries you ſuffered at the Siege of Babilon, all thoſe you endured at Sardis, and alſo at Cumes: Oh Madam, (ſaid Cyrus) Theſe are not the things I deſire to talk of, but it is of the Inſufferable ſorrows of my ſoul to leave you when I left Themiſcira; of the horrid apprehenſions of my heart at my return, when I underſtood that Philidaſpes had carried you away, and that I had ſaved his life; my exceſſive grief in taking Babilon and not releaſing you; my horrid deſpair at Sinope, when I thought the flames had reduced you to aſhes, my diſmal apprehenſions in finding only the King of Aſſiria on the Top of the Tower, and in ſeeing the Galley with which Mazares carried you away, my deadneſs of heart and ſoul when I thought you periſhed, my vexation to find you in the power of a Rival when I heard you were living, my melancholy at Artaxates, when I delivered the Princeſs Araminta in lieu of the incomparable Mandana, my ſorrows to ſee you on the other ſide of the River, and I not able to follow you, my grief to hear that you were imbarked at the Port of Cicilie, my ſadneſs of ſoul to hear that you ſuſpected me of infidelity, my unutterable grief when I took Sardis and could not find you in it, my fury, when I heard my Rival had found out an art to make you inviſible, my torment to be always amongſt my Rivals, and ſtill ſeparated from you.

Theſe Madam are the ſorrows which I deſire to talk of, in hopes that judging of the greatneſs of my Love by the greatneſs of my ſufferings, you may know me better: It ſeems we have long been ſeparated, (replied Mandana with a modeſt ſigh) ſince you have forgot, that though I permitted you to love me, yet I could never endure you ſhould ſpeak to me of your Love. My Love Madam, replied Cyrus, was at that time a hidden myſtery, I durſt not then tell any that I loved you; but now, ſince all the world knows me to be your Adorer, and ſince Ciaxares himſelf approves of it, it were not juſt that you only ſhould be ignorant of my Love: For truly Divine Princeſs, there is not one Soldier in the King your Fathers Army, who knows not that he hath fought only for you: I could never have any joy in all the Victories I have gotten, becauſe in getting them I could not releaſe you; I acquainted all my Rivals with my Paſſion, Mazares himſelf would ſometimes pity me, and would you Madam, be the only one in all the Univerſe unto whom it ſhould not be ſpoken? Oh Madam, this would not be juſt: Speak on then, ſaid ſhe unto him, ſince there is no remedy: But pray Sir, give me leave alſo to relate my ſorrows: I am afraid Madam, replied he, that they are not much different from mine; for methinks I hear you aggravate your ſorrows, for being ſo often carried away, and expoſed unto ſo many voyages, ſo much pains, and ſo many dangers without your making me a ſharer in them; and how to my infinite glory and delight would it have been, if I had been the cauſe of your greateſt ſorrows: But alas Madam, I preceive you do not think me worthy of any ſuch obliging expreſſions, as to tell me I was any cauſe of them, nor will you permit me ſo much as to think it: Yet I aſſure you, replied ſhe, that my fears leſt you ſhould periſh in ſome of thoſe dangers into which you expoſed your ſelf for the love of me, was one of my greateſt ſorrows: Your language Madam, replied he, is moſt obliging, but ſince your ſorrows might perhaps proceed only from generoſity, they were not of that nature which I deſired: For truly Madam, did you know how to love, you would know that abſence from the perſon loved is a moſt horrid torment: But ſince the Gods have made you only to be loved, and ſince they have infuſed love enough into my heart, to make me endure this modeſt coldneſs, which ſtill oppoſeth my felicity, I will not murmur to ſee you no more ſenſible of my zealous Paſſion: Yet Madam, to my conſolation, I would gladly believe, that your modeſty doth hide ſome of your thoughts from me, and that I do not ſee all the advantagious reſentments of your heart: Being a Prince of ſo much virtue as you are (replied Mandana and bluſht) and knowing me ſo well as you do, I will freely permit you to believe, that I have all the advantagious thoughts of you, all the eſteem and tenderneſs which in any reaſon I ought to have of a Prince, unto whom the King my Father is a debtor for his life, and many Victories, and unto whom I owe my liberty and ſomething more. After this Sir, be contented, and aſk me no more, for as well accuſtomed as you are to get Victories, you ſhall get no more of me. At theſe words Cyrus did render a million of thanks unto Mandana, for the permiſſion which ſhe gave him; and then they began to make ſhort relations unto each other of all their adventures, but it was in a different manner, for Cyrus feared that he could never ſay enough to ſet forth the violence of his Paſſion; and Mandana was ſo full of tenderneſs towards Cyrus, that ſhe feared leſt ſhe ſhould ſay too much, yet the converſation was moſt ſweet and pleaſing unto Cyrus; for Mandana was not ſo abſolute a Miſtreſs of her looks and words, but that Cyrus ſaw by the motion of her eyes, that her heart was not inſenſible; ſo that ſometimes his exceſs of joy would ſilence him, and he would gaze upon her without a word; and ſometimes again he would break into ſuch raptures of expreſſion, as it was moſt plain his love was ſtronger than his reaſon: I beſeech you Madam (ſaid he unto her, when he perceived the diſorder of his own ſpirit) pardon me, if I cannot maſter my joys, for I profeſs they are ſo great, that the more I conſider you, the more reaſon I find to devote my whole heart unto you; for ſince I am now ſo near the Divine Mandana, after ſo long and ſad aniabſence, after I believed her loſt, and bewailed her death, this is ſo high a joy, as is abſolutely unutterable, when I call to mind the miſerable condition I was in when I loved at you Sinope, and compare it to my preſent happineſs: Oh heavens, what an advantagious difference do I find? For I was then unknown unto you, I durſt not then tell what I was, for fear of being hated, though I knew I could never be loved unleſs I were known: I had a great King to my Rival, and another Rival at the head of a puiſſant Army, and I ſaw every thing againſt me: But now Madam, I find the King your Father for me, I ſee the King of Pontus without a Kingdom, or any receptacle, I have the Prince Mazares my friend in lieu of a Rival, and I ſee the King of Aſſiria a Priſoner unto Arſamones, judge therefore I beſeech you Madam, whether the extravagancy of my joys be not excuſable: Since I am yet far from Ecbatan, replied ſhe, I muſt confeſs, I cannot reſent the happineſs which I enjoy, out of fear it ſhould be moleſted by ſome accident which I cannot foreſee; yet ſince it is vanity, to make imaginary miſeries, I will hope that our happineſs will be durable, and that Fortune will be as conſtant in ſmiling upon us, as ſhe hath been in her frowns againſt us. After this Mandana hinting unto Cyrus that it was late, this Prince retired, and went out of her Chamber, with ſpirits ſo full of paſſion, as he neither ſaw Marteſia, nor Chriſantes, nor Feraulas, who never ſtirred out of the outer Chamber, and was not able to take his mind off that Divine Princeſs whom he loved; he came unto his own Chamber, and there undreſſed himſelf, while his fancy was ſtill fixed upon the ſame object; and ſleep, as powerful as it is, could not deface the Idea of Mandana in his imagination.

Now did he begin to accuſe himſelf for making ſuch a bad interpretation upon the Sibels anſwer, and upon the King of Aſſiria's Oracle, and he began to hope, that which the Oracle rendred unto the Princeſs of Salamis would be as happily accompliſhed for him, as for her; his ſoul was now ſo ſolely devoted unto joy, as he never regarded the Combat which he was to have with the King of Aſſiria as a thing of any doubtful event, nor ever troubled himſelf to conſider how ſorry Mandana would be if ſhe knew it; on the contrary, he contemplated upon nothing but the beauty, ſuperexcellencies, and charms of his Princeſs, and he lull'd himſelf ſo in the fancy of Mandana, that he ſaw her in his ſleep as well as when he was awake; he imagined that he ſaw himſelf preſenting her unto Ciaxares, and ſaw Ciaxares give her again unto him in recompence of all his travels and pains. Mandana on the other ſide entertained her ſelf with her dear Marteſia, confeſſing ingeniouſly unto her, that ſhe never in all her life ſaw Cyrus ſo amiable as now, and that ſhe could not chuſe but think her ſelf extreamly happy in her reigning in the heart of the greateſt Prince in the world.

But whilſt theſe two illuſtrious perſons did delight their ſouls in the innocent pleaſures of ſeeing each other, Mazares, Anaxaris, and the King of Pontus were all full of different reſentments; a Civil War, whoſe victory was doubtful, did flame in the heart of the firſt of theſe; for ſometimes his virtue was weaker than his love, and ſometimes his virtue got the upper hand: But for the ſecond, his love of Mandana was ſo violent, that he had not the leaſt thought of oppoſing it, though he could not imagine ever to find out any way of ſatisfaction: So that abandoning himſelf both to his love and his deſpair, he was in a moſt miſerable condition: But as for the third, his miſery did tranſcend them both; for the truth is, the King of Pontus was in ſuch a deplorable condition, as he would have moved Mandana and all his Rivals to pity him, if they had but ſeen him. Since the man who did hide him was not acquainted with the virtue of Cyrus, he imagined, that if this Prince did know how he concealed the Raviſher of Mandana from his revenge, he would ſeverely puniſh him; ſo that for more ſurety, he put this unfortunate King into a little Cabin in a corner of the Garden, where the Gardiner lodged. This bad lodging yet was not at all ill reſented by this unhappy Prince, though he was much wounded, and could hardly be dreſſed: But when he conſidered that Mandana would treat Cyrus as her Deliverer, that he had for ever loſt her, that ſhe would eternally hate him, that he was miſerable in the ſame Town where his Rival was happy, that he knew not how to get out, and that perhaps he ſhould fall into his power, his reſentments of theſe were unexpreſſible: The next day alſo he had an addition of double ſorrows, for Mandana having a deſire to render thanks unto the Gods as well as Cyrus, this Prince would needs have her go unto the Temple with ſome magnificent ceremony, to the end the People might the better ſee her: But ſince they could not go unto the Temple of Neptune, ſo much celebrated in Cumes, but they muſt of neceſſity paſs under the Walls of this Garden, and under the Window of that Cabin wherein the King of Pontus was, this magnificent Pomp did paſs that way: So that this unfortunate Prince hearing the noiſe which the Troops made, as they paſſed before the Princeſs, he asked that Soldier which followed him what noiſe it was; and he telling him that it was the Princeſs Mandana going unto the Temple of Neptune to render thanks unto the Gods, he was ſo tranſported with Love, that he ſhould ſee her once more before he died, and therefore did riſe out of his homely bed to look out of this little Window, which was made only of a few Reads, and where indeed he beheld all that paſſed: But when he ſaw Mandana in a Triumphant Chariot with ſuch joy in her looks, as augmented her beauty, he was ſenſible of more ſorrow than ever was man before; that which grated him unto the very heart of his ſoul, was to ſee Cyrus on horſeback next Mandana's Chariot, and to ſee him in a Garb ſo high, and Port ſo Majeſtical, as in ſpite of his ſorrows and jealouſie, he could not chuſe but think him worthy of this Princeſs; and to ſum up the total of his miſery, he ſaw more joy in the face of Cyrus than in the face of Mandana, conjecturing from thence, and truly, that he had been very favourably received, and in an inſtant did imagine a thouſand favours done unto Cyrus, more than he himſelf could have wiſhed to himſelf. This thought ſo diſordered his ſoul, that love, jealouſie, rage and deſpair depriving him of reaſon, he violently broke down the little Window which did hide him from ſight; but as good luck to him was, he was ſo weak, that as he pulled the Window away, he fell backward upon his Bed, ſo that as his wound opening and beginning to bleed afreſh, he was not able to riſe again, yet he endeavoured, though the Souldier did very reſpectfully hinder him, knowing that if he now looked out of the Window he would certainly be known. In the mean while, his ſorrows cauſed by ſuch a violent agitation of ſpirits, did caſt him into a ſound for above a quarter of an hour; and when he returned out of it, his deſpair was no better than madneſs. Thus the renowned Cyrus had four Rivals nothing ſo happy as himſelf; but though the ſtate of their fortunes was very different, yet had they a conformity in their ſorrows.

The King of Aſſiria a Priſoner, and forced to ask ſuccour from his Rival, he thought himſelf the moſt miſerable Prince alive: The King of Pontus vanquiſhed, wounded, and lurking in a poor Cabin, thought never any ſo unfortunate as himſelf: The Prince Mazares, who would needs have his Virtue triumph over his Paſſion, and who yet ſaw himſelf every minute ready to be overcome by his Love, he was perſwaded that none could ſuffer more than himſelf: And Anaxaris, in love without one ſpark of hope, and yet reſolved to love Mandana till he died, come what could, conſidering the ſtate of his ſoul, and the ſtate of his fortune, he could not conceive it poſſible any ſhould be ſo miſerable as himſelf. Thus whilſt Cyrus and Mandana were rendring thanks unto the Gods for their happy conditions, the King of Pontus, Mazares, and Anaxaris, had much ado to forbear murmuring againſt the Gods, for expoſing them unto ſuch diſaſterous and fatal deſtinies; yet the misfortunes of theſe three Rivals did not hinder the univerſal joy that was both in Town and Camp: But to be ſhort, at their return from the Temple, Cyrus after he had taken orders from Mandana, ſent unto Pactias and Licambes to acquaint them with the ſtate of things, and to induce them to lay down arms: He ſent alſo to the Xantheans, and Caunians, to confirm the offers which they made: He ſent diſpatches alſo unto Ciaxares and Cambiſes: The Princeſs writing unto the King her Father to thank him for his cares in procuring her liberty, and unto the Queen of Perſia alſo, to teſtifie her obligations unto the Prince her Son. After this, was to be ſeen (according to the orders which Cyrus ſent over night) the two Fleets of Thraſibulus and Thimocrates, enter into the Port of Cumes, and as they paſſed in ſight of Mandana's Chamber, where Cyrus then was, the Flags of all the Fleets vailed Bonnet, in honour of that Princeſs. As ſoon as Thraſibulus, Thimocrates, Philocles and Leontidas came aſhore, they came alſo to ſalute Mandana, unto whom Cyrus preſented them: You ſee here Madam (ſaid he and ſpoke of Thraſibulus) a Prince who was my Conqueror, and whoſe valour did exceedingly help me to finiſh the Armenian War: In telling me (replied Mandana) that the Prince Thraſibulus hath conquered the Conquerors of others, you oblige me to eſteem him infinitely: The victory I got Madam (replied Thraſibulus) did coſt me ſo dear; and the defeat of the Illuſtrious Artamenes was ſo glorious unto him, that if I might have choſen, I had rather have been the Conquered than the Conqueor.

As Cyrus was ready to reply, and vie modeſty with him, the King of Hircania, the Prince Artamas, Gadates, Gobrias, Perſodes, and many others of Noble Quality, came into Mandana's Chamber, who entertained them with as much ſweetneſs as Majeſty. Crœſſus and Myrſiles came a little after; the firſt of theſe asking pardon for protecting the King of Pontus, beſeeching her not to be leſs generous than Ciaxares and Cyrus had been: To teſtifie unto you (ſaid ſhe unto him) that I will not yield unto them in that virtue, I aſſure you, I am much joyed at the alliance which you have made, with ſuch a renowned Prince as the Prince Artamas, who hearing what Mandana ſaid of him, returned a moſt ingenious and civil anſwer.

But ſince ſuch kind of viſits as theſe, never uſe to be long, this crowd of renowned perſons did ſoon diſperſe themſelves: Cyrus alſo was obliged to go out of her Chamber into his own, to receive two Deputies from Suſiana, which Orſanus ſent unto him: So that Mandana in this interval talked with Chriſantes and Feraulas, unto whom ſhe had not yet ſpoken; therefore ſhe went into her Cloſet, whether Marteſia brought them. Now was the glory of Cyrus aggravated with much zeal, by theſe two faithful ſervants unto their Maſter, and ſhe did much better underſtand from them than from him, how much ſhe was obliged unto him. In the mean while, Cyrus being come to his Chamber, whether Mazares and Hermogenes alſo reſorted alſo to hear ſome news of Beleſis, he received the Deputies which Orſanus ſent. He underſtood from them, that all the Grandees in the Kingdom of Suſiana no ſooner ſaw the Teſtament of Abradates, who gave him his Crown, but all were joyfully diſpoſed to become his Subjects, and acknowledge him for their King: That the people did ſubmit unto it with abundance of ſatisfaction, that Beleſis had done him very good ſervice in this buſineſs, that Aduſia according to his order ſtayed at Suſa, to command in that Kingdom, until he himſelf could honour that ſtate with his preſence; that all things were there very quiet, that both Grandees and People had taken oaths of fidelity to him, and that he was abſolutely King of Suſiana. Theſe men having ended their ſpeech, Cyrus did treat them as men who brought him a Crown, and began to tranſact with them, as with good and faithful Subjects. Then appointing them to be lodged in the Town, he diſmiſſed them, keeping Orſanus with him, purpoſely to tell him ſome news of Beleſis, whom he infinitely eſteemed, knowing that he did ever confirm Mazares in thoſe reſolutions of virtue, which he had planted in his ſoul, ſeeing then there was none but Mazares and Hermogenes near him: Well Orſanus (ſaid he unto him) hath the voyage of Beleſis been as happy for himſelf, as it hath been for me? Will Cleodora acknowledge him for her Slave with as good a will as the People of Suſa are to acknowledge me for their King? Sir (replied Orſanus) it is not ſo: Why (ſaid Mazares and interrupted him) had Cleodora accompliſhed her laſt vows which the women conſecrated unto Ceres uſe, when Beleſis came unto Suſa? No Sir, (replied Orſanus) we came thither ſome days before ſhe was to perform them: I pray, ſaid Cyrus, relate unto us the buſineſs.

Hermogenes underſtanding by the diſcourſe of Orſanus, that Beleſis did not thrive in his affection to Cleodora, his curioſity augmented, and his ſorrows diminiſhed, for his belief was that Beleſis was gone to take poſſeſſion of her; ſo that he lent a moſt attentive ear unto what Orſanus ſaid: Since you are pleaſed to command me Sir, (ſaid Orſanus unto Cyrus) to acquaint you with the adventure of Beleſis, be pleaſed to know Sir, that when he came to Suſa, he preſently enquired whether Cleodora had power to come out of the Temple unto which ſhe was retired, and whether it was believed ſhe would remain there? He underſtood that the laſt ceremony which was to bind her for ever, was not to be performed of a month after; that the general opinion was, ſhe would remain there, becauſe ſhe might live a retired life there; every one telling her, that ſhe was none of thoſe, who in lieu of ſeeking out a ſolitude amongſt the veiled Virgins, and preſerving their innocence, would trouble the firſt, and loſe the ſecond, and ſo diſhonour them in lieu of adding glory.

Yet Beleſis was not very much grieved at the thought that Cleodora would remain in the Temple, becauſe he hoped ſhe might change her mind; ſo that not to omit any tittle of his duty in matter of love, he writ unto Cleodora, and gave his Letter unto Alcenor to carry, ſoliciting her alſo by many friends for leave to ſee and ſpeak with her. But whilſt Alcenor and the Ladies his friends were negotiating for him, he took order for all things which related unto your ſervices; and in the mean while he underſtood that Cleodora refuſed his Letter; that ſhe would not ſee him, that ſhe obtained leave to ſhorten the time of the laſt ceremony, and that it was to be accompliſhed the next day: You may judg Sir, what ſad news this was unto Beleſis, who no ſooner heard it, but he went unto the Temple of Ceres, and ſo tampered with her who had power to command Cleodora, that ſhe commanded her to ſee and ſpeak with Beleſis, an hour before ſhe was to engage all the reſt of her life. Beleſis then ſaw her, and ſpoke to her, but never ſaw her ſo fair and lovely as then, nor never more inexorable unto his prayers; and to render him the more unhappy, ſhe confeſſed unto him, that ſhe was induced unto this courſe which ſhe was going to take, only becauſe ſhe was ſo weak, as not to hate him if ſhe would; and indeed ſhe ſpoke this unto him in ſuch a manner, as it was eaſie to ſee, ſhe did not hate him ſtill, and that what ſhe did, was rather out of a punctilio of honour, which moveth her never to pardon Beleſis, than out of any hatred unto him. I ſhall not need to tell you Sir what this unfortunate Lover ſaid unto Cleodora: For ſince you know the nature of Beleſis was to be zealous and paſſionate, and knowing what his mind and affection was, you may eaſily imagine that he uſed all the moſt moving expreſſions that was poſſible, and all to no purpoſe, for this fair One was unalterable, mauger all the ſorrow ſhe ſaw in his face, and very well it may be ſaid, that the ſorrows of Beleſis did make her joyful, for the more earneſt he was in praying her the more eaſily did ſhe deny him. To be ſhort Sir, this fair One retired, and maugre all the importunate deſires of Beleſis, the ceremony was accompliſhed, and Beleſis loſt Cleodora for ever; for ſince that ſhe would not ſee any, no not her deareſt friends: So that Cleodora who was wont to be the only lover of news, did not now know whether Aſia was in War or in peace; and this excellent woman did very ſufficiently make it appear, that ſhe could be Miſtreſs of her ſelf when ſhe pleaſed. In the mean time, the deſpair of Beleſis did ſo appear in his face, and in all his actions, as every one feared he would ſteal away from Alcenor as ſoon as he could, and return unto his Deſert, and ſo deprive Suſa of the moſt accompliſht man in it.

Whilſt Orſanus was ſpeaking thus, Cyrus and Mazares did intereſt themſelves in the ſorrows of Beleſis: But as for Hermogenes, all the affections he bore him as his friend, could not keep him from rejoycing, that he was never like to enjoy Cleodora; yet he did what he could to hide a thought which had more love than generoſity in it; and he might the more eaſily hide it,becauſe Cyrus, who was not able to live without Mandana, did in all haſte give orders that the Works ſhould be thrown down, that the Forts ſhould be demoliſhed, and that the Army ſhould ſtill keep in a poſture ready to receive an Enemy, not daring to think of carrying Mandana out of Cumes, until he heard the Enemies Army was diſperſed, becauſe he would not hazard a perſon who was ſo infinitely dear unto him. After then he had given all the prudential orders requiſite, he returned to the Princeſs Mandana, where all the Ladies of Quality in that Town were come to make their firſt viſit. Since the Princeſs ſpoke the Greek Tongue very fluently, and the Language of Cumes differed from it only in pronunciation; it was as eaſie for her to charm ſo many Beauties by the ſweetneſs of her converſation, as to charm their eyes by her Beauty; and ſince ſhe knew that commendations are very well received by all the World, eſpecially when they proceed from a perſon of much merit, Mandana did extreamly commend every Lady in whom ſhe could find any good ground for it; She alſo did double her applauds when Cyrus came in; for beginning to ſpeak as ſoon as he was ſet down, Though I know very well (ſaid ſhe unto him) that Artaxates, Babilon, and Sardis, are far greater Towns than Cumes; yet I aſſure you, the conqueſt of this was more glorious then of them, ſince I do not think you ever took any Town wherein there are ſo many Beauties as in this: There are ſo many reaſons Madam, replyed Cyrus, Why you ſhould know a Beauty better than any elſe, that though my eyes did not tell me you had reaſon for what you ſay, yet I ſhould believe you: However (added he, and turned towards thoſe Ladies whom Mandana commended) you may well value at a high rate, the commendations of a Princes, who is uſed every day to ſee the faireſt perſon in the world: Mandana bluſhed at the diſcourſe of Cyrus, but could not anſwer it; for one of the Ladies, whoſe name was Atalia, began to ſpeak: If the commendations of the Princeſs (ſaid ſhe) were addreſſed unto me, or that I had any reaſon to apply them unto my ſelf, doubtleſs I ſhould think my ſelf the moſt glorious woman in the world, for being commended by one, who every day in her myrrour ſees enough to make her ſcorn the greateſt Beauties upon Earth. You know very well, amiable Atalia, (replied Mandana) what ſhare you ought to take unto your ſelf of thoſe commendations which I give unto the Ladies of Cumes in general; and I know alſo what ſhare I ought to take in thoſe you give unto me; however, without putting you to the bluſh by any particular applauds, I pray agree with me, that there are few places in the world where are to be found ſo many beauties as here; and certainly, Mandana had good reaſon for what ſhe ſaid, ſince there were in Cumes at that time a moſt prodigious number of Beauties. Amongſt all thoſe who were then with Mandana; there were four of the beſt quality in all the Town, and higheſt beauty: Atalia was Tall, and of a handſom Mine, ſhe had brown Hair, Eyes gray and ſweet, her Complexion whitiſh and lively, ſeeming always very ſerious: The ſecond, whoſe name was Cleocrite, was fair and lively, yet her eyes black and ſparkling with a ſprightly fire: her looks though ſweet, yet nothing of paſſionate, but it was eaſie to ſee ſhe loved to look upon her ſelf in a glaſs, and loved her ſelf better than all the world beſides. Cleocrite was of a good ſtature, ſhe had moſt handſom Teeth, and freſh roſes upon her Lips: her Noſe was of an exact proportion, and all the features of her Face pleaſing: ſhe had an aſpect of joy and tranquility in her Phyſiognomy, which was a great addition to her beauty: ſo that without any flattery I can aſſure you, Cleocrite was a high beauty, and had been infinitely amiable had ſhe known how to have loved any.

The third whoſe name was Lyſidice, was of a low ſtature, but a high beauty, and infinitely charming: her Neck was white, her Arms and Hands the ſame: her Eyes fair, her Complection rare, and her Mouth admirable: She had a kind of auſterity and pride in the corner of her Eye, and in the corner of her Mouth, which though it was very ſweet, and did much contribute unto her beauty, though it expreſſed ſome inequality in her humour, yet did exceedingly become her. The fourth who was called Philoxene, and was a Widow, was of a ſtature ſomething above the common height but very handſom, her hair was cheſnut colour: the model of her face was ſomething oval, her complection whitiſh and ſmooth, her Noſe was ſomething Aqueline, but well proportioned, her Eyes full, black, ſweet and ſmiling; her Phyſiognomy was noble and pleaſing, which did as well ſpeak the ſweetneſs and equality of her humour, as the tenderneſs and generoſity of her ſoul; and which did invite abundance of eſteem, and forced a diſpoſition to love her: Theſe four perſons being ſuch as I have diſcribed, and being mingled amongſt many others who had beauty enough, it was not without good cauſe that Mandana commended them: Not long after ſhe had as good cauſe to commend the ſweetneſs of their minds as well as the charms of their faces: for they all made it appear, that if Cyrus had been able to have endured that any ſhould have ſhared with him in the ſociety of his Princeſs he had not ſtifled his deſires as he did of talking with her in private, yet he did ſo hide it, as none of the Ladies could perceive him: and Mandana only could know that as amiable as theſe Ladies were, yet he deſired that they were abſent from her, yet it was a long while before he could be in private with her; for beſides thoſe Ladies that were already with Mandana, there came another under the conduct of Anaxaris, who though ſhe was well in years, yet was a Lady of a very handſom carriage, and ſeemed to be a woman of quality. Anaxaris in preſenting her unto Mandana, told her name to be Niſide, and ſaid her quality to be the moſt conſiderable in all Cumes. After which, this Lady beginning to ſpeak, Since I know Madam, ſaid ſhe unto the Princeſs Mandana, what power you have with the Illuſtrious Cyrus, I conceived it my beſt courſe to addreſs my ſelf unto you, for the obtaining of my Sons liberty, who is now his priſoner, who as the Fate of Arms would have it, did take priſoner the Generous Anaxaris who preſents me unto you. I ſhould not have been ſo bold Madam, as to ask liberty for a man who took him priſoner that did ſo couragiouſly fight for yours, if the ſame Anaxaris had not made me a moſt generous promiſe to joyn his prayers with mine to obtain of you, that the ſame man who once took him captive, but at preſent is his, may enjoy the general act of grace which the invincible Cyrus, at your deſires Madam, did grant unto the meaneſt inhabitants of Cumes.

For my part (added Anaxaris) I aſſure you Madam, (ſaid he unto the Princeſs Mandana) that you will extreamly oblige me if you would grant my Conqueror his liberty: and I am the more obliged to ſerve him, becauſe if I had not fallen under his power, I ſhould not have had the glory to have done that little ſervice for you Madam, which I did: ſo that, Madam, to recompence me fully, I beſeech you, let Thraſiles be at liberty: and I am confident that he is a man of ſo much merit, as if you had known him, he had been at liberty e're now. Certainly it is not at all neceſſary to make any addreſſes unto me, (replied Mandana, and ſpoke unto Niſide and Anaxaris) to obtain a favour from the Illuſtrious Cyrus, which he doth ſo uſually grant: And leſs neceſſary, Madam, (ſaid Cyrus, and interrupted her) to uſe my name in a buſineſs which depends abſolutely upon your ſelf: However, replied that Princeſs, I will intreat you to ſet Thraſyles at liberty upon my requeſt. Thraſyles, replied Cyrus, is more a priſoner unto Anaxaris than unto me, but I believe he will confeſs with me, that you have power to ſet at liberty whom you pleaſe: therefore, Madam, you need only to command, and be obeyed. What e're you ſay (replied Mandana) I intend that Niſide ſhall be no more a debtor unto you for the liberty of Thraſyles, than unto me. To end this generous conteſt, replied this Lady, my Son and I will both be equally debtors unto you both, and will both of us make our acknowledgments,as if we were obliged unto one and the ſame perſon. I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid Anaxaris unto Mandana) Command then that Thraſyles be ſet at liberty? Since it is the pleaſure of the Illuſtrious Cyrus, and ſince you have a peculiar right to conſent unto it (replied ſhe) you will do me a pleaſure to go and ſet open his priſon, and to let the firſt uſe of his liberty be imployed in making me acquainted with a man who is ſo valiant as to make you his priſoner. Moſt certainly he is a very brave man (replied Cyrus not ſuſpecting that Anaxaris was his Rival) who is the Vanquiſher of Anaxaris. Anaxaris who in his heart reſented more diſorder than he was well able to maſter when he heard himſelf commended both by his Rival, and by Mandana, did ſeem as if he heard them not; but ſaying ſomething unto Niſide, (who was very glad of her Sons liberty,) took that pretence to go out, and ſet open her ſons priſon, and acquaint him how much he was a debtor unto this Princeſs. And Madam, (ſaid Niſide to her) I know Thraſiles hath ſo ſtrong an inclination to acknowledg a benefit, that he would exceedingly complain againſt me, if I ſhould not acquaint him with his obligements to you, before he hath the honour to ſee you. After this, Niſide retired, and went with Anaxaris unto the Tower where Thraſiles was: As ſoon as ſhe was gone, there was not one of thoſe Ladies who deſired not to be gone alſo, having no mind to be in that place, when Thraſiles entred: But the Princeſs Mandana not thinking they had any intereſt in the Priſoner, addreſſing her diſcourſe unto them, ſhe did engage them to ſtay. Since valour is ever accompanied with all neceſſary qualities to make a compleat man, ſaid Mandana unto Lyſidice, I would gladly know whether Thraſiles have as much wit as courage. Since thoſe who can judg of wit in others (replied Lyſidice) had need to have much themſelves, doubtleſs I am not fit to be a competent Judg in ſuch a matter. The fair Cleocrite who hath it in a ſuperlative degree, and who beſides that, hath all the indifferency deſirable in an impartial Judg, is better able to tell you than I am. This indifference you ſpeak of (replied Cleocrite, and ſmiled) and which you think ſo good a quality in an impartial Judg, may cauſe me to do a piece of injuſtice: for I do not ſufficiently know him, and therefore if the Princeſs would have an exact account of Thraſiles, ſhe muſt have it from Atalia, or from Philoxene: for the one is his ancient friend, and the other is his neweſt acquaintance: According to your own words, replied Atalia, It is ſo long ſince I knew Thraſiles, that I have almoſt forgot him: And for my particular, added Philoxene, I do ſo little know him in compariſon of you, that I may well ſay I do not know him at all. For my part (ſaid Cyrus, and ſmiled, (addreſſing himſelf unto Mandana) by ſeeing ſo many Beauties ſo ſweetly deny being Judges of Thraſiles wit, I do believe him to have very much: and I am apt to believe that theſe Ladies do think more than they ſpeak.

The diſcourſe of Cyrus did put Atalia, Lyſidice, and Philoxene to the bluſh: but as for the indifferent Cleocrite, ſhe never changed colour for it, yet thoſe three Ladies bluſhed more, for as ſoon as Cyrus had ſpoken that which made them bluſh, Anaxaris returned, and Thraſiles followed, who entred with ſo good a grace, and ſeemed to be a man of ſo good behaviour, and of ſuch a noble and gallant Air, that as ſoon as Cyrus and Mandana ſaw him, they had a good diſpoſition to believe that thoſe Ladies who had no mind to commend him, did eſteem him much more than they would ſpeak of. In the mean time, Thraſiles ſpoke ſo well, ſo reverently, and ſo pathetically both unto Mandana, and unto Cyrus, that they eſteemed him as much for his wit as his courage. It is moſt generous and nobly done, Madam, (ſaid he to the Princeſs Mandana) to give liberty unto a man who endeavoured all he could to hinder yours. Though his zeal unto the Prince of Cumes, and unto his Country, was his only motive to fight againſt you. Since you have done nothing but what honour did oblige you unto, replied Mandana, I do not think any thing you have done againſt me ought to keep me from my dictates of Generoſity: and doubtleſs it is upon the ſame reaſon that the Illuſtrious Cyrus doth ſo eaſily and with ſo good a will grant me your liberty. Since I know, Madam, (replied Thraſiles) Nyſide would have me wholly obliged unto you, I dare not in your preſence expreſs my gratitude unto him, though it be infinite. No, no, replied Cyrus, you ought not to give me that which I ought to have no ſhare in. In all places where the Princeſs Mandana is preſent, ſhe is the Authoreſs of all good and ſhe deſerves the diſpoſing of all favours, and therefore unto her from whom you received a benefit is your gratitude due. Whilſt Mandana, Cyrus, and Thraſiles were talking, Atalia, Lyſidice, and Cleocrite, and Philoxene looked on, and looked often upon Thraſiles, who for his part, was not attentive to what he ſaid, or to what he heard, as he was to obſerve Philoxene, and to obſerve whether Atalia, Cleocrite, and Lyſidice obſerved him. But Anaxaris perceived it not, for he was ſo wholly taken up with the ſight of Mandana and Cyrus, as he thought upon nothing but his own paſſion, and never minded others.

But the moſt obſervable paſſage of this day was, that this company who was then with Mandana, and ſtayed very long, was compoſed of perſons who had no mind to be there; for Philoxene wiſhed ſhe had not been there, Lyſidice was extreamly perplexed at her being there, Atalia was vexed at her preſence, and Cleocrite as neutral and indifferent as ſhe was, had rather have been any where elſe: As for Thraſiles, he was much non pluſt at his being amongſt four Ladies, with whom he had held various correſpondencies; and as for Anaxaris, though the ſight of Mandana was the eſſential part of his life, yet he cared not for being there, ſince he could not be rid of his Rival, ſo that except Cyrus, all in the Chamber deſired to be out: 'Tis true, this Prince was as reſtleſs as the reſt, for though he had no mind to be from Mandana, yet he wiſhed with all his heart that none elſe were with her, yet they ſtayed a long while: But at laſt Atalia, Cleocrite, Philoxene, and Lyſidice being gone, Mandana asked Thraſiles, whether theſe Ladies were his friends, and whether he much eſteemed them? But ask what ſhe would, he was as much reſerved in his ſpeeches of them, as they were to talk of him, yet he commended them more than they commended him, but yet it was after ſuch a manner, as was apparent that he was zealous in the commendations of none but Philoxene. After ſome other indifferent diſcourſe, the reſt of the company parted alſo. But juſt as Cyrus was ready to fall in talk with Mandana, Anaxaris brought in an Inhabitant of Cumes, who had a Letter unto the Princeſs from the King of Pontus. Mandana no ſooner looked upon it, but ſhe knew it to be his hand; ſo that giving it unto Cyrus to read: Will you ſpare me the pains (ſaid ſhe unto him) of reading this Letter, which I believe will but anger me: I will obey your commands, Madam, in all things, (replied he) though it be no pleaſing office to read a Letter from a Rival; leſt in lieu of anger, it ſhould invite you unto pity; after which, Cyrus opened the Letter, and found theſe words.

The moſt Unfortunate of all Men living, unto the Princeſs MANDANA.

MADAM,

Since revenge is the ſweeteſt thing in the world, I thought it my duty to let you know, that though I can give you no other ſatisfaction in my life, yet I can acquaint you, that never any was ſo fully revenged as you are; for truly, Madam, I ſuffer more than ever any did; I ſuffer without any hope; and which is the greateſt of my misfortunes, I ſuffer without your pity: And I reſolved to let you know my ſorrows, that I might thereby force you to pity an Enemy, who now hath no power to hurt you: Imagin, Madam, what ſadneſs of ſoul it is, after I have loſt two Kingdoms, after I have ruined Crœſſus and the Prince of Gumes; after I have ſo long loved you without any hope but to hinder my Rival from being happy, what horror, I ſay, it is to ſee him the moſt happy and moſt glorious of all men, and to loſe my very hopes of ever ſeeing you again, I am gone away, Madam, the moſt unfortunate Prince that ever was in the world, the moſt deſperate Lover that ever was or ever will be, and the moſt miſerable man that ever lived: Since I go almoſt alone to ſeek my death in the ſame Element, in which I had the happineſs to ſave your life, and ſince in all probabilities my end will have no witneſſes, I had a deſire to let you know, that maugre your inſenſibility towards me, and in ſpight of all theſe miſeries into which my paſſion hath precipitated me, I ſhall ſtill die your adorer, and can never repent of my adoring you, though that be the only cauſe of all my misfortunes. This, Madam, is the Paſſion which you have ſcorned, and theſe ſhall be my thoughts of you, when the exceſs of my ſorrows ſhall end my life; believe therefore I conjure you, that you, you only ſhall be my laſt thought; and that when I expire, my laſt gaſp will be a gaſp of love, and happy enough ſhall I think my ſelf, if after my death you ſhall only ſay, I was worthy of a more favourable Fate.

When Cyrus had read this Letter, he looked upon Mandana, and ſaid, Doubtleſs I have good reaſon to fear, Madam, that the King of Pontus his Letter will move your heart more unto pity than anger, for though he be my Rival, yet I profeſs I cannot read it without compaſſion: Since pity is natural unto perſons of Heroick generoſity, replied the Princeſs, I wonder not your ſoul ſhould be ſenſible of it: But ſince I will not pity a Prince who had none of me, I will take all occaſions of it from my ſelf; therefore (ſaid ſhe, taking the Letter and tearing it in pieces) I will not read it, leſt it ſhould incline me to pity, as it doth you: I know not, Madam, (ſaid Cyrus then and ſmiled) whether your fears of being pitiful ſhould cauſe ſome ſparks of jealouſie in a Lover, whoſe temper is to be jealous : Nor do I know (ſaid ſhe and ſmiled alſo) whether your compaſſion of him would not move any other than my ſelf to accuſe you of want of affection : Oh Madam, replied Cyrus, that accuſation would have a very bad foundation : It may be as well grounded as the other, replied ſhe : Then I had rather confeſs unto you, Madam, replied Cyrus, that they are both of them built upon a bad foundation, than to diſpute it with you.

After this, theſe two Illuſtrious perſons did both of them agree, that this unfortunate Prince deſerved pity ; they alſo underſtood the ſame day, in what place he had been hid ; and as ſoon as the Port of Cumes was open, he got out in the night as weak and wounded as he was, in a Fiſhers Boat, without any with him but the man who rowed the Boat, who was the ſame Souldier, who went out of the Caſtle with this unfortunate Prince : So that this news did cauſe both Mandana and Cyrus, much more to pity a King who had ſaved both their lives , for it was he who advertiſed Artamenes of the conſpiracy amongſt the forty Cavaliers who ſhould have killed him ; and it was he alſo who ſaved Mandana from drowning, after ſhe had ſuffered Shipwrack ; therefore ſince they could do no leſs for him who had ſaved their lives, they pitied him in his miſery, though he himſelf was the only cauſe of it. The next morning they underſtood that Pactias and Lycambes had layed down their Arms, but Pactias having no mind to come into an Army where Crœſſus was , whom he had betrayed, he imbarked for Mytilene, and that meeting by chance with Harpagus, who durſt not look Cyrus in the face, after his being the loſs of that Army which he commanded, they both contracted friendſhip, and choſe the ſame place for their exile. So that Cyrus ſeeing no Enemy to fight with , and that the field was clear, his thoughts were all how to get Mandana out of Cumes, and to advance towards Medea, though he had promiſed the King of Aſſiria not to marry that Princeſs until he had fought with him, and though Ciaxares had in a manner conſented unto it, and though he was fully reſolved to keep promiſe with him, yet he knew not how to acquaint Mandana with the ill news of it; yet he conceived it a kind of blemiſh unto his honour to go unto Ecbatan before he had fought with that Prince, ſince he knew he would not go thither; but the way being long between Cumes and that Town, and ſince the Princeſs could not go faſt, he hoped that before he got thither the King of Aſſiria would be releaſed, either by ranſome, or by force. So that ſtill entertaining his firſt raptures of joy, he rejected all angry thoughts whatſoever, and commanded Chriſantes and Feraulas not to mention a word unto Mandana of his intended combat with the King of Aſſiria. Thus minding only how that Princeſs ſhould arrive triumphantly into Ecbatan, he gave all requiſite orders for the regulating her houſe, and that her equipage ſhould be magnificent. Now was the time, when the Souldiers which Anaxaris had ſuborned, and which made him Maſter of the Caſtle, did demand, in recompence for what they had done, to have the glory of being a Guard unto that Princeſs; which was granted unto them: But the greateſt wonder unto Cyrus, was to ſee Anaxaris, who had refuſed very conſiderable imployments in the Army, ſhould only deſire to be Captain of the Guards unto the Princeſs; until now, Cyrus thought Anaxaris to be of ſome very extraordinary high Quality; but ſeeing now, how he confined his ambition unto ſo low a ſphere, he thought he refuſed all higher imployments out of his modeſty, and deſired only ſuch imployment as was ſuitable unto his birth: So that conſenting unto it with all joy, Anaxaris became Captain of the Guard unto that Princeſs whom he loved, and was in that office with the approbation both of his Rival and his Miſtreſs, who being ignorant of the paſſion in his ſoul, expreſſed a thouſand teſtimonies of amity unto him.

But whilſt all things were in preparation for Mandana's departure, all the Ladies in Cumes reſorted unto her, and did ſtrive how to divert her; amongſt the reſt, Cleocrite, Atalia, Philoxene, and Lyſidice, were very aſſiduous. Thraſiles alſo was often with her, where alſo all the men of any Quality and wit about Cyrus were preſent. As for that Prince, this preſs of company was often troubleſome unto him, and the better to colour his vexation, he was often conſtrained to go out of her Chamber; and to comfort himſelf, would go into Marteſia's, and talk with her of Mandana: But as he was one day with her, and making her repeat many paſſages which he knew before, one came to tell him the Princeſs would ſpeak with him; Cleocrite, Lyſidice, Atalia, and another Lady called Lyriana, and Thraſiles were with her. As ſoon as he came into the Princeſs Chamber, I beſeech you, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, do not imploy your ſelf only in being the Arbitrator of Aſia, in ordering the intereſts of Kings and Princes, and in taking and giving of Crowns and Scepters, but I beſeech you be a Judg in a difference wherein ambition hath no ſhare, and in which I do confeſs I dare not take upon me ſo much boldneſs, as to give a definitive ſentence: I do not think my ſelf more knowing in any thing than you are, Madam, replied Cyrus, and I hope you do not think me ſo preſumptuous, as to imagin my light of reaſon or knowledg to be above yours. Since I muſt ſuit my words according unto your modeſty, replied ſhe, I muſt tell you there are many things which very decency requires that you ſhould know better than I do; for example, in all the terms and phraſes in the Art of War, would it become me to expreſs them ſo well as you? or were it not a ſhame for you to ſpeak of ſuch things ſo ſimply as my ſelf? Truly in ſome things one of my Sex ought not to expreſs ſo much perhaps as ſhe doth know, for a kind of voluntary ignorance doth well become us: You know (purſued ſhe, and would not give Cyrus time to interrupt her) that Cleocrite, Atalia, and Lyſidice, who would not ſpeak any thing concerning Thraſiles, when Anaxaris asked his liberty, do now all ſpeak unto me of him, and after they had told me a thouſand of his good qualities, do deſcribe him to be the moſt unconſtant man alive. But as they were ſpeaking to me of theſe things, Thraſiles entered, and peremptorily maintained, that he was as faithful as any man living, but the thing which moſt puzzles me is, he confeſſeth withal, that he hath ſucceſſively one after another loved Atalia, Cleocrite, Lyſidice, and ſome others, and that at this time he is in love with Philoxene: How Thraſiles (ſaid Cyrus) ſo many ſeveral loves, and yet faithful? Is it poſſible you can maintain, that you do not merit the name of unconſtant? Sir, repli. Thraſiles, to know rightly what I am, it is requiſite you knew my life, to know perfectly all thoſe whom I have loved, and that you take ſo much pains as narrowly to examine what conſtancy and what inconſtancy is? for I am fully perſwaded, that one may love many, and not be at all perfidious, nor deſerve the name of inconſtant: For truly, Sir, I conceive, that though the King of Aſſiria, and the King of Pontus ſhould now quit that paſſion which hath ſo tormented them, yet they could not be charged with inconſtancy, but rather on the contrary, deſerve to be commended for overcoming themſelves, ſince all reaſon in the world requires it; therefore it muſt be granted, that in ſome caſes one may ceaſe to love, without any brand of infidelity, and begin to love in another place, without deſerving the title of inconſtant; and I think that in ſome caſes, I may very well ſay, it is rather obſtinacy than conſtancy in thoſe who continue loving where they are certain never to be loved: So that in my opinion ſuch men in lieu of a virtue, have a vice, which they thought not of: If it be a vice (replied Cleocrite and laughed) I aſſure you, that you can never be ſuſpected of it, nor be accuſed for being too obſtinate in your love: No (added Lyſidice) but in exchange he may well be charged with inconſtancy. The word obſtinate doth ſo little ſuit with an inconſtant man, ſaid Atalia, that I cannot conſent it ſhould ever be applied unto Thraſiles, who conſidering the number of his ſeveral Loves, is the moſt unconſtant man living: For my part (ſaid Lyriana, who had not ſpoke yet) I muſt confeſs, that I cannot abſolutely condemn him, and I think that without manifeſt injuſtice, he cannot be charged in reaſon with inconſtancy, though he have loved many perſons: It is very generouſly done (replied Cyrus) to undertake the defence of Thraſiles, who is aſſaulted by three ſuch terrible Enemies: Lyriana (replied Thraſiles) doth ſo perfectly know my reaſon, why I ceaſe from loving, that ſhe cannot accuſe me as theſe do, who accuſe me becauſe they do not know themſelves. Moreover Sir, ſince there are ſome reaſons which may induce one to ceaſe loving without any charge of inconſtancy, I hope generoſity will move you to ſuppoſe that I have ſome ſuch reaſons which induce me unto it, and not to look upon me as a perfidious man: For indeed, Sir, I am of this belief, that that which may rightly be termed inconſtancy, is a certain diſguſt, and a kind of wearineſs in ſpirits, which cauſeth the very ſame things that once pleaſed, not to pleaſe any longer, though they be the very ſame things they were before, and which takes novelty to be an inevitable charm: So that by this means the love of an inconſtant perſon doth ſlack, and cool, and die, without any cauſe but what is in it ſelf: So that becauſe there is in the heart of ſuch a one a kind of natural levity, he cannot love the ſame perſon any longer, be ſhe never ſo accompliſhed, or be he never ſo well treated; but for my part, I can aſſure you without any diſſimulation, that if the firſt perſon I loved had been found to be ſuch a one as I fancied her to be, I ſhould never have loved thoſe who upbraid me with inconſtancy. It ſeems (ſaid Cleocrite then) that Thraſiles hath found ſome horrid faults in all the perſons he hath loved: For my part, ſaid Lyſidice, that ſince Thraſiles hath ſpoken thus before the Princeſs, it will much concern our honours, that he declare before the Princeſs his reaſons for quitting us. I believe (ſaid Atalia then) that a relation from his mouth will not be very advantagious to us.

If you will, replied Lyriana, and if the Princeſs deſire to know it, I will make a very exact and impartial relation of all the paſſages which have befallen Thraſiles. You would do me a great pleaſure in it, replied Mandana: I aſſure you, ſaid Cyrus and laughed, you will undertake a very difficult task, to perſwade me that Thraſiles could love, and quit three ſuch Beauties as theſe, and not deſerve the title of inconſtant. Lyriana hath ever been ſo much the friend of Thraſiles, (ſaid Lyſidice) as I can hardly conſent that it ſhould be ſhe who ſhould relate the ſtory unto the Princeſs. For my part, ſaid Cleocrite, I am ſo confident that Lyriana cannot ſpeak any thing to my diſadvantage, as I value not whether or no ſhe be more a friend unto Thraſiles, than ſhe is unto me. To teſtifie, ſaid Lyriana, that I intend to ſpeak nothing but impartial truth, I am willing that you all be preſent at my relation, and that you correct me if I utter any untruth. For my part (ſaid Lyſidice) though Thraſiles were the moſt unconſtant of all men, yet I had rather acknowledge him conſtant, than to be a hearer of all thoſe follies which have paſſed betwixt us. That the relation may be more equal, replied Thraſiles; it is requiſite that none of the perſons intereſted be preſent, and that Lyriana be alone with the Princeſs. Lyſidice, who till then could hardly conſent, that Lyriana ſhould relate any buſineſs wherein ſhe was concerned, was the firſt who according to the inequality of her humour, conſented that Lyriana ſhould be alone with Mandana: And ſo the thing being reſolved upon, Thraſiles went with Cleocrite, Lyſidice and Atalia into another chamber where Marteſia was: and Lyriana prepared her ſelf to relate the various loves of Thraſiles: after which, he was to be declared either an inconſtant man, or elſe confirmed in his pretence to be a moſt faithful Lover. But though Lyriana intended to ſpeak before none but the Princeſs Mandana, and before Cyrus, yet ſhe had more Auditors: For the Prince Artamas being entred with Aglatidas, Cyrus ſaid that they who were the moſt faithful Lovers in the world, were very fit to be judges in the buſineſs: So that every one taking their places, Lyriana addreſſing her diſcourſe unto Mandana, ſhe began thus:

The Hiſtory of THRASILES.

SInce Truth, Madam, ought always to be inſeparable from the words of them who undertake to relate any thing; doubtleſs I ſhall be induced in the ſequel of my diſcourſe not to make an equal commendations of all thoſe perſons of whom I am to ſpeak, though otherwiſe they be infinitely laudable: Therefore, I beſeech you Madam, do not think that to juſtifie Thraſiles, I will unjuſtly juſtly accuſe Cleocrite, Lyſidice, or Atalia: ſince certainly I will tell you nothing which I will not make them confeſs, and which is not known unto all of any quality in Cumes. I will not ſtay you Madam, with a relation how Thraſiles is of a very noble extraction: how he hath upon many occaſions made himſelf Signal in War, and how he hath abundance of wit: But give me leave to tell you, Madam, that never man had a more paſſionate ſoul than Thraſiles hath: For that paſſion of love is ſo predominate in him, as he cannot live and not love: But to manifeſt it unto you, that he is not of the ſame temper which unconſtants are, I muſt let you know that all the loves which he hath profeſſed, were not bare Gallantries and Courtſhips, but they were zealous and violent, as well as tender and paſſionate: And it is my opinion, that if Thraſiles had been ſo happy to love the firſt time, one who had in ſome ſort anſwered his affection, I am moſt confident he would never have loved any but her, and would have loved her until death. And to let you ſee, he is capable of conſtancy, you may judge of his love by his friendſhip; for he had a friend called Egeſipes, whom he conſtantly loved from his very Cradle: Yet the odneſs of his deſtiny was ſuch as that he hath loved many, as I ſhall tell you. Be pleaſed to know Madam, that as ſoon as Thraſiles was out of his Tutorſhip, and began to make viſits of his own head, he fell as much in love as the age at which he was would permit him. But ſince you know, young men, who firſt enter into the world, are not always treated ſo well as thoſe who have been longer in it, unleſs by women who never uſe to repulſe any, and ſuch who would have ſlaves of all ſorts: So Thraſiles, though very handſome, and of much ſpirit, did not then meet with an equal civility amongſt thoſe Ladies who had the greateſt reputation of beauty, and he eaſily obſerved, that they made ſome difference between men of his form and age, and others who were elder than himſelf: So that ſince it was glorious for him, he did not fall in love with ſuch as would not treat him as a man of power to become their Lover; but he fell deſperately in love with a Lady, who being of ſuch an humour as I ſpoke of before, was beyond all meaſure civil unto him, omitting none of thoſe fond fooleries (which women who make it their profeſſion uſe) to enſlave the poor Thraſiles: The ſmall experience he had in the World, ſuffered him to be extreamly joyed at his good uſage, and to ſee that this Lady treated him as if he were the moſt accompliſhed man in all the Court: When he made a viſit any where elſe, he ſat upon thorns and ſtaid not; for as it is uſual unto ſuch green men, they either talked not at all to him, or elſe talking of ſomething that angred him; ſo that he hath often proteſted unto me, that he hath been extreamly troubled at it, when they either ſpoke low in his preſence, or elſe ſpoke only of his exerciſes, or of his Parents, and ſo would leave him.

I leave you to judge Madam, what ſweetneſs he found in thoſe places where he found different uſage, where he was talked unto as others were, and where a hundred trifles were imparted to him; and he loved this Lady as deſperately as ever any did, and he loved her ſo much, that for almoſt ſix months time, he thought himſelf the happieſt man in the world, in being reſpected by a Lady who really had both beauty and wit, but who was the varieſt Cheat, and the varieſt Weathercock that ever was, for ſhe would write Letters of Gallantry unto a thouſand ſeveral Gallants; ſhe would let all in Cumes love her, and deſired to be loved of all the world; ſhe would put all that ever loved her in hopes, and yet jeared at all without exception: I think Madam you will not at all wonder that Thraſiles being very young ſhould be taken by her, and that you will wonder leſs he ſhould leave her, when he diſcovered her cheats and fooleries, and when he knew ſhe loved him no better than ſhe did a thouſand of his Rivals; if to juſtifie the change of Thraſiles, it were requiſite to give you a Catalogue of her Tricks, I could tell you, that he met with many of her Letters, that he underſtood ſhe ſhewed his unto all his Rivals, that ſhe would jear with them at his paſſion, and with him at theirs, that ſhe would often ſend him word he could not ſee her, whilſt ſhe was talking with others in private, and that indeed ſhe was the weakeſt, and moſt fooliſh perſon of her Sex. I leave you to judge Madam, whether Thraſiles was able to continue loving her, and whether his change could be called inconſtancy: I will not further aggravate the matter, ſince for the juſtification of Thraſiles, it is enough to ſay, that I conceive he would have been extreamly to blame, had he perſiſted loving ſuch a contemptible woman after he knew her. However, ſince the amorous inclination of his heart would not let him live long without loving ſome one or other, after his return out of the Country, and after he had broke off with his firſt Miſtreſs, he laid ſiege to a ſecond: But ſince now Thraſiles began to be reputed one of the compleateſt Gallants in all our Court, he was looked upon in a different manner from what he was at his firſt entrance into the world, ſince there was not a woman of any quality who thought it not a glory to have ſome ſhare in his eſteem, and his choice was not bad in fixing upon Atalia, for the object of his ſecond paſſion, for as you ſee her a Lady of much beauty and wit, ſo ſhe is Miſtreſs of much generoſity, goodneſs, and freedom. Thraſiles then finding her infinitely amiable, did infinitely love her, and he loved her the more, becauſe he found her of a humour different from her whom now he ſlighted; for indeed Atalia affected neither Gallants nor Gallantry, ſhe rather ſhunned the tumults of the world, than courted it; ſhe was handſome without any affectation, and of a ſweet, eaſie, and agreeable converſation, though of a little ſerious temper: So that finding a thouſand good qualities in her, oppoſite unto thoſe ill ones which he ſcorned in her he had quitted, he applied himſelf unto her ſervice, and that very violently, continuiug a long time in doing all that love uſeth to incite the greateſt Gallants to do, for indeed he made her many magnificent Feaſts; and his love to her was not only violent, put it was alſo apparent, and made a great noiſe in the world: He ſeeing that maugre all his endeavours, Atalia did not anſwer his paſſion, but on the contrary, did ſlight it as much as in civility ſhe could, yet he perceived that it was not out of any averſion or ſcorn, and that he had a ſhare in her eſteem, though not in her affection; ſo that ſtill he applied himſelf to her ſervice with all imaginable exactneſs, and he was ſo obſtinately devoted unto it, that this Lady, who did really eſteem him, and who feared leaſt her Parents ſhould force her to marry a man whom they highly eſteem'd, reſolved to tell him the reaſon why ſhe would not anſwer his affection. One day when he was alone with her, and when he had a deſire to ſpeak of his paſſion to her, and to beſeech her ſhe would not ſcorn his affection, ſhe impoſed ſilence upon him, and acquainted him with as much ſincerity as ſweetneſs, with the true cauſe of her coldneſs to him: Since I do intend (ſaid ſhe unto him) to give you a very ample teſtimony of my eſteem, I do conjure you to let me acquaint you with a buſineſs which will anger you the moſt of any thing in the world, if what you have told me be true, and that you love me as well as you would make me believe, for truly Thraſiles, I were very unworthy of the honour which you do me, if I ſhould let you engage you ſelf any further in an affection wherein you can never receive any ſatisfaction. Alas Madam (ſaid Thraſiles and interrupted her) can I never hope to be loved or endured? No (ſaid ſhe unto him) you cannot; and if I could obtain ſo much power of my ſelf, as to tell you the reaſon, you would agree with me, that unleſs I ſhould wrong you, and be unjuſt, I muſt deny you my affection: Why Madam (ſaid he) can you not love me, becauſe you love ſome body elſe? Can there be any in the world ſo happy, as to be loved by Atalia? Can any upon earth be ſo little tranſported with joy at ſo high a happineſs, as that he can hide it? Fie Atalia, it is not impoſſible: If he were a man of this Court, who hath this honour, I ſhould diſcover the joys of his ſoul through his eyes; and the truth is, if there were any truth in your words, I ſhould have ſeen him with you, and if I had ſeen him, certainly I ſhould have known his happineſs and his paſſion: Yet you may eaſily conceive, ſaid ſhe unto him, that what I tell you is not invented: But I beſeech you Madam (ſaid he unto her) who is this too happy man that hinders me from being ſo, and who hath the glory of your affection? I did not tell you, replied Atalia, that I do love any, but only that I would have you know, that there is one whoſe love I could admit of: If that be all, replied Thraſiles, it is not enough to hinder me from loving you; and I beſeech you Madam, give me leave to love you as well as my Rival, be he whom he can be, and if it ſo fall out, that you love him better than me, then it may be my reſpects of you may make me endure my miſfortune with patience.

Atalia ſeeing ſhe had ſaid either too much, or too little to ſatisfie him, was at a little non plus; ſo that reſolving to drive the nail to the head at one blow, ſhe confeſſed unto Thraſiles, that ſhe was in love,though ſhe would never confeſs with whom: I beſeech you Madam (ſaid he unto her) tell me who is this inviſible Rival, the noiſe of whoſe ſighs could never reach my ears, though I have been almoſt perpetually with you? And what hath he done to win your heart, and undo me? He hath loved me (ſaid ſhe) before you did, and when you were in love with another; and he hath loved me with ſo much fidelity and obedience, that he never revealed unto you the ſecrets which were betwixt us: How Madam (replied Thraſiles much aſtoniſhed) is the Rival you love my Friend? No, no Madam, that is not poſſible; for truly I have but one only friend, which is Egeſipes, and I am moſt confident he would reveal his very heart unto me, if either of us two be faulty, I am ſure it is my ſelf, in never telling him that I loved you; and beſides Madam, Egeſipes hath been abſent theſe three months: 'Tis true (ſaid ſhe and bluſht) Egeſipes hath been out of Cumes this three months; but it is as true alſo, that he hath been above a year in my heart; therefore Thraſiles, ſince I would not expoſe you unprofitably to loſe a friend, I had a mind to diſcover that unto you, which yet he knows not, and I will acquaint you, that I ſhall never love any but Egeſipes, who only knows that I do not hate him, but knows not at all how my heart is wholly his: Oh Madam (cried he out) I had rather he knew it, and that I knew it not; but is it true, that Egeſipes ſhould be my Rival, and I have no cauſe to hate him? Doubt it not, ſaid ſhe, for indeed he knows no more that you are his Rival, than you did within this quarter of an hour know that he was yours: However Thraſiles, (ſaid ſhe and aſſumed a very ſerious countenance) if you be not faithful unto me, and if you do not make good uſe of this ſecret wherewith I have truſted you, I do profeſs I ſhall moſt horridly hate you: I beſeech you Madam, replied he and ſighed, what ſhall I do to make good uſe of it? You muſt never tell it to any (ſaid ſhe) no not unto Egeſipes himſelf. You muſt alſo ceaſe to be my Lover, but never ceaſe to be his Friend. Alas Madam, replied Thraſiles, how difficult are your commands to be obeyed? How hard a task is it to love a Rival, and leave loving a Miſtreſs? When one cannot without injuſtice hate the firſt, replied ſhe, nor with any hopes continue loving the other, the moſt rational, the moſt generous, and fitteſt courſe is to be taken, and not obſtinately to run on headlong in a deſign which will never proſper.

For all Atalia's fair language, ſhe could not that day perſwade Thraſiles; but he perſiſted loving her as before: he thought alſo to have quarreled with Egeſipes as ſoon as he returned to Cumes. But upon ſerious conſideration, finding that the affections of Egeſipes and Atalia was indiſſolvable, and all was both unjuſt and in vain to root his friend out of the heart of the fair One, he began generouſly to ſtrive with himſelf, he left Cumes for a certain time, and when he returned would not viſit Atalia any more: ſo that abſence, reaſon, generoſity, friendſhip and all, overcoming his paſſion he left off loving Atalia, ſince he ſaw an abſolute impoſſibility of ever obtaining her love. Thus I conceive it may very well be ſaid, that though there was a great difference between her and the firſt Lady he loved, yet he might very well quit her without any aſperſion of inconſtancy as well as the other.

However, ſince in changing his thoughts of her, he had not changed his temper: and ſince the amorous inclination of his ſoul could not be idle, he fell inſenſibly in love with Cleocrite, who indeed was very capable of captivating a heart, but was abſolutely uncapable of making a lover happy, for her humour was oppoſite unto any ſuch thing of that nature. Since the love of Thraſiles unto this fair One was extreamly violent, I ſhall inſiſt longer in relating of the paſſages between them, then I did in relating of the two firſt: And ſince it doth very much concern Thraſiles, that you perfectly know Cleocrita, to the end you may not accuſe him for quitting her, it is requiſite I deſcribe her unto you: As for her perſon, I need not ſpeak of it, becauſe you know her, yet I can aſſure you, that ſince ſhe hath of late been ſick, you never ſaw her beauty in its full luſtre, for certainly when ſhe was in perfect health, ſhe was much fairer than now ſhe is, though now at this preſent ſhe be very fair. For Madan, there was ſo great a luſtre in Cleocrites complections, and in her eyes, when ſhe dreſſed up her ſelf with a deſign to make a Conqueſt, that ſhe always ſtruck all beholders with admiration: Moreover, Cleocrite had an excellent, gallant, and knowing wit: ſhe ſpoke admirably, and inſpired a ſoul into all company; ſhe would be ſo ſweetly merry as pleaſed very much, and ſhe would out with a thouſand pleaſant quibbles in a pleaſant manner; But for all the charms of her beauty and wit, and maugre all the excellent qualities which ſhe was Miſtreſs of, ſhe had one which did not only loſe her all her Lovers, but alſo all her friends: and which made it a thing almoſt impoſſible to love her long and zealouſly. Every one did queſtionleſs always much eſteem her, and love her alſo whether they would or no: but it was with a murmur againſt her, and with a confeſſion they did not well in loving her: for truly Cleocrite had ſuch an univerſal, and ſo great a neutrality and indifferency unto all whatſoever, that ſhe made thoſe who knew her to deſpair, who otherwiſe eſteemed her very much; yet do not think, I mean, Madam, when I ſpeak thus of her indifferency, that ſhe is uncapable of either violent paſſionor violent friendſhip: but my meaning is, ſhe is abſolutely incapable of any particular application of her ſelf unto any one whoſoever; and if ſhe loved any much, it was pleaſures in general: She could leave any place without any trouble to her ſelf, new acquaintance never vexed her: She could eaſily endure the abſence of her beſt friends, though yet ſhe would have been glad to ſee them: And it may be ſaid, and truly, that ſhe accuſtomed her ſelf unto all Companies, and diſ-accuſtomed her ſelf from all.

Since ſhe had wit in abundance, and could very well diſcern degrees of merit, and diſtinguiſh men of parts from others, She was much delighted to have her chamber always full both of wits and blockheads: But when chance would ſometimes have it ſo, that there was none of the firſt ſort there, ſo there were but a number of mean capacities, who could but talk and fill up ſeats, ſhe was never troubled at it as any other would have been: And I believe Cleocrite, as witty and ſprightly as ſhe was, did ſo love a multitude, that ſhe had rather have been in the company of five or ſix ſhallow wits, than in the company of the moſt accompliſhed man upon the earth, if he were long with her. I aſſure you Madam, Cleocrite was never better pleaſed than when ſhe ſaw much company both at home and abroad, and paſs continually from pleaſure to pleaſure, and from feaſt to feaſt; as for ſolitude ſhe did abhor it, yet this muſt needs be ſaid to the glory of Cleocrite, that ſhe was very ready to do her friends any ſervice whenſoever any occaſions were offered; and would often treat them as if ſhe did moſt tenderly love them. But to tell you truly, it was becauſe ſhe knew that decency required it: and that when ſhe ſaw them, ſhe would be merry with them; and being a lover of pleaſure and mirth, ſhe would love them that would be merry and pleaſant as long as the mirth and pleaſure laſted, and no longer. She was of ſuch a cold neutrality, that though ſhe would have been glad that one ſhould love her, yet ſhe cared not for being loved with any tenderneſs or violence, provided people did eſteem her, and love her enough to ſee her often, to be compl ſant and merry, ſhe cared not a ſtraw for any more. However, this ſtrange indifferency, which vexed both her Lovers and her friends, did not ſo eclipſe Cleocrite, but for all that, ſhe was one of the moſt accompliſhed Ladies in the world.

She being ſuch then as I have preſented her unto you, Thraſiles loved her, and loved her with ſo much the more hopes, becauſe he thought he did not expoſe himſelf to love one who loved a thouſand, nor unto ſuch a rocky miſfortune as he did in loving Atalia, being ing ſure that ſhe had no particular affection unto any which could hinder her from accepting his, ſince ſhe was generally accuſed for loving none at all. He hoped alſo that this her cold indifferency might one day prove advantagious to him, if ever he could win upon her, and that he ſhould be much more happy in having one who would be cold unto all the world but himſelf. The truth is Madam, he loved Cleocrita, and did not deſpair of obtaining her love; for ſhe being of a free, and open ſprightly nature, and entertaining all that diverted extraordinarily well, Thraſiles was at the very firſt miſtaken, and thought that ſhe was ſo for the love of him, though indeed is was only for the love of her ſelf; ſo that he engaged himſelf more and more, and loved her far better than ever he did before.

Thraſiles being of a free and liberal inclination, invented a hundred diverſions which were agreeable to the diſpoſition of Cleocrite; ſomtimes he would give her a danceing entertainment, another while he would ſurprize her with muſick: If he walked with her, ſhe was ſure to meet with a coſtly collation, and for a whole Summer together, there was no day without a pleaſant diverſion from Thraſiles: You may very well imagine Madam, that Cleocrite, having a ſoul ſo devoted unto delights, would very civilly treat the man who procured them, eſpecially a man ſo accompliſhed as Thraſiles was, in the mean time, as much in favour as he was, he could never tell her his paſſion; for ſuch was the general neutrality of Cleocrite, that ſhe never repulſed any acquaintance: So as there was continually ſo many men with her, and ſomtimes men very impertinent, as it was not poſſible for a man to get a minutes talk with her in private: But at laſt, being one day in the Garden with her and with four or five perſons more who he wiſhed farther oft, he led her apart from this troubleſome company. But ſince Cleocrite did naturally love a general converſation, better than any private, ſhe turned ſeveral times to ſee whether the company followed, and ſeeing them to walk a ſlow pace, ſhe offered to call them, as if ſhe had been weary of Thraſiles. But this Lover having a hot deſire to diſcover his poſſion unto her who cauſed it, did hinder her, and would not loſe an occaſion which he had ſo long looked for: Why Madam (ſaid he unto her) is not my company enough to entertain you in a place, where Trees, Flowers, and Fountains may delight the eyes, and divert the mind? Pray pardon me Sir (ſaid ſhe very obligingly unto him and ſmiled) for I was afraid that my company was not good enough for you, and therefore I deſired to call for more: I beſeech you Madam (ſaid Thraſiles) do not think I can deſire better company than yours, eſpecially now when I have ſomething to tell you, which I have long deſired to impart: Really Thraſiles (ſaid ſhe unto him, without any application of it to her ſelf) you do very ill in ſtaying ſo long before you tell it. Thraſiles ſurprized at her ſpeech, did perceive ſhe did not much mind what ſhe ſaid, and indeed Cleocrite never ſtaying for Thraſiles his anſwer, began to ask him, whether the Ball was to be kept the next day at the Prince of Cumes his Palace? I know not Madan, ſaid he, whether there be any Ball to morrow, but I am moſt ſure, my heart will be much perplexed to day, if you will not hearken unto what I ſhall tell you, and if you do not hearken very favourably: For the truth is Madam, I have diſcovered in my ſoul a thought ſo contrary unto that wherewith you are upbraided, that I am extreamly afraid you ſhould hate me when you know it: No, no (ſaid Cleocrite unto him) I am not ſo unjuſt as you think me; therefore though you be not of my opinion in every thing, yet I ſhall not hate you; for the ſame indifferency wherewith they upbraid me, makes me to allow others their opinions, ſo they will let me enjoy my own, and ſuffer me to follow my own will: You do much joy me Madam, replied he, and for this day only I ſhall love his indifferent humour, whereof you are ſo much accuſed, if it will permit me to tell you, & not anger you, that I am infinitely in love with you. Cleocrite was ſo ſurprized at the diſcourſe of Thraſiles, that thinking perhaps it was only a piece of Gallantry, ſhe began to anſwer him laughing: Though it were true you did love me, ſaid ſhe, and though I could hear it without any anger, yet I believe you would not be a jot the better, for I never heard that indifferency was any great favour: It is moſt true, it is not (replyed Thraſiles) but yet I muſt needs think it a piece of good fortune, if you can know I love you, and yet not hate me; and truly my paſſion is of ſuch a nature, as you would be unjuſt if it did offend you, ſince my deſire is only to ſee and adore you, and if it be poſſible, to talk with you ſometimes in leſs company and more privacy. How's this Thraſiles (ſaid ſhe unto him) are you ſo bold as to talk of any matters of Love unto one who is accompted for neutrality and indifferency in the very abſtract? And can you ever think, that ſince I am accuſed for not loving where I ought to love, I will ever begin to entertain any vicious affection, or any Gallantry? No, no (purſued ſhe and laughed, and deſired to avoid angring him) though it were true you did love me, and hoped to obtain my leave, yet your proceeding is not diſcreet, but you ought to ſtay till you ſaw me inclinable unto any amity at all; therefore Thraſiles, I would adviſe you as a friend, to continue living with me, as formerly you have done until you ſee my heart a little ſoftned; for to think I ſhould in a moment paſs from one extremity unto another, is to imagine impoſſibilities: I know very well Madam, ſaid he unto her, that it was a very difficult task to engage unto the love of any; but to ſhew you that I aim not at any impoſſibilities, I do not now ask ſo much happineſs, as that you ſhould love me, but I only ask ſo much favour, as to let me love you: I am ſo accuſtomed Sir, replied ſhe, not to care what thoughts men have of me, that what you ask, I think, will be no difficulty to obtain; yet ſince your company doth infinitely pleaſe me, I wiſh with all my heart you would not drive me to the neceſſity of being deprived of it, as infallibly I muſt, if you continue perſecuting me with any talk of Love, which doth but trouble both the Lover and the loved; for indeed Thraſiles, why do you think, I endeavour ſo much to preſerve this indifferency, which is ſo much talked of; The reaſon is, becauſe I ſee all men who are not ſo, are miſerable. This fine tenderneſs of heart, which is ſo highly applauded, makes thoſe who are capable of it, not only ſenſible of their own miſeries, but of others alſo, or at leaſt they ſay ſo: So that knowing ſo many as I do, if I were of ſuch a tender compoſition, I ſhould be perpetually in miſery; for there is not a day in the year in which there is not ſome one of my friends either abſent, or ſick, or in ſome affliction or other; But I know how to paſs away my time a little better than ſo, and am more rational than to grieve exceſſively at any thing but what reflects directly upon my ſelf.

It ſeems Madam, replyed Thraſiles, that you are the happieſt perſon in the world: Not at all, ſaid ſhe, for I have as many vexations, as others have: As for example, when I have a deſign to walk, if it chance to rain, or the day not prove fair, I am vexed to the heart; or if it prove too cold or dry, and the duſt diſturb the pleaſure of it, I am grieved at it to the Soul; if any coveto*u*s fellow will not be at the charges of keeping a Ball, I ſhall murmur and grumble at him, as if he had done me ſome manifeſt injury; if I chance to be a little ill upon any day of diverſion, I ſhall be ſo ſick as if I were ready to die: So that though I have none but my own ſorrows to be ſenſible of (ſaid ſhe and laughed) yet I have enough to put me to all my patience; therefore Thraſiles, do not perplex me with that which of all things in the world I cannot endure, for I aſſure you, if you be obſtinate, and will be talking to me of any ſuch things as Love, you will find, that though I am not capable of any tenderneſs, yet as indifferent as I am, I am capable of anger; yet for all this, Thraſiles did not take her counſel, but on the contrary, began to proteſt moſt ſeriouſly and earneſtly, that his affection to her was infinite, and that he was fully reſolved to overcome her indifferency by a million of ſervices, by as many prayers, ſighs, and ſubmiſſions: So that Cleocrite foreſeeing ſhe muſt be deprived of Thraſiles, who furniſhed her with a thouſand diverſions, and that ſhe was not to accept any of his feaſts, as ſhe did before he had diſcovered his paſſion unto her; alſo conſidering that he would endeavour as much as he could to talk only with her, and hinder her from talking with others, ſhe was ſo extreamly vexed at it, as ſhe gave him very angry language, and Thraſiles could not give any appeaſing anſwers, for the reſt of the company joyning with them, he could not ſpeak to her all that day: Since the anger of this fair One was very high, and ſince he never before had any trial of it, he feared that it would laſt long, and not daring to revive it, he kept very cloſe three whole daies, and durſt not ſee her, nor would he go any where elſe, ſince he could not ſee her there: Yet at the laſt, ſince he was not able to live and not ſee her, he reſolved to go unto her, but it was in ſuch a trembling manner,and with ſuch a dull ſadneſs in his face,as made it evident he had ſpent his time very ill, ſince he ſaw her laſt.

At for Cleocrite, it was not ſo with her, for ſhe had been every day in the Walks ſince Thraſiles told her of his love; and though ſhe had not been in company of any ſo accompliſhed as himſelf, yet Cleocrite was never melancholly for the matter; but was as gay, and pleaſant, and merry, as Thraſiles was ſad.

This miſerable Lover then going to her with a look as pitiful at Cleocrite was pleaſant, he entered into her chamber with fears, that he ſhould find but very bad reception: But the wonder of the paſſage was, that Cleocrite having ſpent thoſe three days in feaſts and pleaſures, and had talked with a hundred ſeveral perſons ſince ſhe ſaw Thraſiles, had ſo quite forgot that he had ever mentioned any matters of love unto her, and that ſhe had given him any ſharp anſwer, or was ever angry at him, as ſhe entertained him with a free and pleaſant countenance as formerly ſhe was wont to do; asking him where he had been? what he had been doing, and why he was not at thoſe feaſts ſhe had been at? Telling him, ſhe had been very merry, and that ſhe did not think ſhe ſhould ever ſee more pleaſant days than theſe laſt.

Thraſiles was ſo amazed at the carriage of Cleocrite, as he knew not whether he ſhould be ſad or glad at it: yet not thinking it poſſible ſhe ſhould ſo ſoon forget the paſſages between them, his hope was that ſhe repented her ſelf of her courſe treatments to him; ſo that deſiring to cloſe with an opportunity which he thought favourable for him: Had I thought, Madam,(ſaid he unto her)that my company would not have diſturbed your pleaſures,I ſhould not have failed to have been in thoſe places where you have been ſo pleaſant: But I muſt ingeniouſly confeſs, that I durſt not ſee you ſo ſoon after the harſh language you were pleaſed to give me: and I did not come hither now but in fear of your diſcovering the zeal of my paſſion. Cleocrite hearing Thraſiles ſay ſo, did preſently remember what ſhe had forgotten: at firſt ſhe bluſht for ſhame, but preſently after ſhe began to laugh ſo heartily, that ſhe was not able to ſpeak: Thraſiles did now as much wonder at her merrineſs, as he did before at her civility, and ſtood ſtone ſtill; but at laſt Cleocrite beginning diſcourſe: I ask you pardon, Thraſiles, ſaid ſhe, for the injury I have done you, in quite forgetting what you ſaid, and what I anſwered the other day: and for not remembring that I was angry with you; for indeed I know that my preſent civilities are moſt injurious. But I proteſt, I did not remember it; yet to repair my fault, and to teſtifie that I am not ſo indifferent as you think me, I will rowſe up my anger, and quaſh all my civilities. Thraſiles was ſo aſtoniſhed at this, that he neither knew what to think or ſay; but at laſt, not being able to hold. Is it poſſible, Madam, ſaid he unto her, you ſhould forget how I told you that I loved you? Yes, ſaid ſhe, and ſo forgot it, that I ſhould do you the greateſt wrong in the world, if I ſhould remember it; for indeed I ſhould not then have lived with you, as I did before.

But, Madam, replied he, Can I believe this to be true? To make you certain of it, ſaid ſhe, keep only five or ſix days out of my ſight, and when you come again to me, ſpeak not a word that may revive your crime and my anger in my memory, and ſee whether I ſhall remember it; for unleſs I be much miſtaken, I ſhall not, and it will be long of you only, if we do not agree well together as we did before. No, no, Madam, replied Thraſiles, much incenſed, I muſt not do ſo; for ſince you cannot remember a thing three days, I muſt tell you every day that I love you, and that I ſhall for ever love you whether you will or no, in ſpight of that cruel indifferency wherein you ſo much glory, though it be the greateſt fault you have.

As Thraſiles pronounced theſe laſt words, I came into the chamber of Cleocrite, and heard them very diſtinctly; ſo that prompting them to go on with their diſcourſe, I need not ask (ſaid I unto Cleocrite) what that fault is, wherewith Thraſiles upbraids you, for ſince you have but one it is eaſie to gueſs it, eſpecially ſince it is ſo generally known unto all the world. I proteſt Lyriana, (ſaid ſhe unto me and laughed) you are very plain with me, and I do not think there is any perſon upon earth who is ſo freely upbraided with her faults as I am. Since you do vainly glory in that one you have, replied I, the world ſpeaks of it without fear of angering you, and without any hopes alſo of ever mending you. Then they ſhould never ſpeak of it, replied ſhe. You take ſo much pleaſure in their ſpeaking of it (replied Thraſiles) that it is the leaſt piece of complacency they can uſe to you to ſpeak of it, as they do the reaſon why I am not angry, ſaid Cleocrite, is the ſame why the greateſt beauties are leaſt angry when they are called ugly: For to ſpeak with the ſame plainneſs, Lyriana, that you do, if I had only that fault which the world ſo twits me with, I were the rareſt woman upon earth. Yet you go too far, ſaid I unto her, if you perſwade your ſelf that a cold faint indifferency is a good quality. Perhaps (replied Cleocrite) you call indifferency ſomething elſe which I know not, and which I am a ſtranger unto; but I dare maintain that all my thoughts are juſt, and that the amity whereof I am capable, is the moſt convenient, and rational of all others: As for the moſt convenient for you, replied Thraſiles, I do agree with you, but as for the moſt rational, I think it is diſputable. The moſt tender amity, replied ſhe, cannot produce any thing which is good, that may not alſo be expected from mine: For truly, I think there is none, who loves better to ſerve their friends, nor is more glad to ſee them, than I am: You might have added, replied I, nor none that can better tolerate their abſence: It is true, ſaid ſhe, that when I loſe the ſight of them, I do not loſe my wits: But I pray tell me, if I were the moſt grieved in the world at the abſence of my friends, what good would it do them? Doubtleſs I am ſorry to part with friends, but it is without any mad exceſs, or troubling my friends which remain, by an inſupportable grief, which does them no good who ſees it not, and troubles them who do ſee it, and caſts down my ſelf without any other benefit but getting the reputation of a tender-hearted thing; but in my judgment, theſe are Arguments of a weak ſoul.

Did I not really eſteem my friends according to their merit, and ſerve them whenſoever they ſtand in need of my aſſiſtance, I ſhould ſet a worſe face upon them when they come to ſee me; I ſhould not let them condemn me as they do; only becauſe forſooth I do not give them my whole heart, and becauſe I am not ſenſible even to the very laſt gaſp, and becauſe I do not mix with my talk words of tenderneſs, zealous amity, and ſuch like, therefore I muſt paſs for a piece of hard indifference, though to ſpeak truly, I am no more than what is requiſite and concordant to reaſon; this is it which I cannot endure: And indeed (purſued ſhe and laughed) do not all the Sages who are ſo fam'd in the world make prudence to conſiſt in a ſelf-denial of all things? and according to their precepts am not I temperate, as they by their ſapient documents would have me? None of the Sages you ſpeak of, replied Thraſiles, did ever condemn amity; No more do I, replied ſhe, but I do regulate it, and give it limits: For to think that amity ſhould be a heavy burthen, and an oppreſſion unto thoſe who love it, is a thing moſt unjuſt; if ſo, I had rather chuſe ambition, hatred, or anger, than amity, which is termed tender amity, heroick amity; ſince certainly I ſhould ſuffer leſs by thoſe three violent paſſions, than by that you call amity: You might have wiſhed jealouſie as a higher aggravation (replied Thraſiles.) If one could be jealous, replied ſhe, without love, I ſhould have put it in for company; and if you will, I will alſo add envy, which is no leſs tormenting than jealouſie, that I may let you ſee how inconvenient I think this kind of tender amity is; I am confident that if the hearts of all men were laid open, as mine is, even thoſe who make the greateſt profeſſion of tenderneſs, they would not be found more tender der nor ſenſible than mine is ; all the difference 'twixt me and others is, that I ſpeak what I think, and would not paſs for what I am not, or for what I would not be: Oh I beſeech you, ſaid I, content your ſelf with your own indifferency, and do not undertake to condemn amity, which is the moſt innocent, the moſt juſt, the moſt ſweet, and the moſt heroick quality in the world ; for truly this amity which you ſo much ſlight is of ſuch a Nature, as without it, there is no true ſatisfaction in the world, all other pleaſures without it are but imperfect, they reach no further than the ſenſes, but never fill the ſoul, or charm the heart with abundance of ſweetneſs: 'Tis amity, doubtleſs which ſweetens all ſorrows, which doubles all delights, which makes one to find comfort and conſolation in the greateſt misfortunes, and indeed it is that which prompts every one unto a thouſand heroick actions: The truth is, purſued Thraſiles, It is had in veneration amongſt all Nations, and there is not one perſon in all the world except Cleocrite, who is not offended at it, if they be charged with want of amity: I pray do not except me, replied ſhe, for I ſhould not be pleaſed that I ſhould ſay I do not love my friends: But it is true, I do not much affect, that any ſhould think my amity to be worthy of any Elogies: If you did but know what true amity is, replied I, you would not be aſhamed to call ſuch an affection as your heart is capable of, by ſo glorious a name: However it be, ſaid ſhe, I would not alter my opinion. After this, Thraſiles and I, did argue a long with Cleocrite to no purpoſe, for we could not argue her unto any repentance, nor make her acknowledg ſhe was in the wrong. However, ſince my deſign was only a bare viſit unto Cleocrite, after I had ſtayed out a reaſonable time, I went out, and left Thraſiles alone with her, who not being able to leave her, before he had expreſſed his affection, as ſoon as he ſaw I was gone, he began to ſpeak unto her. Becauſe I dare not ask a favour, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) which would be oppoſite unto your humour, I ſhall this day only deſire of you, that you would be ſo indifferent as to let me love you, and not be angry: I have already told you, Sir, replied ſhe, all that I can ſay upon that queſtion : But not to deny you every thing, I ſhall further ſay unto you, that upon condition you will live eight days, as heretofore you have done, and mention not a word of that pretended paſſion which you ſay is in your heart, nor by any of your actions manifeſt it unto me, I will do what I can to forget all that you ſaid unto me the other day, and to day : And after this, I proteſt I will never examine upon what grounds you viſit me ; and to teſtifie how pleaſing the ſight of you is unto me, I promiſe you never to attribute any thing which you ſhall do for me, to any thoughts of Love : O Madam, (cried out Thraſiles) I do not deſire this laſt favour, but on the contrary, I conjure you to believe, that whatſoever I ſhall do or ſay, are only ſuch effects as my love of you doth inſpire into me : When you ſee me ſad, think that I am ſo only becauſe I am not loved of her whom I adore ; if you ſee me joyed, the only reaſon is becauſe I am near you ; if I be in a deep ſtudy, imagine it your ſelf who hath ſolely taken up my ſoul;if I look upon you, think that is in hopes you will caſt a favourable eye upon me again ; and if I do not look upon you, conceive it is becauſe I am afraid to anger you, and find it in your eyes ;and indeed Madam,without any interpretation of my actions, as actions of indifferency, believe that whatſoever I ſhall do, is done with a premeditated deſign and hope to obtain your love : To teſtifie unto you,replied Cleocrite,that I am of a very pliant humour, I ſhall believe as you would have me to believe : Oh Madam, ſaid Thraſiles, Shall I be ſo happy ? As for happy, ſaid ſhe,I know not whether you will be or no ; all I know is, and I will ſay it again, that I tell you I will believe you love me,and that you would have me love you ; but at the ſame time I declare unto you,that I will tranſact with you,as if I did believe all this,that is,I will ſee you no more,that I will ſhun you with all imaginable care, that I will deprive my ſelf of a thouſand delights by it, and by conſequence, that I will moſt horribly hate you. O Madam,(cried out Thraſiles) rather than ſo,I beſeech you think that I do not love you : I ſhalldo ſo,ſaid ſhe, and do it with abundance of pleaſure: Yet I beſeech you,Madam,replied Thraſiles,believe, or not be-believe, as you ſhall think good: Since I am to believe what pleaſeth me, replied ſhe, I ſhall eaſily believe you do not love me, becauſe I do extreamly wiſh it; therefore Thraſiles take your meaſures accordingly, and be confident, that the readieſt way in the world to make me hate you, will be to create a diſpoſition in me to part from this neutral indifferency, which cauſeth all the tranquility and ſweetneſs of my life; content your ſelf with my accuſtomed civilities, and regulate your ſelf accordingly.

Thraſiles uſed all his Rhetorick to make her change opinion, but all would not do; and before he could obtain leave to ſee her, as he was wont to do, he muſt promiſe her to carry himſelf towards her, as formerly he uſed: However, he thought it a kind of happineſs that he had let her know he loved her without a baniſhment; for ſince he could not imagine ſhe ſhould believe he did not love her, he hoped that ſhe her ſelf would take it to heart, without his further telling her. So that aſſuming to himſelf new hopes, and conſequently new joys, he continued in his obſequious ways of ſerving her, and courting her with a thouſand delights; yet this ſerenity of ſoul and tranquility of heart was not long, for the more he applied himſelf unto her, the more indifferent he found her, and he more clearly found it, becauſe having two Rivals who were nothing ſo gallant as himſelf, and who courted Cleocrite with ſome diverſions, yet he obſerved that ſhe was not more faintly indifferent unto them, than unto himſelf, provided the Muſick was good, that the Ball was finely carried, and the Banquet ſumptuous, ſhe cared not a ſtraw for him who was at the charges of them, and would have been as well contented to have received all theſe diverſions from any other, as from him: So that Cleocrites manner of living did put this pitiful Lover to a thouſand ſecret diſpleaſures, yet he could not accuſe her of any inconſtancy, or any ſecret under-hand dealing, for ſhe held correſpondency with none, nor treated any better than himſelf, nor did ſhe treat him better than any other, though ſhe had a thouſand reaſons to put a notable difference betwixt Thraſiles and all the reſt; for it was his fortune to render her many conſiderable ſervices concerning her family, mily, and having very much credit, ſeveral occaſions preſented themſelves, wherein he did highly manifeſt his affection unto her. But do what he could, he could not move her heart,nor never extinguiſh her humour of indifferency, yet he did accuſtom himſelf whether ſhe would or no to tell her that he loved her, but it produced no more effects upon her ſoul, than upon a ſtone, inſomuch as he grew ſo much incenſed againſt her cruel indifferency, that he was not only grieved becauſe She would not love him, but it vexed him alſo that She would not love any of her friends; and he hath ſometimes ſworn unto me, that he ſhould have thought himſelf leſs miſerable,if Cleocrites had loved any of his Rivals, than he was to ſee her ſo inſenſible and indifferent as ſhe was.

I beſeech you Madam, (ſaid he one day unto her when he had found ſome new ſign of her inſenſibility) perſwade me by ſome example,and that it is not abſolutely impoſſible you ſhould love ſome or other : Chuſe out of the whole Univerſe whom you ſhall think good; for were I once convinced you could love any, I ſhould be in ſome hopes: It not being poſſible that any ſenſible heart ſhould know my paſſion, and not anſwer it : But to ſee that nothing will move it, that your ſoul will not fix upon any, that though you have a moſt diſcerning eye in all things, yet that you will chuſe none, this is a thing which is moſt intollerable. Yet you muſt endure it, replied ſhe, for I will never change, nor do I think I ought ever to change; and indeed ſhe was as good as her word. Yet Thraſiles as inconſtant as he is ſaid to be, did ſtill continue loving her, that for my part I did both pity and chide him: Alſo I had reaſon to double my pity; for the indifferency of Cleocrite went ſo near his heart, and grief ſo filled his ſpirits that he fell ſick, and that moſt extreamly ſick. At firſt Cleocrite who knew his diſeaſe, and was not ignorant that ſhe her ſelf was the cauſe, ſent to ſee how he did, and ſaid ſhe was very ſorry : But for all that, though all Phyſicians thought him deſperate, ſhe loſt not a days diverſion for it, nor was a jot more melancholly, nor worſe dreſſed. And queſtionleſs this laſt inſenſibility was like to have been the death of Thraſiles:

For ſince he had his reaſon free, and ſince the heat of his Feaver had not a jot cooled his love, he did every day carefully cauſe his men to enquire what Cleocrite did; ſo that ſometimes he would hear ſhe was in the Walk, other times that ſhe was at ſome Great Feaſt; and almoſt every day that ſhe was never ſo jocond and merry: But one day among the reſt, when he was exceeding ill, and Cleocrite ſending to ſee how he did, he ſent her word as he believed, that ſhe was now like to loſe the moſt faithful of all her Servants, and that he thought he ſhould never have the honour to ſee her again: Yet he underſtood that this ſad meſſage did not keep her that day from making ſeveral viſits, viſits of pleaſure, and of no neceſſity at all. You may well imagine Madam, that this went to the very heart of Thraſiles: Yet maugre all his diſcontents he recovered; but could not ſo ſoon recover the diſeaſe of his mind as of his body; for he returned as deep in love with Cleocrite as ever, though he was much vexed ſhe ſhould be ſo little ſenſible of his ſickneſs, yet ſhe did eaſily appeaſe him; for as ſoon as ever ſhe ſaw him in a capacity of giving her freſh diverſions, She received him with ſuch joy in countenance as would have perſwaded any one, that She had been very ſorry for his ſickneſs: Thus did Thraſiles ſuffer himſelf to be deluded, inſomuch as he courted her in ſuch a manner as would have moved even cruelty it ſelf. In the mean while Thraſiles being ingaged to go unto the wars; and the day of his departure being come, he ſent to ask her favour that he might come and take his leave of her, but becauſe ſhe was engaged with Lyſidice to go unto ſome place, I know not where, about a buſineſs not worth a ruſh, and even where ſome of Thraſiles his Rivals were to meet her: She choſe a very mean pleaſure, rather than deprive her ſelf of it, in giving Thraſiles ſo much ſatisfaction as to did her adieu. You may well imagine Madam, what thoughts Thraſiles carried with him, and whether Cleocrite was very ſorry for his abſence; yet ſometimes She would think upon him, but it was only to lament the want of thoſe diverſions he was wont to give her; and not one tender or obliging thought of him:

. This Madam, if I be not much miſtaken, is ſufficient to juſtifie the change of Thraſiles

Be pleaſed to know that towards the end of the Summer, it chanced that I went one morning unto her, to ask her if She ſhould make a viſit with me that day? At firſt, She told me that She was engaged unto Philoxene to go with her unto a place; but upon examination whether She ſhould find more pleaſure of Philoxenes viſit or mine: She reſolved upon mine, and ſent to excuſe her ſelf unto the other: Then She began to make her ſelf ready, and to ask my counſel how ſhe ſhould dreſs her ſelf. As we were then in conteſt what ſhe ſhould wear or not wear, one of her women entred into her Chamber with ſuch ſad looks, as was eaſie to perceive. She had ſome bad news to tell. Madam, ſaid the woman unto her, you will be much ſurprized and very ſorry if you knew all: Cleocrite whoſe mind ran all of dreſſing her ſelf, and never had the leaſt thought of Thraſiles, did think that her gown which was to be brought that morning, was not yet ready: or that the Carkenet of Diamonds which She had borrowed of a friend, and which ſhe intended to wear that day, was broken or loſt; ſo that ſhe haſtily asked the women, which of thoſe miſchances it was? No Madam, replied ſhe, the news is worſe; Thraſiles is killed, and news of it is brought unto Niſide: Alas (cried I out with extream ſorrow) is Thraſiles kill'd? Yes (ſaid the woman) and all the world does infinitely lament him. To tell you, Madam, that Cleocrite would have been more grieved if the Carkenet of Diamonds had been loſt or broken, then at the death of Thraſiles, perhaps had been a lie, and perhaps a truth; for Madam, all that ever ſhe did in the buſineſs was to ſend unto Niſide's to know whether the news was true; and in the mean while ſhe did a little lament the death of Thraſiles, but it was with a very quiet mind, and without one ſingle tear or ſigh: Alas, ſaid ſhe unto me, I was in ſuch hopes of a thouſand delights from Thraſiles this Winter, that I muſt needs lament the loſs of the poor man. For my part, ſaid I unto her, I lament the loſs for himſelf, and not for the loſs of any delights; lights; and although he would have contributed unto no diverſions at all, yet I ſhould pity him as much as I do. Whil'ſt we were talking thus, the news of his death was confirmed; and immediately after I ſaw Cleocrite looking in her glaſs, and being but half dreſſed, ſhe dreſſed her ſelf with as much ſpruceneſs and alacrity as ſhe deſigned before the ſad news was brought: For my part, I muſt confeſs, I was ſo ſurprized at the obdurate inſenſibility of Cleocrite, as I was ſpeechleſs; ſo looking upon her actions with as much amazement as ſorrow, and with as much anger as amazement: I obſerved that ſhe ranged her locks, and curled her hair with as much niceneſs and care, and dreſſed her ſelf as trimly as if ſhe had ſome deſign of conquering a freſh Lover in lieu of him ſhe had loſt. After I had forced my patience a long while in ſilently ſeeing her deck her ſelf, and after her woman was gone out, my choler could contain no longer: Fie Cleocrite, ſaid I unto her, does not thoſe thouſands of delights which Thraſiles hath given you, deſerve one day of mourning for him, and to deprive your ſelf for his ſake of a poor mean diverſion the day you hear of his fatal death? If that would raiſe him from the dead, replied ſhe, I ſhould do it with much joy; but ſince I have paſſed my word unto Philoxene, I am reſolved to keep it. But you did reſolve to break it (ſaid I unto her) and to make a viſit with me; and may you not as well break it to mourn one day for the poor Thraſiles? I can mourn for him better in company than in ſolitude (replied this hard hearted Lady) and if I ſhould this day hide my ſelf, I might perhaps be accuſed of mourning too much for him: Fie Cleocrite, ſaid I unto her, you are not in any ſuch reputation of tenderneſs, as that you need fear any ſuch aſperſion: and certainly they would wrong you much, if they ſhould think you ſo inclined: Why (ſaid ſhe) do you think I do not grieve for Thraſiles? I proteſt I think ſo, ſaid I unto her. And I proteſt, replied ſhe, that I grieve as much as I can and more than ever I did for any: I do believe it, ſaid I unto her; yet it is becauſe you love nothing in the world but your ſelf; and as long as you can look in your glaſs, and find your ſelf fair, you care for nothing elſe; yet I would gladly know whether you could reſent the loſs of your own beauty. Cleocrite then offered to give me ſome poor reaſons, but I roſe up and left her, not being able to endure ſuch a ſtony hearted piece of inſenſibility. Howſoever, ſhe went with Philoxene unto the place agreed upon, where ſhe found more diverſion than ſhe expected, for they danced until night. But Madam, all this was happy for Thraſiles: for you muſt know, that the cauſe of theſe reports of his death, was, that there was one Thraſiles killed, but it was Thraſiles of Xanthes, and not of Cumes: For that Thraſiles who was an Adorer of Cleocrite, and whoſe death I lamented, being choſen by the Prince of Cumes to carry the news of the victory which he had lately gotten, he came to Town that very evening after his death was reported, his firſt care was to enquire how Cleocrite did, and he was let know that ſhe was at a Ball: and at the ſame time he was informed that every one thought him dead: he underſtood that Cleocrite ſent unto his mother to enquire of it, and that it was from her confirmed; ſo that he could not doubt but Cleocrites heart was harder to him than flint. This did ſo much ſurprize him that imagining perhaps Cleocrite was not told of it; or that perhaps ſhe had heard the news of his death contradicted, he reſolved to go unto the place where they ſaid ſhe was. But in his way thither, he took my houſe in his way to ask me what I knew concerning Cleocrite; ſo that after my expreſſions of joy to ſee him alive, and deſiring to cure him of his paſſion, I told him that the hard hearted indifferency of Cleocrite was unworthy of his affection: and I brought his mind into ſuch a ſtate as to wiſh he could love her no longer: After which he went unto the place where ſhe was in a ſtrange perplexity: As he entred into the Hall, ſhe was dancing, and danced ſo very well, as it was apparent her mind was wholly upon it; and the thoughts of his death did not hinder one ſtep of her dancing. You may imagin, Madam, how Thraſiles was troubled to ſee how indifferent Cleocrite was of him; but much more after ſhe had done dancing, when he ſaw her talk to his Rivals with as much jolity in her looks, as ever ſhe had in her life.

There being much company in that place, Thraſiles was not at firſt perceived, but anger upon a ſudden rowzing up his heart, and deſiring to reproach Cleocrite with her horrible inſenſibilirdy, he broke through the crowd, and came unto the place where ſhe was diſcourſing: Imagin, Madam, how Cleocrite was ſurprized to ſee Thraſiles by her, whom ſhe thought to be dead, ſhe ſhrieked out, as if ſhe had ſeen ſome horrid apparition: So that all the company flocked about Thraſiles, and rejoyced to ſee him. As for Cleocrite, ſhe was as glad as if ſhe had grieved extreamly for his death, and for half an hour the talk was ſo tumultuous, as it was not poſſible for Thraſiles to ſpeak particularly unto Cleocrite; but at laſt when every one had complemented themſelves out of breath, he had opportunity of ſpeaking to her: I would believe, Madam, for my ſatisfaction (ſaid he unto her in a twitting kind of jeſt) that you are of the ſame opinion which ſome People in the world are of, who think they ought to rejoyce, and be fineſt at the death of their kindred and friends, and who laugh at thoſe which weep and put on mourning; for if I were not perſwaded of this, I ſhould have cauſe to think my ſelf the moſt miſerable of all men living, ſince the reports of my death will not oblige you to beſtow one ſigh upon me, nor ſtop the full carreer of your joys for one minute.

Cleocrite hearing Thraſiles ſay ſo, as inſenſible as ſhe was, yet ſhe bluſhed, but it was more out of anger than any ſhame; in lieu of confeſſing any fault, or any repentance, or ſeeking out for any excuſes, ſhe anſwered him ſharply: If you be riſen from the dead, ſaid ſhe unto him, only to make perpetual complaints of me, becauſe I did not weep for you, you put me to the neceſſity of grieving more for your life, then I did for your death; Therefore if you will take my advice along with you (ſaid ſhe with a forced ſmile) be contented that I am glad to ſee you again without any further enquiry, whether I grieved when I thought you dead: Your inſenſibility, Madam, ſaid Thraſiles, goes too too far, and certainly I ſhould be the leaſt generous of all men, if I ſhould endure it; I am ſure, Madam, that the loſs of my affection will never trouble you, ſince the loſs of my life did never reach your heart; and it is not out of any humour of revenge that I withdraw this affection from you, but it is only from my own tranquility; for it is a thing moſt impoſſible for any man to love a perſon of ſuch a rocky diſpoſition, and ſuch a flinty inſenſibility as you are, any long time.

When Thraſiles was ſilent, and expected an anſwer from Cleocrite, one came and took her out to dance, and ſhe went with as jocund a countenance, as if Thraſiles were not at all diſpleaſed, nor did take the leaſt care in the world all the day after, to give him any occaſion of talking with her, nor ever offered to excuſe her inſenſibility: I think, Madam, after all this, you will not condemn Thraſiles, for reſolving to uſe all his endeavours to leave loving ſuch a ſtony-hearted perſon as was not capable of loving any, yet heaven knows it was a hard task for him to bring it about, and he was a long time conſulting which ways might poſſibly reach the heart of Cleocrite, yet in concluſion, growing out of all patience, very anger in a few days did that which his reaſon could not, and he cured himſelf of a diſeaſe which he thought incurable, and the more to confirm him in his recovery, Cleocrite did care as little for the loſs of him, as if ſhe had eſteemed him at the value of a ruſh; yet I do believe, ſince that, ſome reſentments of honour made her a little angry, that ſuch a Slave had broken priſon; but I am certain, that though ſhe did apprehend the loſs, yet it was not at all out of any tenderneſs: I conceive, Madam, that after all this, Thraſiles cannot be charged with any inconſtancy, ſince there never appeared the leaſt levity in all his carriage; and that if he did leave loving her, it was only becauſe it was moſt fitting he ſhould do it.

Since the love of Thraſiles to Cleocrite made a great noiſe in the world, it was ſoon peceived they were at odds, and ſince the matter was never made any ſecret myſtery between them, all the world did know the cauſe, and I dare boldly ſay, all the world did lay the fault where it deſerved, and blamed Cleocrite: But amongſt the reſt, Lyſidice could not chuſe but much condemn her: So that ſince Thraſiles did naturally love to be pitied, and loved ſuch as took his part, and hearing what Lyſidice ſaid in his behalf and againſt Cleocrite, he deſired me to carry him to her, knowing that I was frequently with her; I being glad to contribute any thing unto the conſolation which he had found in one who condemned the inſenſibility of Cleocrite, did willingly conſent unto his deſire, not being ignorant, that Lyſidice would think her ſelf obliged unto me for bringing Thraſiles unto her, whom ſhe eſteemed very much, though he never ſaw her at her own houſe. But as I have deſcribed the other Ladies whom Thraſiles loved, ſo it is requiſite I deſcribe this, whoſe Perſon you know is all beauty, all amiable, all charming, in whoſe mind was a million of beauties and admirable graces; but as for her humour, it is ſuch, as none living can repreſent it unto you, for indeed Madam there was never any more ſweet, more compliant, nor more agreeable at certain times, on certain dayes, and certain hours, and at certain minutes; but alſo, never any was more auſtere, more imperious, more crabbed, nor inſupportable at other times; ſo that there was ſuch a prodigious miſcellany and inequality in the humour of Lyſidice, as I conceive ſhe may be fitly compared unto one of thoſe days in the Spring time of the year, when one ſhall ſee the Sun guild all the world, give a freſh fragrancy unto the Meadows and Trees, and diſcloſe a thouſand Flowers, and upon a ſudden a terrible ſtorm of Hail and Snow doth fall, together with Thunder and Wind; ſo that one may in one day ſee all the beauties and all the rigours of the whole year: Indeed Madam the inequality of Lyſidices humour is ſo great, as I have often ſeen her moſt pleaſant in the Morning, moſt melancholy after Dinner, and as merry as might be before Night again, having no cauſe in the world to be more merry or more ſad at one time than at another: Perhaps you will ask me Madam, how Thraſiles could ever fall in love with ſuch an uncertain perſon; and I muſt anſwer, that the good hours of Lyſidice were ſo pleaſing and charming, that it is no wonder at all if ſhe did captivate the heart of Thraſiles, which was ſo apt for love: It may be further ſaid, that the humour of Lyſidice was always to prefer the ſociety of men, before that of women, and was leſs various in her unequal humours with new acquaintance than with others: Alſo Thraſiles did not at firſt know her temper, but on the contrary, was never better ſatisfied with any perſon than with her the firſt time he ſaw her: For truly ſhe had ſcrued her ſelf, into all his thoughts of Cleocrite, and did ſo inveigh againſt her rigid humour, as he had good reaſon to think, that ſhe had a heart as ſoft and ſenſible, as Cleocrites was hard and indifferent: So that accuſtoming himſelf by little and little to ſee her, he came at length to love her. Since he had already loved three perſons in one Court, he did for a while conceal his paſſion, fearing that they would, as formerly, upbraid him with inconſtancy. Whilſt he was thus ſilently in love with Lyſidice, he began to diſcover the oddneſs of her humours, and I cannot tell whether or no he did wiſh, that he did not love her, if the fate of it had been in his power: However, ſince he believed her not to be inſenſible and indifferent, he counted all her other defects as nothing, and to ſpeak the very truth, Lyſidice had no other but this unevenneſs of temper, and that was not then ſtrong enough to hinder Thraſiles from loving her, and applying himſelf to her ſervice: But it is very obſervable, that the ſame imperfection which all the friends of Lyſidice did continually chide her for, was partly a cauſe why he diſcovered his paſſion, ſooner than otherwiſe he would: For Egeſipes, Thraſiles, and I being one afternoon with her, it chanced ſo, that I began to chide her, for the inequality of her humour, which hindred her from being without any fault: That which did give me a ſubject for it was, that when Thraſiles and I came into her Chamber, ſhe did entertain us with ſuch a hollow kind of gravity, as if ſhe did not care for our company, or as if ſhe were in ſome moſt deep melancholy, yet within leſs than a quarter of an hour Egeſipes coming in, ſhe paſſed upon a ſudden from her dumpiſh humour unto the quite contrary, and was extreamly civil, ſweet and pleaſant. In the mean time, I knew it could not be the ſight of Egeſipes which cauſed the alteration of her humour, knowing that ſhe loved me, as well as him, and that ſhe eſteemed Thraſiles more than Egeſipes: So that making this my pretence of chiding her: Really Lyſidice (ſaid I unto her) I am very glad that I came not by my ſelf to ſee you, and I believe Thraſiles is not ſorry that we came together; for ſince you would have entertained us ſo coldly, it would have vexed us to have ſeen it, eſpecially ſeeing you receive Egeſipes with ſo much joy; but ſince we came both together, I believe this coldneſs doth not relate unto either of us: For my part, replied Thraſiles, I reſpect Lyſidice more than to ſuſpect her of any coldneſs unto you; and I had rather take it all upon my ſelf, though there is none in the world could be more ſorry for it than I ſhould: No, no, Thraſiles, replied Lyſidice, never trouble your ſelf in a thing wherein you have no ſhare, nor trouble your ſelf with ſatisfying Lyriana, for I aſſure you, ſhe chides me, rather to correct me than for any thing elſe: It is moſt true Lyſidice (ſaid I unto her) and I ſhould be extreamly joyed if you were always in the ſame mood as you are now, and that you would never be in that humour in which you were when Thraſiles and I came in: Did you but know how much fairer and more amiable you are when you are out of this dogged fit, certainly you would for ever baniſh it; for queſtionleſs, there is nothing more becoming, than an even, ſmooth and equal temper: For my part, replied Lyſidice, I am not of your opinion, but am perſwaded it is more pleaſant to find ſeveral perſons in one, than to ſee ſtill the ſame glutting equality of temper, which never ſheweth you but one and the ſame thing ſeveral times. Certainly, added ſhe, and laughed, it is with equal and unequal humours, as with waters in general, where thoſe which are ſtill the calmiſt, are not the moſt pleaſiug: I think none will deny, but that the Sea with all its ſtorms and tempeſts is more pleaſant than a ſtanding Lake, in ſpite of its tranquil ſerenity: The inequality and fury of the Sea, replied Thraſiles, is doubtleſs very pleaſant unto thoſe who ſtand upon banks, and look upon it, but very troubleſome unto thoſe who are upon it: 'Tis true, replied ſhe: But as the Sea doth ſometimes ſwallow up ſome unfortunate perſons, ſo it pleaſeth a hundred thouſand who look upon it in ſafety. Moreover, this inequality of temper which is ſo much vaunted of, is often only a good effect of a bad cauſe: For to ſpeak in general, if one do well obſerve thoſe who are of this even temper you ſpeak of, he ſhall find much ſtupidity in ſome or moſt; others of grave and ſilent temper, it is more out of ſluggiſhneſs than virtue, that they do not vary and change their humours; others are ſo continually in the ſame temper of merriment, that they ſeem fools, and others of ſuch an inſufferable tediousneſs of ſpirit, as that their equality of temper renders them weariſome. Moreover, I will maintain, that moſt of theſe equal-ſpirited perſons, have the thoughts of a baſe and crouching ſoul: And on the contrary, to ſpeak in general, thoſe of a little uneven temper, and ſomething fantaſtical, have hearts moſt high and heroick. I know there are ſome in whom all the virtues meet, wit, ſpirit, generoſity, complacency, and equality, are their own, but this is very rare; and I am confident that ordinarily, if men of greateſt ſpirits have this equality in their humours, it comes to them more by reaſon than by temper: You defend a bad cauſe with ſo much eloquence, ſaid I unto her, that I cannot think you are fully perſwaded, it is as you ſay: Seriouſly (ſaid ſhe) I think as I ſay, and I do not think my ſelf deceived; for indeed, from whence do you think proceeds the fantaſticalneſs and inequality, wherewith Poets, Muſitians, Painters, and all thoſe who make profeſſion of the Liberal Arts are charged? Have they not all their raptures? Do you think the Rules of Poetry, the inſtruments of Muſick, Colours and Pencils, are tyed to the ſame evenneſs of temper? Fie, no, not at all; but the very ſame temper which makes the higheſt Poets, the greateſt Muſitians, and the beſt Painters, makes humours a little unequal and phantaſtical.

Moreover, it is a groſs error, to think that one alters humour always without cauſe or reaſon, and moſt certainly there are reaſons which are not viſible unto others; for when the imagination is quick, and the mind very ſenſible, a very ſmall matter will be a great vexation: In my own particular, my very own thoughts will put me into a bad humour; and when I am not pleaſed with my ſelf, I am never pleaſed with any, nor can I pleaſe others: But I pray, ſaid I unto her, how is it poſſible, that having ſo much wit as you muſt needs have to ſpeak as you do, you ſhould not imploy it to bridle the vexation of your humour, which alters the very air of your countenance, and which ſometimes makes the ſweeteſt and moſt amiable woman in the world become imperious, and as peeviſh a thing as is imaginable? The reaſon is, ſaid ſhe, becauſe I am ſuch a lover of liberty, that I cannot be a ſlave to my own reaſon in a thing almoſt indifferent, and which does not expoſe me unto any crime; and alſo, my reaſon it ſelf tells me, that I am obliged to change my temper; for as I do not know almoſt any one who has not ſome quality or other which is to be deſired ſhe had not, my friends ought to bear with my faults as I bear with theirs: This word Fault is very rough (replied Thraſiles) to expreſs any quality that can be found in Lyſidice: If you conſult with Lyriana, replied ſhe, I am confident ſhe will think the word mild enough: Since you are not in your fretting humour (replied I unto her) and that one may ſpeak any thing unto you, I find it ſo ſtrange a thing, you ſhould be capable of ſuch extream inequality, that I think it not rough enough, for you who can judg ſo clearly of others, who can make ſuch good choice of your acquaintance, and who can hardly endure thoſe who are but meanly qualified: Ah Lyriana (ſaid ſhe) when did you ever ſee me fret or vex, but when I do ſee men that pleaſe me not, or that I have ſeen ſome ſuch, or that I know I ſhall ſee them? or that I only fear to ſee them: I beſeech you, Madam, replied Thraſiles, do me the honour to tell me, which of theſe four did cauſe the coldneſs in your face, when Lyriana and I entred?

As to that, ſaid ſhe, and laughed, I muſt ingeniouſly confeſs, that I do not know the reaſon. After ſuch a ſincere acknowledgment, we continued chiding Lyſidice; who was in ſo good an humour that day, as that ſhe was not at all angry. Preſently after a friend of mine coming to fetch me from Lyſidices, I left Thraſiles alone there; for Egeſipes would needs carry me to my Coach, and went with me. I underſtood ſince, that Thraſiles finding ſuch a favourable occaſion, he would not let it ſlip, not knowing when he might find Lyſidice, both alone, and in ſo a good humour; alſo the laſt diſcourſe with her did give him a good ſubject to talk unto her: and ſince I knew he was in love with her, I turned towards him at my going out, and told him thus, If to your miſery (ſaid I to him, and laughed) you be in love with Lyſidice, I would advice you to tell her now as much; for in the humour ſhe is now, I think you may tell her any thing without fear of anger: The counſel you give, replied Thraſiles, perhaps is more dangerous to follow than you imagin. Not at all (replied I, and laughed ſtill) for as Lyſidice uſeth to be angry at every thing when ſhe is in the fretting humour: I am confident, ſhe will not be angry at any thing when ſhe is in the pleaſant fit: After this I went out with Egeſipes, and Thraſiles ſtayed. I underſtood ſince from himſelf, that as ſoon Lyſidice and he had taken their ſeats, he reſolved to diſcover himſelf, ſo that making uſe of my advice, as a Prologue to the buſineſs: As dangerourous as the counſel of Lyriana is (ſaid he unto her) yet Madam I will follow it: And after I have a long time adored you in ſilence, it is juſt you know what thoughts your beauty hath inſpired me withal. I beſeech you Thraſiles, replied ſhe, do you think the ſharp language of Lyriana need engage you to give me any ſweeter; for I am confident ſhe knows not what ſhe ſaid unto you, nor what you anſwered: I know not why, Madam, replied he, you ſhould ſpeak ſo much of Lyriana; But for my part I do proteſt, I know very well what I do ſay; and that I never in all my life ſpake more ſincerely than now I do, when I aſſure you that there is none upon earth that loves you better than I do; and that I never loved any near ſo much as I do you: Fie, Thraſiles, ſaid ſhe unto him, you have ſaid too much to be be believed; for I am confident you have loved three better than ever you loved any elſe. Truth is, the firſt paſſions are ever moſt violent; and I think it may very well be ſaid, that the more often one loves, the leſs he knows how to love. I know not, Madam, replied Thraſiles, whether it do often fall out ſo as you ſay; but I am moſt ſure it is not ſo with me: for I loved Atalia much better than I loved her who cauſed my firſt paſſion; I loved Cleocrite much better than I loved Atalia, and I love Lyſidice much better than them all three. Since you have told me the ſeveral degrees of your love unto three ſuch amiable Ladies (replied ſhe and ſmiled) I pray tell me alſo unto what point did you arrive in obtaining the love of them; I thought I had obtained the love of the firſt, replied he, and I was in hopes of obtaining the love of the other two, but did not obtain the love of any of the three; yet for all this I muſt love the fair Lyſidice, and not deſpair to obtain her love. Certainly ſaid ſhe and ſmiled, to love and not be loved, is not ſo great a miſery as is reported, ſince you are ſo reſolved to endure it ſo often. I beſeech you, replied Thraſiles, hearken a little more ſeriouſly unto what I ſay: and do me the honour to tell me how you would have me live? I dare not undertake to regulate your life, anſwered ſhe, but I ſhall be very willing to regulate your words; for truly Thraſiles, you have ſpoke ſo much, that I cannot deſire you ſhould ſpeak any more. Content your ſelf therefore with the quality of my friend, and never offer to perſwade me that you are my Lover: Moreover, I muſt tell you, that you would not be ſo happy as you imagin, if I ſhould ſuffer you to love me. For firſt, you may be aſſured, that though I would have you love me above all the world, yet I would do all that ever is in my power never to love you again. But I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid he unto her, did you not condemn indifferency in Cleocrite? 'Tis true, ſaid ſhe and I condemn it to in you, for I would have had her to love you, but it ſhould have been by virtue, and not by inſenſibility. This diſtinction, replied he, is very nice; but though there cannot be a more miſerable condition than to love, and not be loved by the perſon one loves: yet Madam, I would with all my heart, that the fair Lyſidice were once put to the neceſſity of ſtriving not to love me. You ſee, (ſaid ſhe and laughed) that I begin it now; ſince I do what I can to believe you do not love me; and that you ſpeak as you do, only becauſe Lyriana hath engaged you. Oh Madam, replied Thraſiles, do me not ſo much wrong; for if you do, I ſhall be induced to tell all the world I love you, to the end you may not be ignorant of it:Take heed,replied ſhe, leſt you do not as you ſay, for though it be true you do love me, yet I had rather know it only my ſelf, than that every one ſhould know it, not that I would make any ſuch ſecret of your Paſſion as ſhould be advantageous to you, but becauſe I do hate above all things in the world, that any one ſhould be known unto the Court to be my Lover; for if I would treat him ill, it were good for him they ſhould not know it; and if I would treat him well, it would be good for me they did not know he loved me, leſt they ſhould ſuſpect I love him; therefore Thraſiles, if you do not love me, you ought not to tell any that you do, ſince that would be to tell an unprofitable lye; and if you do love me, yet you ought not to tell it, for whether I ſhould be mild or rigorous, it is equally requiſite that this pretended Paſſion be kept cloſe: Then Madam, ſaid Thraſiles, I will tell it unto none but your ſelf, and provided you will be pleaſed to let me tell it unto you, I will be ſilent unto all the world beſides: I beſeech you Thraſiles (ſaid Lyſidice to him) either hold your Peace, or talk of ſomething elſe; for believe it, my crabbed humour will come upon me if you continue any longer: Then Madam, it's beſt for me to leave you before it come (ſaid he unto her) And indeed Thraſiles ſeeing company coming in as he ſaid ſo, did retire, not knowing whether he was more to hope or to fear, yet he thought himſelf very happy, in that he had diſcovered his love unto Lyſidice; but the Gods do know, his happineſs did not laſt long, for this changeable humoured woman was ſo ill ſatisfied with her ſelf after Thraſiles was gone from her, and thought that ſhe had ſpoke too kindly unto him, as to repair that fault, ſhe reſolved to treat him the moſt ſharply the next time ſhe ſaw him: And indeed ſhe was as good as her word, for ſhe would ſcarcely look upon him, or anſwer him when he ſpoke; yet Thraſiles could not that day diſcern perfectly whether this rigid uſage from Lyſidice, was only a ſimple effect of her unequal humour, or proceeded from what he had ſpoke unto her the laſt time: But a few days after I gave him light in the buſineſs, as I am going to tell you: You muſt know Madam, that going to Lyſidice, I found her in her Mothers Chamber, where there was ſo many women, that there was ſcarce any room for me, but there was not one man amongſt them all.

I cannot relate every particular paſſage of their diſcourſe, but I muſt confeſs it was not very pleaſant, for it was compoſed only of this and that dreſs, and of ſuch trifles; and I may very well ſay, that I never in my life heard ſo much ſpoken, and to ſo little purpoſe. I eaſily perceived that Lyſidice was in a fretting humour, and perceived it with delight: becauſe it was a kind of whetſtone to her wit: As ſhe was very weary of this tumultuous company, which went againſt the grain of her inclination, one of her Cozens came in. But the moſt obſervable thing was, that though this man who came in was far from one of the fineſt wits, but of a very common form of men, yet the diſcourſe did preſently alter, and became more regular, more witty, and more pleaſant, though there was no alteration at all in the company, but only this man, who was none of the beſt Speakers: The truth is, though I cannot give a true reaſon for it, they talked of other things, and much better, and the very ſame perſons who before did weary me, as well as Lyſidice did now extreamly delight me. However, when all the company was gone, I ſtayed with Lyſidice, who ſeeing her ſelf at liberty, did upon a ſudden lay aſide her crabbed humour, and aſſumed her pleaſant: Well Lyriana, ſaid ſhe unto me, do you yet condemn me for preferring the company of men before the company of women? and muſt it not needs be confeſſed, that if all were written down that fifteen or twenty women together ſhould talk, it would be the moſt pitiful book in the world: I do confeſs (ſaid I unto her and laughed) that if all I heard this day were written, it would be found a very fantaſtical piece: for my part, ſaid ſhe, I am almoſt mad at my own Sex, eſpecially when I am in company, with thoſe whoſe talk is all of dreſſes, of houſhold-ſtuff, of Jewels, and ſuch like; not but that I would have ſuch things talked of; for truly I have ſometimes ſo well dreſſed my ſelf, as I ſhould be glad to be told of it; and ſometimes my Gown is ſo rich and well made, that I love to hear it commended; but I would have ſuch things ſpoke of but ſeldom, that they ſhould talk of them handſomely, as it were by the by, without making it the main buſineſs, and not as certain women I know, who make it the whole buſineſs of their lives, to talk of ſuch things, and never think of any thing elſe; and yet do think upon them with ſo much irreſolution, as that they have not yet determined the queſtion in their minds, whether the Red becomes them better than the Blew, or the Yellow, then the Green: I muſt confeſs, Madam, Lyſidices diſcourſe did make me laugh, and the more becauſe there was a Lady in Cumes, whoſe mind was wholly upon ſuch things, and never talked of any thing elſe: whoſe greateſt glory did conſiſt in the guilding of her Palace, in the richneſs of her houſholdſtuff, in the fineneſs of her clothes, and fairneſs of her jewels. After I had laughed heartily at Lyſidices diſcourſe, I would needs take the Ladies part in general, and told her that there were as many men as women, whoſe company and diſcourſe was not very pleaſing Doubtleſs, replied ſhe, there are ſome whoſe company and talk is intollerable, but yet there is this advantage in them, that one may more eaſily be rid of them: nor is one obliged to obſerve an exact civility towards them.

But Lyriana, ſaid ſhe, this is not my meaning: for the thing I ſay is, that the moſt amiable women in the world, when many of them are by themſelves together, and not a man amongſt them, do uſe to talk of nothing worth a ſtraw, and weary one another more than if they were by themſelves. But it is not ſo amongſt men of able accompliſhed parts: Their converſation, its true, is not ſo pleaſant without Ladies, as with them, yet though it be more ſerious, it is more rational; For my part, replied I, I could live very contentedly, though I never ſaw any but women, provided they were ſuch as Lyſidice. To anſwer your civility, replied ſhe, I could be as well contented as you, provided my company were all Lyriana's: But for all that, one to one, two to two, or three to three at the moſt makes the beſt company; for I had rather ſee none than twelve to twelve. Yes Lyriana, (purſued ſhe with the prettieſt anger in the world) though there were a dozen Lyriana's in the world, I ſhould not deſire to ſee them altogether every day, unleſs there were two or three men amongſt them. For though I never heard any impertinencies proceed from you in my life, yet I am confident that if there were twelve of you, there would: or elſe you would do like many of thoſe, who ſit and ſay nothing, but makes converſation languiſhing and weariſome: The truth is Lyriana, unleſs you diſſemble you muſt confeſs, that there is ſomething in it, which I cannot tell how to expreſs, that makes one accompliſhed man more to divert and pleaſe a company of Ladies, than the moſt amiable woman of the world can do. I ſhall go further than this alſo; for I will maintain, that if there be but two women together, unleſs they be intimate friends to each other they will be leſs pleaſed than they would be, if each of them were talking with a man of ſpirit and wit whom they had never ſeen before: Judg therefore, if I have not reaſon to murmur againſt my Sex in general. But I do wonder (ſaid I to her and ſmiled) ſince the ſociety of men is ſo neceſſary, that you do not manage the company of Thraſiles better: for I perceive you treat him with as much ſharpneſs as if you intended to baniſh him. Thraſiles (replied ſhe and bluſhed) is queſtionleſs a very compleat and pleaſing man: but he hath given me ſuch cauſe to complain againſt him, as that I cannot pardon him: and I ſhould more eaſily pardon him, if I were not in the humour in which now I am. Since I had a great deſire to know how the caſe ſtood between Thraſiles ſiles and Lyſidice, and ſince this ſhe told me did much augment my curioſity, I preſſed her to tell me what he had done; ſo that ſhe deſiring to be rid of my importunity without telling me directly what ſhe thought. Thraſiles, replied ſhe, hath or would have done a thing which would have diſpleaſed me the moſt of any thing in the world. This is a very fine accuſation (ſaid I unto her) for you know not whether Thraſiles hath or would have committed a fault. However it be, ſaid ſhe, he is culpable; for you muſt know that in all probability he endeavoured to deprive me of my deareſt friend, and the man whom of all the world did pleaſe me beſt: and he hath made me ſo to fall out with him, as I ſhall be conſtrained to ſee him no more. I confeſs, Madam, Lyſidice ſpoke this with ſuch an air, that my curioſity was higher than; I could not deviſe whom ſhe ſhould mean: I named two or three whom I knew to be her friends, and ſhe always anſwered that I could not gueſs him: and to puzzle me the more, ſhe ſeemed to wonder that I could not hit upon him: But, ſaid I, who is this friend with whom you muſt break, and with whom Thraſiles hath made you quarrel? He is ſuch a one, replied ſhe, as hath not only made me out of conceit with him, but out of conceit with my ſelf alſo. I muſt confeſs, ſaid I unto her, that I cannot underſtand you; for if Thraſiles have told you any thing concerning this friend, which gives you matter of complaint againſt him, why do you grieve for him? Becauſe, anſwered Lyſidice, that I had rather not have known the crime which Thraſiles hath revealed unto me, than to be deprived of him who did commit it: But (ſaid I innocently unto her) Can you not wink at it as if you knew it not? for ſo he do not know that you know it, you are not obliged in point of honour to puniſh him. If Thraſiles ſhould know, replied ſhe, that I could pardon ſuch a crime, I ſhould be extreamly aſhamed. But, replied I, though I muſt not know the criminal, yet may I not know the crime? No, (anſwered ſhe and ſmiled) you muſt not know it now: Yet I do wiſh, ſaid I unto her, that Thraſiles whom I made you acquainted with were not ſo much out of your favour; and I muſt confeſs, that I cannot well ſee by your words why you ſhould treat him as you do: If I ſhould ſpeak ſo plain as to be underſtood (replied ſhe and laughed) doubtleſs then you would underſtand me, but ſince I ſpake purpoſely that you ſhould not underſtand me, you will hardly find me out. Really Lyſidice, ſaid I unto her, You are a very ſtrange woman; and it may be ſaid, that in this buſineſs you are both one of the moſt diſſembling Perſons, and one of the moſt ſincere in the world: Since you both commend me and blame me (replied ſhe) I conceive that I ought neither to thank you, nor complain againſt you; yet do not think, that I keep this ſecret from you, becauſe I do not think you worthy to know my heart; but the reaſon is, becauſe according to that inequality of humour wherewith you have ſo often upbraided me, there are ſome days on which I make a ſecret of every thing, and others, on which I keep cloſe nothing. But Madam, I could not perſwade Lyſidice to tell me directly: So that not being obliged to obſerve fidelity with one who would not truſt me; I muſt confeſs, I was very impatient to ſee Thraſiles, and to get out of him what I could not out of her, deſiring to do a good office between them, and to make them friends.

So that the next morning, chance bringing Thraſiles to ſee me, I began to ask him what he had done to incenſe Lyſidice ſo much againſt him? How, replied Thraſiles, hath Lyſidice complained of me to you? Yes, (replied I, ſeeming to know more than I did) But why did you tell her that which you told her the other day? What I told her, replied Thraſiles, ought rather to have obliged, than to have angred her: But Lyriana, I pray tell me what ſhe did tell you concerning me? For heavens ſake, if you know the cauſe of her coldneſs to me, do not conceal it; for I do profeſs, I cannot underſtand why any thing I ſaid unto her ſhould provoke her to treat me as ſhe did: I muſt confeſs, Madam, that when I heard Thraſiles ſay ſo, I thought that he had indeed advertiſed Lyſidice, how ſome one of her friends had either done or ſaid ſomething which deſerved her anger, and that it was out of this reaſon he ſhould ſay, he never ſaid any thing unto her which might provoke her to treat him as ſhe did: So that without moving him to tell me what I deſired to know, I told him that Lyſidice complained againſt him for cauſing her to loſe one of her deareſt friends. This accuſation did at the firſt ſurprize Thraſiles, but afterwards he thought that Lyſidice, becauſe ſhe would not tell me that he had ſpoken unto her of his Love, had invented this little lye to excuſe it: So that giving no credit unto my words, he told me, that it was impoſſible Lyſidice ſhould think ſo of him, for he had been ſo far from making her loſe any friend, that he ever wiſhed all the world did adore her: She did not ſay (replied I, being angry that I was not credited) that you made her fall out with this friend; but ſhe ſaid, that you have either done or ſpoken ſomething which hath made that friend fall out with her: I underſtand you worſe than I did before (replied Thraſiles) for I know that I am not naturally any Miſchief maker, nor any Tale-teller; and I am ſure, I never ſpoke any thing of any body unto Lyſidice: Certainly then, replied I, ſome or other hath done you an ill office to her: But Lyriana (ſaid he and interrupted me) do you think you did rightly underſtand her? Yes certainly Thraſiles, ſaid I; and let me tell you, that if you do not quickly juſtifie your ſelf, you will be excluded out of her favour: How can I juſtifie my ſelf, anſwered he, of an accuſation which I underſtand not? To give you a good occaſion, replied I, I will permit you to tell her, how I acquainted you that ſhe complained againſt you, and that ſhe ſaid you were the cauſe of her falling out with one of her deareſt friends; ſince ſhe did not make her complaints any ſecret, but on the contrary, made a myſtery of a thing which ſhe might well have imparted to me, I am willing you ſhould tell her it was I who told you, and ſo you may juſtifie your ſelf: I ſpoke this ſo confidently unto Thraſiles, that he could not chuſe but believe me; and fancying to himſelf that Lyſidice ſhould be offended at him for any thing elſe, rather than at the Declaration of his love, he reſolved to go the next morning unto her, and did ſo, and he went ſo opportunely, that he found her alone: Since I hear from Lyriana, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that you make ſome complaints againſt me, and that you accuſe me for cauſing you to loſe one of your deareſt friends, I come to know, Madam, whether it be true: Yes, (replied ſhe ſharply) I did ſay all that Lyriana told you, but I have not yet ſaid all I think upon the buſineſs: Why, Madam, (replied Thraſiles) Can you ſay that I did ever make you loſe any friend, I who have ever ſpoke enough to make all the world love you: You have ſpoke that unto me, replied ſhe, which is enough to make me break off with him. I would gladly know, Madam, replied he, who this friend is, unto whom I have unwittingly done ſo ill an office: You ſhall quickly know him, ſaid ſhe, and all the world ſhall know that I will ſee him no more. But, Madam, anſwered he, if this friend be faulty, you are unjuſt to grieve for him, and puniſh me: Lyriana, replied ſhe, hath already ſaid as much as you, but to no purpoſe: for I have better reaſons than either of you for what I do. For Heavens ſake, Madam, replied Thraſiles, tell me who this friend is, who on my ſcore hath loſt your favour? *I*t is your ſelf, (replied ſhe, and bluſht for anger) who might have enjoyed my friendſhip as long as you had lived, and who hath forced me againſt my will to baniſh you, and alſo who hath deprived me for ever of your company, which was very pleaſing, but which now is odious unto me. How Madam, anſwered Thraſiles, in a great amazement, Am I he? Yes, certainly, replied ſhe, you are. I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid he, what did I ever ſay againſt my ſelf that could move you to hate me? You have told me, ſaid ſhe, that you loved me, and that is enough. Yet I would gladly know, replied he, whether your anger proceeds from becauſe I love you, or from becauſe I was ſo bold as to tell you ſo: It proceeds, anſwered ſhe, from becauſe you told me ſo: for to be ſincere, one cannot be angry at being loved.

Then, Madam, replied Thraſiles, if it be not my paſſion which incenſeth you, but only my bad expreſſions of it which angers you, I will not, Madam, ſpeak any more, and be contented to let you know it by my looks, by my ſervices, and by all my actions. If you had done thus before, replied ſhe, we had been friends: but ſince what's paſt cannot be undone, I muſt do as I reſolved: And indeed this was all that Thraſiles could obtain of Lyſidice that day, and he parted from her in a belief that ſhe would caſt him off. Lyſidice alſo for her part, thinking to ſee him no more. After Thraſiles was gone from her, he came to me, who was extreamly deſirous and impatient to know who this friend was, who Lyſidice was ſo much out with: Well Thraſiles, ſaid I unto him, do you now know the name of him, unto whom you have done ſuch ill offices? Yes, Lyriana, ſaid he, I do know him; and I come hither to tell you and to deſire your pity for him. You ſee then, replied I, that I did not lie: Nor do I think, ſaid ſhe, that you told the truth. For Heavens ſake, ſaid I unto him, explain this riddle Thraſiles then, ſeeing I was very earneſt with him; and hoping for ſome pity from me, began to acquaint me with his love to Lyſidice: and afterwards to tell me of the paſſage between them, letting me underſtand that this friend whom Lyſidice would baniſh, and himſelf, were both one and the ſame. Thraſiles had no ſooner told me this, but I began extreamly to pity him: Alas Thraſiles, ſaid I unto him, how infinitely do I pity you for being in love with Lyſidice? Rather pity me good Lyriana, ſaid he, becauſe ſhe does not love me, and not becauſe I love her: I aſſure you anſwered ſhe, I pity you for both cauſes, and I know not whether or no you would be leſs miſerable in her hate or in her love: for really Thraſiles, conſidering the peeviſh inequality of her humours, I do foreſee you would be intollerably puzzled to endure them.

Alas, replied he, ſo ſhe would let me love her, I would endure them all. After this, I uſed all my arguments to diſſwade Thraſiles from any longer loving Lyſidice, but all in vain. However, he deſired me to let him lament the miſeries which he foreſaw he was probably to endure; and I conſented unto him. And indeed, after this, there grew a great amity betwixt him and me; inſomuch as I dare ſay, that I knew his moſt ſecret thoughts. But to return unto Lyſidice, you muſt know that though ſhe reſolved to baniſh Thraſiles; yet there was ſo much giddineſs in her humour, that ſhe altered her mind: And, Madam, not to trouyou with too much impertinacies, Thraſiles was not baniſhed: And Lyſidice became one day in ſo ſweet a humour, that ſhe ſuffered him to love her: yet I think it may very well be ſaid, that ſhe allowed him this favour, to make him reſent the toyiſhneſs of her humours with more ſorrow. And indeed, I believe there was not a day after this on which Thraſiles did not find the truth of my predictions, in ſaying that his love to Lyſidice would coſt him abundance of ſorrow: yet I muſt needs confeſs, that all his hours were not equally ill, but I think I may very well ſay, he ſuffered more in loving Lyſidice, than he had done in loving all the three which formerly reigned in his heart: and that the foolery of the firſt, the engagement of the ſecond, and the inſenſibility of the third, did not put him to ſo much trouble, as the inequality of Lyſidices humours: For indeed he never knew in what ſtate he ſtood, and could never tell in what diſpoſition to find her mind, when he came to her. He thought ſome days that he had a deep ſhare in her heart: She would impart a hundred particular paſſages unto him in a moſt ſweet and obliging manner, inſomuch as he would think himſelf ſure of her affection: But at next meeting the caſe would be moſt miſerably altered, and he would find her the moſt harſh peeviſh, auſtere and cold woman in the world.

And I muſt go a little further, and tell you how it was even ordinary for her to go into her Cloſet in a very good humour, and come out in an extream bad one:

And to ſet forth her unequal humours a little higher yet: ſhe has ſeveral times had ſeveral diſcourſes with Thraſiles, and has not ended with the ſame humour ſhe begun, though there was no occaſion in the earth given, which could make her change it. When ſhe was in the good fit, ſhe would commend all that Thraſiles did, and nothing could anger her: and when ſhe was in the bad, ſhe would find fault with every ſyllable he ſpake, and would be angry at every thing: ſometimes ſhe would complain of his paſſion, that it made too great a noiſe in the world: at other times ſhe would have him do a hundred things to publiſh it, and ſhe would very often quarrel with him for obeying her own commands. I remember one day amongſt the reſt when Lyſidice was the moſt charming perſon upon earth, and the moſt complaiſant, and falling into diſcourſe of Feaſts, Pleaſures, and Walks, before five or ſix perſons whom ſhe loved very well, every one propounded their own diverſion according to their own palate, ſo that Lyſidice in her turn, after ſhe had hearkened unto the fancies of others, ſhe began to comment upon them, and ſaid that there was not one in all they had propoſed which had not ſome inconveniency in them. As for dancing, ſaid ſhe, the trouble in matters of dreſſing themſelves, the crowd one finds there, the ſetting up late, the ſpight to ſee another dance more, and to be more applauded, all theſe ſurpaſs the pleaſure of it. As for muſick, it moves melancholy, or at leaſt does ſo take up the ſpirits, that ſo long as it laſts, they can do nothing but hearken: alſo the pains of commending the muſick does always follow the pleaſure. As for Grand feaſts, they are intollerable by reaſon of that glutting abundance in them, and by reaſon of that prodigious variety, which in having ſo much to chuſe of, doth take away the liberty of choice: yet acknowledging that walking came neareſt her inclination, provided it was in delicious places and choice company; yet notwithſtanding to content all the world, ſhe could fancy ſuch a feaſt, as ſhould have all thoſe pleaſures which they had propoſed, without any of the inconveniences which follow them. I pray, ſaid

I unto her, how would you contrive the buſineſs? Firſt, ſaid ſhe, I would make choiſe of a moſt rare Garden, wherein were many murmuring and cooling Fountains, excellent Statues, ſhady Walks, open and airy Allies, great Borders, but of Flowers, cloſe Arbors, and all that's excellent for a Garden: Alſo I would have it near a fair houſe: But after all this, I would have the liberty of naming all the perſons to be preſent, whom I would order ſo handſomely in my choice, as they ſhould not be weary of me, nor I ſhould not be weary of them, nor they weary of one another. After this not to be troubled with too much tricking and dreſſing: I would have all the Ladies there undreſſed: that there ſhould be only ſo many Coaches as not to make a throng,that the dividing of companies ſhould be ſutable,and that every Coach ſhould be filled with thoſe who love beſt to be together,that none ſhould be put to riſe too ſoon in the morning, and that every one ſhould come to the place, juſt to have ſo much time as to ſee the houſe before they ſit down, and no more.Moreover,I would have the meat to be moſt exquiſitely good without any ſuperfluity: Then order ſhould be obſerved, and that the odour of flowers ſhould take away the ſmell of a feaſt. All dinner while I would have ſuch muſick as is more fit to exhilerate the ſpirits, than to mollifie the heart: alſo I would have the muſick in a loft by themſelves, and not too near. After all this, I would have the company paſs into a cool handſom Chamber, and talk, till the Sun gives us leave to walk; after which every one ſhould follow their own inclinations, and chuſe thoſe places they like beſt. When night came, we would ſup as we dined, but in a place where the murmur of Fountains might be heard: at riſing from table, I would return to walk again, and to content thoſe who affected dancing, I would have two or three hundred Chriſtal Lamps fixed in every Tree in a large Walk,to make the night day, and then to let the muſick draw neat, and thoſe that deſired dancing, let them dance; without any hinderance to thoſe that had rather ſit down under a purling fountain, to follow their own humours. After which, without going too ſoon, or ſtaying too late, I would have us return to Cumes, fully ſatisfied with all innocent delights, without any trouble and puzzle as uſually follows ſuch entertainments.

Lyſidice having done, every one agreed that ſuch a journey as ſhe expreſſed would be very pleaſing: But ſaid Thraſiles . to imagin ſuch a thing is not enough, but it muſt be really effected before it be pleaſant: For my part, ſaid he, I will provide the Garden, the Muſick, and two repaſts, in which ſhall be no ſuperfluity. Lyſidice hearing this offer, was the firſt who accepted of it, and ſo it was a thing reſolved upon. Thraſiles taking upon him the charge and care of all the Feaſt, and Lyſidice the choice of all the perſons, who indeed were ſuch as pleaſed her; at laſt they all had Summons, the day was appointed, Thraſiles ordered all things according to Lyſidice's expreſſions, excepting what related to the Table unto which he did not keep within his preſcribed limits, for he was much more magnificent in them.

The day of this pleaſure being come, all the Ladies were ready, and all the Coaches provided, but upon a ſudden the whimſey did ſo take Lyſidice, that after ſhe had made a new Gown for that day, which was as gallant and gay as poſſible: After I ſay ſhe was dreſt, after ſhe had put on her Hood, and ready to go, ſhe changed her mind, ſhe undreſt her ſelf, and went to bed, praying me to make her excuſes unto the company, ſaying, ſhe was not well; but after I received this meſſage, in lieu of doing as ſhe bad me, I went unto her, and found her more waſpiſh and melancholy than ever I ſaw her in my life. Since I underſtood by her women in the outer Chamber that ſhe was well enough, and not at all ſick, I went to her bed ſide, I drew the Curtain, and ſet open the Windows: Let me look in your eyes, ſaid I unto her, and there ſee whether your diſeaſe be real or diſſembled, for it is by them better than your tongue, that I can know it.

But, Madam, in lieu of finding the leaſt languiſhing paleneſs, I ſaw a freſh complexion, her hair ſo curled, that much pains and art had been uſed, ſo that without any anſwer: No, no, Lyſidice, ſaid I, I am ſure you are not ſick, and therefore you muſt riſe and go along with us, and I will not let you be at reſt till you riſe. At firſt ſhe anſwered me in a pitiful tone, but after ſhe ſaw I did not believe her, ſhe confeſſed ſhe was not ſick, but only ſaid ſo, becauſe ſhe would not go with us: Fie, fie, Lyſidice, ſaid I unto her, after you your ſelf propoſed the buſineſs, after you have made choice of the Perſons, after you have engaged Thraſiles unto much care and charge, all which he is at only for the love of you, can you put it off thus? Fie, fie, Lyſidice, I profeſs I cannot endure it, and you ſhall abſolutely go with us: Were this Feaſt made for any other than my ſelf, replied ſhe, I would go to it; but ſince I know it is intended only for me, I neither will nor can go, for I know that there's nothing does more put one out of countenance, than to be the Lady of the Feaſt: But I pray, Lyſidice, ſaid I unto her, did you not know it was only intended for you, when it was firſt reſolved upon? Yes, ſaid ſhe, and I engaged my ſelf before I had well conſidered upon it. But did you not conſider upon it this morning before you dreſſed your ſelf, ſaid I? No, ſaid ſhe, for as my woman as ſhe was dreſſing me, told one, how one of the Ladies who was to be preſent ſhould ſay, that ſhe was not at all obliged unto Thraſiles for this Feaſt, but wholly unto me; this did ſo vex me, that I ſaw I had been very raſhly inconſiderate in ſuffering Thraſiles to make this Feaſt, and that it was the moſt importent thing in the world to make my ſelf beholding unto a man for all the pleaſures which he give unto a great company, and for the ſatisfaction which men will receive, unto whom it is not intended: The truth is, I muſt be the debtor unto Thraſiles for all this Feaſt if I go unto it, for the Muſick, for the Dancing, and even to the very charges of the Candles, for the very coolneſs of the evening, and murmur of the Fountains. Fie, Lyriana, this muſt not be, and I had much rather pay for all, then to acknowledg my ſelf a debtor, as needs I muſt if I go; therefore, Lyriana, as well as I love you, I muſt not be beholding unto Thraſiles for all the pleaſures he provides you this day. Is it poſſible, ſaid I unto her, that Lyſidice ſhould ſay ſo? Yes, replied ſhe, and more than that, for Lyſidice is as reſolute in it, as ever ſhe was of any thing in all her life. Then you make Thraſiles, ſaid I unto her, moſt deſperately ſad: There will be ſo much good company (anſwered ſhe) as he may very eaſily comfort himſelf without mine: You were rightly ſerved (ſaid I unto her) if he did, for he muſt needs be ſenſible of the affront which you put upon him: Let him do what he will, ſaid ſhe, ſo you will go and leave me at quiet. But, Lyſidice, ſaid I unto her, though you do not conſider Thraſiles, yet conſider your ſelf, and think how your humour will be talked on; Let them ſay what they pleaſe, replied ſhe, ſo they will let me do as I will. As ſhe pronounced theſe laſt words, Thraſiles came in, and was aſtoniſhed to find her in bed. Since he knew her now as well as my ſelf, he imagined that this was only a fantaſtical humour, yet at firſt he did not expreſs his thoughts, only asked her, how it came to paſs ſhe was ſuch a ſluggard, yet adding with a ſmile, that it was in ſome ſort but juſt ſhe ſhould make them ſtay for her, on purpoſe to let them ſee that the Feaſt was prepared for her: It will appear, ſaid ſhe, that I have no great ſhare in it, ſince I will not be there: I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid he unto her, how comes this ſudden alteration to paſs ſince laſt night? Never accuſe Lyſidice of any alteration (ſaid I in an angry mood) ſince ſhe hath no reaſon in the world for it, but that ſhe is ſtill her ſelf. Then did ſhe tell Thraſiles that ſhe was not well, but he did not believe her, and he courted her in the ſweeteſt and moſt perſwaſive language in the world, not to refuſe him this favour, but all was in vain. Thraſiles then ſeeing all his perſwaſions and arguments could not prevail, propoſed unto her to put it off until another day, but ſhe did with abundance of violence forbid it. Then was Thraſiles ſo vexed, as he ſaid, that ſince ſhe would not go, he would not go neither; and for above half an hour I was in a belief, that neither ſhe for whom the Feaſt was made, nor he that made it, would be preſent at it.

But in concluſion She was ſo earneſt with Thraſiles, that he himſelf ſhould go, and ſhe her ſelf to ſtay behind, that obey her he muſt, and accordingly went unto this Feaſt without her. You may imagine Madam, in what a ſullen humour Thraſiles was in all that day, yet he did bear out this peeviſh paſſage with abundance of patience, and as inconſtant as he was reported to be, he did not deſiſt from loving Lyſidice, though in my opinion he had very great cauſe; but on the contrary, he deſired me to tell all the company, that Lyſidice was really ſick, leſt they ſhould ſpeak ſomthing of her which might be diſadvantagious unto him. But the oddeſt Paſſage of all was, that the next day ſhe would needs perſwade him moſt unjuſtly, that he was very merry at the Feaſt, though he never ſeemed ſo melancholy in all his life, and charged him with a crime for obeying her in the entertainment of thoſe Ladies which ſhe her ſelf made choice of. However, her waſpiſh humour being over, ſhe eaſily appeaſed Thraſiles. But ſince it was not poſſible the fantaſticle humour of Liſidice ſhould be concealed, ſhe made the love of Thraſiles to her more apparent, inſomuch as one who was an Enemy unto Lyſidice, and had a ſquint eye her ſelf upon Thraſiles, did give it out, that Thraſiles did not only love Lyſidice, but alſo that Lyſidice ſuffered Thraſiles to love her: And She ſpoke this before ſo much company, that ſome friend of Lyſidice did acquaint her with it: So that ſhe never conſidering that it was only the reports of an Enemy, did take the matter as heynouſly, as if it had been the vulgar talk of all the Court, and charged Thraſiles never to ſee her again, yet ſhe did a little moderate her doom, and confined him only not to ſee her at her own houſe: So that Thraſiles, who was all obedience, ſought out all occaſions of comfort to himſelf in ſeeing her at other places, either in the Temple, or in the Walks, or at other viſits which ſhe made, inſomuch as though he did not ſee her at her own houſe, yet he ſaw her very often; but he did not long enjoy this favour with any tranquility for Lyſidice, growing into a worſe mood, began to be very harſh to him, and to think that he ſlighted ed her, ſince he came not to ſee her, though ſhe poſitively commanded the contrary, and though he never in his life loved her more. In the mean time, Thraſiles ſeeing himſelf ſo courſly treated, could not deviſe unto what to attribute the cauſe, and I believe would never have found it, unleſs he had by chance come unto me when Lyſidice was there, where caſually I was ſpeaking of a man in Court who was one of my friends: One of your friends (replied Lyſidice ſharply) how can that be, ſince I never ſee him with you? I do not ſay, replyed I, that he is in the firſt rank of my friends; yet however ſince I ſee him almoſt every day in ſeveral places, I may ſay he is my friend: Oh Lyriana! ſaid ſhe, you do ſtrangely miſtake your ſelf; for it is my opinion that though I ſhould ſee you every day at Philoxenes houſe, and not at mine, I ſhould look upon you only as my friends freind, and not my own. But if Lyriana ſhould only aim at ſeeing Lyſidice in Philoxenes Chamber, replied Thraſiles, what would you think of her then, I would then think, replied ſhe, that ſhe might have ſpared her labour, for I am not at all obliged unto her for it: There is ſuch a notable difference between viſits at ones own houſe, and viſits at anothers houſe, one is not Miſtreſs of the converſation, but muſt ſubmit in civility to the pleaſures of her whoſe houſe it is. Moreover, when one is at home, one is obliged to ſee a thouſand perſons whom they care not for meeting with, and who ſomtimes deſires not to be ſeen. So that the humour taking me, as oft it doth, I ſhall be a whole afternoon and not ſpeak a word; and there is ſo great a difference between Lyſidice in her own Chamber, and Lyſidice in anothers, as one would ſay ſhe was two Lyſidices: Yet (replied I and laughed) there is not neceſſity of being ſo different in your ſelf: However it be, ſaid ſhe, it cannot be denyed, but that it is incomparably more ſweet to have good company at home, then any where elſe, and that any one is fuller of life and ſpirit in ones own Chamber, than in anothers. According to your Maximes Madam, replied Thraſiles, I am only to be the friend of your friend; You need not doubt it, replied ſhe, and from this very hour I will look upon you as Lyriana's friend and not mine, for I do profeſs and declare unto you, that all the men I find abroad, do never make any particular impreſſion upon my heart, and it would be an Age before I ſhould look upon them as having any right unto amity, but ſhould rank ſuch men in the Catalogue of my acquaintance, and not of my friends. But I beſeech you Madam, replied Thraſiles, if one do forbid any one of their friends to come unto their houſe, does ſuch a friend loſe the glorious title and quality of friend, by being obedient unto their commands? Yes replied She, if ſuch a one will willingly be obedient in ſuch a thing as might be diſobeyed without diſobliging her who did command it. I know one of your friends, replied he, unto whom I will give this counſel: Be not too haſty, ſaid ſhe, for perhaps the counſel which I give in general, is not good for him you ſpeak of in particular. The truth is Madam, Thraſiles did eaſily underſtand her, for ſince he had a mind to go the next day unto Lyſidices, ſhe did treat him moſt abominably ill, and told him, that ſince he would ſcarcely ever ſee her at her own houſe, he ſhould not ſee her any where elſe, ſo that there was a fearful quarrel between them; but for all this, it ended to the apparent advantage of Thraſiles; for ſince that, he obtained leave to ſee her at her own houſe, as before. But Madam, it was to torment him more then ever he was before; for I am confident, that there was not one day on which the inequality of this fantaſtical woman did not torment him with a new puniſhment, the greateſt cruelty was, that ſhe would ſo ſmooth him up with her ſweet and pleaſant hours, that he could not for his life diſingage his mind: For truly (ſaid he one day unto me when I was perſwading him to deſiſt) were ſhe alwayes in her ill humours, I could eaſily break thoſe bands which tye me to her ſervice: But Lyriana, did you but know how amiable ſhe is when ſhe pleaſeth, you would not wonder I ſhould love her, maugre her fantaſtical inequallity; and her good hours forceth me to endure her bad ones with patience. In the mean time I plainly ſee, this ſweetneſs ſerves only to make me the more miſerable. Thus Madam did Lyſidice live with Thraſiles, who did a long time endure her impertinent inequalities; and I am very confident, that any other would have forſook her ſooner, yet I am moſt confidently perſwaded, that until this laſt paſſage, he loved her in ſpight of her humours, but for it, he was not able to endure it, and certainly he had good reaſon; For Madam, be pleaſed to know, that Thraſiles taking her in the critical minute, when ſhe was all ſweetneſs and civilities, he won her to let him ask the conſent of her Parents unto her Marriage with him. He had no ſooner obtained this liberty, but being even raviſhed with joy, he went unto Niſide, (for Father he had none long ſince) and moved her to tranſact with him. Niſide who was extreamly tender of her Son, did give him all deſirable ſatisfaction, and ſpoke of it unto Lyſidices Parents, who liked very well of this Alliance. So that imagining Thraſiles would never have put her upon this motion, unleſs he had known her mind before, they accepted the Propoſitions with joy, not at all queſtioning but Lyſidice, would like of it as well as themſelves: but it was not as they imagined: For Madam, this fickle humoured woman having altered her mind, ſince Thraſiles left her, diſliked of that which before ſhe approved of. 'Tis true, ſhe writ a Letter of Revocation unto him, but he did not receive it until a quarter of an hour after he had received the favourable anſwer which Lyſidices Parents gave unto Niſide. I leave you to judge Madam, how this ſurprized Thraſiles, but his aſtoniſhment was much greater when he underſtood how Lyſidice had declared her ſelf that ſhe would not marry, and when he underſtood that the Parents of this uncertain woman came to Niſide with a hundred excuſes for engaging themſelves ſo far as they had done, before they knew the mind of her who had the greateſt intereſt in the buſineſs. Judge Madam, how Thraſiles ſhould reſent this affront which Lyſidice put upon him, and whether he had not good cauſe to leave loving her; his anger was ſo great, that he made a ſolemn oath never to go unto her again, but abſolutely to break off with her; yet I do verily believe, he would have violated his oath, had not I prevented him; but ſince I knew he would never find any joys in this moſt alterable humoured woman, I did ſo confirm him in his deſign, that he reſolved to execute it. Since he had already found by experience, that abſence was a good remedy againſt ſuch diſeaſes, he left Cumes, and at parting left this Letter for Lyſidice, which contained theſe words.

THRASILES unto LYSIDICE.

Madam,

SInce in loving you with a moſt conſtant violence, ever ſince I began to ſerve you, I cannot obtain your love: Perhaps in changing my mind, you will change alſo, and perhaps grieve for your loſs: However, I depart from Cumes with a moſt ſtrong reſolution never to return until I have quite baniſhed you out of my heart: Be moſt confidently aſſured, that if ever you ſee me again, it ſhall be without the leaſt ſpark of love unto you: And if you never ſee me, it is becauſe I cannot rid my heart of the moſt fervent paſſion that ever any was capable of.

THRASILES.

When Thraſiles gave me this Letter for Lyſidice, I knew he deſired an anſwer; but I muſt confeſs, I would not preſs her for one, leſt if it ſhould be writ in one of her good moods, it might re-engage him to love her, yet ſince he wiſhed that ſhe had it, I did deliver it, and made her read it in my preſence: After which, I began to chide her a thouſand times, and preſſed her to tell me, why ſhe would ever grant Thraſiles any ſuch permiſſion as ſhe did, ſince it was againſt her mind. When I gave him that permiſſion, ſaid ſhe, I did really think it, and it was my very mind: But aftewards, when I conſidered this engagement which was to be as long as

I lived, I found it fondneſs for one who could not tell in the morning what humour ſhe ſhould be in at night, to think that the ſame which pleaſed me now, ſhould pleaſe me at the latter end of my life: So that it might perhaps have made me miſerable, without contributing any thing unto the felicity of Thraſiles. For truly Lyriana, ſaid ſhe unto me, when I think upon the extream perplexity I am in, when the humour takes me in a place out of which I cannot get: And how grieved I ſhould be if after I were married unto Thraſiles, I ſhould change my mind, and repent; I muſt needs proteſt, that as much as I eſteem him, I am very glad he is out of Cumes: And ſhall hardly deſire his return for the reaſon he expreſſeth in the concluſion of his Letter: Yet Lyſidice bluſhed as ſhe pronounced theſe laſt words, and bluſhed ſo much as I could eaſily ſee her heart and her tongue were at odds. In the mean time I writ unto Thraſiles enough to cure him, yet for all that he was not ſo ſoon quit of that paſſion which tormented him: But during his abſence I ſaw Lyſidice remembred what he had writ, and believed that the reaſon why he returned not, was becauſe he was ſtill in love with her. That which induced me to think ſo, was, that Philoxene going into that Country where Thraſiles was, ſhe came to bid me adieu juſt as Lyſidice was in my Chamber, ſo that falling into diſcourſe of that ſolitude whereunto ſhe was going, I told her that I thought her very happy in that ſhe was to have the neighbourhood of ſuch a moſt accompliſhed man as Thraſiles was. It's ſo long ſince he went out of Cumes, replied Philoxene, that it's very probable he will not ſtay long in the Country: Since you are in it, replied Lyſidice, and ſmiled, it's to be thought he will not ſo ſoon leave it: For my part (replied I purpoſely to let Lyſidice know I underſtood her) I am not of your opinion: For I think it very likely Philoxene will make Thraſiles come ſooner unto Cumes, than you imagine. I muſt confeſs, ſaid Philoxene, I do not well underſtand your meanings; for methinks you both do commend mend me, and yet ſpeak contrary to each other: It's a Riddle, ſaid I unto her, which happily you may explain hereafter: If ſhe do not return until Thraſiles returns, replied Lyſidice, and laughed, it will be a long time before ſhe know what you mean. After this, and much other diſcourſe which I remember not, Philoxene went away. But within a month after ſhe was gone, as Lyſidice and I were together, and coming out of Atalia's houſe, who ſhould we meet but Thraſiles, who ſaluted us very civily as he paſſed by, but ſtaid not a jot with us. I no ſooner ſaw him but I look'd upon Lyſidice, who as ſoon as ever ſhe ſaw him changed colour: So that I turning to her, and ſpeaking low leſt our women ſhould hear. Well Lyſidice (ſaid I unto her) did you think Thraſiles would ever return? Provided Philoxene did not ſend him, replied ſhe, I do not care though he be returned: For my part, replied I, I care not upon what reaſon he return, ſo he think upon the end of his Letter which he writ unto you. However it be, ſaid ſhe unto me, you would do me a great pleaſure, if you would tell Thraſiles, I am much joyed at his return: I promiſe you I will, ſaid I unto her, though on my Conſcience you are not ſo glad of it as you ſay you are. As we were thus talking, we came to a Ladies houſe unto whom we intended a viſit: which done, I waited upon Lyſidice to her own houſe, and returned to my own, where Thraſiles ſtaid for me: I no ſooner ſaw him, but I ſeemed very joyful at his return: But yet, ſaid I unto him, before my joys be full, I muſt know whether you be returned free from this thing called Love: For if you be not, believe me, in lieu of rejoycing, I ſhall be extreamly grieved. Grieve then you muſt, ſaid he unto me; for I was never more in love in all my life than now, and in all probabilies ſhall be ſo till death. Fie, fie, Thraſiles, ſaid I unto him, you are not ſo much Maſter of your ſelf as I imagined, nor care I for the friendſhip of a man, who ſince he can ſo eaſily forget injuries, can as eaſily forget good offices: But Thraſiles, ſaid I, have you forgot how you writ unto Lyſidice, that you would never return unto Cumes until you had left loving her? Pardon me good Lyriana, ſaid he unto me, for I have kept my word. You are not then in love, as you ſay you are, replied I. I am more in love, Lyriana, ſaid he, than I ſay I am; yes, much more than I am able to ſay: But, my dear Lyriana, it is with Philoxene, and not with Lyſidice, whom ſpight and reaſon baniſhed out of my heart, before Philoxene came into the Country. Though it be not my cuſtom, replied I, to be very glad that any of my friends ſhould be in love; yet I profeſs I am infinitely joyed that you are in love with Philoxene, ſince it is an infallible argument you are not in love with Lyſidice.

After this, I began to vaunt that I ſhould ſo foretel his paſſion; and I related unto him what Lyſidice and I had ſaid when Philoxene came to bid me adieu: After this he acquainted me, how having ſeen Philoxene every day ſince ſhe came into the Country with all the freedom which the Country could afford: he had ſeen her more in a month there, than he ſhould have done in Cumes in a whole year: and that indeed he had found that in her alone which he had vainly ſought for in thoſe four perſons which formerly he had loved. How Thraſiles, ſaid I unto him, are you not only inlove, but loved alſo? No, replied he, you do not well explain my words, for my meaning is, that Philoxene hath more good qualities than all the reſt together have: And certainly Madam, Thraſiles had good reaſon thus to commend this lovely Widow, ſince queſtionleſs there cannot be a more accompliſhed perſon. Doubtleſs he might have found one of as great beauty, and as much wit and ſpirit; but never any ſo without fault. For truth is, ſhe had none: her beauty was infinitely pleaſing, her behaviour was high, noble, and modeſt; her Phiſognomy ſpake goodneſs and ſincerity; and there was ſuch pretty mixture of mirth and ſeriouſneſs together in her face, as did exceedingly become her: She had a million of charms in her humours, as many graces in her mind, and as many good qualities in her ſoul; virtue was always the end ſhe aimed at in all her actions: She affected glory, ſhe is moſt tender to her friends, ſhe ſerves them with joy, and never diſobliged any. It may be ſaid her anger is an ornament unto her, in raiſing up ſome lovely bluſhes, but vaniſhing ſo ſoon as it will not give her time to do any injuſtice. It is impoſſible but to judge favourably of her: She is fair, ſhe is young, ſhe is rich, and ſhe is a Widow: She knows ſo well how to regulate her life, that her reputation is high, though her vertue be neither ſalvage nor auſtere; but on the contrary ſweet and ſociable. This Madam, was Philoxene, when Thraſiles began to love her, and this ſhe is at this very day: Yet I underſtand by him that he durſt not diſcover his paſſion unto her, but tells me, that he is fully perſwaded ſhe knows it, or at leaſt ſuſpects it. Since he came only unto Cumes upon ſome little buſineſs, and to let Lyſidice know how he did not now love her; he ſtaid but three days, and returned to Philoxene.

To tell you how vexed Lyſidice was, is not an eaſie matter, eſpecially when Philoxene returned to Cumes, and Thraſiles followed her the next day; for when ſhe perceived that he was in love with this fair one, ſhe was vexed to the very ſoul. Then did ſhe contract a great amity with Cleocrite, and both of them had a plot to make him paſs in the world for the moſt unconſtant man in it, hoping thereby to ruin him in the opinion of Philoxene: And indeed, I believe theſe reports which they had ſcattered abroad, did not do him much good nor hurt. But the great obſtacle which Thraſiles met with in the mind of Philoxene, was not that: For indeed after he had ſerved her a whole year with extream aſſiduity and fidelity, ſhe ſaw he was far from inconſtancy: But Madam the love ſhe had to liberty, kept her from the reception of Thraſiles his ſervices: I know ſhe eſteemed him above all men living, and that if ever ſhe married, Thraſiles would be her choice: But yet, for all this favourable inclination which apparently ſhe had to him, ſhe did not chuſe him, nor put him in any hopes: Yet for all that, Thraſiles whom they ſaid was ſo unconſtant, deſiſted not, but ſuffered all, becauſe he did not find in her ſuch things as ſtifles the very ſoul of love: As the foolery of his firſt Miſtreſs, the engagement ment of his ſecond, the inſenſibility of the third, and the fantaſtical humours of the fourth: But he ſtood firm and conſtant to his loving her, and ſeemed as if he were reſolved ſo to do as long as life was in him, and I am moſt confident it is true; for ſince Thraſiles loved Philoxene, his conſtancy hath been put unto all ſorts of trials. Firſt, it is certain, that Cleocrite and Lyſidice either out of vanity or malice, or ſome other reaſon, laid all the ſtratagems they could invent to diſingage him from her, and to reduce him unto their ſervices. Niſide alſo for a while had a ſtrong deſire her Son ſhould marry one of the faireſt Ladies in the world, and much richer than Philoxene, yet his paſſion reſiſted againſt all, even abſence it ſelf, for he was three whole months in Milete, where the greateſt Beauties in the world reſide, yet he continued faithful, and returned to Cumes as much in love with her, as when he went away: Moreover, it cannot be ſaid, that the favours of Philoxene did reſtrain him, for none could live more reſervedly, and uſe more ſeverity than ſhe did to him, though without any rudeneſs or incivility. Thus Madam it muſt conſequently and neceſſarily be concluded, that Thraſiles may very well paſs for a very conſtant man, though he have loved very many Miſtreſſes: Yet Madam, ſince friendſhip may be partial, I will ſuſpend my judgment until you have pronounced your ſentence.

After Lyriana had finiſhed her relation, Mandana did extreamly commend her, and thanked her for her pleaſing recital of Thraſiles his adventures, applauding her eſpecially for epitomizing five ſeveral Loves into ſo ſhort a method, as any one elſe would have made ſo many ſeveral ſtories. After which, asking Cyrus, the Prince Artamas, and Aglatidas in what rank ſhe ſhould repute Thraſiles, they would not give her any counſel, but would leave it unto her judgment: So that appointing to let Cleocrite, Lyſidice, Atalia, and Thraſiles to enter, it was found that Lyſidice having altered her humour, ſince ſhe went out of the Chamber of Mandana, was gone away, and had carried Atalia with her, and ſo there remained none but Thraſiles and Cleocrite, whoſe indifferent humour made her not care much whether Thraſiles ſhould paſs for a conſtant or an inconſtant man; and accordingly ſhe came into Mandana's Chamber with Thraſiles, as pleaſant as if ſhe valued not the indifferency whereof ſhe imagined Lyriana had accuſed her. You ſee Madam, ſaid ſhe to the Princeſs Mandana, that as indifferent as they ſay I am, yet I am more full of revenge than either Lyſidice or Atilia, ſince I my ſelf do bring him in who is to be condemned: 'Tis more than you know, replyed Thraſiles, whether I ſhall be condemned or juſtified: We ſhall know it preſently, replied ſhe, ſince it is the Princeſs who muſt teach me what I ought to think of you: I aſſure you, replyed Mandana, that if you regulate your thoughts by mine, you will think nothing that is advantagious to him: For indeed, added the Princeſs, after a ſerious conſideration of the ſeveral changes which hath been in Thraſiles, I do not find him ſo clear as I did imagine; therefore without either favour or injuſtice, I do doom him to be named

The unconſtant man, without inconſtancy.

The Judgment is ſo juſt, replied Cyrus, that I cannot think the fair Cleocrite will murmur at it, nor that Thraſiles will complain: Since the name of Inconſtant is his doom, replied Cleocrite, I ſhould be injurious to murmur: And for my part, ſaid Thraſiles, ſince the moſt wiſe Princeſs in the world declares me to be without inconſtancy, I have good reaſon to be ſatisfied, and to commend her Juſtice: Since I have pleaſed you both, replied Mandana, I have done more than I thought I ſhould, but certainly done that which I deſired. As ſhe ſaid ſo, Philoxene entred, and Cleocrite went out: But as Mandana obſerved that Anaxaris thought himſelf obliged by the favours ſhe did unto Thraſiles, ſhe took occaſion to ſpeak unto Philoxene in his behalf; and the occaſion did the more fitly preſent it ſelf, becauſe Philoxene knowing that the Army was to march very ſhortly ſhe came unto the Princeſs, beſeeching her to obtain from Cyrus a Protection for a fair houſe which ſhe had, which ſtood juſt in the way they were to march. Cyrus for his particular, did ſo love to do all good offices for unfortunate Lovers, that he ſpoke very much unto Philoxene in behalf of Thraſiles, inſomuch, as though ſhe had till then very reſolutely defended her liberty, both againſt Thraſiles, and againſt her own inclination, began now to yield unto the Conquerour of Aſia. And indeed Thraſiles did thrive ſo well under the mediation of Cyrus and Mandana, that within three days after the match was made up, and their Marriage was honoured with the preſence of Mandana and Cyrus. But though all the Ladies in Cumes were invited, there came none but Cleocrite and Lyſidice of all the Miſtreſſes of Thraſiles: The firſt of theſe, becauſe all things being indifferent unto her except pleaſures, ſhe would not loſe ſuch a feaſt of joy, and Lyſidice, becauſe coming thither accidentally, and being in a merry humor ſhe thought it would be moſt Glorious for her not to expreſs any ſorrows for the loſs of Thraſiles. In the mean time, thoſe who were ſent to the Xanthians, and the Caunians, being returned, and reporting that they received all the conditions with joy, there was now no obſtacle to the departure of Mandana, for ſuch haſt was made in the preparations of all things requiſite to her journey, as that all things would be in a readineſs within a day or two. To loſe no time, Cyrus gave out all neceſſary orders, either for the march of the Army, or for the departure of the two Fleets which were in the Port, or to diſmiſs the meſſengers from the Prince Philoxippes, and the Prince of Cicily, with thanks to their Maſters. But whilſt hope did ſo nouriſh the joys of Cyrus, as the engagement with the King of Aſſiria never troubled him; Mazares and Anaxaris ſeeing the diſmal day of Mandana's departure drew near, they were extreamly ſad; for when they conſidered that the end of their voyage would be the beginning of felicity unto Cyrus, and the end of his miſeries, their ſorrows were beyond all expreſſions; yet there was abundance of difference between the thoughts of theſe two Rivals; and one and the ſame Beauty, and one and the ſame Paſſion produced in them effects very unreſemblant, Anaxaris without any hopes, was ſo bewitched with his Paſſion, as he could not for his life reſiſt it: But as for Mazares, he did ſo continually ſtrive within himſelf and his Paſſion, that it was impoſſible for man to do more. Anaxaris to be more in Love, if it were poſſible, did ſee the Princeſs as much as ever he could: Mazares on the contrary, was ſo afraid of a Beauty which was above his Vertue, as he did moſt carefully avoid all occaſions of ſeeing her: Indeed, he had never any particular diſcourſe with this Princeſs, ſince ſhe was delivered; but the night before their departure, Cyrus being buſie in writing to the Queen of Corinth, to the Prince Philoxippes, to the Prince of Cicily, and in giving orders for ſecuring Cumes, and diſpatching the Deputies from Suſiana, ſo it happened, that Mazares being then with Mandana, he was inſenſibly ingaged to be alone with her. At firſt there was a great ſilence obſerved between them, for the Princeſs remembring how this Prince in whom ſhe truſted had betrayed her, and how ſhe never was alone with him ſince he carried her away, ſhe began to bluſh, and Mazares for his part, ſeeing he was alone with that Princeſs whom he extreamly loved, and whoſe greateſt miſeries he had cauſed, he found in his heart ſo much love, and ſo much ſhame both, as he was a long time before he could tell what to ſay unto her; but at laſt, not foreſeeing what the ſequel of his diſcourſe would be, he began to ſpeak unto this Princeſs.

Though I doubt not Madam, ſaid he unto her, but ſince you have honoured me with the promiſe of your friendſhip, and to let me enjoy it as I did at Babylon, you will be as good as your word, ſince I have kept mine with you, yet Madam, I cannot chuſe but beg new aſſurances of it: For truly Madam, when I think how unworthy of it I have made my ſelf, I dare not truſt either unto your promiſes or your generoſity; and methinks I have reaſon to fear, that ſince you cannot reſtore me to your eſteem, you cannot reſtore me to your friendſhip. Since I find you the ſame at Cumes, replied Mandana, that you were at Babilon, I will quite forget all that paſſed at Sinope, and rank you amongſt my deareſt friends: The Crime I did commit againſt you was ſo great, replied Mazares, as I dare not hope you can forget it, unleſs you know ſomthing more that may extenuate it; for truly Madam, you do not yet know two things which I do moſt humbly beſeech you to let me now acquaint you with, and which queſtionleſs will the more willingly induce you to reſtore me unto that eſteem and friendſhip which you were pleaſed to promiſe me. It is ſufficient for that (replied Mandana) that you have repented, and that you are reſolved to keep within thoſe thoughts that now you have: No Madam, replied Mazares, my repentance is not enough, ſince it does only repair my Crime, but the two things which I have to tell you will leſſen it: Then tell them, replied the Princeſs, for I aſſure you I ſhould be very glad of new cauſes to eſteem you: Since you are pleaſed to permit me Madam, replied Mazares, I muſt tell you, that it was Paſſion that made me criminal againſt you. Methinks, replied Mandana, and bluſht, that this is but a bad way to me to reſtore you unto my eſteem and friendſhip, ſince it revives in my memory a thing which made you loſe them: I beſeech you Madam (replied Mazares, ſeeing the diſorder in her Face) do not fear that I will ever repent of my repentance, and do not imagine I repent, that the Paſſion (whoſe grandure I would have you know) ſhall ſerve me unto any other end, than to leſſen the crime which I committed in carrying you away. No Madam, I promiſed you never to tell you the thoughts of my heart as long as I live; and that I will never ask any thing from you but this eſteem and friendſhip which you promiſed me: But for Heavens ſake Madam, give me leave only once to tell you with what imperious violence you commanded in my heart, when you raviſhed away my vertue.

This is a favour which Cyrus himſelf, if I asked would not deny; but would give me leave to tell it: for I profeſs, Madam, I deſire not to talk to you of that love which made me criminal, out of hope of any recompence: but only to leſſen my puniſhment, and to juſtifie my ſelf: I do not beg permiſſion, Madam, to tell you that I love you, I deſire only to let you know, that I did love you to ſuch a height, as that I was out of my wits when I carried you away from Sinope: To the end, that if you do not look upon me as a wicked wretch, who ſinned without any provocation or repugnancy, you may the more eaſily keep your word with me. If to believe you loved me (replied the Princeſs) be all that's requiſite, I had rather confeſs it, than doubt of it: to the end I may ſpare my ſelf the pains of hearkening unto a diſcourſe which cannot pleaſe me, nor be at all advantagious unto you: However, Madam, ſaid he, I beſeech you let the greatneſs of my crime convince you of the greatneſs of my love which moved me to commit it. I pray, Mazares, ſaid Mandana, and interrupted him, do not infuſe any ſcruple in my mind, to poyſon that friendſhip and eſteem I would have of you: and know, that the more you perſwade me that you loved me, the more I ſhall think you did not love me, and the leſs ſhare will you have in my friendſhip: therefore do not expoſe your ſelf unto a thing which perhaps may make you loſe it: For heavens ſake, Madam, replied Mazares, do not threaten me with ſuch a dire adventure, but give me leave to acquaint you with my real thoughts; to the end you may entertain no unjuſt ones of me. Think Madam, I conjure you, that I would never ſpeak any thing that ſhould diſpleaſe you: and that I court nothing but your eſteem and friendſhip; and that I will eternally fight againſt my ſelf in your behalf; that I will regulate my thoughts as I do my words: I will forbid my eyes to ſhew you the thoughts of my heart: and for a teſtimony of my reverend eſteem of you. I will ſerve Cyrus as if I had never been his Rival. Judge, Madam: after this, whether you can be ſo ſevere as to deny me the favour which I aſk; for I proteſt, Madam, that this is the laſt time of all my life that ever I will ſpeak unto you concerning my ſelf: I will engage my ſelf never to pronounce the word Love in your preſence: but I beſeech you, let me aſſure you, that ſince love hath cauſed me to commit theſe crimes, that I could never have done it, unleſs it had been forced by ſuch a violent paſſion, as that which forced me to forget my reverence of you. But for all this, Madam, I muſt tell you, that never was repentance more real than mine, nor more fit to repair a great crime; for there is nothing upon earth which I would not do, rather than to give you the leaſt cauſe of ſuſpicion that I do entertain one thought which might render my ſelf unworthy of that glorious friendſhip, which you have done me the honour to promiſe me, and which I beg with all imaginable zeal, and poſſible reſpect. Mazares pronounced theſe words in ſuch a ſerious manner, as Mandana having no mind to inſult over a Prince whoſe paſſion only had made him miſerable, did anſwer him with as much civility as virtue: and ſpoke unto him in ſuch a generous manner, that if the love of Mazares had been capable of becoming friendſhip, he had made the exchange at her inſtance: But though he was not able to regulate the thoughts of his heart, yet he did as much as ever he could, and did regulate his words: And ſolemnly proteſted unto Mandana never to ſpeak unto her again of that love he had unto her at Babylon; to the end ſhe might give him new aſſurances of her eſteem and friendſhip, which Mazares received with joy, though not without a ſigh: For truly if this Prince had been only the friend of Mandana, ſhe had given him language obliging enough to content him: but ſince he was ſtill her Lover, it was impoſſible the friendſhip and eſteem of this Princeſs ſhould ever make him happy, though out of his reaſon and vertue he did look upon this friendſhip of hers as the utmoſt term of his deſires, and limits of his hopes.

In the mean time, the hour of their departure being come, Mandana after ſhe had received the Complements of all the Cumean Ladies, did mount into a glorious Triumphant Chariot, none but Marteſia with her; all the reſt of her Women being in other Coaches which followed her. Anaxaris who commanded her Guard, did immediately follow; and as for Cyrus, Mazares, Artamas, and all the Voluntiers, they did march in a Body by themſelves ſome twenty paces before Mandana. The Prince Thraſibulus, Thimochares, and Philocles, would not Embark until they had waited upon Cyrus and Mandana a days journey out of Cumes, but they would by no means permit them, and they were forced to obey. The parting of Cyrus and Thraſibulus was very tender; as for Thimochares, he charged him with ſo many obliging things to tell the Queen of Corinth, as it was evident he did highly eſteem that Princeſs: he did not content himſelf with all this, but ſaid more unto Philocles than unto Thimochares: alſo he willed Ligdamis, Thraſibulus, Menecrates, Parmanides, and Philiſtion, to leave him, and to return unto thoſe who for his ſake they quitted as ſoon as they married them: There was not one of them upon whom he did not beſtow a thouſand thanks and rich Preſents, as well as upon the jealous Leontidas, who returned unto Cyprus. As for the generous Megabates, though the way of Army was partly his, yet Cyrus would not hinder him ſo much as to go ſo ſoftly: for remembring that the illuſtrious Ariſteus told him that he was in love with the fair Philonide, he would by all means have him take his time; and at parting, did him all the honours that his Quality and rare merit deſerved, the Princeſs Mandana alſo honouring him with all poſſible civilities.

In the mean time, Cyrus who ſet a higher rate upon his honour than his life, did fear that if the King of Aſſyria ſhould be releaſed, and come to Cumes after his departure, he might perhaps imagn that he would not perform his word, ſince he took the way towards Ecbatane: therefore he left a man in Cumes, with Orders to ſtay there until the King of Aſſyria came, and to deliver him a Letter, by which he aſſured him, that he would not fail in the leaſt tittle of his promiſe: ſo that omitting nothing which he owed either unto his glory, or unto Mandana, he ſatisfied both differing duties. For the greater ſecurity of this Princeſs, he ſo ordered his march, as that ſhe was to be always in the midſt of his Army, that he could not imagin any enemy he had reaſon to fear. When this Princeſs came out of Cumes, all the people flocked together in the Streets, who having had trial of Cyrus his clemency, did make the Air ring with acclamations of praiſes and thanks: This magnificence was worthy of ſight, and worthy her for whom it was made, in reſpect of the great number of Soldiers: the abundance of Camels which carried the baggage, the richneſs of their Sumpter Clothes, the glorious Chariot of Mandana, and the multitude of Heroes about her. Since Thyabarra was in the way, Cyrus reſolved to reſt there a day, leſt the Princeſs ſhould be too much wearied: of which, the Prince Myrſiles was not a little glad, in hopes to find Doraliſa there, with whom was Arianita, whom Mandana alſo was glad to ſee again, though ſhe had not found her ſo faithful as Marteſia: This Princeſs alſo was very glad ſhe ſhould ſee two Perſons whom Panthea dearly loved, meaning Doraliſa and Pherenice: Never was journey fuller of pleaſure than this; one might ſee in the face of all the Soldiers ſuch a ſprightly jolity, as that they marched with abundance of alacrity, and as if they rejoyced to be at the end of all their labours and travels: one might plainly ſee, that though they were not really Crowned with Lawrels, yet that they were returned victors, and that nothing had reſiſted them: Mandana for her part, imagining every pace to bring her nearer the King her Father, and not further from Cyrus, was ſo abundantly ſatisfied, as that ſhe found a notable difference between this Voyage, and thoſe ſhe had made with the King of Aſſyria, and the King of Pontus. Cyrus for his particular, thinking that Ciaxares could not deny him Mandana, had no other inquietude, but how to vanquiſh the King of Aſſyria: And there was not one in all the Army, except Mazares and Anaxaris, who rejoyced not at the carrying of Mandana unto Medea. In the mean time thoſe of Thyabarra made a moſt magnificent entertainment for the Princeſs, at her enterance. Cyrus preſented Doraliſa and Pherenice unto her; And ſhe received them as perſons unto whom ſhe was obliged when ſhe was at Suſa: making very much alſo of Arianita, and forgetting her paſt infidelity. Since Mandana was full of generoſity, ſhe was not able to look upon Doraliſa and Pherenice, without ſome ſighs in the memory of the Suſanean Queen: conjuring them both to keep about her, the ſame place they did about Panthea: And indeed they did ſo, for Mandana did oblige Doraliſa's Aunt to let her Neece go along with her: And Pherenice was very willing to follow ſuch a Princeſs as the Queen of Suſiana had dearly loved; ſo that at the departure from Thyabarra, the Princeſs Myrſiles was joyed to ſee that Doraliſa was to go this journey; and that he might have the happineſs ſometimes to talk with her. But as for Andramites, in lieu of rejoycing he grieved: for having diſcovered that the Prince Myrſiles loved Doraliſa, he had rather not ſee her, than his Rival ſhould be always in her eye. In the mean while, ſince the Monument which he had cauſed to be erected in memory of Abradates and Panthea, was not far off, Cyrus went very early before the Princeſs waked to ſee whether his Orders concerning it were executed: deſiring alſo to render the laſt honour unto a King, who dying in his quarrel, had left him a Kingdom, and unto a Queen, of whom he had a moſt particular eſteem. Since he reſolved to go very faſt, that he might return again before the Princeſs Mandana was ready to depart, he carried with him only Aglatidas, Chriſahtes, Feraulas, and five or ſix others.

When he was come to the Monument of Abradates, and lighted from his Horſe, he ſaw that he had been punctually obeyed, that the order of it was right, the Architecture ſtately, the inſcriptions ſuch as he had appointed, and that they had forgot nothing to eternize the memory of thoſe renowned perſons, whoſe Aſhes it incloſed, and the acknowledgments of him who cauſed it to be built; the ſight of this Monument did fill his ſoul full of melancholy thoughts, deep ſtudies ſeized upon him, and after he had looked upon it, he walked a long time about it, and ſpoke not a word, the Company not daring to interrupt him, kept themſelves ſome twelve paces off, and ſpoke not a word neither. As he was thus contemplating the deplorable deſtiny of Abradates and Panthea, and was thinking in what a miſerable condition he was when he loſt them, he heard a great noiſe of Horſes coming towards him, which cauſed him to turn his head, and he ſaw five or ſix Horſemen coming towards this Monument, in the head of whom was the King of Aſſyria, who being no leſs ſurprized to find Cyrus there, than Cyrus was to ſee him, alighted from horſe and advanced towards him, with all the civility that could be expected from a man unto his Deliverer, but yet with all the ſharpneſs of a miſerable and incenſed Rival. Since it does ill become a Prince (ſaid he unto Cyrus after he had ſaluted him) who expects you ſhould keep promiſe with him, to fail in his duty, I muſt begin in diſcourſe with my gratitude; and though you be my Enemy, yet I muſt thank you for the liberty which now I do enjoy: Since I have done nothing but what I ought Sir, replied Cyrus, you may ſpare your thanks, unleſs it be for commanding Hidaſpes to procure your liberty as ſoon as poſſiby he could: Hidaſpes (replied the King of Aſſyria) hath moſt exactly executed your Orders; for Arſamones having refuſed to releaſe me, he delivered me by ſurprizing the Caſtle wherein I was Priſoner: So that I am forced to confeſs you have done a moſt heroique Act in it, and that if it were poſſible I could ceaſe being your Enemy, it would be upon this occaſion; but I am confident, that your affection unto Mandana will eaſily hint unto you, that I cannot change my thoughts either of her or you, and that you will take no other advantage from my liberty, but to be the ſooner in a condition to fight with me: I am obliged Sir, replied Cyrus, to interpret my own actions, as I would do yours upon the like encounter, ſince certainly I intended nothing in your releaſement, but that you ſhould enjoy your liberty freely, nor did I expect any acknowledgments for doing a thing which Honour invited me unto; and to teſtifie that I had no intentions to ſpare my ſelf a Combat by delivering you, you muſt know, that at my parting from Cumes, I left a Letter for you, to the end you may be aſſured that I was ready to keep my word: Since ſo, replied the King of Aſſiria, you muſt tell me, Sir, when you will have me keep mine; for ſince it hath not been the will of Fate that I ſhould be ſo ſoon releaſed, as to help you in the releaſement of Mandana, and ſince you have a new right unto her, which I cannot diſpute, yet before you can be a quiet poſſeſſor of her and all Aſia in general, you muſt be Vanquiſher of me in particular; therefore if you pleaſe, Sir, let us end that controverſie to morrow morning near the Monument of Abradates, which was begun at Sinope in the Temple of Mars.

I know very well (purſued he) that I owe you, Sir, my life and liberty; but I know withal, that as the condition whereunto you have brought me ſtands, I cannot be more miſerable; nor am I inſenſible how I ſpeak unto you in the midſt of your Army, and that the few Forces I have are not able to ſecure me; but ſince I know you, I need not fear any thing; therefore without any further conſideration, what the ſequel of our Combat will be, I beſeech you let me ſee you as ſoon as you can with Sword in your hand: Should I humour my own inclination (replied Cyrus very ſharply) I ſhould quickly ſatisfie your impatience and my own, and I ſhould not ſtir off the ground I ſtand on, before I were either Conquerour or Conquered. But as earneſt as my deſires are to end the difference that begun at Sinope, there is a moſt prevalent reaſon which moves me to deſire a little time before I give you ſatisfaction, and I deſire it the rather, becauſe I do not fail in my word by it, for I did promiſe to fight with you before ever I marry Mandana, and I do promiſe ſtill not to fail, but I never promiſed to fight before I had put her into a place of ſafety; you know how many Battels I have fought to releaſe her, and would you have me leave her in the midſt of an Army compoſed of different Nations, in a Country newly conquered, in the midſt of ſo many newly ſubjected Princes, who gape for occaſions of revolt? Fie; no, no; neither love nor honour will permit me to do ſo; and therefore you muſt needs let me carry the Princeſs into a place of ſafety: But when I have carried her into Medea, if I do not return to fight you, count me for the baſeſt coward of all men living; and to ſpeak rationally, your own intereſt as well as Mandana's requires I ſhould do thus, for if the Fate of Armes ſhould make you Conquerour, what ſafety can you find in the midſt of an Army whoſe General you have killed? No, no, anſwered the King of Aſſiria ſharply, mingle not my intereſt with Mandana's, for I know that whether I be Conquerour or Conquered, I can never hope for any thing from Mandana, ſhe hated me in Babylon before you diſthron'd me, and certainly ſhe would not love me if I ſhould kill you; ſo that I would not fight with you in any hopes to enjoy her, but I would overcome you if I could, and ſo keep you from enjoying her; ſo that for my part all places of Combat are to me indifferent, ſince Conquerour or Conquered, I cannot expect any thing from Mandana: The Gods (purſued this violent Prince) have deluded me by their Oracles, but do not you delude me by your words, and rid your ſelf of an Enemy who is infinitely obliged, but ungrateful to you, who envies all that you enjoy, who cannot brook your glory, and who would pull your heart out, ſo he could pull Mandana's out of it; therefore, Sir, never ſtudy ſo much for reaſon in the buſineſs, for I know all you can produce as well as if you told them, and if you be Conquered, perhaps Mandana will not be without a Protector: Did you know, Sir, (ſaid Cyrus and interrupted him) how much it is againſt my mind to oppoſe your deſire, you would ſee I deſire to give you ſatisfaction as much as you; but I muſt confeſs, that ſince it concerns the ſafety of the Princeſs, I cannot think I ought to do it: Since I know your heart, replied the King of Aſſyria, I do not entertain a diſadvantagious thought of you: But I know not, added he harſhly, whether all the world will think ſo, when they ſhall know how you defer fight, and whether they will not think it ſtrange that you ſhould go to Ecbatan, as if your intentions were, either to arreſt me there, or to cauſe your ſelf to be arreſted. Have I not told you (replied Cyrus, and bluſht for anger) that I will only conduct the Princeſs unto Ecbatan; and that you have been in ſafety in Ciaxares his Army, when he was there himſelf in perſon, though he knew what I had promiſed you. Forbear then, unjuſt Prince that you are, to tell me of ſuch things as I cannot hear without fury, and without preferring my honour before my love, which I ought not to do: And forbear you (replied the King of Aſſyria) to make a miſerable Prince languiſh, who hath nothing to hope for but your death or his own, and force him not to tell ſome diſadvantagious lye of you: Fie, fie, ſaid Cyrus, this is too much to be endured, and I cannot any longer reſiſt either againſt my ſelf, or againſt you, but both my reaſon and my love muſt ſubmit. Know therefore moſt aſſuredly, that ere I be four days older, you ſhall be either my Conqueror, or I yours; that is as much as to ſay (purſued the King of Aſſyria) as that either you or I muſt die for it; Our Combat ſhould be to morrow, if I could (purſued Cyrus) but ſince it cannot poſſibly be ſo ſoon, I muſt take a little longer time. In the mean time, to the end that thoſe who ſee us, may not ſuſpect any thing of our deſign, let us go unto them, and go together unto the Caſtle where the Princeſs is, and doubtleſs ſtays for me to depart: I will do ſo, ſaid the King of Aſſyria, though heaven knows it is the moſt cruel thing in the world for me to go and ſee Cyrus Triumphant with Mandana; but I pray remember, that a Rival may be ungrateful, and ſtill be generous, to the end that if I be overcome by you, you may not ſtain my reputation in ſpeaking of me to our Princeſs: I do not know, replied

Cyrus, that it is permittable to be ungrateful in any buſineſs, but I am ſure that neither you nor I am ſo now; but ſince you are ſo earneſt, I promiſe you again, that within this four days the fate of Arms ſhall decide your Forture and mine for ever.

After this, theſe two furious Rivals took Horſes, and putting on more calm countenances, the better to hide their deſign, they took their way towards Mandana, who not foreſeeing the misfortune which threatned her, had dreſſed her ſelf, and was talking very pleaſantly with Doraliſa, Pherenice, Mazares, and Anaxaris.

OR THE

GRAND CYRUS.

PART VIII. Book I.

THE Princeſs Mandana was no ſooner ready, but according to her Pious Cuſtom, ſhe would go to the Temple before ſhe departed: So that Mazares leading her by the hand, ſhe went out of her Chamber: But ſhe was no ſooner upon the top of the ſtairs, but ſhe ſaw the King of Aſſiria lighting from his Horſe at the other ſide of the Court, and who never ſtaying for Cyrus, haſted towards her, before ſhe could get into her Coach. Madana's wonder was ſo great, that in lieu of going forward, ſhe ſtopped, and gave this unfortunate Prince time enough to come unto her, with the ſame reverence he uſed to obſerve, maugre the impetuoſity of his humour, and violence of his Paſſion. I make no doubt Madam (ſaid he unto her, after he had ſaluted her) but my ſight doth both ſurprize and diſpleaſe you, and that I am ſtill the object of your anger and hatred: But ſince the King your Father ſuffers me to be in his Army, as great an Offender as I am both againſt him and you: and ſince Cyrus can endure me, as much his Rival as I am, I ſhall hope you will give me leave to wait upon you; and that ſince for the love of you I have loſt all, you will not deny me the favour to be one of your Convoy, eſpecially ſince you allow the ſame favour unto the Prince Mazares, who hath been as great an Offender as my ſelf.

The Prince Mazares replied Mandana, having waſhed away his crime by a generous repentance, is now in the number of my friends, and not my perſecutors. But however it be Sir, I do aſſure you Sir, I had rather ſee you in the King my Fathers Army, than ſee you in Babylon again. When you came, Sir, I was going to render thanks unto the gods for delivering me out of your power, and giving me that liberty which you had loſt me: And if you will be adviſed by me, you ſhall be as acknowledging as my ſelf, and thank them you have an Enemy ſo generous as to let you enjoy a benefit which you took from me, and which your ſelf had loſt. Since the Gods are juſt (replied the King of Aſſiria fiercely) they will recompence the generoſity of my Rival: And Madam you muſt give me leave to ask them nothing, but to be revenged of your extream inhumanity. Unjuſt Prayers (replyed Cyrus, who was not till now come up to them) do ſeldom reach the ears of the Gods, but to puniſh thoſe which make them, and therefore take heed how you ask them any thing againſt the Princeſs, and if you have any revenging thoughts, pray let it light upon me.

Whilſt Cyrus was talking thus, the Princeſs took Coach, and took Doraliſa, Pherenice, and Marteſia with her: After which ſhe went unto the Temple, and Cyrus, the King of Aſſiria, Mazares, Myrſiles, Anaxaris, Adrametis, Chriſantes, Feraulas, and many others followed him: As long as the Sacrifice laſted, the Princeſs was ſo zealouſly devoted unto the Gods, as ſhe never turned her head or eyes upon any of the company: all whom, being not ſo intent at their prayers as ſhe was, had thoughts as different as were their Intereſts. The heart of Cyrus was wholly upon the ruin of his Rival, whoſe preſence interrupted all his Joys: The King of Aſſyria, though full of impatiency to ſee Cyrus with his Sword in his Hand, yet he had a kind of delight to ſee Mandana; but it was delight without any tranquility; and if his mind was upon the Gods whilſt he was in the Temple, it was in praying for the death of Cyrus, the enjoyment of Mandana, for the Crown he had loſt, and to be revenged upon Mazares: Indeed it may be ſaid that he murmured rather than prayed. As for Anaxaris whoſe flaming paſſion was the more violent, becauſe it was ſmothered and concealed, he wiſhed that theſe two Rivals might ruin each other, or he them both: and though he could not imagine which way in all the world he could pretend any thing unto Mandana, yet he was deſperately in love with her, and prayed to the Gods moſt zealouſly that ſhe might love him. As for Mazares, his virtue was ſo confined and confirmed, as howſoever he loved the Princeſs of Medea, yet he asked no more from the hands of the Gods, but that he might have her eſteem and friendſhip; and he had ſo accuſtomed himſelf unto combates with his own deſires, as he durſt not ſuffer the leaſt impertinent wiſh to proceed from the root of his heart. But it was nothing ſo with the Prince Myrſiles, which did moſt fervently pray unto the Gods to change the heart of the ſevere and inſenſible Doraliſa, and neither thought, nor asked for any thing elſe. As for Andrametis, who was no leſs in love with this fair one than he was, his deſires went ſomething farther, for he equally prayed for the ruine of his Rival Myrſiles, and the enjoyment of his Miſtreſs Doraliſa. As for Chriſantes and Feraulas, who knew of the engagement that was between Cyrus and the King of Aſſiria: they conſulted with each other, whether or no they ſhould acquaint the Princeſs Mandana with it, and prayed unto the Gods that this invincible Hero might have as glorious ſucceſs in this dangerous occaſion, as in all the reſt he ever undertook As for Doraliſa, Pherenice, and Marteſia, all their prayers were for the Princeſs whom they waited upon, knowing that they could never expect any happineſs unleſs ſhe were ſo: The truth is, all theſe different perſons did make ſuch different prayers, that the Gods whom they invoked could not accord unto them all: They were like unto thoſe upon the Sea, ſome with deſigns of going Eaſt-ward, and ſome Weſt ward, and pray for contrary winds, as each had need: So Mandana, the King of Aſſiria, Cyrus, Mazares, Anaxaris, did all of them ask the Gods point blank contrary unto each other, and by conſequence impoſſibilities.

The Sacrifice being ended, the Princeſs returned to the Caſtle, but ſhe ſtaid not there, purpoſely to ſhun the King of Aſſiria's company; yet before ſhe departed, ſhe would needs know of Cyrus, how he met with his Rival, and chid him a little for his over-generoſity in releaſing his moſt mortal Enemy. Had he been only your Enemy, ſaid ſhe, I ſhould not have had any right to accuſe you; but ſince he is my perſecutor, me-thinks I have cauſe to complain againſt you as over-generous.

The King your Father, Madam, hath ſet me ſuch a glorious example, replied Cyrus, as I were moſt unworthy of your eſteem, if I did not imitate him. And truly Madam, (added he) if you did but know what joy it is unto me to ſee you put ſo great a difference between the King of Aſſiria and Cyrus, you would not wonder I ſhould give my ſelf ſo much ſatisfaction.

But for all that, I beſeech you Madam do not alter your thoughts, nor too much pity the miſerable condition, wherein the King your Fathers Armies hath brought my Aſſirian Rival: For I muſt confeſs, though Compaſſion be a quality becoming ſuch an heroick heart as yours Madam: and ſince it doth ſo infinitely concern me that your heart be hardened towards him, yet I cannot wiſh you ſhould have any pity upon him.

I do aſſure you Sir, replied Mandana, that I cannot be very inclinable to pity a Prince who hath cauſed all the miſeries of my life: But in relation to your ſelf, ſaid ſhe, I muſt needs ſometimes think, that looking upon him as the cauſe of all your Conqueſts, and that great glory which you have gotten, you ſhould hate him a little leſs: For truly had he not carried me away, you had never taken Babylon, you had never brought all Aſſiria into ſubjection, you had not conquered Armenia, you had not vanquiſhed Crœſus, taken Sardis, ſubjected all Lydia, the Xanthians, the Cauneans, the Ionians, the Ghedeans; you had not taken Cumes, nor ever have been the Conqueror of all Aſia: 'Tis true, Madam, replied Cyrus, but however I ſhould have ſtill been proſtrate at your feet, adoring you; and my endeavours, my ſighs and ſervices might perhaps have engaged your heart more than it is; ſo that I may ſay, my Conqueſt had been far more glorious unto me by them, than by the Arms of Cyaxares your Father. I could if I would (replied the Princeſs Mandana) anſwer you obligingly enough, and tell you, that in taking Babylon, Artaxates, Sardis, and Cumes, you have perhaps gained my heart more, than you had done by your ſighs and ſervices without them, but I am too ill ſatisfied with you to do ſo: Not that I would have you now change your way of dealing with the Aſſirian King, ſince he is at liberty: but I muſt confeſs, I ſhould not have been ſorry if you had not releaſed him; and I had rather I could have chidden you for your too little generoſity, than for your too much. However I do conjure you, added ſhe, not to be far from me; for if you go and viſit any more Monuments, I ſhall fear that you will bring back the King of Pontus with you, and therefore I pray let no ſuch thing come to paſs. Not that I think the King of Aſſiria to be in any Condition able to attempt any thing againſt me, unleſs it be in attempting ſomething againſt you: but yet for all that, his preſence is ſo tormentive unto me, that I ſtand in need of yours to comfort me.

Cyrus hearing Mandana ſpeak thus, feared that ſhe ſuſpected ſomething of the truth: Therefore to clear all matters he anſwered her, as if he had not any angry thought in his mind againſt the King of Aſſiria. It ſeems Madam, ſaid he unto her, you would have me comfort my ſelf with the ſight of an Enemy, who, as you ſay, is the cauſe of ſo many glorious advantages unto me? However it be, replied this Princeſs, Let me always ſee you, whereſoever I ſhall ſee him, until I come unto ſuch a place where I may obtain of the King my Father to baniſh him, as I do intend: As for your ſelf, as troubleſom as his preſence is unto me, I would not have you attempt any thing to free me from him. Since he is a cauſe why you Madam do treat me ſo well (replied Cyrus, and laughed) I ſhall moſt willingly obey you After this the Princeſs went into her Coach with Doraliſa, liſa and Marteſia; Pherenice and Arianita, and the reſt of the Princeſs her women, went in another Coach which followed hers.

In the mean while Cyrus, whoſe thoughts were upon all that related unto the ſafety of Mandana, and the execution of his deſign, he altered the orders of his march, and cauſed the Aſſirian Troops to be placed on the Wings, and as far off the Princeſs as poſſible: Alſo he gave particular orders unto Anaxaris, to have a ſpecial guard upon Mandana; not thinking that in being ſo cautious againſt one Rival, he truſted her with another. On the other ſide Chriſantes with Feraulas had not yet acquainted Marteſia with Cyrus and the King of Aſſiria's engagement, but reſolved to acquaint her at night, to the end that ſhe making it known unto the Princeſs, ſhe might by her ſovereign authority oblige all the Princes in the Army to have vigilant eyes, and become guards over theſe two terrible Rivals. Yet though they had not ſpoken of it unto Marteſia, ſince ſhe was a woman of an excellent ſpirit, the King of Aſſiria's arrival did make her very melancholy; for ſhe was better acquainted with the violence of his temper than Mandana was, from whom he was obſervant to hide it. Yet for all that ſhe did ſtrive with her ſelf, that her vexation might not appear to the Princeſs; The pleaſant humours of Doraliſa did much facilitate the concealment of her thoughts; for whilſt Mandana was muſing, and ſtudying upon her own thoughts, ſhe would diſcant upon the thoughts of all the Princes which rid by Mandana's Coach by the Air of their Countenances; and ſhe had ſuch pleaſant fancies upon them, which ſuited ſo pat to their adventures, and unto their garbes, that Marteſia not being able to forbear laughing, did put the Princeſs out of her dumpiſh muſing; who being deſirous to know what it was which made them ſo merry, ſhe cauſed Marteſia to repeat all that Doraliſa thought of Cyrus, of the King of Aſſiria, of Mazares, of the Prince Artamas, and of all the reſt they had talked of. But I beſeech you tell me (ſaid Mandana to her, when ſhe ſaw the Prince Myrſiles, and Andramites near her Coach) what are the thoughts of theſe two Captains, whom your beauty hath taken? and whether Cupid hath made them Equals by making them Rivals, ſince the one's a Subject, the other a Soveraign? Alas Madam, replied Doraliſa, I cannot tell what they think; and I am ſo far from knowing it, that I have done as much as ever I can, not to underſtand what they ſaid, when they ſpake unto me as intelligibly as they could. But Madam, in lieu of telling you what they think upon, I will if you pleaſe tell you what I think of them. I believe Doraliſa (replied the Princeſs) that you will be ſo far from ſincerity in ſuch a buſineſs, as I will not oblige you to tell me any lies: But I had much rather you would tell me, what you fancy they think of you, than what you think of them. Since you will needs have it ſo Madam (replied Doraliſa, and laughed) I ſhall tell you; That to ſee with what a gloomy countenance Andramites looks upon the Prince Myrſiles, I think he is very ſorry this Prince is not ſtill dumb: and to ſee how earneſtly that Prince doth talk with others, makes me think, that if he have talked upon any matters of Love, it is only becauſe he takes a delight in talking of ſomething which he never talked of before: After this, Mandana began to chide with Doraliſa, and to make her tell her whether ſhe did not uſe to talk more ſeriouſly and more obligingly unto a Prince ſo accompliſhed as he was, whoſe heart ſhe had captivated.

But whilſt Doraliſa was diverting Mandana with her pleaſant humours, and had her Quibbles of wit, upon a thouſand paſſages, and every object, Cyrus was thinking how he ſhould keep touch with the King of Aſſiria as ſoon as poſſible, and imagining how he ſhould ſlink aſide from ſo many men as were continually about him. But his greateſt care was, to contrive it ſo, that in caſe he was vanquiſhed, then the King of Aſſiria to have no power in diſpoſing of the Princeſs. However, he was much perplexed; for honour would not permit him to impart a buſineſs of this nature unto many men; and therefore he took a middle courſe, and told all the chief Commanders only thus much, that the King of Aſſiria's preſence did move him to have a more eſpecial care of Mandana's ſafety: He conjured them to remember the Fidelity which they owed unto Ciaxares, and whatſoever happened, never to fail in that. Yet he thought not this enough: But the high eſteem he had of Anaxaris, prompted him to impart the ſecret unto him; for ſince he was Captain of the Guard unto the Princeſs, he thought him the fitteſt to truſt with her, and that it was by him he might get out to fight with the Aſſirian King: And therefore Mandana was no ſooner come unto the place where ſhe was to lie; and as ſoon as Anaxaris according to his Cuſtom had placed his Guards, he ſent for him, and began to talk in private with him: At the firſt, Anaxaris knowing by the action of that Prince, he had ſomething of great importance to ſay unto him, did imagine that his own eyes had betrayed him, and that Cyrus had dived into the bottom of his heart, and diſcovered the flaming and ſmothering paſſion in it: But he was not long in this error; for as ſoon as ever Cyrus and he were together, he began to talk unto him: Doubtleſs Sir, ſaid he unto him, though you be a ſtranger unto me, yet certainly you are a man of extraordinary vertue, and uncommon fidelity, ſince I am reſolved to truſt you with a buſineſs, which is a thouſand times more dear unto me than my life, for it concerns my honour: And ſince I know you to be a man both brave and generous, I queſtion not but that you will carry your ſelf in ſuch an important buſineſs as this, as you ought to do: But yet, as highly as I eſteem you, and as great an opinion as I have of your honeſty, I cannot truſt you with the ſecret, until you have made a ſolemn oath unto me never to reveal it, nor never do or ſay any thing which might raiſe the leaſt ſuſpition of it, eſpecially unto the Princeſs who of all in the world ought not to know it. Sir, ſaid Anxaris, (much amazed, and impatient to hear what Cyrus would ſay) ſince honour doth ſufficiently oblige one to conceal the ſecrets of another: And ſince none are Maſters but of their own ſecrets, I may with ſome juſtice complain of you, for exacting from me an oath never to ſpeak of what you will pleaſe to honour we with the truſt. Yet Sir, to teſtifie how eaſily I can do what is my duty: I will promiſe you with all the ſincerity of a man who never uſes to betray his truſt, never to ſpeak what you ſhall impart.

After this, Cyrus embraceing Anaxaris, asked him pardon for the wrong he did his vertue, in not truſting him at firſt: but my dear Anaxaris (ſaid he unto him) did you but know what a contention there is in my heart, between my love of Mandana, and my love of Honour; and what turbulent agitations theſe two violent Paſſions do at this preſent cauſe in it, doubtleſs you will excuſe me, eſpecially if ever you were in Love: But that you may more clearly pardon me, I muſt open my ſoul unto you, and acquaint you with the cauſe of that injury which I have done unto your Fidelity. After this, he acquainted Anaxaris in few words, with the promiſe he had made with the Aſſirian King upon the Tower at Sinope, and how he had ſince confirmed that promiſe at the Monument of Abradates. You may judge (added Cyrus) that ſuch a ſecret as this ought not to be revealed: Moſt true Sir, replied Anaxaris, but he who diſcovers it, may give the man whom he truſts, ſhare with him in the glory, by letting him partake of his peril. That's not my deſign Sir, replied Cyrus, but the thing which I require of you, generous Anaxaris, is, that you ſolemnly ſwear unto me, that if the King of Aſſiria do Conquer me, you will with all your power keep the Princeſs Mandana out of his: For ſince I cannot be vanquiſhed but by death, I am very confident that if he become my Conquror, he will do all he can to ſow ſedition amongſt the Souldiers, purpoſely to become Maſter of the Princeſs. And therefore apprehending, that an Army compoſed of ſo many ſeveral Nations, and a People newly Conquered, wherein alſo are ſome Aſſirian Forces, may be apt to mutiny, I thought it neceſſary that you, who have got much credit amongſt the Souldiers, and has an eſpecial care of the Princeſs, ſhould be acquainted with the ſtate of things; to the end that multiplying your Cares, you may make ſure of your Souldiers: And that I may leave orders with you to ſhew unto all the Commanders in the Army, if I ſhould fall in the Fight which I am to make, and which moſt certainly I ſhall make very ſhortly, ſince having taken but four days, whereof one is already paſt, I will before the laſt keep punctual touch with the Aſſirian King. Anaxaris hearing this was much joyed, that he deſired nothing thing which he could not eaſily promiſe, and which he could not keep, though he was ſomewhat aſhamed that he could not chooſe but be a Rival unto a Prince who treated him ſo obligingly. But at laſt, ſtriving with himſelf to hide the agitation of his ſpirits, he promiſed Cyrus, with all the zeal of a man that was reſolved to keep promiſe, that he would die a thouſand deaths, rather then the King of Aſſiria ſhould ever have Mandana in his power, if it ſo hapned that he were Conquerour. O my dear Anaxaris (ſaid Cyrus then unto him) the aſſurance which you give me doth ſo elevate my heart, that I am confident I ſhall vanquiſh the King of Aſſiria, ſince now I do not fear he ſhall triumph over Mandana, though the fate of Arms ſhould let him triumph over me: Yes, yes, my dear Anaxaris, I ſhall owe unto you all the glory I ſhall get in vanquiſhing my Rival, if I do ſurmount him; for really if I ſhould have fought in fear, that my death would have put Mandana in his power, I ſhould have been half overcome before I ever fought: But ſince you promiſe me to employ the ſame valour wherewith you have done ſuch miracles, and whereof I am a witneſs and an admirer, in behalf of the Princeſs, I ſhall never fear my Rival will ever rejoyce in the fruits of his Victory, nor do I fear he can vanquiſh me.

Moreover I remember, my generous Anaxaris, that Mandana is a debtor unto you already for her liberty; and this I would have you now do, is not more difficult than that you did in the Caſtle of Cumes. Sir, replied Anaxaris, could you but ſee my heart, you would never offer to oblige me by any more new promiſes, nor would you doubt but that I am reſolv'd to die for the Princeſs Mandana's ſervice. Be confident therefore Sir, I beſeech you, that as long as I am living, ſhe ſhall never come under the King of Aſſiria's power; but Sir, I believe I ſhall never need to defend her againſt him; for if I be not much miſtaken, his valour will thrive no better againſt you this ſecond time, than it did the firſt: but I am confident you will overcome him now as you did before. If I do overcome him (replyed Cyrus) then Sir, I will come and give you thanks for my victory; ſo that whether I be Conquerour, or Conquered, I ſhall be ſtill obliged to you, and the Princeſs will be infinitely you debtor. If I be vanquiſher; I promiſe you to let her know her obligations; and if I be vanquiſhed, ſince ſhe her ſelf muſt be both Witneſs and Judge of your valour, doubtleſs ſhe will acknowledg your merits, and conſequently, my dear Anaxaris, your own vertue will purchaſe you the eſteem of the moſt illuſtrious Princeſs upon earth. Yet remember above all, to be faithful unto me; you know how delicate a thing this honour is; therefore for Heavens ſake Sir, do for mine, as you would have me do for yours: Yet this is not all Anaxaris that I require of you, for it muſt be by your means that I muſt rid my ſelf of ſo many eyes as are upon me, that I may ſteal from them to go and fight with the King of Aſſiria, which you may eaſily do by a way which I have contrived, and which I ſhall acquaint you with when time is fit: Oh, Sir, replied Anaxaris, ſhould the Princeſs know that I ſhould ſalicitate your Combat, ſhe would extreamly hate me; ſince ſhe ſhall never know it, replied Cyrus, you will not be expoſed unto any danger of it: but tho' ſhe ſhould come to know it, I would engage my ſelf to make your peace if I be not vanquiſhed.

After this Cyrus and Anaxaris parted; the firſt of theſe was well ſatisfied with his confidence in Anaxaris: and the ſecond had his heart ſo full of different apprehenſions, as that he was not able to maſter them: The confidence which Cyrus put in him, made him aſhamed that he did not give him a ſincere anſwer; but his affection to Mandana, ſtuffed ſo full of fancies contrary unto that, as ſometimes he could not chooſe but be over-joyed, that theſe two Rivals were ready to ruine each other. Yet ſince his ſoul was of a brave and generous compoſition, he ſtifled his Joys as much as he could, and condemned his own thoughts: Fie, fie, unworthy Anaxaris, would he ſay unto himſelf, canſt thou ſuffer thy heart baſely to rejoyce, that two of the moſt valiant Princes in the world are ready to kill each other? and that thou ſhouldſt be rid of two Rivals at once without any danger to my ſelf? Repent, repent for ſhame, of thy ignominious weakneſs: and if theſe two Princes be any obſtacle unto thy deſigns, do not wiſh that they ſhould ruine each other, to the end that thou mayſt have the honour of ruining them thy ſelf.

But alas, unhappy Anaxaris, ſaid he, and ſighed, how vainly art thou baſe in thy wiſhes? For though Cyrus and the Aſſirian King were both dead, yet Mandana is ſtill none of thine: and thou haſt more reaſon to think ſhe will never be any ones, but that the death of Cyrus will cauſe hers: But what do I ſay? (ſaid he, and reprehended himſelf) I do very unjuſtly accuſe my ſelf; For indeed I cannot conceive that honour forbids me to rejoyce at the loſs of a Rival, as long as this joy is no cauſe of it: wait then with hopes, the ſucceſs of this furious Combat, between two of the greateſt Princes upon Earth, diſputing for the poſſeſſion of the faireſt Princeſs in the World: But alas, unfortunate Anaxaris (added he) how much ſorrow will the end of this Combate cauſe thee? For if Cyrus be vanquiſhed, thou wilt ſee Mandana ſwimming in tears for him: thou wilt hear all her ſighs and doleful complaints, and wilt be a witneſs of all her ſorrows; if Cyrus be conqueror, then thou wilt hear all her applauds of him, thou wilt be a witneſs of all thoſe teſtimonies of eſteem which ſhe will give him, and thou wilt with thy own eyes perhaps find as much Love in hers to him, as there is in thy heart to her. Think therefore of it Anaxaris, conſider ſeriouſly, and reſolve to vanquiſh thy ſelf: Conſider how many great things ought to poſſeſs thy mind, and that Love is not the Paſſion which at this time ought to reign in thy ſoul: Do not deceive thy ſelf as thou doſt others, and do not think thy ſelf to be Anaxaris: Remember, that thou haſt a name more illuſtrious, which muſt have all the glory, and that this of Anaxaris which thou haſt borrowed, muſt not be always thine; Never brand it with a piece of folly in obſtinately loving Mandana, who will never love thee. But who knows, ſaid he (and reprehended himſelf) what the Fates have reſolved of thee? Perhaps they have reſerved for thee all the Victories of Cyrus. The Princeſs whom thou ador'ſt does not hate thee, ſhe thinks her ſelf much obliged unto thee, and the only man upon earth that hath any ſhare in her heart, as expoſing himſelf unto eminent danger. Leave then the conduct of thy life unto the ſame Gods, who breathed thy love into thy ſoul; and without committing any buſineſs, act nothing againſt thy ſelf on the paſſion which poſſeſſeth thee.

But whilſt Anaxaris was thus conſulting with himſelf, Chriſantes and Feraulas were ſeeking for an opportunity of ſpeaking unto Marteſia, and of diſpoſing her to tell the Princeſs of the promiſe which Cyrus made unto the King of Aſſiria, upon the Tower of Synope: But do what they could, they could not get a ſight of her, becauſe Mandana to avoid the ſight of the Aſſirian King, would ſee none that night, nor ſuffer Marteſia to leave her.

On the other ſide, Cyrus, whoſe greateſt preſſure of mind was how to fight with his Rival, he reſolved it ſhould be the next day, whilſt the Princeſs was at Dinner: ſo as he imployed the reſt of that night in making ſure of all thoſe whom he thought fitteſt to oppoſe all the violences of the Aſſirian King, if the Fate of Arms would have him ſubjected by him: Yet was is ſo handſomely carried, that he gave not the leaſt ſuſpition of his ſecret deſign, colouring the matter only with the King of Aſſiria's preſence.

But to the end his Rival ſhould not long wait for his promiſed ſatisfaction, he told him that the day following ſhould make it appear which was Conqueror, and which was conquered: hinting unto him the time and place where he ſhould expect his ſatisfaction: So that this violent Prince ſeeing himſelf neer his fatal time which was to decide all Controverſies between Cyrus and himſelf, his heart began to beat high, he rowſed up all his hatred, his jealouſie, and his fury, as a better preparative to fight. He called into his memory all the rigours of Mandana, and as much as in him lay did forget that he owed his Life and Liberty unto his Rival: So that ſtirring up all the wormwood of his miſeries, and ſetting an edge upon his anger, the fury of his heart did more appear in his eyes than uſual: and indeed, he found that he was ſo little Maſter of himſelf, as fearing leſt he ſhould diſcover the ſecret, and be an obſtrcle unto his own deſign if he were ſeen, he would not expoſe himſelf the next morning unto fight. But ſince his turbulent humour would not let him reſt long in a place, as ſoon as it was day he took horſe, and would take the Air until the time he knew Mandana would ſet out: So that without any with him but a Page, he went to conſult with his own thoughts by a Rivers ſide not far off.

In the mean time Chriſantes and Feraulas no ſooner knew that Marteſia was gone into her Chamber, but they went unto her, and acquainted her, that they thought it requiſite ſhe ſhould acquaint the Princeſs as handſomely as commonly ſhe uſed with the buſineſs. Alas, ſaid ſhe unto them, how difficult a task it is to acquaint her with ſuch bad news, and not extreamly trouble her? but ſince it would be an ill piece of ſervice to ſpare her this trouble, becauſe it might perhaps expoſe her unto a greater, I will leave you, and put her to it. As Marteſia ſaid ſo, and made her ſelf ready to leave Chriſantes and Feraulas, ſhe underſtood by Arianita, that Cyrus having received ſome Letters from Ciaxares, he was gone into Mandana's Chamber, ſo that Marteſia could not ſpeak unto her. The conference between this Princeſs and Cyrus being very long, and did not end until it was time to go unto the Temple, he waited upon her thither, and back again. Whilſt they were there, Cyrus did a little wonder that he ſaw not the King of Aſſiria, who was not wont to be from Mandana, when he could be with her: But this wonder was much more at his return from Church, when being upon the top of the Caſtle ſtairs where the Princeſs lay, he ſaw five or ſix Souldiers to bring this King extreamly wounded, his amazement was ſo great, that he was not able to expreſs it; and the Princeſs turning aſide her head, and ſeeing it alſo, her ſurprize was as great as his; Marteſia alſo, who ſtood behind Mandana had her ſhare in the admiration, but it was mixed with ſome Joy, ſince his accident put Cyrus in ſafety. Anaxaris on the contrary, he grieved at this misfortune which hapned unto the Aſſirian King, becauſe it did at leaſt defer his Combat with Cyrus: And though he had a will to choak any thought that was oppoſite to generoſity, yet he was not able eſpecially becauſe Mandana and Cyrus were together, and in ſight.

In the mean time, thoſe who carried the King of Aſſiria, could not carry him to his Lodging, but they muſt needs paſs by the half Pace where Mandana and Cyrus ſtood, therefore this fatal Lover could not chooſe but ſee them: So that being both extreamly aſham'd and angry to be ſeen in that condition, both by his Miſtriſs and his Rival, he bluſhed for very anger, though he had loſt much blood:

blood; He ſtrived to ſeem leſs wounded than he was, inſomuch as turning himſelf a little towards the Princeſs with more reſpect then his ſalute was able to bear; and ſhunning the eyes of Cyrus becauſe he would not receive his Civilities, he appeared very angry and furious. However, ſince the Princeſs had not any mind to inſult upon a miſerable man, ſhe went into her Chamber, and Cyrus asked leave to go and know, who it was that wounded the King of Aſſiria; for truly Mrdam, ſaid he unto her, this Enemy is of ſuch a rank as requires this Civility from me. And having the honour to commmand the King your Fathers Army, its fit I know all paſſages in it, and prevent all injuſtice. I ſhall not be againſt any reaſonable civility, replyed Mandana, provided it be not over long, nor hinder me from departing within an hour. After this Cyrus left her, and went unto the place where they carried the Aſſirian King; but being told that he was dreſſing, he would not ſee him until the Chirurgions came from him. As they came out of his Chamber, Cyrus asked them how he did, and they anſwered him that of three wounds which he had received, the moſt dangerous was in his right arm, which was very ill, and they would not anſwer for it; telling him further, how that the Prince deſired them to ſay, he was not in any danger. After this Cyrus went into the King of Aſſiria's Chamber, who was calling one of his men to ſend unto him: So as he no ſooner ſaw him, but ſtriving not to ſeem weak, or dangerouſly wounded, I am glad Sir, ſaid he unto him, that you have taken ſo much pains as to come and ſee me: And truly Sir, replied Cyrus, I am very ſorry you ſhould be in ſuch a condition, as obligeth me to render you this viſit. Trouble not your ſelf ſo much for my hurts (replied this furious Prince in a low voyce, leaſt any ſhould hear but Cyrus) for if I be not much miſtaken, I ſhall be well before you can come at Ecbatane. Though I ſhould come there before that, replied Cyrus, it ſhould not make me ſtart from my promiſe. I conjure you not (anſwered the King Aſſiria) And to oblige you unto it, know Sir, that though this hurt in my right Arm were greater than it is, and that I had loſt the uſe of it, yet would I fight with you with my left Hand rather then voluntarily yield the Princeſs unto you; for there is a fatal neceſſity in it, you muſt either be my Conqueror, or I yours: To teſtifie unto you Sir, replied Cyrus, that I do not wiſh to ſpare a fighting with you but upon the ſcore of your hurts,and the advantage of that weakneſs which your wounds have cauſed, I beſeech you take as long a time as you pleaſe to recover in,and make choice of whom you will to keep you company; but I beſeech you Sir tell me, what Heroe, or what Aſſaſſinate hath brought you into this Condition? Certainly you will have it from the mouth of my Conqueror (replied the King of Aſſiria ſharply) for I make no queſtion but Intaphernes will come ere long, and ask a recompence of you, for ridding you of an Enemy, though he fought only upon his own ſcore, but yet he has reaſon Sir to give you thanks for his victory; for if my extream deſire to vanquiſh him preſently, that I might fight with you alſo this day, had not made me run head long into his Arms, as brave as he is, he had not ſo eaſily vanquiſhed me. Since I have ſuch experience of your valour, Sir, replied Cyrus, I ſhall eaſily believe what you ſay. In the mean time, I aſſure you, that if the Prince Intaphernes were not the Son of Gadates, unto whom I ſtand bound in many obligations, I ſhould hardly receive him well, as accompliſhed as he can be, ſince he is the cauſe our Combat is deferred; but becauſe I will not my ſelf defer it,by augmenting your pain with too long a viſit; You ſhall give me leave to retire after a ſecond confirmation of my promiſe,not to fail in the leaſt tittle of my word; and after I have aſſured you, I will appoint ſome of my men to wait upon you with as much reſpect as upon my ſelf, and to have as great care of your life, as if it were abſolutely neceſſary unto my felicity.

Moſt noble Rival, ſaid the King of Aſſiria (lifting up his eyes to heaven) do not over-load me with your generoſity; but let it ſuffice, you have promiſed me not to fail in your word.

After this, the violent King of Aſſiria not being able any longer to maſter himſelf, turned boiſterouſly on the other ſide, and began to accuſe the Fates for being ſo oppoſite unto all he deſired: And Cyrus having no more to ſay unto him, went out of his Chamber, commanding thoſe that were to wait upon him,to have eſpecial care of him. Thus this generous minded Prince, in point of perfect magnanimity took care for the preſervation of an Enemy, who wiſhed not for life, but to be his death: But Cyrus was no ſooner out of his Rivals Lodging, then this unfortunate King called for one of his men, and ſent him unto the Princeſs Mandana, to tell her he was very ſorry he could not wait upon her as he deſign'd; but that he hoped to overtake her before ſhe came to Ecbatane: Yet conjured her, that if he was miſtaken in his Conjectures, and died of his wounds, ſhe would be pleaſed to favour him ſo far as not to rejoyce at his death. The man who was to deliver this odd meſſage, did very haſtily perform his Commiſſion: yet he found the Princeſs ready to take Coach, and Cyrus with her, rendring her an accompt of the Aſſirian Kings condition: But ſhe no ſooner received this Meſſage, then ſhe prepared to anſwer him that brought it: Tell the King your Maſter, ſaid ſhe unto him, that I never uſed to rejoyce at the death of my greateſt Enemies, becauſe I cannot do it without a piece of inhumanity; but withal aſſure him, that I ſhould exceedingly rejoyce, if in the recovery of his wounds he ſhould recover the health of his mind as well as the health of his body.

After this, Mandana, with Doraliſa, Pherenice, and Marteſia took Coach, and departed immediately: And then Cyrus took Horſe, with all the reſt of the Princes, except Mazares, who ſtayed a quarter of an hour behind the reſt to viſit the King of Aſſiria, but he found him in ſuch a fretting and diſtempered humour, as he was forced to leave him preſently, ſo as he quickly overtook the Princeſs Mandana. In the mean time, Cyrus having left order with one to ſend him exact word of the Aſſirian Kings condition, and to ſend it ſecretly for ſome Reaſons beſt known to himſelf. He alſo ſent to ſeek Gadates, and to tell him that it was his Son who had wounded the King of Aſſiria, and to ask him if he knew where he was. Sir (ſaid Gadates unto him as they rid) I did write unto him by the Meſſenger of Arſamones, and commanded him to come and pay ſome of my obligations unto you, by rendring you ſome conſiderable ſervices; knowing, that ſince the King of Bythinia had now no Wars in his Dominions, he would willingly come hither; but ſince that I heard nothing of him:

It is credible, replied Cyrus, that we ſhall ſhortly ſee him: For by the manner of the King of Aſſiria's ſpeech, I collected that Intaphernes was not wounded.

Though the King of Aſſiria (replied Gadates, and ſighed) hath heretofore given my Son a thouſand cauſes of complaint, in the life time of the Queen Nitocris: and though it's likely he hath given him ſome ſince in Bythinia, yet I muſt needs be ſorry both for his Combat and his Victory: For indeed, ſince he was born his Vaſſal, unleſs he were forced to fight, he ought not to have fought with him.

You ſpeak with ſo much wiſdom, replied Cyrus, as it is not credible, that the Son of a man ſo prudent as Gadates, would ever make any undiſcreet Combat, and I can aſſure you, that he has not vanquiſhed the King of Aſſiria without glory.

Whilſt Cyrus and Gadates were thus talking and riding together, Crœſſus and the King of Hircania diſcourſed together upon the vertues of Cyrus: The Prince Myrſiles and the Prince Artamas did alſo ſweetly communicate the paſſions of each others ſouls unto each other: The firſt of theſe affirming that Love might ſtill ſubſiſt without any hope: And the ſecond maintaining, that whoſoever doth truly love, doth not ceaſe being a Lover, in becoming a Husband.

As for Mazares, when he overtook the Troops, he marched and diſcourſed with none, having enough to contemplate upon in his own thoughts, without the converſe of others.

On the other ſide, Anaxaris, whoſe ſoul was toſſed with a thouſand various thoughts, and ſeeking out for one to be the Confident of his heart, he talked with Andramites, whoſe ſpirit pleaſed him, and whom he knew did particularly eſteem him. And indeed the truth was, Andramites had as ſtrong a deſire to anſwer the Amity of Anaxaris, as Anaxaris had to enjoy his.

Again, Chriſantes and Feraulas, ſeeing the King of Aſſiria was wounded, and that dangerouſly: Alſo that they were far enough from him, they told Marteſia before ſhe went into Mandana's Coach, that they would not have her impart the buſineſs unto the Princeſs, ſince it would trouble her to no purpoſe, conſidering the King of Aſſiria's eſtate: So that Marteſia aſſuming her ordinary humour, and Doraliſa continuing her uſual jollity, that days journey was very pleaſantly paſſed over: It might well be ſaid, that the Country had decked it ſelf in its beſt ornaments to pleaſe ſo many Gallants as fortune had aſſembled together; for all the Province through which they travelled, was a pattern for an exquiſite Painter to draw a Land-skip by. The Rivers were moſt delightfully twined amongſt pleaſant Meadows, ſet with Oſyers and Willows upon the Banks: The Plains through which they paſſed were neither too vaſtly open, nor ſo cloſe as to make them ſolitary: The Villages were ſuch as were full of pretty Cataracts of water, purling Springs, and pleaſing Shades: The Hills over which they paſſed were nothing rough and rocky, but afforded moſt delightful proſpects of Towns, Villages, Houſes, Rivers, Woods, Ways, and men travelling in them; abundance of grazing Flocks, many magnificent buildings, huge Rocks afar off, and the Sea the fartheſt: Inſomuch as though the Princeſs had wanted the company of thoſe three excellent perſons who were ſo amiable, and ſo full of diverſions, yet ſhe might have found enough in the very variety of the Country to feed her eyes withal, and to contemplate upon, without any melancholy: And ſhe paſſed over that day with more pleaſure, than ſhe had done a long time before, and ſo ſoon, that at her journeys end, ſhe did not think ſhe had gone above half the way.

But that this days Journey might end more pleaſingly, chance would have it ſo, that as ſhe came out of her Coach to go into a houſe of Sacrifice, which was the faireſt in all the Town, ſhe ſpied coming out of this houſe into which ſhe was to enter, a man of a moſt admirable Garb, who both by his habit and aſpect ſeemed to be a man of noble quality: But her wonder was, to ſee him ſlink out of a back-door, and in lieu of coming towards her, he took another way, though ſhe could not imagine upon what deſign.

But ſhe was not long in this wonder; for no ſooner was ſhe in her Chamber, but Cyrus brought this ſtranger unto her whom Gadates preſented unto him: I think it ſufficient Madam (ſaid this Prince unto her in preſenting this illuſtrious ſtranger) I tell you, that he whom I bring unto you is Son unto the wiſe and generous Gadates: This I ſay Madam, will be enough to make way for his reception, as a man of moſt rare merits. It is moſt true Sir, replied ſhe, for to let me know, that it is the Prince Intaphernes, is ſufficient to move me unto a high eſteem of him: But yet (ſaid ſhe very ſweetly, and looked upon Cyrus) I know not whether I ſhould give credit unto your words: For Sir, how can I imagine that a man who hath fought ſuch a Combat, and overcome ſuch a furious Enemy as the King of Aſſiria, ſhould be in ſuch a condition as I ſee him? Since Madam, it is fortune (anſwered Intaphernes moſt modeſtly) which decides Combates, ſhe often makes them Conquerors, which ſhould be conquered: And to ſay the very truth Madam, I am a Debtor unto you, as well as unto the illuſtrious Cyrus for my victory; for certainly the reaſon why the King of Aſſiria is not my Conqueror, is, becauſe the Gods would not ſuffer a Prince, who is an Enemy unto the one, and a perſecutor of the other, to be fortunate in any thing: So that Madam, ſince I am Victor only by you, it is without any glory unto me: And if I did not hope to merit your eſteem by ſome conſiderable ſervice more than by this act of your vertue, not my valour, I ſhould be very ſorry: Modeſty does ſo well become true valour (replied Mandana) as I muſt needs extreamly commend you for ſpeaking with ſo much moderation of a buſineſs which might make a thought of vanity excuſeable in any other heart but that of Intaphernes.

After this, Mandana to alter the diſcourſe, leſt the King of Aſſiria ſhould be any ſubject of it, began to talk of the Princeſs Iſtrina his Siſter, and of the Princeſs of Bithinia, and to ask him whether Arſamones was ſtill reſolved never to conſent unto the marriage of the Prince Spitridates with the Princeſs Araminta? He is ſo far Madam from conſenting unto it, replied Intaphernes, as I believe him capable of any thing ſooner than that Alliance: And if you did but know his actions during the imimpriſonment of the Prince Spitridates, and the impriſonment of the Aſſirian King, you would not doubt Madam of what I ſay.

Cyrus hearing Intaphernes ſpeak thus, had a good mind to ſay that Arſamones was injurious, not to let Spitridates marry one of the moſt vertuous Princeſſes upon earth: But remembring that Mandana had ſome ſparks of jealouſie in her mind, he durſt not commend her enough at that time, and only ſaid, that Arſamones was unworthy of that favour which the Gods had ſhewed him, in reſtoring him to his Dominions, ſince he treated ſo ill his Son, who was one of the moſt illuſtrious Princes in the world. Mandana then would have engaged Intaphernes to tell her, how Arſamones arreſted Spitridates the ſecond time, how he got out of priſon, and why the King of Bythinia arreſted the King of Aſſiria? But he anſwered her, that theſe were things which could not be related in few words: For indeed Madam, ſaid he unto her, before I can acquaint you with the thoughts of Arſamones, it is requiſite I ſhould relate unto you the ſeveral intereſts of four or five perſons, who have not the honour to be ſo well known unto you, as that you ſhould deſire to know them.

After this Cyrus endeavoured to engage him only in a relation of the cauſe of the Combate with the Aſſirian King; but he could not oblige him to it, this Prince telling him that that quarrel begun at Babylon, during the life of the Queen Nitocris, and that the ſtory would be too long to trouble the Princeſs Mandana with the hearing of it. Intaphernes ſaying ſo, he rather augmented than diminiſhed the curioſity of Mandana and Cyrus, yet they would not then preſs him any further, conceiving there might be many paſſages which he would not ſpeak of before ſo much company, ſo the reſt of that diſcourſe was all upon things indifferent: But Intaphernes was found to be a man of ſuch an admirable ſpirit, that he purchaſed a high form in the eſteem of Mandana and Cyrus, and of all the reſt of the Princes: He alſo won much upon Doraliſa's eſteem, which was a thing ſhe never beſtowed upon ſlight grounds: But as for Marteſia, ſhe did not content her ſelf with bare eſteem, for ſhe did ever love him, thinking ſhe could not do any leſs for a man, who in conquering the King of Aſſiria, had quitted her of a neceſſity in telling the Princeſs Mandana a thing that would have extreamly troubled her: So that not acquainting him with the cauſe, ſhe lived with him, as if they had been of old acquaintance; She did him alſo good offices in talking very advantagiouſly of him unto the Princeſs Mandana: But to ſay truth, it needed not; for Intaphernes was very amiable, a man of great courage and wit, ſo that his preſence did much contribute to the pleaſure of the Journey.

In the mean time Mandana having obſerved ſome terms of friendſhip to be between Intaphernes and Marteſia, and being alſo very deſirous to know the ſequel of that Princes life, the beginning whereof ſhe knew at Babylon, ſhe commanded Marteſia to endeavour the knowledge of all paſſages.

On the other ſide, ſince it nearly concerned Cyrus, not to be ignorant in any thing wherein his Rival had an intereſt, he intreated Intaphernes to tell him all paſſages in Bythinia concerning the impriſonment and liberty of the Aſſirian King, wondering much that Hydaſpes ſhould not return with him, nor ſend unto him: Sir (ſaid Intaphernes unto him) The buſineſs you deſire to know is of ſuch a nature, as it is impoſſible you ſhould know it without ſome ſad thoughts. For I cannot acquaint you with the paſſages in Bythinia whilſt the King of Aſſiria was priſoner, but I muſt alſo acquaint you, how never any gave greater teſtimonies of his love than this Prince unto the Princeſs Mandana: Judge then Sir, whether I had not reaſon to deny the Princeſs a relation which I cannot make, unleſs I ſhould do your Rival and your Enemy a good office: Generous Intaphernes (ſaid Cyrus) I am infinitely obliged unto you for denying what I asked, ſince you cannot do it unleſs you favour the King of Aſſiria: I beſeech you keep ſtill in the ſame mind, and never ſatisfie the Princeſs Mandana's curioſity: Not that I am at all injuriouſly jealous of her, but becauſe it is the moſt difficult thing in the world to let the perſon whom one loves, know any expreſſions of the Rivals love: And I had rather Mandana ſhould accuſe me of ſome fault, than know that my Rival hath given any teſtimonies of his Love.

Then ſhe muſt never know (replied Intaphernes) what hath paſſed in Bythinia: No, I conjure you, replied Cyrus, but I muſt confeſs I deſire to know it my ſelf, and I know not whether my ſorrows to hear that my Rival hath had an an occaſion to ſignalize his love,be above the pleaſure of ſatisfying my curioſity.

As Intaphernes was ready to reply, a ſecond Poſt came from Ciaxares: But whereas the firſt came with thanks unto Cyrus for releaſing Mandana; this acquainted him, that Thomiris being recovered of a long languiſhing diſeaſe, did revive her firſt deſigns againſt Media, and that the general Rendezvous of her Forces was ſome three days march from Araxes. This news which had extreamly perplexed Cyrus, had it come during the ſiege of Cumes, did never trouble him now Mandana was releaſed: and he believed that the reports of her liberty would alter the deſign of that incenſed Queen, ſo that without any diſquiet at this news, his only care was to conceal it from the Princeſs Mandana, leſt it ſhould trouble her. In the mean time his cares of keeping Intaphernes from letting the Princeſs know all, that what he told her the next day before ſhe departed, was a cauſe that ſhe came ſooner to know it; for as Marteſia did divers times preſs Intaphernes unto it, he did ſo earneſtly forbid him, as this made her more earneſt to know it: But why Sir, (would ſhe ſay unto him) will you not be pleaſed to honour me ſo far, as to tell me that which I have ſo vehement a deſire to know? Do you think Sir, I do not know the beginning of your life? Believe me Sir, I have been too long at Babylon to be ignorant of it; and to teſtifie unto you that I do know it, I will, if you pleaſe, repeat word for word all that long and ſharp language which paſſed between you and the King of Aſſiria in time of the Queen Nitocris, when you argued in defence of the Brown Beauties againſt the Fair; and when he gave you ſuch words as provoked you to anſwer him in ſuch a manner, as made it appear, you had a heart too high for a Subject, or at leaſt for a Vaſſal.

Since you are ſo well acquainted with my life (ſaid he, and would have civily put her off) what would you have me tell you more ? I would have you Sir, acquaint me, replied ſhe, with your adventures in Bythinia : Alas, Amiable Marteſia (ſaid he) do not ask me that, for indeed I cannot conſent unto it. Intaphernes uttered theſe words in ſuch a tone, as moved Marteſia to think that he had ſome reaſons for it, ſo that her curioſity was much more eager than before. That which did moſt exaſperate her, was the Princeſs Mandana's prompting her to perform her promiſe which ſhe made to get it out of him : This Princeſs wittily twitting her with want of wit to bring it to paſs : and ſince it was in the Coach, and in preſence of Doraliſa, that ſhe thus jeared her, ſhe was even mad upon it : For my part (ſaid Doraliſa, ſeeing it pleaſed the Princeſs to torment her) If I did attempt to get the friendſhip of any one, as I ſee you have courted Intaphernes for his, I ſhould be extreamly aſhamed to thrive in it no better ; for as full of Charms as you are, I ſee you have but ſmall power over him, ſince he refuſeth to tell you a thing, which doubtleſs all Bythinia knows : I have been as ſolicitous Madam (replied Marteſia, and looked upon Mandana) as if my deſign were to Court the love of the Prince Intaphernes : As for matter of Love replied the Princeſs, I do not think you can be charged ; but I am ſure it muſt be confeſſed, that either you have very ill obeyed me, or the Prince Intaphernes hath very ill obeyed you. Alas Madam replied Marteſia, ſince I have no right to command him, I have no way but to be contemned, and have recourſe unto my prayers : Alas Marteſia (ſaid Doraliſa and interrupted her) It ſeems Itaphernes hath treated you worſe than I did imagine, ſince in my opinion it is a greater offence to deny a requeſt, than to diſobey a command ; and to ſpeak ſincerely, my heart does naturally ſo hate to be commanded any thing, as I ſhould much more readily pardon ſuch as reject my commands, than ſuch as deny my requeſts : Therefore , ſince you have requeſted, and requeſted in vain, it does extreamly touch your honour to be thus denied by the Prince Intaphernes. But Marteſia (replied Mandana) if you uſe no other ſtratagems to get out of him what I deſire to know, but prayers, you have not done enough; for there are ſome certain things which you muſt ſeem as if you did not deſire to know them: Did you but know Madam, replied Marteſia, what I have done, you would be ſatisfied with my endeavours. The more you have done (replied Doraliſa) the more you may be aſhamed, ſince none takes effect. I beſeech you Doraliſa, ſaid Marteſia, try what you can do upon him to ſcrue out what the Princeſs ſo much deſires: Were her Commands upon me, replied ſhe, as they are upon you, I ſhould have obeyed her; but ſince ſhe hath not done me that favour, I have no mind to rob you of the honour in doing her this ſmall piece of ſervice: And therefore ſince your prayers have no influence upon Intaphernes, go ſome other way to work; make him bolt out that at ſeveral times, which he will not do at once: Puzzle him with a hundred far-fetched queſtions, pump him, and make him confeſs what he has no mind to do: Seem ſometimes to know what you ask him, and as if you were careleſs of knowing more; be ſometimes mild, ſometimes ſharp: And when you have tried all ways, and all in vain, yet I know one infallible courſe to make him tell what the Princeſs deſires to know. Pray then inſtruct me, replied Marteſia; for I have done all that you have yet adviſed me unto, and more: Therefore I beſeech you inſtruct me with this deviſe, whoſe event you think ſo certain. I am confident, replied Doraliſa, and ſmiled, that the Princeſs will agree the moſt ſure way to know the ſecrets of another, is to truſt them with their own. I cannot tell, ſaid Marteſia, whether that be true or no, but I am ſure you never pumped out the ſecrets of any one by imparting your own. However it be (ſaid Doraliſa) begin from this very night to tell the Prince Intaphernes all the particulars of your life, eſpecially ſince the time that the illuſtrious Cyrus came to Sinope under the name of Artamenes, omit not ſo much as the long diſcourſe you had yeſterday with Feraulas: And if after all this, Intaphernes do not impart his ſecrets, I will engage my ſelf to tell you mine, which is thing I uſe not, but hate moſt of any in the world.

Mandana hearing Doraliſa ſpeak thus, could not chuſe but laugh, eſpecially when ſhe ſaw Marteſia was a little nettled: For though ſhe had wit at will, and was excellent at Railery; yet the very name of Feraulas having put her to the bluſh, ſhe began to ſtudy revenge upon Doraliſa, yet could not hit upon it; for ſhe was of ſuch an humour, as the names of Myrſiles, Andramites, and all the reſt of her Lovers had never reached her heart, ſo that Marteſia was forced that day to endure whatſoever Doraliſa pleaſed to put upon her. However, after all this Railary, the Princeſs Mandana told Marteſia in a more ſerious manner that Intaphernes his denial did extreamly augment her Curioſity, imagining that either Cyrus or her ſelf, or both were concerned in the relation he was deſired to make: So that Marteſia to ſatisfie Mandana, and to ſtop taunting Doraliſa's mouth, did bethink her ſelf of a man whoſe name was Orcames, of good rank about the Prince Intaphernes, and in great favour with him; from him ſhe thought to have what ſhe deſired to know: For at their laſt diſcourſe, he let her know how he was obliged unto the intereſts of this Prince, ever ſince he was at Babylon; and her greateſt hope was, in that Orcames was a man the beſt at relating ſtories in the world, and loved to employ his talent, and often when he had no adventures of others to relate, he would voluntarily out with his own. Marteſia then upon this hope of perſwading him to tell her all he knew concerning his Maſter, and other paſſages in Bythinia, did promiſe Mandana afreſh to ſatisfie her Curioſity, and indeed ſhe did not fail in her word. In the mean time, ſince ſhe could never talk with Orcames but at nights, it was three days before ſhe could perſwade him to relate the adventures of Intaphernes, though his inclination to ſuch relations was good enough: Yet ſhe did ſo handſomely tamper with him, as ſhe perſwaded him that it was requiſite the Princeſs Mandana ſhould be acquainted with the intereſts of Intaphernes, to the end ſhe might ſerve him when occaſion were: Inſomuch as Orcames who was ignorant that Cyrus had deſired his Maſter not to acquaint the Princeſs with any paſſages in Bythinia; and who knew he had related unto that Prince all his adventures, tho he never dared to let Mandana know what Cyrus knew: And he was the more induced unto it, becauſe he could not tell any thing which was not glorious unto the Prince his Maſter: So that Marteſia having fitted him to her deſired mould, ſhe went immediately unto Mandana, with whom Doraliſa was. Now Madam, ſaid ſhe unto her, you ſhall know the ſecrets of Intaphernes, at an eaſier rate than his knowing mine; for Orcames hath promiſed me to tell you them, whenſoever you ſhall pleaſe to appoint him. That ſhall be to morrow at night (ſaid the Princeſs) for then I know our journey will not be long, and that we ſhall come to our Lodgings betimes, ſo that I do intend to retire ſooner than ordinary, purpoſely to give him the more convenient opportunity for it.

The buſineſs being thus reſolved upon, Marteſia acquainted Orcames with it, and the day following, Mandana ſeeming as ſhe were weary with her journey, would not be ſeen all that Evening as ſhe did uſually, yet ſhe had a deſire to acquaint Cyrus with the true cauſe of that wearineſs ſhe complained of, and to let him be an Auditor of this Relation: But ſince Intaphernes was then with him, ſhe could not do it: Alſo, ſince her vertue was very ſcrupulous and delicate, as much as ſhe eſteemed Cyrus, yet ſhe would not let him ſee her, after ſhe had ſaid that ſhe would admit of none; for as for Orcames, the matter was not ſo great.

Marteſia then ſeeing that none but Doraliſa and Pherenice were with Mandana, ſhe brought in Orcames, whom the Princeſs received as a man from whom ſhe expected ſatisfaction of her Curioſity: You need not think it ſtrange, ſaid ſhe unto him, that I ſhould rather deſire to know the life of Intaphernes from you, than from himſelf: For ſince the deſign in my deſires of knowing it, is principally becauſe I would the more eſteem him: I thought his modeſty would hide part of his vertues from me, and that perhaps he would detract from himſelf, and therefore I deſire to receive them from you: But I pray, ſaid ſhe, let not your relation be limited only unto the adventures of the Prince Intaphernes, but I beſeech you let the Princeſs Iſtrina alſo have her place, for I know the intereſts of that illuſtrious Brother and admirable Siſter are ſo twiſted, as were unjuſt to ſeparate them in their ſtories.

Though I would do ſo Madam, replied Orcames, yet I cannot; for truly the Princeſs Iſtrina hath ſo great a ſhare in all I am to relate, and in all the paſſages of all Aſia, even in this which hath happened unto you Madam, in particular, as one may almoſt look upon her as the innocent cauſe of all the Wars. Indeed if the Queen Nitocris had not peremptorily reſolved that the Prince her Son ſhould have married her, perhaps he had loved her, or at leaſt not hated her, nor gone out of his Kigdom, and by conſequence he had never been an Enemy and Rival unto the illuſtrious Cyrus: He had never carried you, Madam, away; he would have reſted peaceable in his own Dominions; you had never come under the power either of the Mazares, or the King of Pontus: Crœſſus had at this hour poſſeſſed all his Treaſures; Armenia had not been tributary, the Prince of Cumes had been alive, and all theſe great revolutions in Aſia had never happened without the Princeſs Iſtrina. But Madam, I muſt not only bring in the Prince Intaphernes, the Princeſs his Siſter, and the Princeſs of Bythinia, but alſo the Prince Atergatis, and the King of Aſſiria: And to ſpeak truth, I have ſo many ſeveral things to relate which are ſo twiſted with one another, as I doubt whether I am able to wind the clew of my relation to the bottom without ſuch a diſorderly ruffle, as will weary you. The only favour which I ask, replied the Princeſs, is, not to do as many Relators do, who deſign to include many things in few words; for indeed there are many paſſages whereon aggravations are pleaſing, and ſometimes are neceſſary, ſo that I cannot abide this ſparing of a few words; and therefore do not confine your ſelf unto over-narrow limits, but freely impart all you know. Orcames being glad that the Princeſs commands did not thwart his inclination, he aſſured her that he would moſt exactly obey her; ſo that Mandana having placed her ſelf oppoſite to him, and cauſed Cuſhions to be given unto Doraliſa, Pherenice, and Marteſia; Orcames began his ſtory thus:

The Hiſtory of the King of Aſſiria, of Intaphernes, of Atergates, of Iſtrina, and of the Princeſs of BYTHINIA.

TO the end Madam, you may more eaſily believe that the Prince Intaphernes, and the Princeſs Iſtrina are accompliſhed with all the vertues which perſons of their quality ought to be: I muſt begin my relation with an Elogy to the Queen Nitocris, under whom they were educated, and of whom they were moſt tenderly loved: But Madam, this Queen hath ſo many, ſo great, and ſuch rare qualities, that if I ſhould undertake to deſcribe but a part of them, I ſhould want time to acquaint you with what you deſire to know: And to ſpeak the very truth, it need not be brought into any queſtion; but a Queen whoſe name hath filled all Aſia, is freſh in the memory of a Princeſs whoſe glory fills all the earth: I will not therefore ſtay you, Madam, with applauds of a great Queen, whoſe vertues I do believe you ſufficiently eſteem, maugre the violences of the King her Son: Nor ſhall I ſtay you long with acquainting you in things ſo far fetched as I ſhould have done, if I had not underſtood from Marteſia, how you are not ignorant of the affection which Gadates had unto Nitocris, and of her vertue in thwarting her inclination unto Gadates; ſo that I ſhall content my ſelf with reviving in your memory, that ſhe having no mind to put the Crown on that Prince whom ſhe loved, for fear of cauſing a Civil War in her Dominions, but married another whom ſhe loved not: And with telling you how ſhe baniſhed him who had the greateſt ſhare in her heart; how ſhe commanded him to marry; how he obeyed her; and how afterwards, to gratifie his obedience, ſhe intended to ſet the Princeſs Iſtrina upon the Aſſirian Throne by marrying her unto the Prince her Son. After this Madam, I believe you will imagine that the Prince Intaphernes, and the Princeſs Iſtrina were educated with all imaginable care, it being eaſie to be conjectured, that the wiſeſt Queen which ever reigned in Aſſyria ſince Semiramis would not neglect the education of a Princeſs whom ſhe deſigned for a Throne, and of a young Prince whoſe Father had ſuch a ſhare in her heart, and whom ſhe looked upon as one who was to be brother-in-law unto the King of Aſſiria: And certainly all her cares were not loſt; for I can aſſure you, Madam, that theſe two young perſons did much exceed their age both in beauty and ſpirit, and were the admiration not only of all the Court, but of all Babylon, which you know, Madam, is one of the greateſt Cities in the world. I ſhall not inſiſt, Madam, upon any particular deſcriptions of Iſtrina's beauty; for ſince the Prince Intaphernes is the very picture of her, your own eyes may be judg. I ſhall only ſay thus much, that never was any brown beauty more lovely than hers, nor fuller of attractive charms: As for her ſpirit, her phyſiognomy doth promiſe what it is to wit, great and noble: and which is moſt pleaſing, her humour is of ſuch a ſweet compoſition, as it gains her more hearts than her beauty.

Yet for all that, this ſweet and lovely Lady has a heart full of ambition, and ſo ſenſible of glory, as ſhe is ready to ſacrifice any thing, even all her pleaſures unto it. She being of ſuch a temper as I have deſcribed, her hopes were flattered up with being a Queen, and her mind was ſo blown up with thoughts of Grandure, as all her cares were how to pleaſe the Queen Nitocris, and the Prince of Aſſiria, whom ſhe was made believe ſhe was to marry: Since you know, Madam, what Antipathy there was in him towards her, though he had no other reaſon for it, but becauſe he would not ſute his fancy unto the will of any others, I will not inſiſt upon any aggravations of it: Let me only tell you thus much, that becauſe the Princeſs Iſtrina was of a brown complexion, he hated all the brown, were they never ſo fair, and hated Intaphernes only becauſe he was her brother. Indeed you know, Madam, how he treated him one day when they were hunting together, when the Prince Intaphernes more dexterous and happy than he, killed a Lion: But Madam, the thing which I believe you do not know, or at leaſt have but a confuſed notion of it, is, that whilſt all the Court wondered to ſee this averſion of the Aſſirian Prince towards her, ſhe made many in Love with her: And amongſt the reſt, there was a young Prince in that Court called Atergatis, who was moſt deſperately in love with her, and who was no leſs meritorious of her Love, than ſhe of his; the Prince Mazares who knows him, is able to tell you, that the Prince Atergatis is one of the moſt accompliſhed perſons in the world, and the beſt to make a faithful and diſcreet Lover.

As for his perſon it is pleaſing, and it's hard to look long upon it, and not love it. Since his Quality made him a Companion with the Prince of Aſſiria, in all his pleaſures, he was oftentimes a witneſs of that averſion which he had to the Princeſs Iſtrina: And I have heard him ſince ſay, that this his averſion was partly a cauſe of his Love; becauſe not being able to conceive how a Prince of his ſpirit could poſſibly hate ſo fair a perſon as ſhe, unleſs he had obſerved ſome particular faults in her, he therefore applied himſelf unto her, to ſee what was the reaſon her beauty did not captivate the Prince of Aſſiria's heart: ſo that ſeeing her very often, he ſaw her too oft for his quietneſs, for he loved her with as much violence as it was poſſible for any living to love. However, ſince he knew that the Queen Nitocris was fully reſolved that the Prince her ſon ſhould marry her; and ſince he very well obſerved the ambitious vein of the Princeſs Iſtrina, he durſt not therefore declare himſelf, and therefore ſmothered up moſt tormenting flames; but the oddeſt paſſage in his Love was, that he adhered ſo much unto the intereſts of the Princeſs Iſtrina, as he could not choſe but hate the King of Aſſiria, becauſe he carried himſelf harſhly towards her, though it would have pinched him to the ſoul if he had ſeen him love her.

Since at that time the heart of Iſtrina was ſwelled only with ambition; and ſeeing her ſelf looked upon by all the Court, as her that was to be Queen of Aſſiria, ſhe did imagin that none durſt preſume to look ſo high as ſhe: Inſomuch, as though ſhe did every day ſee the Prince Atergatis, and though he talked with her as much as he could, and courted her with continual trifling ſervices, yet ſhe did not perceive he was in love with her, though many others obſerved it, and though ſhe her ſelf had a good inclination to eſteem him.

The Prince of Aſſyria was the firſt that found it out, and was very glad of it; for he heartily wiſhed that the Princeſs Iſtrina had a Lover whom ſhe loved, purpoſely that he might have a better pretence for not loving her, as Nitocris would have him: And indeed this violent Prince ſeeing that the Laws of the Land required that he ſhould marry Iſtrina, becauſe there was none of her Quality in all the Kingdom whom elſe he could marry: And ſeeing that the Queen Nitocris was reſolute, and would exact obedience from him, as ſoon as the Peace with Phrigia was compleated, which was under negotiation, therefore he had recourſe unto the moſt extream Remedies.

Then he made a hundred odd Propoſitions unto the Prince Mazares, who would not hearken unto them: ſo that perceiving the Prince Atergatis was in love with Iſtrina, he ſent one day to him to tell him that he would uſe his beſt aſſiſtance to make him happy. Atergatis much ſurprized at the Prince of Aſſyria's Complement told him, that the only way to make him happy was to give him ſome occaſion of doing him ſome conſiderable ſervice: No, no, replied this violent Prince, I mean not to make you happy by your ſerving me, but by my ſerving you: I know you are in love with the Princeſs Iſtrina: Alas Sir (ſaid Atergatis, and interrupted him) I owe you more reſpects, than to have any thoughts of that moſt excellent Princeſs, but ſuch as I ought to have of one whoſe Subject I muſt hereafter be: No, no, Atergatis, (ſaid he unto him) do not diſſemble the truth, but confeſs freely unto me that you are the Princeſs Iſtrina's ſlave without fear of being hereafter her Subject, for I aſſure you that I will never put the Crown upon her head: Therefore for your own ſatisfaction, and to free me from the perpetual perſecution of the Queen, who would have me marry her; give me leave to ſteal her away for you, and put her into your power, yet ſo as I may not be ſeen in the buſineſs: I will find you a moſt ſafe Sanctuary for a Retreat, where you may wait until the Queens anger be over, and until you have got the Princeſs Iſtrina's Love. Sir, replied Atergatis (extreamly amazed and puz'ed to to anſwer the Prince of Aſſyria) I have already told you that I have no thoughts of the Princeſs Iſtrina, but ſuch as becomes me, though I muſt needs confeſs that I do infinitely admire her: But were it ſo that I loved this moſt excellent Princeſs, I would not, Sir, accept of this offer, becauſe it is not the way to obtain the love of that illuſtrious perſon, and becauſe it would hinder her of a Crown: Therefore Sir, whether I be her Lover, or not her Lover, I ought not to conſent unto your Propoſition.

Your anſwer (replied the King of Aſſyria) doth ſo much ſurprize me, as I almoſt believe my ſelf miſtaken in thinking you to be in Love with Iſtrina; for I cannot conceive it poſſible one ſhould refuſe the poſſeſſion of her he loves, though he come to her by the moſt difficulty and unjuſt ways in the world.

But perhaps (purſued he) you do not believe me, and are not perſwaded of my great averſion to the Princeſs Iſtrina: yet I do proteſt Atergatis, I hate Intaphernes, becauſe he is her brother, and ſhould hate you as her Lover, were I not in hopes of perſwading you to be her Raviſher alſo: I muſt confeſs when I do force my eyes to examine her beauty, I do find her fair: and my reaſon ſometimes tells me, ſhe has wit enough. But for all this ſhe diſpleaſeth me: I cannot abide her; and I am ſometimes very ſorry that I can only hate her, and that I cannot but only in my heart ſcorn her.

How Sir, replied Atergatis (who could not endure to hear her he adored, ſo vilified) can it be poſſible the Princeſs Iſtrina ſhould diſlike you, and ſtifle your inclination? How is it poſſible Atergatis (replied the Prince of Aſſyria) that the Princeſs Iſtrina ſhould pleaſe you, charm you, and move your heart, and yet not deſire to enjoy her by the way which I propound? Yet you love her; and I do plainly ſee it in your eyes, that you cannot endure I ſhould ſpeak ſo ſharply againſt her: Therefore I do declare unto you, that you muſt do one of theſe three things: You muſt either carry her away, or make her love you, or elſe make me hate you: For if I find you to be only a bare Adorer of Iſtrina, I ſhall hate you perhaps more than if I were your Rival.

As Atergatis was ſtudying for an anſwer, as good luck was, the Prince Mazares and others came in and broke off their diſcourſe, and alſo gave him an occaſion of quitting that place where his ſoul ſuffered the torments of a Hell.

But to ſum up his torments, as he was going from this Princes Chamber, he met with one who ſtayed him along time in talk of ſome buſineſs; and as he was talking, one of the Aſſirian Princes ſervants paſſed by him, and was asked by another whither he went, and he anſwered aloud, that his Maſter ſent him to ſeek a Prince whoſe name was Armatrites: So that Atergatis knowing this Prince to be in love with the Princeſs Iſtrina, and imagining that the Prince of Aſſiria ſent for his Rival to make the ſame propoſition which he had done unto him, he was ſo perplexed that he was forced to quit him he was talking with, and to go home purpoſely to reſolve with himſelf what courſe to take: I underſtood ſince, from his own mouth, that he was more perplexed than ever was any amorous heart: Sometimes he was glad to ſee the Prince of Aſſiria's averſion to Iſtrina; ſometimes again he was angry at it, and otherwhiles he repented of his non-acceptance of the offer made unto him, fearing leſt his Rival ſhould anticipate him: What a moſt miſerable croſs deſtiny is mine? (would he ſay to himſelf upon examination of this ſtrange adventure) I do love a Princeſs who knows not that I adore her, becauſe my reſpects unto the Prince for whom ſhe is deſtined does hinder me from letting her know it; and yet this very ſame Prince who thinks my felicity would be his miſery, offers me to ſteal her away for me, and put her in my power. Think well on it Atergatis (would he ſay) conſider whether 'tis not thy beſt courſe to return and tell the Prince thou doſt repent of thy refuſal: For truly ſince he is reſolved not to make her a Queen, is there any one in all the Kingdom that is more worthy of her than thy ſelf in reſpect of thy violent and reſpective paſſion?

But ſaid he, (and reprehended himſelf immediately after) canſt thou be ſo inſolent as to make any Declaration of Love unto her, after thou haſt cauſed her to be Raviſhed away? Take heed Atergatis, with what eyes a wronged Princeſs will look upon thee, a Princeſs who will think that thou haſt taken a Crown from her: Imagin that thou ſeeſt Iſtrina incenſed? Let not thy love eclips thy vertue? Remember that thou haſt ever thought, and that with reaſon, that whoſoever excludes reſpect from this paſſion, doth ruin it: and that to take away a Princeſs whoſe heart is not obtained, is the moſt unjuſt thing in the world, and the greateſt folly one can commit: Hearken therefore unto reaſon in ſpight of thy love, and follow its Counſels rather than the King of Aſſiria's: But alas, alas, ſaid he, if thy Rival ſhould not be ſo generous as thy ſelf, but ſhould accept of what this unjuſt Prince ſhould offer him, in what a deplorable condition art thou then? what good will all thy reſpects of her thou adoreſt do thee, ſince ſhe does not know thou loveſt her? And who cannot think her ſelf obliged unto thee for a thing ſhe is ignorant of? Examine ſeriouſly Atergatis, what courſe is beſt to be taken: If thou wilt not do as the King of Aſſiria would have thee, thy Rival perhaps will: If thou doſt carry away Iſtrina, ſhe will hate thee: If thou doſt not carry her away, another in all probability will. What canſt thou do, unfortunate man, in ſuch a ſtrange condition? Canſt thou ſuffer thy Princeſs to be carried away without acquainting her with the misfortune which hangs over her head? Canſt thou give her a greater teſtimony of thy eſteem and love, than by letting her know it? But alas (ſaid he, and ſighed) how canſt thou at one time acquaint the Princeſs Iſtrina, that thou loveſt her; that the Prince of Aſſiria hates her; that thou haſt refuſed the offer of her taking away; that thou art perſwaded thy Rival will not ſtartle at it: The leaſt of all theſe is enough to tremble thee into a Palſey in telling it, ſince it would make her both ſad and angry: Conſider what an angry buſineſs it would be to tell her all theſe things at once: Yet why ſhouldſt thou pauſe upon it; For though there were no other reaſon to move thee unto a diſcovery of what thou knoweſt, yet her intereſt alone is enough to oblige thee unto it, as her Friend, and not her Lover. But what phraſes canſt thou make uſe of to expreſs thoſe difficulties, which will ſo much ſurprize her? She hath ever looked upon thee as one who was to be her Subject, and and thou goeſt to tell her that ſhe muſt look upon thee as her Lover; and as a man who wiſheth withal his heart that ſhe may never be a Qeen. She expects the King of Aſſiria will put a Crown upon her head, and thou telleſt her that he would ſteal her away for another, and that he will perhaps find one who will accept of an offer ſo unjuſt, ſo contrary to generoſity, and even Love it ſelf. Nevertheleſs, the ſervice thou oweſt unto the Princeſs Iſtrina requires it from thee, and thy Paſſion commands it.

But yet once more Atergates, what words wilt thou uſe? I know not (ſaid he and ſighed) yet without more ado leave it unto thy Love to ſuggeſt ſuch as ſhall perſwade the Princeſs, that ſince the King of Aſſiria does not adore her, he is unworthy of her eſteem, and ſince thou loveſt her more than ever man loved any, thou doſt merit ſome ſhare in her heart.

After this Atergates being fully reſolved to acquaint Iſtrina of the paſſage, and to give her ſuch hints as might make her gueſs at his Love, he waited with much impatience until after dinner. But in the interim, his reaſon ſuggeſted unto him, that perhaps he ſhould expoſe himſelf to the Prince of Aſſiria's hatred; if it ſhould ſo fall out that the Princeſs Iſtrina ſhould diſcover unto him what he ſhould tell her: yet this did not divert him from his firſt intentions, and from going unto the Queen as ſoon as the hour, when every one uſed to go, was come.

Since the Princeſs Iſtrina did much eſteem him, and ranked him in the number of her intimate friends; and ſince the Prince Intaphernes did dearly love him, he hoped to find an eaſie opportunity of talking with her, either in the Queens preſence, or her own Chamber: And he found the opportunity more favourable than he hoped, for ſince it was then very hot, and the Sun began to grow low, the Princeſs went to walk in thoſe rare Gardens, made heretofore by the famous Semiramis, and which as you know Madam, being vaulted underneath, and ſupported by huge, high, and ſtately Pillars, has the reputation over all Aſia to hang miraculouſly in the Air, conſidering their prodigious bigneſs. The Princeſs Iſtrina, having that day made choice of this Walk, there being very little company which frequented it, becauſe the Queen not going, the crowd of the Court ſtayed with her, ſince it was upon her that all Graces and Favours depended. As for Atergatis, ſince his buſineſs was not there, he followed the Princeſs Iſtrina, and was ſo happy, that when he came firſt into her preſence, ſhe asked him if he would walk with her: He joyfully accepted of ſuch a favourable opportunity, and preſented her his hand to lead her out: Since it was a great heighth to mount into thoſe miraculous Gardens, which ſhe made choice of for her diverſion, ſhe was a little weary when ſhe was up: So that to reſt her ſelf a while, to the end her walk might be the more delightful, ſhe did ſit down in an Arbor made between four Palm trees, which being intertwiſted with each other, did make a moſt delicate ſhade, there being Seats of Cyprus wood which perfumed the place. The Princeſs Iſtrina ſitting under ſuch a cool ſhade, the Prince Atergatis had all the conveniency of talking with her he could deſire; For ſince there was no perſons with her of his Quality but himſelf, as ſoon as he began to talk ſeriouſly with the Princeſs, as if he had ſome ſecreſie of importance to impart, all the reſt of the company did out of their reſpect retire ſome diſtance from them, ſo that Atergatis, not to loſe ſuch a precious moment, Madam (ſaid he unto her with a trembling heart) I have a buſineſs to acquaint you withal, which I wiſh were already told you, becauſe it is moſt neceſſary you ſhould know it, and yet I dare hardly tell it, unleſs I have the authority of your Command.

Iſtrina ſurprized at the diſcourſe of Atergatis, did look ſeriouſly upon the matter, and endeavoured to gueſs at the buſineſs; but yet though her fair eyes did look ſeriouſly in the eyes of Atergatis, and ſaw them full of love, yet they could not diſcover the paſſion of his heart: So that not knowing what to think, I do confeſs Atergatis, ſaid ſhe, I cannot imagine what you can tell of ſuch importance for me to know; for ſince I have ever thought you my friend, in lieu of deſiring a Command to ſpeak, you ſhould ſpeak freely without, but ſince you do deſire it, I do command you : Then Madam, ſaid he, I will obey, and acquaint you with a buſineſs which will moſt ſurprize you of any thing in the world : O I beſeech you (ſaid Iſtrina then) do not yet obey me; but tell me firſt, whether it will be a buſineſs which will anger me, or grieve me, or elſe joy me; for you know that pleaſing things may ſurprize one, as well as diſpleaſing. Since Madam I am full of ſincerity, replied he, I muſt confeſs I have nothing to tell which I think will pleaſe you, but much which will diſpleaſe.

If it be ſo,ſaid ſhe,I pray tell me nothing,unleſs you can tell me a way how to avoid any great misfortune. If that had not been the cauſe Madam, replied Atergatis, I ſhould never have reſolved to acquaint you with what I now intend, but indeed Madam, it does ſo neer concern you to know it, as it doth concern the whole tranquility of your life: Speak then Atergatis, ſaid ſhe unto him, and ſpeak quickly, for I long to know your buſineſs. I will obey you Madam, replied Atergatis, but it muſt be upon Condition, that my firſt words ſhall not move you to impoſe ſilence upon me, but that you will ſuffer me to ſpeak out without any interruption, all that concerns you to know. Since you cannot tell me any thing which will vex me more than this incertainty unto which you have put me (replied ſhe) I will hear you as long as you pleaſe: For ſince I have a good opinion of your wiſdom, I need not fear you will tell me any thing which I ought not to hear.

I ſhall tell you then Madam, ſaid he unto her, that though all Aſia knows how the Queen intends you ſhould wear the ſame Crown ſhe doth, by marrying you unto the Prince her Son, and by conſequence all the Subjects of this Great Queen, ought to look upon you as her who muſt be their Soveraign: Yet there is one who not being contented with the quality of a Subject which is common to many others, hath a devotion to be your ſlave in a moſt particular manner. Though I did promiſe not to interrupt you (ſaid Iſtrina, and bluſhed) yet it was becauſe I thought you had ſome buſineſs of importance to tell me:

but Atergatis I do perceive it to be only a piece of Railary to divert me, and by Conſequence does not merit the performance of my word: I beſeech you Madam remember, replied Atergatis, that I deſired you not to impoſe ſilence upon me, nor wonder at my firſt words. But the more to oblige your audience, I will ſubmit unto all imaginable puniſhments, if you do not confeſs at the end of my diſcourſe that you ought to know what I ſhall tell you, and that I were unworthy to live if I did not acquaint you with it.

The Princeſs Iſtrina then perceiving that Atergatis had indeed ſome ſerious matter to tell her, reſolved to hear him without interruption, not imagining that Atergatis and this ſlave whereof he ſpake were both one: ſo giving him a new permiſſion to ſpeak, he began with as much fear as love.

Be pleaſed to know Madam (ſaid he unto her) that there is a man in Babylon who began to admire you as ſoon as ever he began to ſee you: and who without any hopes of being loved, or thoughts of leting you know his Love, doth ſtill continue loving you: but it is with an affection ſo pure and ſo free from all manner of intereſt, that I am certain until yeſterday about this time, he never intended you ſhould know his Paſſion, and yet he loves you in a higher degree than ever any could: and had he thought he could pretend unto the enjoyment of you without hindering you of a Crown, he had long ſince declared himſelf, and avenged you of the Prince of Aſſiria's injuſtice, had he thought the glory of being a Queen had not been the object of your deſires, doubtleſs he would have let you known that you do Reign as Soveraignly in his heart, as ever you can do upon the Throne of Aſſiria: He would have made it known unto you Madam, though he had directly oppoſed the Queen, and though the Prince her Son had loved you as much as he ought to do. So that Madam, the reaſon why this concealed Lover hath not diſcovered his Paſſion unto you, is becauſe he was as full of reſpect as Love: becauſe he thought it not his duty to make yon loſe a Crown, and becauſe he could never hope you could prefer the Empire of his heart, above a Kingdom.

In the mean time, ſince the paſſion of his amorous heart is moſt violent, he hath ſuffered and ſuffered more than ever any did: he hath ſmothered up all his miſeries in ſilence, and without complaint, and would ſtill have done ſo, if the Prince of Aſſiria had not yeſterday told him a thing which is the cauſe I now diſcover his thoughts unto you. For truly Madam (if I may without offence utter it) that moſt unjuſt Prince cannot endure you, and will never give you that Crown which he is to wear, though you deſerve it better than he. He is not contented with not adoring you himſelf, and with entertaining the moſt unjuſt thoughts in the world of you, but he would alſo corrupt this Lover which doth adore you: Yet Madam, ſince it is requiſite I acquaint you with the Prince of Aſſiria's injuſtice, I muſt tell you, how he ſent for him of whom I ſpeak, and told him that he perceived his Love to you, and proteſted unto him that he for his part could never love you, and offered him to ſteall you away for him, and all this with ſuch earneſt expreſſions, as it was rather a Commandement that he made, than a Propoſition. How (ſaid the Princeſs Iſtrina, and interrupted him) would the Prince of Aſſiria ſteal me away, and put me in the power of him you mention? If this be ſo, though he were King of the whole World, I would diſobey the Queen if ſhe commanded me to marry him; and if it were not for the Reverence I owe unto that Princeſs, I ſhould this very day let him know who thus ſlights me, that I do not deſerve it from him, and that I have a heart as great, as his is inſolent and proud: Can I believe Atergatis, that this is true? So true Madam, replied he, that nothing can be more: Then ſaid ſhe, I am the moſt miſerable woman in the world; for unleſs the injurious Prince of Aſſiria have not imparted this unjuſt Propoſition unto a moſt generous man, perhaps he will accept of it: I cannot tell Madam (replied Atergatis very modeſtly) whether the man do merit the attribute of generous; but I am ſure, that though he loves you beyond all expreſſions, he refuſed to enjoy you by any ſuch unjuſt way as the Aſſirian Prince propounded: His reſpects of you are ſo high, as he would not acknowledg unto him that he loved you; but told him that though he were, yet you ſhould never be ſtollen away, which put that violent Prince into ſuch a chafe, as he told him in the concluſion of their Conference, that he muſt do one of theſe three things: Either let him ſteal you away, or procure your Love, or elſe be hated of him. This laſt thing (replied Iſtrina very ſharply) is queſtionleſs the moſt eaſie of the three, and alſo the moſt juſt: Yet (added ſhe, and bluſhed, becauſe ſhe knew by the diſorder which appeared in the face of Atergatis, that it was himſelf who loved her) the generous proceeding of him who refuſed the Prince of Aſſiria's unjuſt propoſition, doth ſo ſenſibly oblige me, that I muſt conjure you not to name him to me, leſt being obliged to look upon him as a man who loves me, I ſhould be driven to ſhun his company: therefore Atergatis ſince he cannot chooſe but be a moſt excellent man, let me have the liberty of treating him with the ſame Civilities I uſe unto ſuch men, and never let me know his name. Oh Madam, ſaid Atergatis, was ever ſuch a kind of acknowledgment invented? Could ever any but your ſelf have found it out? For ſince the proceeding of him whom you would not know doth both pleaſe and oblige you, why will you not know who he is? The reaſon is, replied ſhe, becauſe I cannot know him, unleſs I reſolve at the ſame time to hold no particular friendſhip with him: ſo that to take from me a ſubject of ingratitude, I muſt not admit of his acquaintance. Then promiſe me Madam I beſeech you (ſaid Atergatis, and looked moſt paſſionately upon her) that you will gueſs at him whom you will not permit me to name: For if you will not promiſe this, I think Madam, I ſhall not tell you what remains, though it concerns you moſt of all to know it; for I am fully perſwaded, that the Priece of Aſſiria is at this very hour propoſing unto another, whom I know, to ſteal you away; who perhaps not being ſo reſpective and juſt as him you would not know, will accept of the offer, and prepare for the execution of his unjuſt deſign: Oh Atergatis, replied Iſtrina, I will promiſe what you pleaſe, provided you will prevent my being taken away, by naming him unto me, whom you think ſo apt to undertake ſuch violence againſt me: How Madam (ſaid Atergatis, retreating a pace or two, and looking fixedly upon her,) her) would you know the name of him that would injure you, and not know his name who gives the greateſt teſtimony of his reſpect and love that ever any could? Yet ſince you will have it ſo (ſaid he, and came a little nearer her) and ſince I am in ſome hopes that you will gueſs who it is, I will tell you that Armatrites is the man whom the Prince of Aſſiria ſent for after he was denied by that reſpective Lover whom you will not let me name. Alas Atergatis, replied Iſtrina, hath Armatrites accepted of this offer? he is no leſs violent and raſh than the Prince of Aſſiria, and therefore I cannot imagine any ſecurity for my ſelf, but by quitting the Court, and acquainting the Queen with it; and conſequently by dividing all Aſſiria, and cauſing perhaps a War between the Queen and the Prince her Son?

No no Madam, ſaid Atergatis to her, there needs no recourſe unto ſuch violent Remedies; for I know that he who refuſed the Prince of Aſſiria's unjuſt Propoſition, intends to have an obſervant eye over Armatrites: And I dare aſſure you, that conſidering his way of acting, you need not fear it; And therefore you need only to keep cloſe for ſome certain days in the Queens Palace, to prevent all fears for let me once more aſſure you, that the Perſon whom you will not permit me to name, had rather die than ſuffer any violence to be done unto you: his Love of you will inſpire him with policy enough to prevent his Rival. Therefore Madam, I beſeech you do not let it perplex you too much; for I ſhould think my ſelf moſt unhappy, if my intentions of preventing one miſery, ſhould drive you into another. I know that the loſs of a Crown is great, and will moſt ſenſibly perplex one whoſe affection is all upon glory: and I know alſo that the Meſſenger of ſuch bad news cannot be welcom. Yet truly Atergatis (ſaid Iſtrina, and interrupted him) I think my ſelf much obliged to you, though you bave acquainted me with nothing but ſad things: Then Madam it ſeems (replied Atergatis and ſighed) that you rank amongſt ſad things, that violent and reſpective Paſſion, which this unknown Lover bears you, who hath refuſed to enjoy you by that unjuſt way which hath been propounded to him, that the enjoyment of you, Madam, is the only thing in the world that can make him happy, and without which he will be ever miſerable: It ſeems, replied Iſtrina, that I have cauſe to grieve at an obligation of ſuch a nature upon me, which I cannot acknowledg, yet I muſt needs be ſo juſt unto him in my heart, as to wiſh him happy in recompence of his generoſity. But Madam, replied Atergatis, you do unawares engage your ſelf unto many things, he cannot without you, be what you deſire he ſhould be. The Princeſs Iſtrina having more and more cauſe to think that it was Atergatis who was in love with her, and who denyed the Prince of Aſſiria, did riſe up, leaſt he ſhould tell her more than ſhe deſired to hear, and leaſt he ſhould take the boldneſs to diſcover himſelf: Since I perceive this generous perſon whom I will not know is one of your Friends, I conjure you to oblige him to a Continuance of his Generoſity in acquainting me by you with all his diſcoveries of any unjuſt deſigns in the Prince of Aſſiria, or in Armatrites. Doubtleſs, Madam, replied Atergatis, you ſhall by me know all that he who adores you with moſt reverence, and loves with all violencies of Paſſion, can inform you of: After this the Princeſs Iſtrina beginning to walk called the reſt of the Ladies which waited, and took one turn in the Garden, to the end it ſhould not be obſerved that the Prince Atergatis had told her any thing which altered her deſign of walking: but her Soul was ſo troubled that ſhe could not take a ſecond; ſo that retiring to her Chamber, ſhe feigned her ſelf ſick, purpoſely to have the better pretence for her not going abroad. Atergatis at his parting from her uſed many expreſſions which confirmed her in her opinion; yet he ſaid nothing which moved Iſtrina from her manner of familiarity with him, ſo that he parting upon very good terms from her, he went away with much ſatisfaction: For though this Princeſs told him ſhe would not know the Name of him they ſpoke of, yet it did not trouble him: But on the contrary being of a quick apprehenſion, he eaſily perceived that the Princeſs Iſtrina's reaſon why ſhe did forbid him to tell the Name of the man, was, becauſe ſhe knew him: So that flattering up his paſſion, he thought himſelf more happy then ever he hoped to be; but his greateſt perplexity was his fears that Armatrites ſhould accept of what he had refuſed, and that the Prince of Aſſiria would take away Iſtrina from him.

And indeed though it was not known in Babylon, but on the contrary reported that he had not received the Propoſition as well as Atergatis; yet it was moſt certainly true, that he did accept of it with joy, and had executed his deſign, had not his Illuſtrious Rival been an Obſtacle unto him, as I ſhall preſently tell you how. On the other ſide Iſtrina's Soul was ſo dejected that ſhe was all ſadneſs: She perceived by what Atergatis had told her, that ſhe ſhould never be a Queen, and that her hopes of it were all quaſhed, yet certainly that was not it which moſt did trouble her; for ſhe did more bitterly reſent the Prince of Aſſiria's ſcorn than the loſs of a Crown; not that ſhe ever had any inclination to him, but becauſe ſhe conceived her ſelf more meritorious than to be ſo ſlighted, therefore ſhe could not chuſe but extreamly hate him, eſpecially ſince ſhe obſerved his claſhing with the Prince Intaphernes. In the mean time ſhe could not find out any remedy to her miſery; ſhe knew the Queen would not permit her to leave the Court, becauſe ſhe had an opinion that the Prince her Son would in the end change his mind. Again, if ſhe ſhould acquaint Intaphernes with what Atergatis had told her, ſhe feared that he being already incenſed againſt the Prince of Aſſiria, he might perhaps take ſome violent courſe; ſince that he would be out of hopes to ſee the Crown upon her head, which was the only cauſe why he ſtayed at Court after ſo many affronts put upon him by the Prince of Aſſiria: Iſtrina then not knowing what courſe to take, thought beſt to pauſe ſome certain days, before ſhe fixed her Reſolution; And to the end ſhe might be that Interim in ſafety, ſhe diſſembled herſelf ſick, as I ſaid before, that ſhe might the better colour her keeping within the Palace. But after a ſerious examination of all that related unto the Prince of Aſſyria, the generoſity of Atergatis came into her memory; and though ſhe then held him in the rank of eſteem and friendſhip, yet ſhe found no diſpoſition in her ſelf to deſire he ſhould not love her: for as ſhe hath ſince opened her moſt ſecret thoughts unto the Prince her Brother; I knew them, as well as if I had been in her heart: Nor did ſhe deſire he ſhould love her; but without any further reaſoning upon his paſſion, ſhe only conſidered the generoſity of his Action, without looking any nearer into the matter, or foreſeeing the Sequel.

In the mean time Atergatis employing all his Wits and Policy to diſcover what he deſired to know did underſtand that the Prince of Aſſiria had held a long Conference with Armatrites, that after it they both of them were very merry; and that on the Contrary he obſerved the Prince of Aſſiria would ſcarcely look upon him, inſomuch as deſcanting upon theſe probable Conjectures, he concluded that Armatrites had accepted of the Propoſition which he refuſed: Alſo he met with ſeveral Orders which both theſe Princes had given, that confirmed him in his Opinion; for the Prince of Aſſiria had ſent ſecretly to the Governour of Opis (whether he carried you, Madam, when he carried you away) And Armatrites had ſent moſt of his Train out of Babylon upon a very unlikely pretence: After when he had plotted how he might defeat the deſign of his Rival, he conceived the beſt way was to fight with him, and to make his Quarrel upon ſomething in which the Princeſs Iſtrina was not concerned; for ſince the Prince of Aſſiria was a Party in the Crime of Armatrites, he thought it no policy to publiſh it. Atergatis did ſee very well that ſince he had no certainty of what he feared, exact Prudence required that he ſhould ſtay a while and endeavour to make the buſineſs clearer; But being extreamly in love he apprehended more danger in ſtaying too long before he fought with Armatrites, than in fighting with him too ſoon; for indeed (ſaid he to himſelf) Armatrites is my Rival, that's certain; therefore though I look upon him only as ſo, and not as a Raviſher of the Princeſs whom I adore, yet ſtill I muſt be his Enemy, ſince there is not ſuch a natural antipathy in the whole Univerſe as between two Rivals. Then Atergatis feared that if he overcame, he ſhould then be forced away from Iſtrina; yet ſince he knew Nitocris did not love Armatrites, he hoped he ſhould not be baniſhed the Court for it; or at leaſt if he were, it would not be long: Alſo conſidering the carrying away of the Princeſs Iſtrina, he thought it better he ſhould be baniſhed from her, then expoſe her unto any ſuch miſery; So that to defeat the unjuſt deſign of Armatrites, he reſolved to ruin him. But to the end the Princeſs Iſtrina ſhould not ſuſpect the truth of what he told her, he cunningly got the Prince Intaphernes, to tell her in his preſence, as a piece of novelty, how Armatrites was the new Favourite of the Aſſirian Prince, and how Atergatis was out of Favour: So that the Princeſs applying what he ſaid unto herſelf, according to the wiſh of Atergatis, ſhe bluſhed ſo extreamly, that though ſhe was upon her bed where it was not very light, yet Atergatis perceived it, and ſaw that he was underſtood. In the mean time, without further delay, he endeavoured to meet with Armatrites the next morning, and ſeemed as if he had no deſign in it: And ſince it was that ſeaſon of the year when walking upon the Banks of the River Euphrates was much frequented, he thought to find him there: And ſince he was of a very violent and haſty temper, it would be an eaſie matter to find a cauſe of ſome Quarrel, eſpecially ſince he had ſuch a ſpirit of Contradiction. For truly, Madam, Armatrites was of ſuch a croſs diſpoſition, that if two perſons were in contrary opinions to one another, he would rather be of a third to contradict them both, then ſide with either.

Atergatis knowing this humour, did conceive it would be very advantageous to himſelf to intereſt the Queen in the Cauſe of his Quarrel, to the end he might be protected againſt the Prince her Son, if any need were, that he might not be baniſhed if he were the Vanquiſher, and by conſequence not be ſeparated from Iſtrina. Conſulting then with himſelf how he might effect his Deſign, he reſolved when he came to the Banks of Euphrates, where he found Armatrites to extol thoſe great and wonderful works which that Illuſtrious Queen had made, to prevent the violence of the River, by turning it ſeveral ways before it came to Babylon, imagining that Armatrites would be ſure to contradict him: And indeed Atergatis was not miſtaken, for as ſoon as they met, and as he began to commend that wonderful work, Armatrites trites checked him, and ſaid, that the Queen was rather to be blamed, and that ſhe had done much better if ſhe had imployed thoſe vaſt Expences in turning the courſe of the River, in fortifying the Frontiers of her Dominions: After which he began to condemn in general all thoſe Princes which buſie themſelves in publick works, and ſaid, that this which Nitocris had done,was not done for the ſecurity of the Town, and to make it more impregnable, but only out of the vanity of that Queen. Atergatis not to let ſlip ſuch a favourable occaſion, told him in an angry tone that he ſpoke too unreverently of a great and illuſtrious Princeſs, who could not be ſufficiently admired: Upon this Armatrites returned a tart anſwer, and Atergatis the like, ſtill engaging the Queen in his diſcourſe; inſomuch as he forced him to bid Atergatis meet him with a Sword in his Land; Atergatis did joyfully take him at his word, and told him, their beſt courſe was to take a turn in the Walks, and to draw out inſenſibly from the Company, leſt their Deſign ſhould be perceived; for at the beginning of their Conteſt, ſeveral perſons did hear them.Armatrites being very brave, he did as Atergatis adviſed him, and they ſeemed to be good friends,ſo that there was no ſuſpicion of a quarrel.

In the mean time,ſince they were both lovers of Iſtrina, and knew it, they both longed to ſee each other with Swords in their hands. ſo that when they obſerved there was no notice taken of them, in lieu of returning amongſt the people which walked, they continued on their walk along the river ſide, as if they were men that affected a ſolitary walk. Since it is the cuſtom of that place, for the Pages to wait upon their Maſters at the Gate of the Town, to the end they ſhould not interrupt the walks of the Ladies, by their uſual ſcurrility, the Pages of theſe two Princes were with the reſt, and by conſequence could not ſee their Maſters, when they ſeparated themſelves from the company. However, ſince theſe two Rivals had either of them a ſword, they were both of them well enough prepared for a Fight: So that as ſoon as they came to a place where the River turned, and kept them from the ſight of thoſe that walked, becauſe the ground in that place was very low, they began that Combate. I ſhall not trouble you, Madam, with any particularities of it; for I have ſo many other things to relate, that I muſt not inſiſt too long upon ſuch as are leaſt pleaſing. Let it ſuffice therefore, I tell you, that Atergatis was the Conqueror of Armatrites, his victory was deep in blood, and fatal to his Enemy; ſo that being both fortunate and brave, the great courage of Armatrites could not defend himſelf from four wounds, two whereof entred into his body. So that loſing abundance of blood, he fainted preſently, and ſtriving to make a paſs at Atergatis, he fell at his feet, yet he ſtrived to riſe again; but his generous Rival who was not wounded, would not ſuffer him, but took away his ſword; and having no mind to kill an enemy, who was not in a condition to defend himſelf, but told him that he would ſpare his life upon three Conditions.

The firſt, to publiſh that their Quarrel was upon ſpeeches of the great works, which the Q. Nitocris had made.

The ſecond, to confeſs he had a deſign of carrying away the Princeſs Iſtrina: And the third, to engage his word that he would never think any more of executing his unjuſt deſign as long as he lived; I could oblige you (purſued he) never to think any more upon that Princeſs; but ſince I know that Love is a thing not voluntary, I will not require any thing of you, but what is juſt and poſſible.

Armatrites being much wounded, and hearing Atergatis ſpeak in that manner, was much ſurprized, for the Prince of Aſſiria had never told him that he made the ſame offer unto Atergatis: ſo as imagining that his Rival came to know of his unjuſt deſign, either by revelation from the Gods, or by inchantment, he never denied the buſineſs, but confeſſed that it was true, he had a deſign of carrying away the Princeſs Iſtrina: he told him that he did well not to force him unto any promiſe of never thinking any more upon that Princeſs, maintaining with abundance of violence, that never any amorous perſon ought to make any promiſe in prejudice of his Love.

As they were upon theſe terms, the Prince Intaphernes who had been hunting that morning without any company but his own ſelf, came to them: and being much ſurprized to find them in that condition, he lighted from his Horſe and went up to them: who were as much ſurprized to ſee him, who coming ſuddenly upon them did hear the name of the Princeſs Iſtrina; and looking upon both Conqueror, and Conquered; Is it poſſible (ſaid he to them) that my Siſter ſhould cauſe two ſuch gallant men to fight? Atergatis whoſe ſpirits were incenſed againſt Armatrites for what he ſaid, and thinking that the Prince Intaphernes had heard more than he underſtood, did force his Enemy to confeſs before him the cauſe of their fight, and his deſign of carrying away the Princeſs Iſtrina by the Prince of Aſſiria's orders; but as he was making this Confeſſion, his anger made him bleed ſo abundantly as he loſt his ſpeech. As guilty as he was, yet the Prince Intaphernes was ſo generous as to command ſome of his men to help him, and to carry him to the next houſe, becauſe Babylon was too far off. As theſe men obeyed the commands of their Maſter, Armatrites expired in their Arms: ſo that changing their deſign, they went to acquaint his men at the gate of Babylon, whilſt Intaphernes and Atergatis, 'twixt whom was a great league of friendſhip they left the high-way, and went another blind one, that they might the better diſcourſe together; yet they went a while without any talking, for both their minds was full: And indeed Intaphernes not being able to conceive the myſtery of this ſtrange adventure, did ſtudy how Atergatis could come to know the Prince of Aſſiria's deſign; and why he ſhould rather fight with Armatrites, than acquaint him with the buſineſs.

On the other ſide, not knowing how he ſhould relate the paſſage, unleſs he ſhould diſcover unto Intaphernes the affection he had unto his Siſter the Princeſs Iſtrina, he was much perplexed; but at laſt, knowing his hatred unto the Prince of Aſſiria, and being acquainted with his generoſity and friendſhip towards him, he reſolved to confeſs the truth; and the rather, becauſe the Princeſs Iſtrina had ſaid nothing unto him which he was obliged to hide. So that he firſt breaking ſilence, I do not doubt Sir (ſaid he unto him as they ſtaid under a Tree which ſtood in their way) but you do much wonder at this adventure; but before I do particularize unto you the great injuſtice of the Aſſirian Prince, and of Armatrites, I muſt open unto you the botom of my heart, to the end you may not wonder how I became thus intereſted.

I muſt tell you then, Sir, and moſt truly, that you have ever been the man of all I know whom I have moſt eſteemed and loved : And the Princeſs your Siſter hath ever been the perſon, whom of all her ſex I moſt admired, and had the ſtrongeſt inclination unto : Thus, not being able to ſay that I eſteemed you becauſe I loved her; or that I loved her becauſe I eſteemed you ; I can only ſay, that both of you have poſſeſſion of the prime places in my heart. Yea I do believe, that if I examine the buſineſs very well (added this Prince very ſweetly) I ſhall find, that though I had not the honour to know her, yet ſtill I ſhould have been your Friend ; and though I never had the happineſs to have ſeen you, yet I ſhould have been her Lover : So that owing that high eſteem which I have of both your vertues, only unto your own proper merits ; if my friendſhip be a thing worth the valuing, you are not beholding unto each other for it. Truly Sir, (ſaid the Prince Intaphernes) I do ſet ſo high a rate upon your friendſhip, that though I be not beholding unto the merits of my Siſter for it, but only unto my own, yet I ſhould think my ſelf moſt happy to enjoy it. And if I have any thing to charge my Siſter with, it is becauſe ſhe never acquainted me with this noble Conqueſt which ſhe hath made : Alas, moſt generous Intaphernes (ſaid Atergatis) the Princeſs Iſtrina knows not yet ſo much as you do, nor do I yet know whether I ſhould wiſh ſhe did know it.

After this, Atergatis related unto Intaphernes his intentions of never diſcovering his Paſſion, unleſs the Prince of Aſſiria ſhould marry ſome other beſides the Princeſs Iſtrina ; and afterwards telling him how that unjuſt Prince ſent for him, what the Propoſition was which he made unto him, how he refuſed it : His deſign of acquainting the Princeſs Iſtrina with it, and to be ſhort, related the whole paſſage with ſo much ſweet ingenuity, that indeed Intaphernes thought himſelf much obliged unto him ; ſo that embracing Atergatis, I do find ſuch freeneſs, ſuch generoſity, and ſo much heroick ingenuity in your proceedings Sir (ſaid he unto him) that I do think it much more glorious for my Siſter to Reign in your Heart, than over all Aſſiria, ſince ſhe cannot do that unleſs ſhe become Wife unto the moſt unjuſt Prince upon Earth; and if ſhe will be ruled by me, you ſhall be happy Sir, if ſo it be that ſhe can make up your felicity. Atergatis hearing Intaphernes ſpeak thus, he expreſſed himſelf with ſo many tender proteſtations of friendſhip and thanks, as Intaphernes did plainly ſee the ſuperlative affection which he bore unto the Princeſs Iſtrina.

Afterwards they began to conſult upon the beſt courſe which was to be taken, conſidering the ſtate of things; for ſaid the Prince Intaphernes, it is to be conceived that the Prince of Aſſiria will ſecretly intereſt himſelf in the death of Armatrites: And it is to be feared, that having ſuch a favourable occaſion for it, he will revenge himſelf upon you for denying him.

But after a ſerious examination of the whole buſineſs, they reſolved that Atergatis ſhould not go into Babylon till it was night: That he ſhould lodge with Intaphernes, where the Prince of Aſſiria durſt not offer any violence becauſe of the Queen: That it ſhould be blazed abroad how the Combat between Atergatis and Armatritis did grow; becauſe the firſt of theſe maintained the glory of Nitocris againſt the other; And that they ſhould not at all ſpeak of the intended ſtealing away of the Princeſs Iſtrina, leſt it ſhould too much incenſe the Prince of Aſſiria; that in the interim, the Prince Intaphernes ſhould go into the Court to prepare the Queen, and to divulge in what condition he found Atergatis and Armatrites, and how he heard it from the mouth of the vanquiſhed what was the cauſe of the Combate, divulging alſo the generoſity of the Conqueror, and publiſhing that Armatrites was the firſt Challenger to fight. And after all this, ſaid Intaphernes, I muſt go into my Siſters Chamber: But generous Prince (ſaid Atergatis to him) what will you ſay of that man whom ſhe will not know? I will tell her, replied he, that ſhe ought to prefer him before all the reſt of the world; and that being ſo much obliged to him as ſhe is, ſhe deſerved the Prince of Aſſiria's ſcorn, if ſhe were not as grateful as Atergatis is generous.

After this, ſeeing it was late, and would be dark before they came to the gates of Babylon, they began to walk, and came ſo happily, that they could not be known by any who could acquaint the Prince of Aſſiria, that Atergatis was gone unto the Lodgings of Intaphernes. However, as ſoon as that Prince had carried him to his Chamber, he left him, Atergatis deſiring him to have a greater care of what he ſaid unto the Princeſs Iſtrina, than of what he ſhould ſay unto the Queen: But as he was ready to go out, a Page from that Princeſs entred, who having heard ſome confuſed reports of a Combate with Armatrites, did ſend to ſee whether her Brother was returned from hunting, and whether he knew with whom it was that Armatrites fought? Tell her ſaid Intaphernes, that I will ſee her preſently, and that I ſend her word it was he whoſe name ſhe would not know, who fought with Armatrites, and is his Conqueror. The Page remembring word for word what the Prince Intaphernes told him, went back to the Princeſs Iſtrina, and made an exact relation of the Prince her Brothers meſſage, and ſhe was extreamly ſurprized when ſhe heard it. The cauſe of her wonder was not only to know that it was Atergatis who fought with Armatrites and overcame him, and to know of a certain that it was Atergatis who was in love with her: But her greateſt wonder was, to underſtand that the Prince Intaphernes ſhould be acquainted with the conference ſhe had held with Atergatis; not being able to imagine, that he who would never tell her openly that he loved her, ſhould acquaint the Prince her Brother with his Paſſion.

But whilſt ſhe was diſcanting thus upon the novelty of this adventure, Intaphernes went to the Queen, unto whom he related the Combat of Atergatis, moving her to ſet a value upon his Zeal who had defended her glory againſt him that oppoſed it, and was vanquiſhed, aſſuring her of a truth that Armatrites confeſſed it before he died. Alſo, ſince at the beginning of this conteſt etween theſe two Princes, there were ſeveral witneſſe of it, the noiſe of it was ſpread throughout all the Court, and had come unto the Queens Ear: So that whatſoever the Prince Intaphernes ſaid unto her, being but a confirmation of what ſhe heard before, it was an eaſie matter for that Prince to diſpoſe her unto a Protection of Atergatis: And indeed, though ſhe had no inclination to authorize ſuch Actions, yet ſhe ſent to tell that generous Lover how ſhe wiſhed he had not been ſo zealous in defence of her glory. However, though ſhe was very ſorry for the diſaſtrous accident, yet ſhe thought her ſelf obliged unto him, for intereſting himſelf ſo far as to hazzard his life for her: Adding, that ſhe would protect him as far as juſtice and fittingneſs would permit her: But though Nitocris had this good opinion of Atergatis, yet the Prince of Aſſiria was quite contrary, and undertook to protect the Kindred of the dead perſon in ſo high a manner, as made it apparent, he lamented the loſs of Iſtrina's intended raviſher: And being a man of an infinite ſpirit, and penetrating wit, his fears were that Atergatis would make his vanquiſhed Enemy confeſs his intentions, and knowing it, would acquaint the Queen.

However Intaphernes meeting him as he came out from the Queen, and as he was going unto Iſtrina, this violent Prince knowing that Intaphernes had already ſpoken very advantagiouſly in behalf of Atergatis, he ſtaid; I know (ſaid he unto him in an angry tone) that you are the great abettor of the Prince Atergatis: But let me tell you that I am reſolved to revenge the death of Armatrites: Since Atergatis Sir (replied Intaphernes mildly) had not fought with Armatrites, but in behalf of the Queen, I had thought Sir, you would have been his protector; and I am confident you will, as ſoon as you have ſpoken with that great and glorious Queen: therefore I beſeech you Sir, give me leave to reſt in my own opinion, which e're long will be yours: No, no (anſwered the Prince of Aſſiria very ſharply) never imagine I ſhall alter my opinion; whom I love now, I ſhall love as long as I live; and whom I hate now, I ſhall for ever hate; therefore never hope that the Queen can make me change my mind, either in what relates unto Atergatis, or any elſe: And therefore by conſequence it is your part to conform your mind and opinion unto mine. I will ever conform my ſelf Sir, unto the dictates of Reaſon (replied Intaphernes) and will never fail in my duty to you or to the Queen: But Sir, I cannot ceaſe, being the friend of Atergatis, ſince honour will not allow it: Then be his friend (anſwered the Prince of Aſſiria very hotly,) but withal, be ſure to find me your Enemy. Then this violent Prince did leave Intaphernes, who had much a-do to keep within compaſs of his reſpects: But ſtriving with himſelf not to give any ſuch tart replies as he deſired, he expreſſed himſelf in as ſweet Language as his generoſity was capable of, and afterwards went unto the Princeſs Iſtrina, who expected him with much impatience, which was accompanied with a kind of fear and ſhame.

As ſoon as he came into her Chamber, he deſired her to go into her Cloſet, where he would try whether all Atergatis told him was true; and whether ſhe knew any more than he had diſcovered unto him: So that beginning to ſpeak, and looking attentively upon her; methinks Siſter, ſaid he unto her, that conſidering how I have ever lived with you, and ſince you have known the very ſecrets of my heart, and have not been ignorant of my inveterate hatred of the Aſſirian Prince, you ſhould have acquainted me how you reign in the heart of Atergates. Atergates (replied the Princeſs Iſtrina; and bluſht) hath kept his paſſion ſo cloſe, that though it be ſo he does love me, yet I knew it not, and therefore could not acquaint you with it: 'Tis true, I had of late a kind of gueſs at it, but I might perhaps be miſtaken in my Conjectures. No, no, replied Intaphernes, you are not miſtaken Siſter, if you thought that Atergatis adored you, and he hath given ſuch ample teſtimony of his love, as you need not doubt it: But Sir, I beſeech you (replied the Princeſs) tell me how you came to know ſo much? And whether Atergatis acquainted you with what he ſaid unto me in the gardens of Semiramis? When you have related your conference Siſter, with Atergatis (anſwered Intaphernes) I ſhall then relate unto you mine with him.

Iſtrina hearing her Brother ſay ſo, began to tell him very ingenuouſly, all that Atergatis ſaid unto her: So that Intaphernes finding her words concur with what his friend had told him: He acquainted Iſtrina with all he knew concerning his Combate, and his Love: And did ſo highly applaud the generoſity of Atergatis, and hate the injuſtice of the Aſſirian Prince, as he did what he could to make her love the firſt, and hate the ſecond. And certainly there was no great difficulty in effecting his deſign; for the Princeſs Iſtrina thought her ſelf ſo obliged unto Atergatis, for hazarding his life to prevent Armatrites from carrying her away, and was ſo mortally offended at the Prince of Aſſiria, that there could not be greater diſpoſitions both to love and to hate, than was in her heart. So that not reſiſting the deſires of Intaphernes, which were, that ſhe ſhould content her ſelf with the Dominion of Atergatis his heart, and reject the Aſſirian Throne; they conſulted together how they ſhould negotiate with Nitocris: But ſince they could not acquaint her with this laſt piece of injuſtice in the Prince her Son without extreamly grieving her, and without expoſing Atergatis to the fury of that robuſtuous Prince, if he ſhould come to know it, they could not reſolve upon that courſe; ſo that Intaphernes diſpoſed himſelf to return unto Atergatis: As he was ready to leave the Princeſs Iſtrina, ſhe kept him a little longer; But Brother (ſaid ſhe unto him, and bluſht) do you intend to acquaint Atergatis that you have told me how he loves me? I muſt acquaint him Siſter, (anſwered he) if I would be welcome to him: However, replied ſhe, I beſeech you do not tell him that you have perſwaded me unto any thing: I cannot tell (ſaid he, and ſmiled) whether I ſhould or no; for it would not be very advantagious for me to let him know that you would not give any credit unto my words: To ſave your honour, replied ſhe, you may tell him that I did not doubt of your words, but becauſe I ſuſpected his, for truly Brother, if you put me to the neceſſity of receiving Atergatis as a Lover, and as a declared Lover too, you will expoſe me to the greateſt perplexity in the world: I pray Siſter, ſaid he unto her, what would you have me tell him? Would you have me ſo damp all his hopes, that he ſhall never dare to tell you that he loves you? Or would you only oblige me not to deprive you of the delight in hearing it from his own mouth, which you cannot ſo pleaſingly receive from mine? You know ſo well Brother what I would have you ſay (replyed ſhe) that I need not tell you what words you ſhould uſe: All I require of you is, that you would not engage me into any Conference of open Gallantry, unleſs you would have me uſe that man over well unto whom I am extreamly obliged. After this, Intaphernes went out of Iſtrina's Chambers, and returned to Atergatis, unto whom he related all the paſſages between the Queen and him; alſo what the Prince of Aſſiria ſaid unto him, and what the Princeſs Iſtrina anſwered him; to the end he might prepare himſelf (when things were brought to ſuch a paſs as he might ſee her) to fit his talk unto her deſires. In the mean time, the Prince of Aſſiria uſed all his arguments to perſwade the Queen that the Combat of Atergatis ought rather to incenſe than oblige her: But he could not do it: On the contrary, the Queen took this occaſion to tell him, that he affected always to hate whatſoever ſhe loved, and whoſoever loved her; and ſpoke ſo ſharply, as he went out very ill ſatisfied: And he was that day in ſuch a huffing Chafe, and gave ſuch harſh language unto Intaphernes, as that Prince, as wiſe and reſpective as he was, did reply ſo ſharply as the Prince of Aſſiria commanded him to keep out of his ſight.

In the mean time the Queen to calm this ſtorm, ſent Atergatis word, that conſidering the violence of the Prince her Son, ſhe ſhould be glad if he would depart the Court for a while, until ſhe had appeaſed the Kindred of Armatrites, and till ſhe had ſweetned the ſpirit of the Aſſirian Prince. So that Atergatis out of his reſpects and obedience unto the Queen, prepared for a departure out of Babylon: But ſince he could not go, before he took his leave of the Princeſs Iſtrina, he intreated the Prince Intaphernes to obtain that permiſſion for him: No, no, anſwered that Prince, you muſt not do ſo: and it ſeems you do not perfectly know the perſon whom you love, ſince you do not think it requiſite to deceive her, and that way oblige her to ſuch a buſineſs as this; but that you may receive your deſired ſatisfaction, I will put an innocent Fallacy upon her: Atergatis then thanked Intaphernes, and told him that his fear was, that he ſhould eſteem him more than he loved his Siſter; However ſaid he, I am ſure, you have obliged me more than ever ſhe did. In the mean time, Intaphernes to keep his word with Atergatis, did perſwade the Princeſs his Siſter the next morning, to go walk in a Garden which is upon the banks of the River Euphrates, telling her, that now ſhe need not fear to go out of the Pallace ſince the Prince of Aſſiria had no more men with whom he could chaffer to carry her away: Yet Iſtrina did a long time deny him, but Intaphernes was ſo very earneſt, as ſhe did ſuſpect ſome hidden deſign in it; but her curioſity having got the maſtery of her mind, ſhe reſolved to ſuffer her ſelf to be deluded: And indeed the next day Intaphernes carried the Princeſs his Siſter unto the Garden which he propounded, where Atergatis by break of day had got before them, and ſtayed there until Evening: For ſince the Owner of that place was an intimate friend unto Intaphernes, he was very ſafe there; ſo that the man carrying Atergatis in a great and magnificent Cloſet, he watched there very conveniently for the Princeſs Iſtrina In the mean time, ſhe was no ſooner come into the Garden, but Intaphernes motioned to go and ſee the Houſe: But ſaid ſhe unto him, you propounded to bring me out to walk, and now you have no will unto it: If it were beſt to be in a Houſe, certainly it were beſt to be in the Queens Palace, which I believe is much better than that you would have me go into; yet Siſter (replied Intaphernes) you ſhall ſee ſomething in the houſe which you could not in the Queens. After he had ſaid ſo, he carried Iſtrina into a great Hall, from thence into a Chamber which looked into a great pleaſant Meadow; ſo that finding this Proſpective very delectable, ſhe looked out of a Window which ſtood open, and pleaſed her ſelf with the ſight of it: Whilſt ſhe ſtood there without any other Company but two of her women, the Prince Intaphernes opened the door of a Cloſſet to let in Atergatis; ſo that when the Princeſs Iſtrina turned about ſhe was extreamly ſurpriſed at the ſight of him, though ſhe knew the Prince her Brother did not bring him thither without deſign: I cannot tell Madam, (ſaid Atergatis moſt reſpectfully unto her) whether you will pardon the Prince Intaphernes, for the fallacy which he hath put upon you in my behalf; but I am ſure, I had no power to yield obedience unto the Queens Commands, that I ſhould depart from Babylon, before I had the honour to bid you adieu. It need not be doubted, replied ſhe, but that I ſhall much complain of him; for indeed I cannot endure that any ſhould deceive me, no, though it be to my advantage: However I ſhall very willingly pardon him this trick he hath put upon me, becauſe he hath given me occaſion of thanking you for hindring Armatrites from making me the moſt miſerable woman in the world. It is moſt true (ſaid the Prince Intaphernes, and interrupted her) and you are ſo much beholding unto Atergatis, that if you were the Queen of Aſſiria, I conceive you could not pay him the debt you owe him, unleſs you gave him the Crown: O, Sir, ſaid Atergatis, you make me ſo aſhamed at your language, as I dare hardly look upon the Princeſs. Since thoſe, Sir, who are obliged, replied Iſtrina, have more reaſon to bluſh for ſhame, than thoſe who do oblige, I muſt confeſs it my part to be aſhamed, for being obliged ſo much beyond my gratitude. Perſons of your Merits, Madam, replied Atergatis, do always ſufficiently recompence all Services that can be done them by their well acceptance of them: Therefore, Madam, if what I have done for you do not diſpleaſe you, I am well paid for the Service, and for all I can do as long as I live. As the Princeſs Iſtrina was ready to reply, the Maſter of the Houſe came and whiſpered Intaphernes in the Ear, and told him, that there was one of the Queens Officers aſked for him, and ſeemed as if he had ſome earneſt buſineſs with him; ſo that Intaphernes being gone out of the Chamber into the Hall to ſpeak with this Officer, Atergatis had the more liberty to expreſs his thoughts unto the Princeſs Iſtrina, though he had none which he deſired to conceal from Intaphernes, nor which he did not tell him: But ſince it is the quality of Love to love Secreſie, and ſince the words of a Lover when he ſpeaks of his paſſion would not be heard by any but the perſon whom he loves, therefore Atergatis was very glad of this opportunity; ſo that not to let it ſlip (tho he did not intend to ſpeak openly of his paſſion.) I render thanks unto the Gods (ſaid he unto the Princeſs Iſtrina) that they have not driven me unto the neceſſity of acquainting you the firſt time with a buſineſs which I could not long conceal from you: And for that the man whoſe name you would not know, is not unknown unto you, though he hath been diſobedient unto your Commands of never letting you know it. Truly, I muſt needs confeſs (replied Iſtrina and bluſhed) that you have not diſobeyed me, and that in reaſon I have no juſt cauſe to complain; yet I cannot chuſe but accuſe you, though I am not able to give a name unto the Crime whereof I do accuſe you: for indeed being ſo much obliged unto you, as I am, and eſteeming you ſo much as I do, I dare not tell you, that you have not ſpoken ſincerely unto the Prince my Brother, but I am confident you did not well know your own thoughts, that you were miſtaken. and took one word for another, in ſpeaking of the Princeſs Iſtrina unto Intaphernes, and that you gave the ſmall eſteem and amity you bore her, ſome names which did not ſute well with them. Do you think Madam, (replied Atergatis) that one can keep a Medium in their eſteem and love of you? Since there is a Prince, replied ſhe, who finds in his heart to ſcorn me, and has a great averſion to me, me-thinks it a piece of vanity to imagine that you ſhould ſo much as eſteem me: Oh, Madam, replied Atergatis, the man you mean deſerves not to be ranked amongſt men, much leſs amongſt Princes. However, Madam, ſince a miſerable man, who is ready to depart from you, ſtands in need of ſome Conſolation to keep him alive; I will believe, Madam, that you ſpake as you did, purpoſely to give me the happy occaſion of telling you my ſelf how infinitely I adore you. No, Atergatis, replied ſhe, that was not my deſign: But on the contrary, I did believe, that by ſpeaking as I did, I ſhould oblige you to take time in the expreſſions of your affection, ſince it muſt be time only that can well do it: I know very well you have done very much for me already, but ſince generoſity only might prompt you unto it, I beſeech you give me the freedom of doubting what you ſay, ſince there cannot hap a greater miſchance unto you than not to be thought very generous. Alas, Madam, ſaid Atergatis, I beſeech you do not attribute that unto my generoſity which belongs unto my love; take away from me that Vertue, if you pleaſe, but do not take from me a paſſion which is neareſt my heart; and ſince you, Madam, your ſelf did create it in me, do not deſtroy your own Creature, nor diſpute it with me. I do not ask, Madam, that you ſhould retaliate heart for heart, and ſigh for ſigh; all I deſire is, you would be pleaſed only to accept of my heart and hearken unto my ſighs: For truly, Madam, ſince the goodneſs of the Prince Intaphernes is pleaſed to intereſt himſelf in my miſeries; I may believe, he will permit me to conquer you in the name of that amity you bear unto him, to accept of my affection without any hatred unto me. If I were not to depart from you ſo ſoon, I ſhould wait until my eyes, my ſighs, my tears, and my ſervices had given you a thouſand teſtimonies of my paſſion, before I had made any uſe of my words to perſwade you. But ſince I am ready to depart, methinks, Madam, that a man who hath ſo long loved you in ſilence, may have the liberty of expreſſing his love without incurring your anger, eſpecially having ſuch a Preface as the Prince Intaphernes.

You do make uſe, Sir, of ſuch a powerful name, replied Iſtrina, that I am much puzled to find an anſwer for you; yet I ſhall tell you, that ſince I am a little harder to be perſwaded than the Prince my Brother is, I do not engage my ſelf to believe all that he doth: And therefore be not offended, Sir, if I ſuſpect your words; and to ſpeak with reaſon, it is to be thought that a Love which begins in abſence will not laſt long. Oh, Madam, (replied Atergatis, and interrupted her) you do me the greateſt wrong in the world to ſay that my Love begun in abſence, ſince if you did but know when it did begin, you would find me to be the very firſt of your Adorers. I do not ask any recompence, Madam, for all thoſe ſecret torments which I have already endured for you, ſo you will but be pleaſed to ſet a value upon thoſe which I ſhall ſuffer for the future.

I know very well, that ſince the eyes of all the Court looked upon you Madam, as ſhe that was to be Queen of Aſſiria, to offer leſs than the heart of a King, was an offering unworthy of you: And I can aſſure you Madam, that my intentions were to obey you as long as I lived; and had I as many Crowns as you deſerve, I ſhould give them unto you with more joy than I could poſſeſs them: Not that (unleſs ambition be the predominate paſſion of your Soul) I can ever hope to be happy, ſince it is to be feared, that you will not love a King who is not ſo unjuſt as not to love you better than a Prince who makes it his glory to be your ſlave: but the Queens authority forcing the Prince her Son to obey her, your own inclination cannot reſiſt her: I beſeech you Madam, be not offended at any boldneſs in ſpeaking thus unto you: If ambition were a baſe and criminal paſſion, I ſhould ſuſpect you; But ſince deſire of Rule is univerſally in the hearts of all; and ſince to aſcend a Throne, long and bloody Wars are uſually made; and ſince Kingdoms and Empires are ſubverted, I may very well fear that you will make no ſcruple of loſing me, that you may Reign; for I muſt confeſs you may do it without any injuſtice to me, ſince I have no right in the Earth to hinder you: And I aſſure you Madam I am not ſo inſolent as to offer any conſtraint unto your inclination; but Madam, I beſeech you give me leave to tell you, that though I am fully reſolved to be a ſlave as long as my life laſts: Yet I perceive I muſt not live your Subject. Therefore Madam, I do beg it as a ſingular favour, that if it ſo fall out during my abſence, that the Prince of Aſſiria does reſolve to obey the Queen Nitocris you will be pleaſed to remember, that you cannot aſcend the Throne, but it muſt coſt the miſerable Atergatis his life.

Since Sir, I am reſolved to be very ſincere, replied the Princeſs Iſtrina, I muſt tell you that I will not oblige you by the reſolution which I have taken of reſiſting the Queen more obſtinately then the Prince of Aſſiria reſpects her, ſince I do it only for the love of my ſelf; for believe it, I think it more glory to ſcorn a Prince that ſlights me, than to be a Queen by any unworthy way; ſo that generous Atergatis, you may aſſure your ſelf that you muſt never be my Subject, and that I ſhall have no other power over you, but what you do voluntarily give me.

As Atergatis was ready to anſwer, the Prince Intaphernes entered, but with ſo many ſigns of diſcontent in his looks, as it was eaſie to ſee, he had met with ſome bad news ſince he left them: ſo that the Princeſs his ſiſter longing to be ſatisfied, asked him what it was which diſcontented him? I underſtand, ſaid he, that the Peace with Phrygia is concluded, and that the Queen prepares for a a publique rejoycing and that the Prince of Aſſiria's marriage muſt follow preſently after this great Feaſt which is to be celebrated for this concluded Peace. The man who told me this, did hear the Queen ſay as much: ſo that thinking to do me a notable pleaſure in acquainting me with it, he ſought me out in ſeveral places, and found me here. This news did extreamly ſurprize Iſtrina, and much more Atergatis; who looking the Princeſs full in the eyes to diſcover the thoughts of her heart, did gaze upon her with extream attention: At firſt ſhe bluſht, and ſeemed a little moved; but preſently recollecting her ſelf, I am ſo ſure, ſaid ſhe unto Intapherrnes, of the Prince of Aſſiria's averſion unto me, and of mine to him, that be the Court never ſo much joyed at his Marriage and mine, yet I ſhall be in mourning.

Oh my deareſt Siſter ſaid the Prince Intaphernes, your expreſſions do infinitely pleaſe me; for what ambition ſoever be in my heart, yet I deſire not to ſee you a Queen by becoming Wife unto a Prince who hath wronged me, and who hath wronged me unpuniſhed, becauſe I was his Subject; and whom, if fortune had not put that difference betwixt us, I would make know, that the fate of Arms might perhaps make us equals.

Atergatis hearing what the Prince Intaphernes ſaid, was well ſatisfied, and was quit of moſt of his fears, but not altogether; for he knew, that the Queen Nitocris was fully reſolved to preſs the Prince her Son unto the very utmoſt: nor was he ignorant, that the Crown belonged unto her; that ſhe was moſt abſolute in her Dominion; and the ancient amity which ſhe had with Gadates, was the reaſon why ſhe would have him Reign in the perſon of his Daughter: So that not relying upon the words of Intaphernes and the Princeſs Iſtrina, he was in a perplexed condition, and he made a hundred ſeveral Propoſitions unto them both, to rid himſelf of his fears.

Intaphernes for his part, adviſed his Siſter to leave the Court, and never acquaint the Queen; but ſhe would not hearken unto that, telling them that ſhe owed more reſpect unto the Queen and Gadates, than to take any ſuch courſe: Alſo ſaid ſhe, it may chance ſo fall out, that the Prince of Aſſiria will ſufficiently reſiſt her, and never put me to the neceſſity of incenſing the Queen. Alas Madam (ſaid Atergatis) I beſeech you give me leave to tell you, that thoſe who will never enter into Combate, can never vanquiſh: and ſo if you will not oppoſe the Queen, it is as much to ſay, that you will obey her: I do aſſure you Sir, replied ſhe, I will not obey her. And if ever I be your Queen, I freely give both you, and my Brother leave to be my rebellious Subjects; but in the mean time I beſeech you give me leave to temper the Queens mind as I pleaſe: I muſt confeſs Siſter, ſaid Intaphernes, that you are very much obliged to the Queen, and that's the reaſon which makes me fear, that if ever ſhe perſwade the Prince her Son, ſhe will perſwade you alſo. Since I do know my own heart better than you know it, replied ſhe, I have more reaſen to truſt unto my own generoſity than you have: But to teſtifie that I would not have you ſuſpect me to be ſo baſe, as ever to marry a Prince who hath wronged you, and ſcorned me, I will alter my intention, and beſeech the Queen (provided you be preſent) not to command me ever to marry the Prince her Son, but that ſhe will pleaſe to give me ſo much liberty as to retire my ſelf: After this, both Intaphernes and Atergatis did return her moſt hearty thanks,and applauded her generoſity: But ſhe being a little diſpleaſed, that the Prince her brother ſhould ſuſpect her of any weakneſs, did give him a handſome check for it, which did the more confirm him in his belief of her generoſity.

In the mean while ſince it was reſolved upon, that he ſhould go unto the Queen the ſame night, he prepared himſelf to leave her: And ſince Intaphernes did moſt dearly love Atergatis, and thought that the more he engaged Iſtrina with him, the more averſe ſhe would be unto the Prince of Aſſiria: He conjured her to accept of his affection, and to look upon him as a man who of all the world was moſt worthy of her.

Atergatis for his part, was full of his tender and paſſionate expreſſions: But ſay, or do what they both could, ſhe would not engage her ſelf unto Atergatis further than terms of friendſhip and acknowledgment. But to tell you truly, I believe her heart did promiſe more than her mouth; and from that day, ſhe began to put a difference between the amity ſhe uſed to her friends, and the affection ſhe had to that Prince.

However it were, as ſoon as ſhe returned to the Palace, ſhe perceived that what the Queen had ſpoken was known to all the world, and that they began already to look upon her as Queen; for ſhe ſaw ſuch obſequiouſneſs in all that addreſſed themſelves unto her, as it was eaſie to know their thoughts, and that their own Intereſts did move them ſo to do.

On the other ſide, the Prince of Aſſiria knowing more preciſely than Intaphernes how the Queen intended his Marriage, did take a reſolution, which as you know Madam, hath been very unfortunate unto you, ſince if he had not left the Court of Aſſiria, he had never come into the Court of Cappadocia. However, without any further deliberation, his deſign was to leave the Court, to get out of the Kingdom, and to travel unknown, until the Queen his Mother had changed her mind, and that the Princeſs Iſtrina was married.

But ſince neither the Prince Intaphernes, nor the Princeſs his Siſter did know of his intentions, they ſpoke joyntly to the Queen, and beſeeched her to let them retire from the Court, and never to command them back: But the more they complained againſt the Prince of Aſſiria, the more Intaphernes was ſenſible of his affronts, and the more Iſtrina begged of the Queen never to marry, the more earneſt was the Queen to have them ſtay in the Court, and was more reſolved to make up the match which ſhe had ſo long deſired. Iſtrina added her Tears unto her Prayers, and Intaphernes was very importunate, but all in vain, for neither ſide would yield, nor change their minds.

In the mean while the melancholy Atergatis hearing from Intaphernes how all things paſſed, would not yet ſtir from the place where he had a buſineſs of that importence, but reſolved to ſtay a while conceal'd in Babylon, until he knew a little better how ſquares would go; but he ſtayed in ſuch a melancholy condition, that if Intaphernes had not cheered him up, his melancholy had been ſtronger than his Reaſon: That which added the moſt miſery to his melancholy, was, the King of Aſſiria, who as I told you, having a deſign to ſteal out of Court, would needs, to delude the Queen, appear the next morning at the Feaſt for the Peace of Phrygia, in a high magnificence. He ſeemed leſs fierce then ordinary, and more civil to the Princeſs Iſtrina: ſo that all the Court thinking he would obey the Queen, the noiſe of it came unto the ears of Atergatis and Intaphernes, who would not participate of their diverſions that day: And ſo that theſe two Princes were both of them equally ſad, though from different Cauſes. Intaphernes did write that night unto his ſiſter to know whether it was true that the Prince of Aſſiria was more pliant to her than uſual; but as he was ſending his Letter, he received one from her, which contained theſe words.

ISTRINA unto INTAPHERNES.

Brother.

I Cannot ſtay until the morning to tell you, that though the Prince of Aſſiria hath changed his behaviour to me, yet I ſhall not change my mind; and if I expreſſed any joys to ſee him leſs uncivil, it was out of my hopes to make him better know the averſion which I ſhall ever have unto him: Adieu, do not ſuſpect me of any weakneſs, and think always of my Generoſity as you would have me think of yours upon the like occaſion.

Iſtrina.

Intaphernes had no ſooner read this Letter, but he went to ſhew it unto Atergatis, who was both glad and ſad at it; for he was glad to hear that the Princeſs Iſtrina was conſtant to her firſt reſolution, but he was very ſorry to hear that confirmed which had formerly ſo much grieved him; ſo that there being a Miſcellany of theſe two Contraries in his ſoul,he knew not how to expreſs his thoughts by his words.

As for the Prince Intaphernes, he knew not what to think; for he could not imagine why a Prince who had behaved himſelf ſo harſhly, ſhould change in ſo ſhort a time. Yet in his anſwer to the Princeſs Iſtrina, he excited her to continue generous, and aſſured her, that he would ſee her the next day: Yet Madam, this Princeſs hath confeſſed ſince unto the Prince her Brother, that ſhe was all the night following extreamly reſtleſs, for truly Atergatis had exceedingly obliged her: Atergatis was very amiable, Atergatis did infinitely love her, and ſhe had no inclination to hate him. Moreover the Prince of Aſſiria's contempt of her, had ſtrangely incenſed her ſpirits againſt him: and his affronts offered unto the Prince Intaphernes did extreamly exaſperate her. But on the other ſide, when ſhe conſidered what Glory it was to be Queen of Aſſiria, to ſucceed on the of moſt Illuſtrious Princeſs's in the world: To command in the greateſt Town upon Earth, to ſee none but the Gods above her, and to have but a few equals in the whole Univerſe; ſhe found it a piece of difficulty to keep cloſe unto her reſolution.

As ſoon as inclined unto Ambition, Honour and Love did command her to be generous, ſo that ſhe returned to her firſt thoughts, and reſolutely defended herſelf.

But whilſt Atergatis, Intaphernes, and Iſtrina were each of them diſcanting upon this adventure; and whilſt the Queen was preparing to ſpeak the next morning unto the the Prince her Son, and to preſs obedience upon him: That Prince without any company but three of his men, departed from Babylon two hours before day.

It is not eaſie for me, Madam, to tell you what effects this departure did produce in the Court: It would be task enough to acquaint you with the thoughts of Iſtrina, Intaphernes, and Atergatis, unleſs I ſhould alſo mention the ſorrows and anger of the Queen, to ſee that the Prince her Son ſhould ſo much fail in his reſpects; yet ſhe diſſembled ſome part of her Reſentments. But as for Iſtrina, ſhe did ſo little hide her Joys at the Princes departure (though in point of honour, ſhe ſeemed a little angry) that all the Court perceived it; for ſhe being then but very young, ſhe could not confine all her tumultuous thoughts unto the Cloſet of her heart. As for Intaphernes, though he was ſomething more a Maſter of himſelf, and went as others did to the Queen, yet he was very glad to obſerve that the departure of this Prince did not trouble her. As for Atergatis, he had ſuch Raptures of joy as never man had; Such, Madam, as though he did never in his life write unto the Princeſs Iſtrina, yet now he writ to acquaint her with his thoughts, asking her pardon for rejoycing at her loſs of a Crown, and hinted unto her ſo many paſſages of Wit, of Gallantry, and Paſſion, as it was apparent; the heart which guided the hand that writ this Letter was infinitely in Love. The joys of Atergatis were the more augmented, becauſe he hoped that now the Prince of Aſſiria was gone, the Queen perhaps would revoke, or at leaſt ſhorten his Exile; yet he was deceived in his hopes: for be pleaſed to know, Madam, that ſince the friends of Armatrites aimed only at the ruin of Atergatis, and knowing that he had ſeen the Princeſs Iſtrina in that Garden where Intaphernes carried her, and having learned alſo that he was ſtill in Babylon, did advertiſe the Queen of it; ſo that the Queen having a moſt Penetrating Wit, and obſerving that the Princeſs Iſtrina was joyed at the Prince of Aſſiria's departure, and far from grieving at the loſs of a Crown; ſhe began to ſuſpect ſomething from this interview, of which ſhe had never told her: And her ſuſpition was the more violent, becauſe ſhe remembred how zealouſly the Prince Intaphernes pleaded for Atergatis, after his Combat with Armatrites. So that comparing all theſe Circumſtances together, ſhe deſired to be ſatisfied in the buſineſs: and indeed ſo ſhe was very eaſily; for ſince Iſtrina ſtood in fear of her, and did highly reverence her, ſhe had not power to deny this interview in the Garden; nor did ſhe in that diſorder ſo much as think upon any Colour for it. Alſo ſhe was much ſurprized when Nitocris asked her, why Intaphernes deſired her to ſee Atergatis; Madam, (replied Iſtrina and bluſht) bluſht) ſince Atergatis was ever a good friend both un Intaphernes and me, he deſired that I ſhould bid him a dieu, and I did not deny him. Fie, fie, Iſtrina (anſwe ed the Queen to make her confeſs) you need not ma a myſtery of ſuch a buſineſs: this meeting hath ſo other cauſe more than I know; but I will know it, an that more particularly from your own mouth. The Pri ceſs Iſtrina ſeeing the Queen ſo very urgent, did ma an indirect anſwer; but Nitocris ſtill preſſing her mor and not giving her time to conſider upon the buſine ſhe forced her at laſt to tell her in a tumultuous manne how ſhe was obliged unto Atergatis, acquainting th Queen with the Prince of Aſſyria's Injuſtice, in offeri to ſteal her away: and acquainting her with the genero ſity of Atergatis, and how ſhe was diſpleaſed with th firſt, and more eſteemed the ſecond. But all this di not ſucceed according to Iſtrina's hopes: for though th young Princeſs never told the Queen that Atergatis w in love with her, or that ſhe did attribute his action on unto the generoſity of his Soul: Yet Nitocris did ſm the truth, for ſince ſome flying reports went of Aterga his paſſion, ſhe had wit enough to conſider all theſe thin in the true ſenſe. But the worſt was, the Queen imagi ing that Iſtrina had of a long time known of the paſſi of Atergatis, ſhe thought, that perhaps this ſecret pie of Gallantry was the cauſe why the Prince her Son was obſtinate. Not but that ſhe knew the Vertue of Iſtri very well; yet looking upon Atergatis as an Obſta unto the thing which ſhe moſt of any thing in the wor deſired: ſhe commanded a new that ſhe ſhould dep the Court, and not return till ſhe recalled him. Inta phernes whom Iſtrina durſt not acquaint with what ſh had confeſſed unto the Queen, did beſeech her not treat a man ſo rigorouſly who had fought in defence her Glory: but ſhe abſolutely denied him, and told hi afterwards all ſhe knew, and what ſhe thought of Ate gatis his Love of Iſtrina; So that Intaphernes whoſe So was all Sincerity and Generoſity, confeſſed more th the Princeſs his Siſter did: for he told her poſitively the paſſage, and with ſo much ingenuity that the Que perceived ſhe was miſtaken in thinking that Iſtrina di know of Atergatis his love long before; So that being very glad a Princeſs whom ſhe dearly loved was juſtified in her Opinion: She did with more moderation admit of Intaphernes his aggravations of the Prince of Aſſyria's injuſtice, in deſiring to ſteal away his Siſter both for Atergatis and Armatrites: I do very plainly ſee, ſaid the Queen, that the Prince my Son is very unjuſt; But for all that Intaphernes, as long as he is living I ſhall ſtill be in ſome hopes of Iſtrina's being Queen of Aſſyria: And therefore I would not have Atergatis have any thoughts of her; ſo that though the friends of Armatrites did not preſs me as they do to baniſh him: yet baniſhed he muſt be, becauſe he loves Iſtrina, and becauſe he is a man too well accompliſhed for her to hate him. However, aſſure him, that if he will change Paſſions, and let Ambition take the place of Love in his heart: I ſhall ere long fully ſatisfie it by conferring upon him ſo conſiderable Government, that though he ſhall be baniſhed from Babylon, yet his Exile ſhall paſs rather for a recompence than a puniſhment. Intaphernes then offered to oppoſe the Queen, but ſhe impoſed ſilence upon him, ſo that it muſt be as ſhe would have it, and Atergatis, muſt depart, yes, and depart without a ſight of the Princeſs whom he loved: for the Queen did cauſe her Commands to be ſo ſtrictly obſerved, that Intaphernes could not imagin which way he ſhould procure that ſatisfaction to his friend, who had departed without any Conſolation; if Intaphernes had not promiſed him to preſent his Letter unto the Princeſs Iſtrina and oblige her to anſwer him. I ſhall not, Madam, both trouble you and my ſelf with a relation how the Prince Atergatis ſpent the firſt months of his Baniſhment: nor how careful he was in writing his Letters unto Iſtrina, and Intaphernes, nor with what exactneſs Intaphernes anſwered him, nor with what zeal that Prince ſpoke of Atergatis unto Iſtrina. leaſt ſhe ſhould forget him, and not enough hate the Prince of Aſſyria; for I ſhould be too long and tedious in telling things ſo little pertinent or neceſſary: But give me leave to tell you, Madam, how one that was Couſin to Armatrites, hearing that Atergatis did often write unto Intaphernes; he did advertiſe the Queen of it, but he was not ſo cunning as to keep it from the knowledg of Intaphernes, therefore ſuc ſharp language paſſed between them as they fell to blows: And Intaphernes fought with ſo much courage, that afte he had killed his Enemy, he defended himſelf moſt ſtou- ly againſt three of his men, who ſeeing their Maſte dead, would needs be revenged. But though they were valiant, yet he killed one of them, and wounded anothe and put the third to flight, having none but the God and himſelf; for he met him with whom he fought in long walk upon the Bank of Euphrates, at the end o which he had left his men, and they could not be ſo ſoo in with him, as he was Conqueror: 'Tis true, his Victor was dearly bought, for he was dangerouſly wounded i two places: But ſince the Chirurgeons did ſay there wa no danger in his wounds, it may very well be ſaid, tha the glory he got in the Combat was worth more tha the blood he loſt.

In the mean time, the Queen perceiving how zealou Intaphernes was in all things that related unto Atergati ſhe reſolved to continue his Baniſhment, not only as lon as the Prince her Son was abſent, but alſo as long as tha unjuſt Prince would not marry Iſtrina: and yet ſhe wa very favourable unto Atergatis in a hundred things of an other nature, both to his perſon and other his relation Thus this unfortunate Lover, not ſeeing any period of hi baniſhment, but the marriage of her he loved, with Prince whom he hated, did lead the moſt miſerable li of any man in the world; yet he received ſo much con ſolation as to have ſome Letters from Iſtrina; but he re ceived ſo much ſorrow alſo as to know how that wi Princeſs told the Queen, that the affection of Atergat was very indifferent into her: yet ſhe told him, how ſh beſeeched her to ſend her back unto the Prince her Fa ther, to the end that ſhe ſhould not hinder the return o the Prince her Son; but ſhe durſt ſay no more, yet ſh explained her ſelf a little more clearly a few days afte the Combat of Intaphernes: for the Prince of Aſſiria ſe one of his men ſecretly into Babylon to ſcatter ſeveral Tick ets in the Town, by which he declared that he woul never return into Aſſiria until the Princeſs Iſtrina wa married, and beſeeching the Queen not to marry her un Atergatis, for ſome reaſons which he would give her when ſhe had put him into a condition to return : So that this Prince by this means revenged himſelf upon Atergatis, who would not ſuffer him to ſteal away Iſtrina for him; for the Queen upon this did confirm her reſolutions of keeping that Prince ſtill in Exile.

In the mean time, the Princeſs Iſtrina, who till now could never let it be known that ſhe did not hate Atergatis, began openly to inveigh againſt the Prince of Aſſiria's Injuſtice, who did not only affront her in his refuſal of Marriage, but did moſt Tyrannically preſcribe things which did not belong unto him, and ſuch things as upon which the whole tranquillity of her life depended. But the more ſhe complained, the more ſhe retarded the return of Atergatis, who hearing of the paſſages in Babylon, was grieved to the very Soul : yet there was ſuch reſentments in the heart of Iſtrina, as would have joyed his Soul had he known them; for certainly the Prince of Aſſiria's Tickets, and the proceedings of the Queen did make her reſolve to look upon Atergatis as the only man in the world, who did merit her affection. But,Madam,not to abuſe your patience any longer, I muſt in a very few words ſlight over all the petty paſſages in Babylon, whilſt the Prince of Aſſiria under the name of Philidaſpes was a Lover of you, and a Hater of the Illuſtrious Artamenes at Synope : for it would take too much time to expreſs how ſad the Queen was, becauſe ſhe knew not what was become of the Prince her Son, and to expreſs the ſad heart of Atergatis at his abſence from her he Loved : the vexation of Iſtrina to ſee the abſent Prince of Aſſiria an Obſtacle unto her happineſs : How angry Intaphernes was to have an Enemy,of whom he neither could nor durſt be revenged,and to what a trouble the Prince Mazares was put unto, in being an univerſal Mediator to appeaſe the Queen whenſoever ſhe was incenſed, either againſt the Prince her Son,or againſt Intaphernes,or againſt Iſtrina,or againſt Atergatis. Therefore,Madam,without more mention of what paſſed in Babylon,whilſt the pretended Philidaſpes followed the King your Father in the Wars, which then he had againſt the Kings of Pontus and Phrygia,and whilſt the Voyage of the Illuſtrious Artamenes to Thomyris laſted ; I ſhall repreſent unto you only ſuch things as happened after the Queen knew that the Prince her Son had carried you away. For truly, Madam, I owe this teſtimony unto the vertue of that great Princeſs, as I muſt aſſure you, that this News did extreamly grieve her, as, but for the Prince Mazares, ſhe had diſinherited the Prince her Son from the Crown: Then did ſhe repent that ever ſhe croſſed the inclinations of Iſtrina, and did not only give her moſt tender and obliging language, but the Prince Intaphernes alſo who was gone a little before into Bythinia, where Arſamones was waging War to recover the Crown of his Anceſtors. In the mean while, Atergatis who did intereſt himſelf unto every thing which concerned Intaphernes, did follow him to the War, deſiring ſince he was Exiled, to paſs his time in the Service of that Prince unto whom Iſtrina had relation. I am obliged, Madam, to acquaint you alſo, that if this great Queen had lived ſhe had beſieged Opis, whither the Prince her Son had conveyed you, aſſuring you that her only deſign in it was to reſtore you unto the King your Father: But, Madam, death prevented the execution of her generous Deſign, which would have ſaved many a ſorrow. But ſince this great Princeſs at the end of her days lookt pale death in his grim face, without any fear, and kept her reaſon clear unto her very laſt breath, ſhe would not leave the Princeſs Iſtrina expoſed unto the violences of the new King; but knowing how much I ever devoted my ſelf unto the Service of the Prince Intaphernes, ſhe did me the honor to make choice of me with the truſt of the Princeſs Iſtrina, appointing me to convoy her into Bythinia as ſoon as ſhe was dead; and having no mind, ſhe ſhould go unto the Prince her Father, ſince he being within the Dominions of the Prince her Son, he ſhould offer any violence unto her: Therefore, making choice of a more ſafe Sanctuary, ſhe would have me carry her unto Arſamones, with whom, as I already told you, were the Princes Intaphernes and Atergatis, who both of them had highly ſignalized themſelves in that War: ſo that, Madam, I accepting of this charge which the Queen committed unto me, and promiſing moſt faithfully to perform my Truſt, this great Queen of ever honoured memory was no ſooner expired, but I prepared for obedience.

The Prince Mazares, who infinitely loved Intaphernes, eſteemed Atergatis, and honoured Iſtrina, did for the more ſafety of this Princeſs give me a Convoy, himſelf waiting upon her ſome forty Furlongs out of Babylon, I cannot tell you, Madam, how great was the grief of the Princeſs Iſtrina for the death of Nitocris, for I have not words apt enough to expreſs it: but I can tell you, that the looking upon the Prince of Aſſiria as the cauſe of her loſs by reaſon of griefe which your carrying away cauſed, did curſe him with as many imprecations as you your ſelf could do, however, as time is the beſt ſalve for all ſorrows, ſo when we came into Bythinia, her tears were a little dryed up, and her ſorrows ſlackened.

As ſoon as we were upon the Frontiers of that Kingdom, and quite out of the King of Aſſiria's power, the Princeſs did ſtay to reſt her ſelf, and to give me time to acquaint the Prince Intaphernes and the Prince Atergatis with her Arrival: You may well imagine Madam, that the bad news of Nitocris's death was not ſweetned by this, eſpecially to Atergatis, though he was to ſee Iſtrina, beyond all his hopes; for Madam, be pleaſed to know, that the Meſſenger whom I ſent unto theſe two Princes, who were then at Calcedonia, where the Court was, did find them ready to come unto Babylon in a diſguiſe. purpoſely for the ſafety of the Princeſs Iſtrina, not knowing how the Queens prudence provided for it.

So that being now out of all fears of the new Aſſirian Kings violence, and hearing that they ſhould ſee her much ſooner then they hoped, the ſorrows of Intaphernes vaniſhed, and much more the ſorrows of Atergatis, ſince he was not ſo much obliged unto the Queen by reaſon of his Exile: However to loſe no time, in lieu of anſwering Iſtrina's Letters and mine, they went in all haſt unto Arſamones, to acquaint him with Iſtrina's Arrival, and to deſire Sanctuary for her: ſince Arſamones was much obliged unto them, he was very glad of ſuch an occaſion to gratiſy the ſervices they had done him in the Wars: ſo that conſenting very cheerfully unto their deſires, he acquainted the Queen of Bythinia with it, the very ſame hour, who for the more honour of the Princeſs Iſtrina, did ſend her own Coach to meet her a days journey from Clacedonia, and alſo a particular Complement un to Iſtrina.

On the other ſide, Intaphernes and Atergatis having a earneſt to ſee her, did make incredible haſt unto th place where ſhe was, Friendſhip and Love being ſhar ſpurs unto both thoſe Princes, who did very pleaſingly ſurprize; for we could not imagine it poſſible for the to negotiate with Arſamones, and be there ſo ſoon. It not an eaſie matter for me to tell you, Madam, how infinitely theſe three perſons were joyed: Intaphernes an Atergatis let theirs appear, but as for Iſtrina, the part concealed hers.

Their converſation yet began in tears, but yet thei Joys to ſee each other, diſſipating all clouds of ſorrow they began to relate all the paſſages which hapned ſinc they ſaw each other; they complained againſt the Kin of Aſſiria with ſuch kind of aggravations as ſometimes u eth to comfort ſuch as have freedom to complain of an Injuſtice done them. Yet they did not vent all the thoughts, for the paſſion of Atergatis forged a thouſan which he never uttered, yet he had ſo much ſatisfaction to eaſe himſelf and his heart a little; for after they ha talked a long time with Iſtrina, Intaphernes being deſirou to confer with me, did draw me aſide, and left Atergatis liberty to vent his paſſion; I know not Madam, ſaid he u to her, whether you remember thoſe cruel words yo gave me at Babylon, when you told me that a Paſſi which began by abſence never laſted long. So many cru adventures have hapned ſince, replied ſhe, that I do remember what we ſaid; but (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled) if I d ſay ſo, I think that I did not ſpeak out of reaſon; for ſinc abſence doth often deſtroy the moſt firm grounded affec ons, well may it deſtroy a green beginning one.

It ſeems then Madam, replied Atergatis, that my a fections to you is not of ſuch a Nature as Time and A ſence can deſtroy; ſince it is moſt certain I do ove adore you more now, then when I left you; and I may tr ly ſay, that there was not a day paſſed over, where my Love did not kindle new fires to burn my heart, a make me more miſerable: For the more of the world ſaw, the more I knew how to value your worth. And t

Co

Court of Bythinia, though full of excellent Beauties, hath let me know, that you are not only a perſon of moſt the abſolute perfection in Aſſiria, but in the world, ſince I am moſt ſure that all the places I ever came in could not produce one comparable.

Though applauds be very pleaſing, replied Iſtrina, principally from a man whom one eſteems, yet I beſeech you be a little ſparing of them, leaſt I ſhould ſuſpect you of flattery, and doubt of what you ſhall hereafter tell me: Provided Madam, you do not doubt my affection, replied Atergatis, I do not fear your doubting the truth of my words, when I commend you more than ever I did any; for truly Madam, when I tell you that you are the faireſt perſon of the whole world, if you will not believe me, I beſeech you believe your Glaſs. If I tell you that you have more wit than thoſe who have the moſt, that very ſame wit which knows others ſo perfectly, will not permit you to doubt of what I ſay, nor ſuffer you to accuſe me of any untruth when I extol all your vertues; And if I were ſure you would as well believe I love you, as you muſt needs believe your ſelf lovely, I ſhould be much happier then I am: and indeed Madam, unleſs you do not eſteem me at all, you cannot chooſe but think that I do admire you.

I do aſſure you Sir, replied Iſtrina, I do ſo little know my ſelf, as I cannot tell whether one doth me right or wrong; when they eſteem me much, or not at all: However, I do once more intreat you not to commend me over much, and I do conjure you not to tell me any more of your affection; for (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled) though I would believe you loved me, yet I ought not to give credit unto your words, therefore, Sir, I intreat you to live with me as the Prince my brother doth; for I do aſſure you that though he does not tell me that he loves me, yet I am very confident of his affection.

Oh Madam, ſaid Atergatis, Love and Friendſhip are things very different: Friendſhip may be dumb, and indeed it were an odd thing, that all ones Friends ſhould ſtill be telling that they love; but as for love Madam, it cannot be ſo: Indeed it is ſo far from being dumb as you would have it, that it muſt be eloquent; and aggravations are ſo natural unto it, as one may ſay, it is above all aggravations, ſince certainly one can never love too much: It is a crime to talk of any thing but his paſſion, when a Lover is ſo happy as to be alone with the perſon he adores Judge therefore, Madam, I beſeech you, whether I have not cauſe to complain againſt that rigorous command of not talking unto you of my paſſion; and whether I have not reaſon to make my Complaints unto the Prince Intaphernes: I had rather you made your Complaints, Sir, replied ſhe, unto my Brother than unto me; yet I hope, replied he, that he would move you to do me juſtice. However, I beſeech you, give me leave to aſk you, Madam, whether after you once intended thoughts of Reigning over all Aſſiria, and the thoughts of having infinite multitudes for your Subjects, you can be ſatisfied with having only the unfortunate Atergatis for your ſlave?

As Iſtrina was ready to reply, the Prince Intaphernes came unto them, and told the Princeſs his Siſter that ſhe was to go unto the Court, to the end ſhe might know how to behave her ſelf: He made a ſhort deſcription of the haſty and imperious humour of Arſamones, of the vertue and prudence of the Queen Arbiana; but when he came to mention the Princeſs of Bythinia, he applauded her ſo highly, and in ſuch a manner, as if he feared he could never commend her enough; inſomuch as Iſtrina imagined that he loved her as much as he eſteemed her. Did I not know (ſaid ſhe unto the Prince her Brother) that you have been always in the Army, ſince you came into Bythinia, I ſhould think that the Beauty of this Princeſs whom you ſo highly applaud, had very much engaged your heart: But ſince I hear of all your Victories, I cannot believe you will let your ſelf be vanquiſhed: Doubtleſs Siſter, replied Intaphernes, we have been Conquerors in the Wars, but yet Love hath conquered me: And that liberty which I preſerved amidſt all Babylonian Beauties is loſt at Calcedonia, by the ſight of the Bythinian Princeſs. Therefore my deareſt Siſter, give me leave to plead for Atergatis unto you with more zeal than ever I did; for now I know by my own experience what this tyrannical paſſion is, which cauſeth the greateſt delight, and the greateſt miſeries of life, and therefore Siſter I do intereſt my ſelf more than ever I did in the paſſion of Atergatis unto you.

I ſhould have thought, replied Iſtrina, that thoſe who are in Love, would have been ſo taken up with their own paſſion, as they would not have had leiſure to employ themſelves in the paſſions of others, but for ought I ſee, I am deceived in my opinion. Yet I do perceive that I muſt prepare my ſelf for as much friendſhip to the Princeſs of Bythinia, as you have Love, if I will preſerve my ſelf in your good opinion. Certainly Siſter, replied he, if you do not love her, you will do me a great diſpleaſure, but that I believe will never happen, ſince it is abſolutely impoſſible to know her, and not to love her, eſpecially having a ſoul ſo ſenſible of Merit as you have.

This Princeſs (added he) hath this conformity in her fortune with yours, that ſhe once thought to have been the Queen of Pontus, as you of Aſſiria, though both failed upon different cauſes. She hath a Brother alſo whom ſhe loves as you have, and who moſt tenderly loves her: he is abſent from her, as I have been from you: and I do find ſuch a ſutableneſs between her fortune and yours; that though you do not love her by acquaintance, yet you muſt love her by ſympathy: When we come to Calcedonia (replied ſhe) I ſhall tell you more; in the mean time, I beſeech you Brother, tell in what condition is the War; For I muſt confeſs I do heartily wiſh it were ended.

Though Arſamones, replied Intaphernes, hath always conquered, yet he hath much to conquer; for the King of Pontus, though he have loſt two Battles, yet he is now in the Head of an Army, having ſtill for his retreat the prime City which is not eaſie to be taken; for doubtleſs you know that Heraclia, by reaſon of the Sea, is very ſtrong, having that for its ſcituation.

On the other ſide, Araminta his Siſter, is in Cabara in the hands of one of her Lovers, named Artanus, who was carried away when the King of Pontus returned unto Heraclia, after he had obtained his liberty by the generoſity of that renowned Stranger, called Artamenes, who hath made the Arms of Ciaxares ſo famous, and whoſe reputation is ſo high: ſo that though he had vanquiſhed the King of Pontus, defeated his Army, and taken Heraclia, yet he muſt after all that fight with Artanus, and take Cabara.

Alas, dear Brother, cryed out Iſtrina, how many dangers and vexations are to be endured before Peace be in Bythinia, or in my heart? After this, ſince the love of Intaphernes was new, and violent, he could not forbear ſpeaking of it, ſo that the Princeſs Iſtrina, out of complacency, did hearken unto him according to his deſires: I beſeech you Brother (ſaid ſhe unto him) how came Love to be predominate in your heart? Did you love the Princeſs of Bythinia as ſoon as you ſaw her? Is it the charms of her beauty, or her wit that hath captivated you? And was your Paſſion as violent at firſt as now? When Atergatis and I came firſt into Bythinia, replied Intaphernes, we went ſtrait into the Army: ſo that not having ſeen the Princeſs till the Army drew into Winter quarters, it was not until then my heart began to be engaged: 'Tis true, that I may reckon my Captivity from the firſt day I ſaw the Princeſs of Bythinia, ſince my eyes did no ſooner ſee her, than my heart admired her; methought I had found that which I had long ſought after: her beauty did ſtrike me into admiration, but I fancied the ſame Idea before.

At the firſt, I fancied her to have as much wit as beauty, and as much vertue as either; ſo that fancying her to be full of perfection, I loved her, and told my ſelf that he who was ſo happy as to have her Love, was the happieſt man alive. Do not wonder to hear me ſpeak incertainly upon the paſſages of my heart; for the truth is, dear Siſter, I had ſuch different apprehenſions, that I can hardly give a true relation. The thing I know of moſt certainty is, that I admired her as much as I was able; but that which made me loſe my ſelf, was the firſt words which I heard from the mouth of this admired perſon, which were not only full of Wit and Civility, but alſo of Commendations which ſhe gave me; for it ſeems Fame had flattered me unto her, for ſome Acts which I had done in the Wars.

After this, Siſter, never ask me what I did, for indeed I did nothing but endeavour to faſten thoſe chains which did captivate me with as much care, as others took to break theirs.

In the mean time, I ſuffered without Complaint: And if Atergatis had not given that Princeſs ſometimes an occaſion to gueſs at my paſſion, by ſome diſcourſe he had with her, ſhe had ſtill been ignorant that I was the man who did adore her with moſt reverence.

After this, ſince it was very late, it was that night reſolved that they ſhould depart the next morning, and to talk together all that day. We departed from that place, which was three days journey from Calcedonia, and by the way miſt Arbiana's Coach which ſtaid for us, with one of that Queens chief Officers, who was charged with a thouſand obliging Complements unto the Princeſs Iſtrina. The truth is, ſhe was exceedingly well received both by Arſamones, and Arbiana, and the Princeſs their Daughter: They lodged her in the beſt Chamber of the Palace, and did her all the honours that were due unto her Merit, as well as unto her Quality. It chanced alſo that the Princeſs of Bythinia had as great an inclination unto Iſtrina, as Iſtrina had unto her, ſo that both of them did quickly love each other moſt tenderly, and friendſhip did grow as ſoon in their hearts, as love did in the heart of Intaphernes. Since their Chambers were very near together, they ſaw one another every hour. and were ſuch intimate friends, that they truſted each other with their adventures: So that the Princeſs of Bythinia acquainted Iſtrina with the love of Sinneſis to her, with the death of that Prince, and all paſſages even unto that very hour. Iſtrina for her part, imparted the Love of Atergatis unto her, ſo that there was a mutual exchange of ſecrets between thoſe two Beauties.

In the mean time, though the Princeſs Iſtrina did much grieve at the death of the Queen Nitocris; yet ſince ſhe came into a Court which victory had filled with joys, ſhe muſt be a ſharer in the diverſions. Not but that the abſence of the Prince Spitridates did much grieve both the Queen of Bythinia, and the Princeſs her Daughter, and all of any quality in the Court: Yet for all that, ſince Arſamones was a Prince who would make himſelf feared, and who as fruits of his victory would enjoy all the delights in Calcedonia, he ſaid that it was juſt, that all thoſe who had taken ſo much pains in helping him to vanquiſh, ſhould alſo take the pleaſures of the Victory. Yet, Madam, you cannot imagine this Court like unto that of a great King in time of Peace, where men of Sword and Blood uſe not to be, but you muſt conceive it to be a Miſcellany of all ſorts of People, Officers of the Army, Voluntiers, Courtiers, Souldiers of Fortune, Juſtices, Magiſtrates, Prieſts, and indeed all ſorts: For ſince the Wars had put all in diſorder; and ſince none did ſtrive to appear above his degree, in thoſe bad times: and ſince every one would be intruders, one might then have ſeen in the King of Bythinia's Preſence Chamber, ſome men in ſuch a ſhabid habit as durſt not look in at the Gates in times of Peace.

But ſince he ſtood in need of ſuch to compleat his Conqueſt he would not diſoblige men of the meaneſt quality, but ſuffered them to come into the Court, until he was ſettled in his Throne. However, ſince men of real worth were mingled amongſt the reſt, the Court was magnificent, and its Tumult had ſomething ſo delightful in it, as was not at all weariſome.

This Court being ſuch as I have deſcribed, all delights were as if it were in a croud: There was Horſe-races, Barryers, Tilting, Dancing, Muſick and Feaſts: But in all theſe Intaphernes and Atergatis did behave themſelves ſo admirably, as they did attract the admiration of all: The greateſt advantage unto them was, that they got the eſteem of thoſe Princeſſes whom they adored, it not being poſſible to ſee two ſo equally excellent in ſuch and ſo many ſeveral things; but to give them commendations according to their merits.

I remember one day amongſt the reſt, when there was a great Aſſembly about the Queen of Bythinia, Intaphernes danced with ſuch a becoming grace, as all the company talked of nothing elſe all that night. And the truth is, Madam, this Prince who fought like a Lion in the Field, did dance as if he uſed nothing elſe; for he did it in ſo noble a manner, and with ſo free, ſo gallant, ſo eaſie, and ſo natural an Air, as he could not chuſe but charm all eyes.

But to return from whence I digreſſed; one night when a Ball was kept by the Queen Arbiana, the Princeſs Iſtrina being retired into the Chamber of the Bythinian Princeſs, who requeſted her ſo to do, that they might have ſome talk together; though it was ſomething late, they began to confer together of all paſſages, and what they obſerved at the Ball.

After they had diſcourſed upon thoſe that were fair, and thoſe that were not; of ſuch as danced much, and ſuch as danced but little; who did well, and who not. The Princeſs of Bythinia began to commend Intaphernes and Atergatis: after which, perceiving that Iſtrina durſt neither contradict her, nor conſent unto what ſhe ſaid, ſhe began to chide her, affirming that ſince ſhe would not commend Atergatis, ſhe muſt needs love him as well as the Prince her Brother: However, ſaid ſhe, if it be ſo, you do an injury unto our friendſhip; for truly I have imparted my very heart unto you, but it ſeems you hide yours, ſince you tell me that Atergatis loves you, and will not confeſs that you love him. I am yet more culpable, Madam, than you imagine, ſaid Iſtrina craftily (to be revenged on her) for I have more ſecrets than one, which I will not impart unto you. How Madam (replied the Princeſs of Bythinia) if ſo, you muſt reſolve not to ſleep this night, unleſs you impart them to me: If I do impart them, replied Iſtrina, it muſt be this very hour; for I believe if you give me time to think upon it, I ſhall never impart them, nor indeed do I think I ever ſhall: Surely they are ſtrange ſecrets (replied the Princeſs of Bythinia) ſince they come ſo hardly out; there is one amongſt the reſt, replied Iſtrina, which I would never impart, but I am ſure you will know it, though I never ſpeak a word. If ſo (ſaid the Princeſs of Bythinia) my obligation will be the leſs, ſince I muſt know it by another; but be it what it will, I beſeech you tell me what it is? Since you will needs know it Madam, replied ſhe and laughed, I muſt tell you that you are the moſt cruel woman in the world, in captivating thoſe who come to ſacrifice their lives to ſet the King your Father upon the Throne. For truly Madam, Intaphernes is at this preſent ſo little his, and ſo abſolutely yours, that it may very well be ſaid, you only are able to make his deſtiny good or bad as you ſhall pleaſe.

How's this Madam (replied the Princeſs of Bythinia) believe me you are too full of revenge: Surely I did not offend you ſo much as to make you puniſh me by any Railery which hath a falſe foundation. I wiſh the Gods, replied Iſtrina, that it were not true for Intaphernes his ſake: Yet Madam (added ſhe, and aſſumed a more ſerious countenance) what I told you laughing, ought not to incenſe you either againſt the Prince my Brother, or againſt my ſelf; for I did not tell it you by any orders from him, or with intentions to let him know I told you, but only to know of you what you would have me adviſe him unto? I thought (replied the Princeſs of Bythinia) that you had ſpoke in a way of Railary; but ſince you ſpeak in a ſerious manner, and ſince my love to you will not permit me to conceal any thing which is in my heart from you, I muſt tell you, that I ſhould be very ſorry the Prince Intaphernes ſhould engage himſelf ſo far as to love me, becauſe I do infinitely eſteem him; for after experience, what trouble it is to reſiſt ones ſelf, I will not expoſe my ſelf unto it again.

The King my Father is ſo bent upon his own will, and doth ſo abſolutely require mine to be conformable unto his, as I will never reſolve upon any thing leſt it ſhould be contrary to his will; therefore, ſince it is to be feared that I ſhall never have the glory to be loved by ſuch an accompliſhed Prince as Intaphernes is, it is requiſite both for his tranquility and mine, that you adviſe him only to eſteem me in the way of friendſhip.

I beſeech you, Madam, replied Iſtrina, that you will be pleaſed to teach me what courſe I ſhould take to make him obey you; ſo that knowing how to cure the Prince my Brother of his love to you, I may alſo cure Atergatis of his love to me. Since Atergatis doth love one that is infinitely lovely (replied the Princeſs of Bythinia) I do not think it ſo eaſie a matter to cure him as Intaphernes. And ſince Intaphernes, replied ſhe, doth adore a Princeſs infinitely more accompliſhed than Iſtrina, it's probable he will not be ſo eaſily cured as Atergatis. Seriouſly Madam (replied the Princeſs of Bythinia) you would do me a very notable pleaſure if you would remove out of Intaphernes his heart that ſlight paſſion which I will believe he hath unto me; yet tranſact ſo with him, I beſeech you, ſaid ſhe and bluſh'd, as I do not loſe his eſteem. Truly Madam, replied Iſtrina, I do think it a thing impoſſible to quench the flames which you have kindled in the heart of Intaphernes: However, replied ſhe, do what you can to hinder him from telling me of his affection: Tell him, that if he never ſpeak of it, I have promiſed you to behave my ſelf as civily to him as I do at this preſent, and for your ſake, be as free with him as hitherto I have been: Really Madam, replied Iſtrina, it is very ſtrange you ſhould ſpeak thus: However, (added ſhe, and ſmiled) to keep you from treating Intaphernes more coldly than ordinary; I muſt tell you, that if you do treat him ſo, I ſhall acquaint him with the diſcourſe which we have had; for though it be not much in his advantage, yet I am confident he will be very glad to hear how you know of his Love.

I beſeech you Madam, replied the Princeſs of Bythinia, do not ſo, unleſs you provoke me to a revenge in acquainting Atergatis with ſome flames which I have diſcovered to fluſh out of your heart againſt your will. Then Madam, you muſt promiſe me, replied Iſtrina, to carry your ſelf in appearance as if you did not know of his affection, and yet to be ſomething obliging, as if you did not hate him. I do not ſee, replied the Princeſs of Bythinia, and bluſh'd, that this promiſe which you would have me make is at all neceſſary; for truly to ſpeak with the ſame ingenuous ſincerity as we uſe to do of things, I do not think one can be angry that ſuch a very accompliſhed man ſhould love one: I know that one may not love him, and fully intend never to do it; but I muſt confeſs I cannot underſtand why one ſhould hate a man for no other reaſon but becauſe he loves; and I am perſwaded, that though one do hate a Lover, yet perhaps they may not hate his paſſion, unleſs it force one beyond reſpect; for in that I conceive, it cannot be termed Love which is not full of reſpect; and I ſhould eaſily hate ſuch as ſhould not behave themſelves as they ought to do.

Since, Madam, the Prince my Brother, anſwered Iſtrina, can never fail in his reverend reſpects of you, you do me the greateſt pleaſure in the world to ſpeak as you do; for ſince, Madam, you ſay that one may not love a Lover, and yet not hate his paſſion, I am moſt confident that you will tolerate the paſſion of Intaphernes: And if you will be pleaſed to give me leave to tell you what I think; I muſt tell you that I do not deſpair of my Brothers happineſs: For truly Madam (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled) it is a marvellous piece of cunning to ſeparate a Lover and Love: And for my part, I muſt freely confeſs I cannot do it, nor can I underſtand how one can affect to be loved by a man whom one cannot love; nor delight in any affection, and hate him that owes it. For my particular, I confeſs that I have not ſo much wit as to diſtinguiſh a Lover from his Love; for if the Love pleaſe me, it is becauſe the Lover doth not diſpleaſe me: And I muſt maintain, that one cannot long take pleaſure in being loved by any one, unleſs his perſon pleaſe as well as his paſſion; for a Lover and Love are inſeparable, and one cannot love the one, and hate the other.

Did I not know, replied the Princeſs of Bythinia, that your aim, Madam, is to draw ſome advantageous conſequences for Intaphernes, and diſadvantageous unto me by talking thus; I ſhould extreamly wonder to hear you maintain ſo bad a cauſe; for you know as well as I can tell you, that one is glad to be eſteemed by ones greateſt Enemies: And it is ſo natural to deſire the being Loved, as it may eaſily be maintained that Love never angred any: But we are apt to confound the effects of Paſſion, with the paſſion it ſelf, as well as the faults of Lovers with Love; but certainly, ſeparate the faults of Lovers from them and they cannot diſpleaſe, though the Lovers themſelves may.

However it be, ſaid Iſtrina, I ſhall content my ſelf with the happineſs of the Prince my Brother, becauſe his paſſion doth not at this preſent incenſe you; for I am moſt confident, that if you did hate him Madam, it would vex you: I ſhould doubtleſs be very unjuſt (replied the Princeſs of Bythinia) if I ſhould hate the Prince Intaphernes who hath done the King my Father ſuch glorious ſervice: But Madam, I muſt tell you, there is a great diſtance between hatred and love. However added ſhe (to conclude this Conference) ſince it is very late, it is time to ſleep, leſt that lively colour in your Cheeks loſe its freſhneſs in the morning, and leſt the Prince Atergatis ſhould be troubled at it, and think he made you ſick with over-dancing you. I cannot tell, Madam, (replied Iſtrina and laughed) whether you have not ſome ends of your own in the advice which you give me; and whether you think not more of your own Complexion, and thoſe ſprightly Eyes, than at my health: But however I will follow it and obey you: And ſo theſe two Beauties parted, and went to take that reſt which they took from others, for truly Intaphernes and Atergatis took none: Not that they had any cauſe to complain againſt the Perſons whom they loved and adored. For the Prince Intaphernes found the Princeſs of Bythinia the ſweeteſt and moſt civil in the world; and Atergatis knew very well, for all the reverſedneſs of Iſtrina that ſhe did not hate him

But being both of them men of a deep wit, and infinite ſpirit, they knew alſo, that though they ſhould meet with no obſtructions from the Princeſſes whom they loved, yet they could not be happy without much danger and trouble: For they were not ignorant that thoſe Princeſſes were too wiſe to diſpleaſe thoſe upon whom they had dependency, ſince the Princeſs of Bythinia had heretofore refuſed to be Queen of Pontus rather than diſobey Arſamones: And ſince Iſtrina alſo would not have gone out of Babylon, but only becauſe ſhe feared that the Prince Gadates her Father ſhould take it ill if ſhe ſtayed. So that not doubting but the King of Bythinia and Gadates would oppoſe their deſigns, they could not chuſe but be exceedingly troubled at it. For indeed Intaphernes knew very well, that as long as the War laſted, Arſamones would keep many Princes in hope of giving his Daughter unto them, to keep them cloſe to his intereſt; and that as long as Spitridates did not appear, he would not think of marrying her unto any; for ſince it was not then known where that Illuſtrious Prince was (who we knew ſince was carried into Perſia, and taken for Cyrus) it was doubtful whether that Princeſs ſhould be Queen or no, and by conſequence Arſamones would not diſpoſe of her.

On the other ſide, Atergatis was well informed, that the Prince Gadates, for all the averſion of the King of Aſſiria, to Iſtrina, and for all her affection unto you, yet he was ſtill in hopes of ſeeing her Queen of Aſſiria; ſince ſhe was the only perſon whom according to the Laws of that State, that Prince could marry: And his hopes was alſo, that the worſt treatment he received from Iſtrina, at Babylon, the ſooner would he be cured of his Love, and reduced ~~unto~~ Reaſon, by marrying Iſtrina out of Maxims of State, though not out of affection.

Thus Intaphernes and Atergatis foreſeeing theſe obſtacles unto their deſigns, did ſuffer more miſeries than they would expreſs. Intaphernes was the more miſerable of the two; for ſince he had not the liberty to ſpeak of his paſſion unto that Princeſs who cauſed it, he was more to be pitied than Atergatis: Though he did endeavour all manner of ways to talk with her, yet it was a very difficult thing to find her alone; for when ſhe was with the Queen, there was always ſo much company, that it was abſolutely impoſſible to find a privacy: and when ſhe was in her own Chamber, there was another obſtacle, which for a while he thought invincible.

But, Madam, that you may the better underſtand it, be pleaſed to know, that there was a Lady in Calcedonia, whoſe name was Beriſa, who though ſhe had a hundred ſeveral imployments, yet ſhe was hardly an hour from the Princeſs of Bythinia: Not that the Princeſs did love her; for on the contrary, ſhe was very troubleſom to her: But this woman did ſo intrude upon her, to the end that other Ladies of the Town might think her a Favourite, that ſhe was one of the moſt burthenſom creatures in the world.

For truly, Madam, ſhe cared not a ſtraw for troubling her, ſo ſhe ſhould be but where ſhe would be: She was always the firſt that came to the Princeſs of Bythinia; and though ſhe would ſtill be fisking into other places, yet ſhe would return again, and be the laſt with her: There was no need of talking to her, for ſhe would have her vote in every thing that was in diſcourſe: If the Princeſs was ſick, ſhe would ſend to ſee how ſhe did three or four times in a day; ſhe never talked of any thing but what was ſaid, and what was done at the Princeſs of Bythinia's: ſhe would always walk with her whether ſhe would or no, and would ſtill be thruſting into her Coach before Ladies of better Quality than her ſelf was. Truth is, Madam, ſhe was as bold and impudent, as the Princeſs of Bythinia was civil and ſweet: And though ſhe was one of the moſt troubleſome and impertinent women in the world, yet ſhe was with the Princeſs more than any other all the while ſhe was in Calcedonia: But the oddeſt paſſage in the behaviour of Beriſa; or if you will, the greateſt wonder is, that ſhe would not be only always with the Princeſs of Bythinia, and with the Queen, but ſhe was alſo as much in the Town as the Court: She was at all Funerals, at all Marriages, at all Balls, and at all both publick and private Diverſions. None could be ſick but ſhe would go to ſee them, none could have any occaſion of joy, but ſhe would go and be a partaker: but though ſhe had a hundred ſeveral employments, yet ſhe diſpatched them ſo haſtily, as one would have thought that ſhe never ſtirred from the Princeſs of Bythinia, ſince whitherſoever ſhe went, ſhe always returned to her.

Moreover it was obſerved, that Beriſa was never ignorant of any thing that was ſaid in her preſence; thinking it againſt her honour that any one ſhould know a thing which ſhe knew not: ſhe would ſay that ſhe knew a thing, though ſhe was altogether ignorant of it; yet ſhe had many cunning fetches to make one relate a buſineſs unto her, and to ſeem as if ſhe was very well informed, ſhe would tell them that talked to her, that there was yet many particulars which ſhe knew of and they did not, which ſhe would tell them another time: after which, ſhe would uſually tell others what was related unto her, as confidently as if ſhe knew it before. Moreover, ſhe had a fancy to hold ſecreſie, or rather a ſhew of ſecreſie with all men ſhe ſaw, provided they were Courtiers: ſhe would always be a whiſpering one after another with all ſhe met, either upon matters of War, or buſineſs of State, or Cabinet news, or buſineſs of Gallantry, or ſome tittle-tattle or other. Indeed, Madam, I do not think ever any was ſo earneſt in every thing without any buſineſs: I remember one day amongſt the reſt, the Prince Intaphernes who did not love her did obſerve her actions: and I will let you ſee, Madam, how ſhe uſed to imploy her time. Be pleaſed then to know, Madam, that there is a Temple in Calcedonia, unto which all the Beauties uſed to pay their Devotions, ſooner than any other; except the two Princeſſes who uſed to go unto a little Temple nearer the Palace: ſo that Beriſa to loſe no time went betimes unto that where all the Beauties were, which uſed to begin betimes, and from thence unto the Temple of the two Princeſſes, which uſed to be later: After this, ſhe went to comfort a man whoſe wife was dead, and after that ſhe went and dined with a Lady whom yet ſhe did not very well love; as ſoon as ever ſhe roſe from the Table, ſhe went to the Wedding of a woman of her acquaintance, and from thence to ſee one of her Couſins: then ſhe came and took her turn with the Princeſs of Bythinia, and after ſhe had related all that ſhe had gleaned from thoſe places, ſhe went out again, to go and ſee a ſtately Ship which a friend of hers had built by the Kings orders, and was then to be lanched to Sea the firſt time. After that, ſhe made two or three Viſits which laſted no longer than the Complement of going in, and coming out, after ſhe knew who was in the houſe; after theſe Viſits, Beriſa took a turn in the Walks by the Sea-ſide, where many Beauties uſed to walk in that Seaſon: from thence ſhe returned to the Princeſs of Bythinia, for whom ſhe underſtood there was a magnificent Banquet prepared that evening in a Garden; ſo that going with her ſhe was a partaker of the pleaſure: yet all this was not enough, for the Princeſs returning to the Palace very timely, Beriſa went to make her excuſes unto one who had invited her unto Supper, from thence She went to a Ball at a Ladies houſe, who had married her Daughter; but before ſhe went home, ſhe went unto the Princeſs of Bythinia's bed ſide, to bid her good-night: Judg, Madam, whether this day was not well employed, and whether it had not been enough for any two, except Beriſa; yet this I muſt ſay, becauſe it is true, that this Lady would not have been ſo diſpleaſing, nor her company ſo weariſom, if ſhe had not been ſo earneſt in going every where, and in talking upon every thing, and intruding herſelf into all manner of things: but as ſhe was, I muſt needs ſay, that there were very few of any Quality in all the Court, unto whom ſhe was not once a day troubleſom, ſince ſhe was continually with the Princeſs of Bythinia, who was the greateſt Ornament of the Court, and attracted all the Gallants about her. After this, Madam, you may eaſily imagin, that a perſon who was troubleſom unto ſo very many, was alſo very troubleſom unto Intaphernes, by taking from him opportunities of talking with her whom he adored; and he became as great a hater of her, as he was a Lover of the Bythinian Princeſs; and tho he was one of the moſt civil men in the world, eſpecially unto Ladies, yet he had ſo great a diſpoſition to croſs this, that he did continually contradict her, unleſs when ſhe commended that Princeſs whom he loved; yet ſometimes he found occaſion to conteſt with her about that, affirming that ſhe did not commend her enough, or in ſuch a manner as ſhe deſerved. Furthermore, he was ſo unhappy, as that ſhe was more troubleſom to him than any other: for ſince ſhe obſerved that he was much in favor with Arſamones, with Arbiana, and with the Princeſs their Daughter, ſhe intruded upon him more than upon any other man: ſo that ſhe was more aſſiduous about the Princeſs when he was there, than when he was not: However, his fears to paſs for an uncivil man, and the example of the Bythinian Princeſs, moved him to endure againſt his mind, and contented himſelf with continually contradicting her. But when he was with Iſtrina, how full of invectives was he againſt Beriſa? Dear Siſter, ſaid he unto her one day in my preſence, why do you not perſwade the Princeſs of Bythinia, that it is not for her glory to be ſo eternally troubled with this impertinent woman, which haunts her every where: who is ſuch an ubiquitary, that ſhe is every where, eſpecially with her? For truly, its fit that perſons of her Quality ſhould have ſuch only about her as ſhe deſired to have: No, Brother, replied Iſtrina; but on the contrary, it is the quality of the Princeſs which deprives her of the liberty to chooſe who ſhe would have about her; For the Gates of Princes, and the Gates of Temples ought always to be open : and becauſe Kings are Gods, and above all others, they ought to expoſe themſelves unto the ſight of all the world : And indeed what do you think Beriſa would ſay, if the Princeſs ſhould forbid her to come ſo much into her preſence ; and what would thoſe ſay, unto whom Beriſa is moſt troubleſom ? As for my part (ſaid Intaphernes and interrupted her) I would ſay ſhe did very well, and that ſhe had done me a very great pleaſure : nor can I underſtand why the Princeſs, becauſe ſhe is a Princeſs, ſhould therefore be obliged to endure the perpetual perſecutions of ſuch a troubleſom perſon I know very well, replied Iſtrina, that it is a torment ; but yet as the ſtate of affairs ſtands with Arſamones, the Princeſs muſt take heed of diſobliging ſuch a perſon as Beriſa, who hanting ſo many places, would make a ſtrange hurly burly, if ſhe ſhould be ſtinted in her Viſits. You may ſay what you pleaſe, ſaid Intaphernes, but I cannot abide that Beriſa ſhould always be where I would not have her to be. For my part, ſaid I then unto the Princeſs Iſtrina, it would be a very good Office unto Beriſa, if ſhe were confined unto her own Quarters: for truly, if ſhe were always where ſhe ſhould be, ſhe were a perſon very amiable, and would be no more troubleſome than others ; but ſhe is ſtill where ſhe is never bidden, and often where ſhe ought not to be ; queſtionleſs ſhe ſeems worſe than ſhe is : Therefore I would have her told, that none but perſons of extraordinary Merit, and invited, ought to intrude into the company of the Bythinian Princeſs : for amongſt perſons of unequal quality, nothing but extraordinary Merits can give ſuch a Priviledg. But who told you, replied Iſtrina, that Beriſa does not think herſelf of much merit : Though ſhe had, replied I, yet ſhe ought to have ſtayed until the Princeſs of Bythinia allowed her ſo much familiarity as ſhe takes, and admit her merits were high enough ; it is not fitting to blaze it : But for all this Beriſa is to be excuſed, for ſince ſometimes the moſt ſad effects of the moſt violent paſſions are excuſed, and ſince men do ordinarily make uſe of Love, Ambition, and Jealouſie, to juſtifie their ill actions, certainly ſome indulgency ought to be uſed towards Beriſa, who aſſuredly hath a paſſion in her heart, which is as ſtrong as any of thoſe I named, med, and which many others are troubled with, as well as ſhe, though they do not make it appear. Oh Orcames (ſaid Iſtrina) do not inſult ſo upon the poor Beriſa, or accuſe her of a Crime which ſhe never thought of: For my part replied Intaphernes, I think ſhe may be ſuppoſed to have a thouſand in lieu of one; therefore Orcames I pray tell us what is the paſſion which Beriſa is troubled with: It is, Sir, replied I, an earneſt deſire to paſs for a Courtier: and I beleive this kind of envy to be a paſſion, and a moſt violent one. For my part, I know women in the Town more ſprightly and more amiable than Beriſa who are haunted with this paſſion, which doth ſo Tyrannize over them, as it makes as great an alteration in their hearts as Love, Jealouſie, or Ambition could; for they cannot abide any thing which is not of the Court: and indeed men whoſe Profeſſions are not Souldiers, are inſufferable unto them, Women of their quality make them aſhamed, they know not what to talk of, and their paſſions are ſo ſtrong, as that they think they cannot live, but where they ought not to be, unleſs, as I ſaid before, when they are called and invited thither: for in that caſe, I confeſs the Court is a very ſweet and pleaſing life, and of what quality ſoever one be, they may keep their Ranks with decency and honour. However, this will ſerve to excuſe the poor Beriſa, ſince certainly the paſſion of the Court is more violent than you imagine: However it be, ſaid Intaphernes unto Iſtrina, you would do me the greateſt favour in the world, if you could baniſh her from the Princeſs of Bythinia; for I cannot endure to ſee a perſon perpetually with her who never does any thing what ſhe ought to do; who is never where ſhe ought to be, who is ſtill talking what ſhe ſhould not, and who is more troubleſom to me than any other, though ſhe is a continual trouble unto all the Court: And if you cannot baniſh her, yet I beſeech you do me the favour, to talk with her always when I am where you and ſhe is; for I profeſs I cannot endure ſhe ſhould talk to me, or to the Princeſs whom I adore. Iſtrina hearing Intaphernes ſpeak thus, did eaſily apprehend the reaſon why he hated Beriſa; ſo that not being able to forbear laughing, ſhe told him by way of Raillery, that Envy was too poor a Paſſion to be entertained in his heart, therefore I pray let the poor Beriſa quietly enjoy a happineſs which ſhe hath taken ſo much pains to obtain: As Intaphernes was ready to anſwer, the Princeſs of Bythinia entered, and Beriſa only followed her, the reſt of her women waiting in the outer Chamber. Since the Princeſs Iſtrina was then in a laughing humour, the ſight of Beriſa did ſo augment it, that for all the reverence which ſhe deſired to pay unto the Princeſs of Bythinia, ſhe could not hold: ſo that being obliged to Complement, I ask your Pardon, Madam, ſaid ſhe unto her, for being in ſuch a merry vain, as that I cannot expreſs my joys of ſeeing you more ſeriouſly; I will very willing pardon you, replied the Princeſs, upon condition you will tell me the cauſe of your joys and mirth; for ſince yon do not uſe to laugh unſeaſonably at nothing, I am much miſtaken,if it be not worth the knowing: I aſſure you, Madam (replied Iſtrina and laughed ſtill) I ſhould wiſh you knew it, if I did not fear that the Prince my Brother would oppoſe it: To prevent him (ſaid Beriſa, who would have her vie in every thing) I will promiſe you to talk with him as long as you pleaſe; you ſhall not need to take ſo much pains (replyed he) for ſince I cannot oppoſe the Princeſs in any thing, I am willing ſhe ſhould know what ſhe deſires. However (replied Iſtrina craftily) you muſt needs entertain Beriſa whilſt I obey the Princeſs: for you know I muſt not ſpeak alowd all that ſhe deſires to know; Intaphernes would have ſaid ſomthing to put it off, but the Princeſs of Bythinia impoſed ſilence upon him; and ſince ſhe commanded him to talk with Beriſa, he muſt needs obey. Thus poor Beriſa, not knowing that ſhe herſelf was the cauſe of that ſecret which Iſtrina told the Princeſs of Bythinia, began to talk with Intaphernes, and employed all her wits and cunning to make him tell her what the matter was, which you may be ſure, he did not impart: But whilſt he was weary of Beriſa, the Princeſs of Bythinia was very pleaſant with Iſtrina; for ſhe hath ſince told that ſhe made ſuch a pleaſant relation of the Conference which that Prince and I had with her, as ſhe never in her life paſſed away an hour more merrily: Iſtrina related it in ſuch a manner as let the Princeſs underſtand the principal cauſe of Intaphernes his hatred of Beriſa, thinking it to be advantageous to the Prince her Brother, that ſhe ſhould know his affection to her, cauſed his averſion unto that woman, yet it proved not ſo advantagious as ſhe imagined; for the Princeſs of Bythinia deſiring to avoid all occaſions of being alone with Intaphernes, reſolved to cheriſh Beriſa more than ſhe uſed, though ſhe did not acquaint Iſtrina with it at that time. Yet to begin her torments upon him by Beriſa, ſhe talked ſo long with Iſtrina, that at laſt ſhe pittied him, and did admit him into their diſcourſe. Well, Madam, ſaid he unto her, do you find that I had reaſon to ſpeak as I did? I find, ſaid ſhe, that you had reaſon, and that you were in the wrong alſo: I aſſure you Madam (ſaid Beriſa to flatter Intaphernes) I can hardly think that the Prince Intaphernes hath not reaſon for every thing he ſaith or doth; and if I do gueſs right, he is not in ſo much wrong as you imagine. Alas Beriſa, (ſaid the Princeſs and laughed) if you did gueſs right you would condemn him more than I do; for I ſay he was right in ſome things, but doubtleſs you would ſay he were wrong in all: yet replied ſhe, his Crime doth not much trouble you, ſince you laugh ſo heartily. Do not think, ſaid Iſtrina then, that though the Princeſs condemns my Brother, he is very Criminal, ſince ſhe condemns him unjuſtly though ſhe have no intereſt in the buſineſs. Beriſa was exceedingly puzled to gueſs at the buſineſs: She called to memory all that paſſed of late in Court, but ſince ſhe did not look into herſelf for the cauſe of Iſtrina's mirth, and for the ſecret which ſhe had imparted unto the Princeſs of Bithinia, ſhe was not like to find it: ſo that the more ſhe muſed, the more merry ſhe made them. In the mean time, Intaphernes wondered to obſerve, that the Princeſs of Bythinia was much more civil towards Beriſa, than ſhe uſed to be; for ſhe did not only ſuffer her, but ſhe talked after with her, eſpecially when Intaphernes was preſent: You may well imagine Madam, that one who was wont to go unbidden unto a hundred ſeveral places, was very aſſiduous and officious in a place where ſhe thought her ſelf welcome and deſired; and ſhe ſtuck ſo cloſe to this Princeſs, that they were almoſt inſeparable, yet for all that, ſhe had a hundred ſeveral buſineſſes in hand, and would go unto a hundred ſeveral places; but ſhe managed her time ſo well, that ſhe always went at ſuch hours as the Princeſs of Bythinia was not to be ſeen, ſo as it ſeemed as if ſhe were never from her.

Intaphernes perceiving this new favour, was ſtrangely ſurpriſed, for he knew the Princeſs did not love Beriſa; ſo that making his Complaints unto Iſtrina, and conjuring her to tell him why Beriſa was more in favour than ordinary, he found her as ignorant and as much troubled at it, as himſelf.

Atergatis alſo, as witty as he was, he could not dive into the myſtery of the buſineſs ſo that this Prince was in a moſt pittiful perplexity; yet had he knew the thoughts of the Bythinian Princeſs heart, he had not been ſo unquiet, for ſhe confeſſed afterwards unto the Princeſs Iſtrina, that the chief reaſon why ſhe made uſe of Beriſa was only to prevent Intaphernes from all opportunities of expreſſing his paſſion unto her: alſo ſince ſhe eſteemed him in ſuch a particular manner, and perceiving a great inclination in her heart towards him, ſhe would not put her ſelf to the neceſſity of ſpeaking either too harſhly or too favourably; but however, ſince he could not ſee into the Soul of that Princeſs, he was extreamly unſatisfied. Iſtrina, who knew all the reaſons which might induce the Prince her Brother not to engage himſelf too far in a buſineſs which had ſo much difficulty in it, did uſe her beſt arguments to perſwade him not yet to declare himſelf, but to ſtay until the War was ended, before he told her of his Love.

But though he ſeemed to adhere unto this advice, yet he liked his own beſt, and reſolved to diſcover his Paſſion unto the Princeſs of Bythinia as ſoon as he found a fit opportunity: But Madam, the difficulty was, to find this opportunity, by reaſon of Beriſa's aſſiduity about her. After he had many days waited for it, and all in vain, he bethought himſelf at laſt of a way to advance his deſign; which was, to put Beriſa upon ſuch a piece of buſineſs as would keep her a whole day from going to the Princeſs of Bythinia: ſo that doing me the honour to truſt me with his ſecret, I helped him to deceive Beriſa.

I invited ſeveral of my Friends unto a Feaſt, upon condition they would all engage Beriſa to be there; My friends though they did not love her, yet did not deny me, becauſe the noiſe of Beriſa's new favour with the Princeſs was ſpread over all the world, and ſo I engaged her to dine with me, and many other Ladies at a very fair houſe ſcituated upon the Sea ſide ſome thirty furlongs from Calcedonia; yet ſhe would not promiſe me but upon condition I would let her return to the Town as ſoon as Dinner was done: Since I had a ſecret deſign in the buſineſs, I promiſed ſhe ſhould, and aſſured her that a Coach ſhould be ready to bring her back when ſhe pleaſed: I aſſured her alſo, to the end ſhe ſhould not fail, that there ſhould not be one man or woman of the Town in the company, but named unto her thoſe that were to be there, at whom ſhe was well pleaſed, becauſe they were all Courtiers; but for all that, the principal reaſon which moved her to promiſe me her preſence, was, becauſe ſhe obſerved that the Princes Intaphernes and Atergatis did me the honour to love me.

This Feaſt being thus concluded upon, it was kept ſome two days after; yet Beriſa went not out of Calcedonia until ſhe had taken her turn with the Queen and Princeſs of Bythinia, unto whom ſhe promiſed to return as ſoon as ever Dinner was done: She made this promiſe in my preſence, for I accompanied her to the Princeſs, and would not leave her, becauſe I would make ſure of her.

In the mean time, I know very well that ſhe could not return ſo ſoon as ſhe intended: And, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that after all my invited Gueſts were aſſembled together, we all went unto a place deſigned for this trick, which indeed was a pleaſant place; for beſides the Gardens which are very noble and fine, there was at the end of a long walk, by the Sea-ſide, the point of a Rock which did ſhoot it ſelf into the Sea, upon which was built a very magnificent houſe, out of which might be ſeen from three ſides of it, the waves of the Sea daſhing againſt the foot of that Rock upon which it was built, and which ſometimes, according to the agitation of the winds, would rebound as high as the Windows, yet could not come through, but left a white ſcum like flakes of ſnow. The proſpect of that place was full of delight, and thither it was I carried Beriſa, and all the Company which aſſembled purpoſely to delude her. Yet for the better effecting of my project, I cauſed that Dinner to be very late, and as if chance had ſhamed me with ill ſervants, ſervices came on ſo ſlowly, that one might have dined ſufficiently between every diſh: And I ſaw Beriſa thought the time to be very long, and did ſit upon thorns to return unto the Princeſs of Bythinia: But that this longneſs might ſeem leſs tedious, I provided the beſt things that could be got: As ſoon as the laſt Courſe was upon the Table, Beriſa began to talk of going, and deſired me to command the Coach to be ready; ſo that not contradicting her, I commanded one to be made ready, but it was to ſuch men as I had in private commanded not to obey me: When Dinner was done, ſhe asked, and I asked, whether the Coach was ready, and I was as earneſt as ſhe, purpoſely to delude her; and when anſwer was made that it was not ready, I ſeemed to be in ſuch a cholerick fume, as ſhe her ſelf began to appeaſe me.

In the mean time, ſince I had provided an open Barque, under pretence of diverting the Company upon the Sea: I propounded unto them to accept of this diverſion, and to ſet Beriſa half way to Calcedonia, and ſo (ſaid I and turned towards her) you will loſe no time; for whilſt they are coming with the Coach, we are ſtill going unto the place where you deſire to be, and though the Coach were ready, yet this is as ready a way: Since I winked upon one of my friends to ſecond this propoſition, ſhe preſſed it on ſo handſomly, that at laſt Beriſa was perſwaded to it, thinking that ſhe ſhould be as ſoon at Calcedania this way, as the other. Then did we all Embark, and to continue my project, I commanded my men, that as ſoon as the Coach which was to carry Beriſa was ready, it ſhould go to ſuch a place, where I ſaid we ſhould land Beriſa. Since it was then neither too hot, nor too cold, it was pleaſant taking the Air at mid day, and thereupon I grounded my Plot.

As ſoon as we were all in the Barque, Beriſa began to complain that it went not faſt enough, ſo that adding Oar to Sail we went faſter: But having appointed him who was to ſteer, in lieu of going by the ſide, to put out to full Sea; he did as I appointed, and Beriſa took no notice of it, becauſe I always kept her buſie in talk.

But that my plot might the better hit, before we came into the Barque, I told all the Ladies (who did not love the humour of Beriſa) that it would be a good Jeſt, if we could make her fail at this meeting which ſhe had appointed at Calcedonia. So that all of them approving of my deſign, and ſince ſallacies of this nature are no great Crimes, they aſſiſted me exceeding well to keep Beriſa from perceiving that we went quite contrary to the place ſhe intended, for two or three of them would ſtand before her that ſhe ſhould not ſee which way we ſteered: Others held her in talk, and put a hundred Queſtions unto her one after another: ſo that flattering her, and treating her as the Princeſs of Bythinia's greateſt Favourite, we pleaſed her ſo very well, that ſhe did not think the time tedious, nor perceived that we were far from the place where ſhe expected her Coach, and thus was ſhe deluded: But at laſt ſeeing we could not hide the truth from her any longer, I cryed out firſt to teſtifie my wonder that we were ſo far in the open Sea. As for Beriſa, ſhe was ſo ſurprized, that if I had not firſt found fault, I believe ſhe would have quarrelled with me; but I was in ſuch a chaſe, and kept ſuch a coil at it, that ſhe could not imagine I intended to deceive her. The Pilot ſaid he underſtood me wrong, and thought I had commanded him to come in the Evening to the place where the Coach was to meet.

In the mean time, every one of us had ſuch an itch of laughter upon us, that we could not hold; and we broke out in ſuch a manner, as Beriſa began to ſuſpect the truth, and grew angry in good earneſt: But when I perceived that her anger was very high, I came unto her: If the lovely Beriſa (ſaid I unto her by ſuch a way of flattery as I knew ſhe loved) were not a perſon who knows all the world, and knows alſo when it is fit to be angry, and when not, I ſhould fear that ſhe had now ſome occaſion of Choller; but being ſo much a Courtier as ſhe is, though perhaps ſome of the Ladies to enjoy her company the longer, had corrupted the Pilot to ſteer a wrong courſe, yet I know ſhe underſtands Raillary too well to be offended at it, and will rather thank her for ſo handſomly deceiving her. For my particular (added I) I ſhould have much ado not to take her part againſt you, ſince certainly I am infinitely joyed to ſee you here, ſo as I cannot chide her, for being a cauſe of my happineſs: For truly (ſaid I unto her in a low voyce) you muſt know amiable Beriſa, that this entertainment was intended only for you, and it would be a cruel piece of injuſtice not to allow a whole day unto him who cares not for the reſt of the company if you were gone.

Beriſa hearing me ſpeak thus, was a little qualified, ſaying, that ſhe would willingly pardon thoſe that deceived her, upon condition they will make as much haſte to Land as they did from it. But the Pilot hearing her ſay ſo, and knowing well that it was not my mind, told her, that it was a thing impoſſible to go in a direct line unto the ſhoar, becauſe there was many hidden Rocks which would endanger them.

The Pilot no ſooner had ſaid ſo, but all the Company bad him have a care of that: and Beriſa her ſelf, as earneſt as ſhe was, did not contradict it, but deſired him to carry her as ſoon as he could with ſafety to the ſhore. As ſoon as ſhe made that requeſt, we did all ſo importune her to ſpend that day amongſt us, that ſhe could not deny us: and indeed we carried her back to the place where we dined, ſtill perſwading her, that ſhe was much obliged unto us for the violence which we did her.

After we were returned thither, we ſent for the Coach which waited half way to Calcedonia, and I appointed thoſe which went, not to make over much haſte, but to be as ſlow in coming as could be, that it was almoſt night when it came, and then ſhe muſt needs have ſo much patience as to ſtay a Banquet before we parted: Thus, Madam, to favour the Prince Intaphernes, I carried the matter ſo, as it was night before Beriſa entred into Calcedonia. In the mean time that Prince the better to make uſe of her abſence, obliged Atergatis to go very timely unto Iſtrina, and keep her from going unto the Princeſs of Bythinia: Not that this Princeſs was ignorant of his paſſion, or diſapproved of it: but ſince he knew how ſhe did not think it fit for him as yet to diſcover himſelf unto that Princeſs, he deſired to keep ſecret from her his deſign: And indeed Madam, he was ſo diligent, that he came to the Princeſs of Bythinia when ſhe was newly riſen from the table: And ſince that is the time when leaſt company comes to her, and when Courtiers uſe not to make any viſits, he had conveniency enough of talking with her: When he came into her Chamber ſhe wondred to ſee him; I thought (ſaid ſhe unto him, and ſmiled) that none but Beriſa would have viſited me at ſuch a time as this; but for ought I ſee, ſhe hath left her Commiſſion with you to ſupply her room; or at leaſt I know you are now as haſty as ſhe uſeth to be: Yet I am perſwaded you will not be long without her company, for ſhe promiſed me to be here as ſoon as ever ſhe had dined.

Beriſa is ſo very good company (replied Intaphernes, and ſmiled as well as the Princeſs) as I can hardly think the Ladies with whom ſhe is, will let her return ſo ſoon: But Madam, ſince I am perſwaded that Beriſa never uſeth to ſpeak unto you concerning me when ſhe is alone with you; I beſeech you let me not ſpeak of her, now I have the happineſs to be here, when ſhe is abſent. I aſſure you, Sir, (replied the Princeſs who had a mind to turn the diſcourſe) that you very much wrong the poor Beriſa, by being ſo averſe towards her, as I have obſerved you are; for truly, though ſhe be a little too intruſive; yet you need not hate her ſo much. Oh Madam (ſaid Intaphernes) did you but know the harm ſhe does me, you would confeſs I have no reaſon to love her. The harm ſhe hath done you, replied ſhe, is only becauſe you fancy that ſhe cannot divert you; and becauſe ſhe meddles with every thing, you would have her meddle with nothing; but yet I do not love ſuch nice ſpirits, and delicate wits, for it is very hard for them not to be very often unjuſt: Since Madam, it is your pleaſure I ſhould not complain againſt Beriſa, replied Intaphernes, I will reverence and obey all your deſires: And to concur with your opinion, and give you an occaſion of calling me the moſt unjuſt man in the world, I muſt confeſs, my obligations unto Beriſa, for preventing me from being expoſed a thouſand times unto your anger. For Madam, ſince I am reſolved to confeſs all my ſins unto you, I muſt let you know, that had it not been for the aſſiduity of buſie Beriſa, I had e're this told you above a hundred times that I am the man who admires you with more reverence than any man in the world, and loves you with a more violent and reſpective paſſion.

How, a hundred times? (replied the Princeſs, and bluſh'd) believe me that ſhould never have been; for after you had told me it the firſt time, you ſhould never have told it a ſecond. However, ſince you are more obliged unto Beriſa than I imagined, though ſhe be not preſent, you ſpeak unto me as if ſhe were; for if you do not, perhaps you ſhall be driven to the neceſſity of grieving ſhe is not here, though I know her preſence never pleaſeth you.

When I firſt reſolved to tell you, Madam, that I adored you, replied Intaphernes, I did not believe you would give a favourable audience; but I muſt needs confeſs, I did not deſpair of obtaining a pardon for a Crime which I could not repent of: And unleſs you had been abſolutely the faireſt perſon that ever lived, I ſhould never have committed it, and told you that I was your adorer; but I tell it Madam without any other pretence, but only to obtain ſo much favour from you as not to baniſh me for telling it.

You talk in ſuch a ſerious tone (replied the Princeſs of Bythinia) as I cannot tell how to anſwer you, as if you had ſpoken only out of a piece of gallantry; and my opinion is, that thoſe who do not anſwer preciſely unto ſuch things, doubtleſs deſire to be told it often, and therefore to ſpare my ſelf much anger, and to preſerve you in my eſteem, I ſhall tell you very ingenuouſly, that I have a very high conceit and eſteem of you, and that you are the man, whoſe eſteem I do moſt deſire; but I muſt tell you withal, that to keep us both in this eſteem of each other, you muſt not tell me any more of ſuch things as you ſpeak of; and that if you do, I will never hearken unto it.

If you obſerve this, you will moſt exceedingly oblige me; and both for your ſake and my own, I will forget what now you have told me. Oh Madam, replied Intaphernes, nes, this is not the way to ſtop my mouth; for if you would have me mention what I have told you, no more, you muſt honour me with a promiſe never to forget it: Proteſting unto you, that if you will favour me ſo far as to aſſure me that you will never forget it, I will then never ſpeak of it again. You know very well replied the Princeſs, that this which you demand is a thing which I neither ought, nor can conſent unto: But I muſt tell you, that if you will not do as I would have you, doubtleſs I ſhall not do as you would have me; for I will ſo abſolutely take all opportunities of ſpeaking to me from you, as you ſhall never meet with any occaſion of telling me any thing that may either pleaſe, or anger me.

As Intaphernes was ready to reply, much company came in and prevented him, and they continued there all that day, ſo as he could not renew it. But the beſt paſſage was, the Princeſs of Bythinia went that night to the Princeſs Iſtrina, and Beriſa at her return to Calcedonia, would have me carry her thither: ſo that Intaphernes being there alſo with many others, it was the beſt ſport in the world to ſee with what aggravations Beriſa related the trick which I had put upon her: Ah Madam, ſaid ſhe as ſoon as ever ſhe ſaw her, if you do not oblige the Prince Intaphernes to revenge my Quarrel upon Orcaines, I ſhall complain againſt you as much as againſt him, for he is the cauſe of my not returning ſo ſoon as I deſigned, and why I have ſpent a whole long day without the honour of being with you. I aſſure you, (replied the Princeſs of Bythinia, knowing that Intaphernes would underſtand her meaning) I was never more ſorry for your abſence than this day, and I never more wanted your company: Me-thinks Madam, replied Intaphernes, that for all the merits of Beriſa, you are injurious unto all the company that were with you, in ſpeaking as if you were weary of them: However it be (ſaid the Princeſs) I wiſh Beriſa had been here, eſpecially after Dinner: I aſſure you Madam (replied Beriſa to juſtifie her ſelf) it was not long of me, for I did as much as poſſible I could to be here again betimes.

After this, Beriſa began to relate all the paſſage how ſhe was deceived; not omitting the leaſt Circumſtance:

The Princeſs of Bythinia underſtood that this fallacy had no ſo ſuch obliging cauſe as Beriſa believed; for ſhe knew that I was no ſuch zealous lover of her, as to take all that pains to hinder her return from Calcedonia; ſo that diſcanting upon the adventure, ſhe imagined that he who had thus deluded Beriſa, was well acquainted with the ſecrets of Intaphernes, and doubted not but that Prince had put him upon this device: At firſt ſhe was a little angry at it, but preſently after anger vaniſhed; and ſhe could not chooſe but think the paſſage pleaſant, when ſhe conſidered the buſie earneſtneſs of Beriſa, and her impoſſibility to do as ſhe would: After which, finding good cauſe to believe that the love of Intaphernes was very great, ſince he was driven unto this ſhift to expreſs his paſſion, ſhe thought upon it without any anger, yet telling Beriſa, that there can be no fallacy innocent; however, Madam, replied Intaphernes, I hope you will confeſs that there are ſome fallacies which are no great Crimes in thoſe who act them. I muſt confeſs replied ſhe, that perhaps there may be ſome pleaſure to be taken in them; but I muſt needs confeſs withal, that there are no deceivers which are not culpable to ſome or other. There are ſome Crimes, replied Iſtrina, which are ſo eaſie to be pardoned, as I cannot tell whether the actors deſerve the name of Culpable; and whether a term ought not to be invented which might expreſs ſuch men neither innocent nor culpable.

For my part, replied the Princeſs of Bythinia, I know no ſuch perſons as you mention, nor any Medium between Innocency and a Crime; nor will I take ſo much pains as to help out the Language with a word which I ſhall never ſtand in any need of; for I muſt declare, that all thoſe which I ever have ſeen, do ſee, or ever ſhall ſee, do paſs in my opinion, either for Innocent or Culpable againſt me: nor can I imagine any medium between theſe two.

Then Madam, according to your expreſſion (ſaid Intaphernes, and looked attentively upon her) it ſeems I am at this preſent either innocent or culpable in your opinion. You need not doubt it (replied ſhe haſtily) ſince queſtionleſs you cannot doubt it unleſs you do me an injury. However Madam (replied Intaphernes) I would gladly know whether you uſe to take all neceſſary care to be well informed of the innocency or the Crimes of thoſe you condemn or juſtifie? For truly Madam, a very ſmall circumſtance may alter the caſe.

The truth is (ſaid Beriſa, and interrupted him) if Orcames did deceive me by way of mockery, certainly he deſerveth my hate: But ſince I am perſwaded, that he had a reaſon more advantagious to me for what he did, I ſhall be more willing to pardon his preventing my return ſo ſo timely as I deſired. I muſt needs confeſs Madam, that I could not chuſe but laugh when I heard Beriſa ſay ſo, and could not chuſe but look upon Intaphernes as I laughed; ſo as the Princeſs of Bythinia obſerving it, ſhe was confirmed in her former opinion, and doubted not but that ſhe her ſelf was a cauſe of the trick which was put upon Beriſa.

In the mean time, ſince ſhe was not well ſatisfied, what ſhe ſhould think of Intaphernes, ſhe retired; but the difficulty was to be rid of Beriſa; for ſince the Princeſs had told her, that ſhe wanted her company, ſhe could not ſhake her off; but was forced to tell her that ſhe would ſleep, to make her go out of her Chamber. Yet ſhe ſleeped not ſo ſoon, for ſhe paſſed away a great part of the night in contriving how Intaphernes ſhould continue his affection to her without ſpeaking to her of it, and without forcing her to change her behaviour towards him.

But, Madam, without particularizing the beginning and progreſs of Intaphernes his affection, give me leave to tell you, that his Services being ſeconded by the Salutations of Iſtrina, and ſupported by his own merits, the Princeſs of Bythinia was moved to let him love her; yet upon condition that he ſhould always ſubmit his love unto her Fortune: and that if it ſo hapned, that Arſamones ſhould diſpoſe of her againſt her will, yet he ſhould not accuſe her of any injuſtice or infidelity, but endure the misfortune, with all the patience he was capable of: But, Madam, ſaid he one day unto her, may I not accuſe you of injuſtice, in deſiring me to promiſe impoſſibilities? Can you think a Lover who promiſeth to renounce the en-enjoyment of his adored Miſtreſs; is able to keep his word? I do verily believe he may, ſaid ſhe unto him, and it much concerns you that I do believe it: and happen what can, I make no queſtion but you will exactly keep yours

This, Madam, was the condition of theſe four Illuſtrious Perſons, who are the Subjects of my Hiſtory: who as you may very well perceive were not very happy: For Intaphernes and Atergatis could never make the two Princeſſes whom they loved, to promiſe them any thing, againſt that obedience which they owed unto thoſe who had the diſpoſing of them: but yet they enjoyed many happy hours when they had opportunities of talking freely with their adored Princeſſes. 'Tis true, theſe opportunities were not ſo oft as they deſired; and Beriſa did make them miſs ſo many occaſions of that happineſs, as they hated her more than ever: The Princeſs of Bythinia alſo, for all her compliance with her, was in the end troubled with her; but yet ſhe would not baniſh her: And I was made choice of to contrive ways of keeping her from going unto her ſo often. So that deſigning to ſerve two Princeſſes, in ridding them of a buſie body who was extreamly troubleſome to them, I carried the matter ſo, that upon a day, when Beriſa was incenſed againſt thoſe two Princeſſes, for leaving her behind when they went to take the Air, as I engaged her to make her complaints unto me, and to truſt me with her very heart; ſhe began to complain againſt them ſo ſharply, as at firſt I thought they had done her the greateſt wrong that could be offered to a perſon of her Quality. For ſhe repeated all her obliging Services to the Princeſs of Bythinia, aggravating her aſſiduity about her, to be as much obliging as a thouſand Services. But after all her talk and complaints, I found the injury to be only as I told you: 'Tis true, this walk being appointed in her preſence, and conſidering how ſhe had been formerly treated, it was an affront not to take her along with them: yet not to let ſlip ſuch a favourable occaſion; after ſhe had diſgorged her ſtomack, and complained till ſhe was weary with complaints, I began to murmur more than ſhe againſt all Grandeur, and againſt the Court in general, purpoſely that I might the better perſwade her: Proteſting that if ever I could get into my Country, I would for ever confine my ſelf to that Province rather than I would endure the ſcorns and affronts of the Court. Afterwards making a thouſand Proteſtations of friendſhip and eſteem of her, I adviſed her to keep home, or at leaſt to retire from ſuch a tumultuous life as the life of a Courtier is: For truly, my dear Beriſa (ſaid I unto her) when one is not ſo happy as to be of a Quality fit for a Court, one ought not to be ſo forward: Alas Orcames (ſaid he) I know but too well the truth of your words, but yet ſince I have ſeen ſo many Gallants, I cannot forbear going unto them; and I had rather be affronted with Courtiers, than be much made of by Townſmen, for (added ſhe to bring me unto her mind) I beſeech you, do but obſerve the difference betwixt them; would not any one ſay that ſees them together, they were of ſeveral Countries far diſtant? and though they ſpeak the ſame Language, and as they think, the very ſame things, yet they expreſs them in ſuch a different manner, as what is gallantry in a Courtier is abſurd in a Townſman: But Beriſa, ſaid I unto her, this rule is not general: for I do know ſome men of the Town, that are very compleat men, however I am ſure, replied ſhe, that if there be any exceptions, thoſe who do deſerve to be excepted, have gotten their merits in the world amongſt Company; otherwiſe I cannot ſee how they ſhould deſerve it: Though I ſhould grant it, replied I, yet that is not ſufficient to perſwade me that one who is not a Courtier by birth ought to apply themſelves unto it, unleſs Fortune do call them unto it by ſome extraordinary way: Indeed were it not a fondneſs to hope that perſons of moſt high Quality ſhould ever care for ſuch Companions? one muſt owe them all things, and they be obliged by nothing: They love you only becauſe they love themſelves; and meaſuring their affections to you by the diverſions which you afford them; as ſoon as your diverſions fail, their loves will ceaſe: Do you not by experience find, that how Princeſſes, who are the beſt of any in the world, do ſlight you? and ſince they have company enough, they will not carry you with them to take the Air? Good Beriſa, let not the Court deceive you, but undeceive your ſelf, and ſhake it off, before it ſhake you off: It is but a habit, and may eaſily be left. Do you think that Provinces far off from Courts have not wits, and men of ſpirit in them? and can you think thoſe wits and ſpirits are idle and weary? No, no, Beriſa, it is not to be imagined; but be confident they think themſelves as happy as you or any Courtier in the world: The laws of amity and friendſhip is regularly obſerved amongſt perſons of their quality; there is as much complacency amongſt them as amongſt others, and there being no Lords nor no ſlaves amongſt them, they live much ſweeter lives than you imagin. I pray then judg Beriſa, what ſhould you do at Court? Oh Orcames, ſaid ſhe, I ſee you never uſe to make any viſits into the Country, ſince you know no better how tedious and weariſom they are. For know, Orcames, that all of them either talk not at all, or talk too much, or elſe talk ſcurvily: They have not only a pronunciation different from the Court, but their matter and manner of ſpeaking doth alſo differ: Their gallantry is ſo groſs, that it is rather an impertinent piece of a talk which is inſufferable; To hear them talk of Love is enough to procure hatred; to hear them talk of Martial Matters, would move ones pity of them: If they talk of news, they know ſo little of the world, and tell ſuch unlikely ſtories, that they are not worth the hearing; yet you adviſe me Orcames not to ſtir out of my own Quarters: I muſt confeſs, ſaid I unto her, that I do adviſe you to it, becauſe the vexations which follow the delights of the Court, are greater than the other, though it were ſo that no accompliſhed perſons were there to be ſeen: For the truth is, as I have already told you, perſons of high Quality care not a ſtraw for their Inferiors: Their friendſhip aims only at themſelves, they will give you a thouſand welcomes to day, and hardly look upon you to morrow: they will promiſe more than ever they intend to perform; and their delicacy is ſuch, that if you do not flatter them ſufficiently, you do them wrong.

Believe me, Beriſa, though there were no other conſideration than this, to drive one out of all Court-fancies, that one muſt ſpend all their days with people that are above one, unto whom they muſt hold a continual complacence, and blind obedience, I think it were enough to move one unto my advice: Beſides, matter of honour, which cannot endure to be ſlighted is conſiderable; for indeed Beriſa, you know as well as my ſelf that if a Town or Country-woman chance to love any Courtier, ſhe expoſeth her ſelf to more talk than any other, ſince certainly it is a piece of injuſtice which reigns in the ſpirits of all men of that quality, and in Courts, to think that a Country Lady is more beholding to them for their ſervices and viſits than a Court Lady is.

Moreover, that's not the place where Country Ladies uſe to ſeek for Husbands, either for themſelves, their Daughters, their Siſters, or their Friends; and the truth is, there is nothing more odious than for a Country or Town-Lady to be too much at Court, Therefore, Beriſa, if you will be ruled by me, you ſhall erect a Court in your own Chamber and attract all the Gallants of Calcedonia which are reaſonable, thither: the number of whom is not ſo ſmall as you imagin. I do not adviſe you, ſaid I, to be troubled with ſuch men whom the name of Court affrights, and who have as great an averſion to Court as Court hath to them; but like ſome Creatures who live ſometimes on Land, ſometimes on water, make choice of ſuch friends as are a Miſcellany, part Court, part Country, and pleaſing in all. No, no, Orcames, replied ſhe, you can never perſwade me to it; for though I know, that what you ſay is partly true, yet I aſſure you I cannot change my opinion: Indeed (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled) I am ſo far from mewing my ſelf in my own Family, that I profeſs, I care not if I never came at it, ſo I could but hear all in it were in health. Since you are of that mind, ſaid I, I will move you but unto one thing more: ſo it be not to quit the Court, replied Beriſa, I will willingly follow your Counſel.

Then (ſaid I unto her) to oblige the Princeſs of Bythinia not to neglect you again, try if you can abſent your ſelf only for three or four days, and thereby force her to ſend for you: But ſuppoſe ſhe ſhould not ſend for me, replied ſhe, I ſhould then be pitifully puzled how to return again to her: And therefore Orcames, I had rather follow my own inclination than your advice. Then follow it, ſaid I, ſince I cannot cure you of this fond Court-humour; but if they ſhould chance to ſlight you another time, when they are going unto any diverſions, blame not me for it.

After this, Madam, I left Beriſa, and was very ſorry that I had no better acquitted my ſelf of my Commiſſion to perſwade her from haunting the Princeſs of Bythinia; For all I could ſay againſt the Court, did make ſuch ſmall impreſſion upon her ſpirits, as ſhe went unto the Princeſs that very ſame night, who received her civilly enough: For, beſides her natural ſweetneſs, there was another reaſon which obliged the Princeſs to tollerate her; which was, becauſe the Father of Beriſa, who was a very popular man in Calcedonia, had done Artamones very conſiderable ſervice: Thus not knowing how to be rid of this troubleſome Creature, I was again made choice of by Intaphernes and Atergatis, to counterfeit Love unto her: And indeed, Madam, though I did not love to diſſemble my thoughts, but ever affected ſincerity, yet I begun to make experiments upon Beriſa, ſo that holding her continually in talk, I gave Intaphernes and Atergatis opportunities to talk often with the Princeſs of Bythinia, and the Princeſs Iſtrina.

Thus Madam, was the Winter ſpent: But the Spring bringing War with it, it was reſolved we muſt depart: I believe, Madam, I ſhall tell you no lye. If I tell you, that the adieu betwixt the Prince Intaphernes and the Princeſs of Bythinia, and between Atergatis and Iſtrina, was much ſadder than mine, and Beriſa's; Yet the Princeſs of Bythinia had ſuch a commanding power over her ſelf, that her ſorrows for the departure of Intaphernes did not appear; But in exchange ſhe ſhewed him ſo many Civilities, and expreſſed her ſelf in ſuch obliging language, that he could not poſſibly complain againſt her not grieving enough. And to tell you truly, he needed not to look any further than to the eyes of that Princeſs to ſee her heart, though much ſorrow did not appear in her face.

As for Atergatis, he was a little more happy than Intaphernes; for though I cannot perfectly ſay that Atergatis had any ſhare in thoſe tears which ſhe ſhed for her Brother:

yet I can aſſure you that her manner of bidding him adieu was enough to perſwade him that though he had no ſhare in her tears, yet her ſighs at parting were very deep, that he ſhould go and expoſe himſelf to ſo many dangers.

But at the laſt, Madam, we departed, and left Berisa with theſe two Princeſſes, unto whom ſhe was more comfort during the abſence of Intaphernes and Atergatis: I ſhall not need Madam, to particularize unto you all the paſſages of this War, knowing that you are not ignorant of them, I ſhall therefore only mark out the principal events. I ſhall tell you then, Madam, that Arſamones was always proſperous, though he had to deal with one of the moſt valiant Princes in the world.

But to tell you truly, it is no wonder if he made uſe of all Advantages, for Arſamones had all the neceſſary qualities to effect a great deſign: For he had not only a great wit, deep capacity, and grave experience: He had not only high courage, and lofty ambition, but he had alſo a kind of raſh prudence (if I may phraſe it ſo) which made him able to attempt the moſt difficult enterprizes, and which helped him to execute them with as much ſucceſs as boldneſs.

Moreover, the Politick Arſamones did not confine himſelf to the ordinary limits of Juſtice; for I have heard him ſay, that all unjuſt means might be uſed to compaſs a juſt deſign: And therefore ſtriving to get upon the Throne of his Anceſtors, I can aſſure you he employed all to bring it to paſs.

Furthermore it cannot be imagined that he would omit any occaſion to advance it: And ſo he carried the matter, that the King of Pontus, after ſeveral Combats, wherein Arſamones had always the advantage, was conſtrained to retreat to Heraclea, which is the Metropolis of his Dominions, and the only Town that was left him in all his two Kingdoms.

During all theſe Victories, Intaphernes and Atergatis, whoſe reputations were very high, did often write unto the Princeſſes whom they adored, for they had obtained permiſſion ſo to do, upon condition that their Letters ſhould contain only matter of News and Civility without any gallantry. You may well imagin, Madam, that this reſtraint went againſt their minds; and that it was difficult to love ſo much, and not dare to ſpeak of it. Yet this command was not diſadvantageous to them; for both of them being admirable at their Pens, and ſince their Letters included nothing which was to be concealed: Thoſe unto whom the Princeſſes ſhewed them, did ſo highly applaud them, as it may well be ſaid, that they ſpoke in behalf of their Loves in not ſpeaking of them.

However, ſince their Paſſions were not ſatisfied, they invented a way to make their minds known without any diſobedience unto the commands which they received: For ſince Iſtrina had not preſcribed unto the Prince her Brother what he ſhould write, and had only forbidden Atergates to mention any matters of Love: and ſince the Princeſs of Bythinia did not think of charging Intaphernes not to mention his paſſion in his Letters unto the Princeſs his Siſter; theſe to Lovers reſolved that Intaphernes to whom Iſtrina had not preſcribed any limits, ſhould write unto her all his thoughts of the Bythinian Princeſs, and all thoſe which Atergatis had of her; ſo that by this invention, theſe two Princeſſes might ſhew the Letters from their Lovers: and the Princeſs Iſtrina durſt not ſhew hers from her Brother. She being a Lady of a moſt admirable wit, after ſhe had received the firſt Letter, and ſhewed it unto the Princeſs of Bythinia, ſhe anſwered it the moſt wittily in the world.

Alas Orcames (ſaid Mandana, and interrupted him) I cannot endure to hear a Letter ſo much commended which cannot be produced: Therefore I intreat to try if you can remember the ſenſe at leaſt, though not the words of theſe two Letters: For your ſatisfaction Madam, replyed Orcames, I can do more than that; for I think I have a Copy of them about me which I got from the Prince Intaphernes, who having loſt the Original in coming hither, he complained of it ſo exceedingly, that to comfort him, I reſolved to confeſs my crime in ſtealing that Copy, and let him have a Copy out of mine: And therefore Madam I am able to ſatisfie your deſires; Then he looked in his Pocket, and found theſe two Letters, the firſt of which was thus indited.

INTA-

INTAPHERNES unto the Princeſs ISTRINA

Siſter,

Since I know you have injoyned the Prince Atergatis to acquaint you with the News of the Army: And ſince I am ſure he will obey you as exactly as I ſhall the divine Princeſs who hath impoſed the like commands upon me. You need not think it ſtrange if I do not hint unto you the ſame things he doth: I leave it therefore to his care to acquaint you with the Enemies defeat, and victory of Arſamones, and reſerve only unto my ſelf to let you know the paſſages of my heart. Know therefore, deareſt Siſter, that my adored Princeſs does ſo wholly take up my memory, as I know not whether I ſhould be ſo unjuſt as to forget you, if I did not need your aſſiſtance to keep her from forgetting me. For ſince ſhe hath not forbidden you to ſpeak to her of my paſſion, but hath forbidden me to write of it unto her, you may without offence proteſt unto her, that I can think of nothing elſe but her; that I do eternally adore her, that her abſence is intollerable: and that her rigor in denying me ſo much ſatisfaction as to mention my love in my letter to her, doth put my life more in danger, then all the King of Pontus his valour. I beſeech you, deny me not this requeſt; for if you do, there ſhall not a Meſſenger come, by whom I will not give the Prince Atergatis ſo much ſatisfaction as to let you know, that he doth ſtill and ever will moſt paſſionately love you: And that there is not a day on which we are not ready to quarrel, ſometimes becauſe he maintains that he loves you as well as I love the Princeſs of Bythinia: and ſometimes becauſe I will be always talking of her, when he would be always talking of you. The truth is (dear Siſter) he is as melancholy to be at ſuch a diſtance from her he loves, as I am for being from her whom I adore: ſpeak then unto my Princeſs in my behalf, if you would not have me ſpeak unto you in his: And perſwade her if it be poſſible to let me write unto her what my heart thinks. But above all, dear Siſter, be ſure that this Letter do not paſs for a piece of diſobedience, and that neither Atergatis nor my ſelf be declared Delinquents either to her or you: Adieu, and believe, I be- ſeech you, that Intaphernes loves his deareſt Siſter, as well as an amorous heart can.

Intaphernes.

I do confeſs, ſaid the Princeſs Mandana, that I could not poſſibly believe, that a Brother could ſpeak of Love unto a Siſter, as he hath done to her, without ſome treſpaſs upon handſomneſs: But Intaphernes hath done it ſo delicately, and hath diſobeyed a Command ſo reſpectively, that I long to ſee how the Princeſs Iſtrina did anſwer him. Orcames then preſenting her Iſtrina's Letter, and taking Interphernes his, ſhe read theſe words.

ISTRINA unto the Prince INTAPHERNES.

Brother,

I Need not tell you how the Letter ſurprized me, for I am perſwaded you do not doubt it: Indeed, I found it full of Friendſhip, and full of Love; but to teſtifie to you, that I would not have you ſpeak unto me, in behalf of the Prince Atergatis, I do aſſure you that I will ſpeak in your behalf unto the Princeſs of Bythinia, and indeed, already have done, yet you are not a jot the better. for ſhe thinks you culpable, as I do Atergatis, for diſobeying. 'Tis true, I never did forbid you to ſpeak unto me concerning your paſſion, nor his; but my reaſon was, I had no right to forbid you any thing, and I will keep within my compaſs, and only make uſe of my Prayers: But as I have ſpoken in your behalf unto the Princeſs of Bythinia, I conjure you to ſpeak in my behalf unto the Prince Atergatis, and tell him, that if I had as much power over him as you ſay I have, I will as abſolutely forbid him to make you the ſpeaker of his paſſion, as the Princeſs of Bythinia, forbids you by me, to make me the ſpeaker of yours unto her; for the truth is, our Curioſity is only to know what paſſages are in the Wars, and not what paſſages are in your hearts; obey therefore, that Princeſs, and cauſe Atergatis to obey me: And if it be poſſible, let neither of you manifeſt your paſſions by any vain diſobedience. Adieu, and believe, I beſeech you, that I will ever preſerve as much amity for you, as any heart, not in Love; is capable of; and by that conſequence Iſtrina is more affectionate unto the Prince Intaphernes than Intaphernes is unto Iſtrina.

Really Orcames (ſaid the Princeſs Mandana, and returned Iſtrina's Letter) if people ſhould alwayes write ſo wittily in matters of Love as theſe Perſons do, it were almoſt to be wiſhed, that they ſhould write of nothing elſe, but that you may give me more ſubjects of commendations, I beſeech you proceed in the relation of their Adventures.

Since you command me, Madam, I muſt obey, replied Orcames, and tell you, That the Prince Intaphernes having received Iſtrina's Letter, he returned her anſwer, that he ſhould make a doubt whether this was the Princeſs of Bythinia's command, unleſs ſhe did atteſt and command it under her own hand: And as for what related to Atergatis, he would not alſo poſitively believe what the Brother of his Saint did ſay, unleſs ſhe alſo did confirm it under her hand: To be ſhort Madam, he carried the buſineſs ſo handſomly, that though theſe two Princeſſes were extream wary how they writ any ſuch Letters, yet they both reſolved to write two ſhort Tickets of two lines, becauſe they would write no more than might be ſeen. The Princeſs of Bythinia's Ticket contained theſe words, if my memory fail not;

I forbid the Prince Intaphernes to write any thing unto the Princeſs Iſtrina, but what I permit him to write unto my ſelf; upon pain of her diſpleaſure of whom he ſpeaks unto her, and upon promiſe of her favour if he impoſe ſilence upon himſelf, and obey her.

This Madam, was the Ticket of the Bythinian Princeſs unto the Prince Intaphernes (purſued Orcames) and ſee, if I be not miſtaken, how the Princeſs's Iſtrina was indited.

If you would have me believe that I have any power over you, cauſe the Prince Intaphernes to mention you no more in his Letters to me, ſince I deſire to know nothing but what

I

I have permitted your ſelf to write; and unleſs you obey this ſecond Command as you did my firſt, you have permiſſion to mention nothing but the victories of Arſamones.

You may perceive, Madam, that theſe two notes were not very obliging; and you ſee alſo they were very ſhort, and contained only a bare command: Yet though Intaphernes and Atergatis had many excellent and large Letters from them, ſince theſe two Tickets were not ſealed, ſubſcribed, nor ſuperſcribed, they were much joyed at them, and ſet a dearer rate upon them than upon all the reſt of their fine formal Letters: Intaphernes preſerved his with abundance of care, he did not keep it in the ſame place where all the reſt of his Letters from the Princeſs of Bythinia were kept, but in a place more precious: For my part, having nothing ſo delicate a wit as he, nor could diſcant ſo ſubtlely upon paſſages of Love, I muſt confeſs I could not chuſe but wonder to obſerve that this Ticket which contained only an angry Command, was preferred before all thoſe fine Letters from the ſame hand, and which were filled with Civilities and Elogies of his valour; I asked him the reaſon of ſuch an unreaſonable act. Alas Orcames ſaid he unto me, it ſeems you are a Novice in matters of Love, ſince you know not the difference between the beſt Letter that can be in the world which is to be ſhewed unto every one, and a ſmall Ticket which one is obliged to keep ſecret; but the difference is ſo great, as there is no compariſon between them: Why Sir, ſaid I unto him, can you prefer two or three lines from the Princeſs of Bythinia, before ſo many Elegant Letters which you have received from her? And are theſe two or three lines which forbids you to mention any matters of Love unto the Princeſs Iſtrina more dear unto you than all thoſe ſweet and obliging Letters which commands you to write often to her, and to ſend her the news of the Army? Yes Orcames, replied he, this little Ticket which contains but few words, which ſeems careleſly written, whoſe Characters are hardly legible; and which forbids me to ſpeak of my paſſion, is a thouſand thouſand times more dear unto me, and more pleaſing, than all her ſweet Letters; wherein it appears ſhe culled the words which ſhe employed, whoſe Characters are ſo fine and legible, and which commands me to write often unto her: And if you did but know how to love, you would know how to diſtinguiſh between a Letter of indifferency, and a Letter of ſecreſie; ſo that then I ſhould not need to ſeek for any reaſons to convince you. But Sir, I beſeech you, ſaid I unto him, are not all thoſe fine Letters, and this Scrowl both written by the ſame hand: Yes Orcames ſaid he, but they are not indited by the ſame mind; for when my Princeſs deſires me obligingly to ſend her the news of the Army, ſhe does me no greater a favour than ſhe might unto any man of quality about Arſamones.

But when ſhe forbids me to mention my paſſion, ſhe tacitely implies, that ſhe hath a right to command me, ſhe admits me to be her ſlave; ſhe teſtifies that ſhe knows I love her, and indeed gives me ſome ſign of confidence, ſince ſhe honours me ſo far as to aſſure me, that I ſhall be happy in her favour if I can impoſe ſilence upon my ſelf. Truth is Orcames, this ridged ſcrowl which ſeems to you leſs obliging than ſo many fine Letters which applaud me with ſo much eloquence, hath ſomething in it more ſatisfactory to the heart of a Lover, than any thing thoſe well pen'd Letters have which pleaſe you ſo well. The very name of my adored Princeſs which I cannot pronounce without a trembling heart, does take ſomething (as I think) from the excellency of thoſe rare Letters; and this Ticket unto which ſhe durſt not ſubſcribe, it has ſomething in it which I am not able to expreſs, that renders it the more valuable. For I am fully perſwaded, that a Lady who endeavours to conceal both the Writer and the Party to whom ſhe writes, hath ſome ſuch ſparks of tenderneſs in her thoughts as ſhe would not have flaſh out into a flame, and be known: And Orcames, ſince Love of its own nature loves myſteries and ſecreſies, it may well be ſaid, that whatſoever is not myſterious and ſecret, is not Love: And if you would preciſely know the difference which I put between Letters of Civility which I received from my Princeſs, and this little ſcrowl I muſt tell you, that I put as great a difference as between Letters from a Friend, and a Letter from a Miſtreſs.

After this Madam, I left diſputing with the Prince Intaphernes, knowing him to be better verſed in the doctrine of Love than my ſelf, and ſeeing I was not able to perſwade him. In the mean time, ſince he knew the Princeſs of Bythinia's reſervedneſs and ſeverity, he muſt obey her, and enjoyn ſilence upon himſelf as well as Atergatis. Yet I am ſure, that tho the word Love was not uſed in their Letters, yet they found an art to uſe others which ſignified the ſame thing, yet without any diſobedience unto the commands impoſed upon them. But their greateſt grief was, that the King of Pontus being retreated unto Heraclia, Arſamones reſolved to beſiege him, and began to draw that way ſo that it was eaſie to foreſee that it would be long before they ſhould ſee their adored Princeſſes.

The reaſon why Arſamones was ſo haſty to beſiege Heraclia, notwithſtanding the illneſs of the ſeaſon, was, becauſe knowing with what zeal the invincible Cyrus under the name of Artamenes did preſs upon Babylon, he feared that if Babylon were taken before he took Heraclia, Cyrus would then protect the ſame Prince whom he protected in relieving him at Sinope, ſo that he was ſo earneſt upon this great deſign, as Heraclia in a few days was beleaguered. Since it imported Arſamones to know how all paſſed at Babylon; and ſince Intaphernes, Atergatis and Iſtrina did hate the King of Aſſiria enough to be inquiſitive of all the misfortunes that did befall him, all the victories of Cyrus were very well known in Calcedonia, and at the Camp: And Madam, your heroick reſiſtance of the King of Aſſiria's violent paſſion was alſo known.

If Intaphernes and Atergatis had not been engaged in their affections in Bythinia, they had then with joy revenged themſelves of that unjuſt Prince, by following Gadates, who had already took part with the Illuſtrious Cyrus: But ſince Intaphernes could not forſake Arſamones, as things ſtood, unleſs he ſhould forſake the Princeſs his Daughter; he reſolved to ſtay with him ſince conſidering the Wars, he might do it with honour: And as for Atergatis, ſince if he changed Armies, he ſhould be at a greater diſtance from Iſtrina, he choſe rather to ſatisfie his love than his hatred. As for the Princeſs Iſtrina I have heard her ſay, that as oft as ſhe was told with what noble reſolution you treated the King of Aſſiria, it joyed her to the heart, to ſee ſuch full revenge upon that Prince, both by your Beauty Madam, by your rigor, and by the valour of Artamenes. It is true, her joys were ſomething moderated by her fears, leſt the ſiege of Heraclia ſhould prove fatal either unto Intaphernes or Atergatis, whoſe courages ſhe knew would expoſe them unto the greateſt dangers upon all occaſions. This fear in which the Princeſs of Bythinia ſhared with her, was not yet all the ſorrow which ſhe had; for the abſence of the Prince her Brother, and the unfortunate condition of the Princeſs Araminta did cauſe her many an ill hour, for ſhe loved that Princeſs exceedingly: But for all that, the glory which Intaphernes and Atergatis had got in the Wars, did much chear up the hearts of theſe two Princeſſes, eſpecially the glory which they got at the ſiege of Heraclia. Since the taking of this Town would be a deciſion of the War, and ſettle Arſamenes in the Throne, this Prince was not negligent about it: And if I had not many things to tell you which are more eſſentially neceſſary to underſtand this ſtory, certainly my relation of the particulars would make you acknowledge, that except the ſieges of Babylon, Sardis, and Cumes, there was never any more famous than the ſiege of Heraclia, nor a ſiege where more glorious exploits were performed: Since there wanted only this City to make Arſamenes King of two Kingdoms, he aſſaulted it with extraordinary vigor: And ſince if this City were loſt, the King of Pontus would be without a Kingdom, he did defend it with ſuch Heroick Courage, as if he had an Enemy leſs valiant than Arſamenes, he had not been vanquiſhed: And he did ſuch prodigious acts in defence of himſelf, as if he had not ſullied the glory of them by his violences offered unto you, Madam, he might well have been put into the Catalogue of Heroes. But that which haſtned his ruin was ſome reports in the Camp that the illuſtrious Artamenes had taken Babylon, and that the King of Aſſiria had gotten you out, and carried you unto Sinope: ſo that Arſamenes falling upon the Town more vigorouſly than before, and being ing ſeconded by the valour of Intaphernes and Atergatis, he brought his works unto better perfection in eight days, than he had done ever ſince the ſiege began: The truth is, Madam, without further abuſing your patience; The Gods having reſolved that the King of Pontus ſhould be forced out, purpoſely to ſave your life, by preventing your being drowned, they made uſe of the valour of Intaphernes and Atergatis to vanquiſh this valiant and unfortunate King, who was forced to fly away in a Ship, not knowing then, that the loſs of his two Kingdoms ſhould be the cauſe of his ſaving your life, Madam, when you ſuffered ſhipwrack with the Prince Mazares. You may imagine Madam, that the taking of Heraclea made a great noiſe throughout all Bythinia, as well as at Pontus. But particularly, it rejoyced the two Princeſſes at Calcedonia, principally becauſe they knew that Intaphernes and Atergatis had a great ſhare in the happy ſucceſs of that ſiege: But that which hindered the full tide of their joys was to underſtand, that the War was not yet finiſhed, becauſe Artanus was in Cabara, where he kept the Princeſs Araminta in his power: And Arſamones would not make any Conditions with him, unleſs he wou'd ſurrender the Town and the Princeſs Araminta into his power, and therefore his deſign was to beſiege Cabara.

In the mean time, as ſoon as Arſamones had ſettled all in Heraclia, he would have the Queen Arbiana and the two Princes come thither to teſtifie unto his new Subjects, that he would be King of Pontus, whereof Heraclea was the Metropolis, as well as King of Bythinia whereof Calcedonia was chief. You may eaſily imagine Madam, that this reſolution was very welcome unto Intaphernes and Atergatis, as it was vexatious to the poor Beriſa, who ſeeing that the Court was to remove from Calcedonia to Heraclea, ſhe was even ready to dye for grief, not knowing how it was poſſible to live without a Court: And indeed we underſtood that every one went to comfort her, as one that had loſt all ſhe loved. She employed all her wit to find a pretence for going unto Heraclea, but her Parents would not permit her: ſo that ſhe ſaw a neceſſity of ſtaying in Calcedonia, where ſhe talked of nothing but her wearineſs of it: And if ſhe made any viſits, to ſatisfie her buſie humour, it was only a gadding from houſe to houſe to tell how weary ſhe was: And ſhe made her ſelf ſo much hated in Calcedonia, that there was not a Lady who did not wiſh her at Heraclea.

But Madam, as the deſign of Arſamones in bringing the Queen Arbiana unto this ſtately Town was pleaſing unto Intaphernes and Atergatis, ſo I muſt tell you that it was not diſpleaſing unto the Princeſs of Bythinia, nor to the Princeſs Iſtrina. Yet I am obliged to tell you unto the glory of he Princeſs of Bythinia, that maugre all the victories of Arſamones, ſhe could not chuſe but ſigh as ſhe went into the Palace of Heraclea, not being able to remember the Condition wherein ſhe had ſeen the Prince Sinneſſis, the Princeſs Araminta, and Spitridates, without much ſorrow for the death of the firſt, and for the captivity of the Princeſs Araminta, and for the abſence of the Prince Spitridates her Brother. Alſo her generoſity did carry her further than this; for ſhe would not upon any terms lie in the Princeſs of Pontus her Chamber: Since I remember very well (ſaid ſhe unto the Queen Arbiana who propounded it unto her) if the Princeſs Araminta did ever look upon me as the Princeſs of Bythinia, when there was not any hopes of the King my Fathers ever being upon the Throne: I will alſo ſtill treat her as the Princeſs of Pontus, although the King her Brother do not enjoy the Kingdom: You may well conceive Madam, that a Princeſs who was ſo generous as to be juſt unto a diſtreſſed vertue, would not be unjuſt unto a victorious and triumphant vertue, and that ſhe received the Prince Intaphernes with all poſſible civility.

Atergatis found as favourable a reception from Iſtrina: And ſince theſe Princeſſes had not forbidden them to ſpeak, as they had to write, theſe two Princes took occaſion to ſpeak of that they would, and had not written; and to make known unto their Princeſſes all the torments they had ſuffered during their abſence: But yet they were not long together; for Arſamones being deſirous to finiſh the War by taking Cabara, deſired them to come into the Army; but ſince the diſtance was not far from Heraclea, there was ſuch a continual correſpondency between them, that this ſecond abſence was not ſo rigorus as the firſt: yet Arſamones could not march ſo ſoon as he deſired againſt Artanus, becauſe he fell ſick. But Madam, I think it fit to omit the relation of the Prince Spitridates his arrival at Heraclea, and all the paſſages concerning the defeat of Artanus: Since it is not poſſible but the Princeſs Araminta, who was ſo long a Priſoner unto Cyrus, and ſince the Prince Spitridates was a while in Sardis, you muſt needs have heard ſince you were releaſed, the adventures of a Prince who hath the honour to reſemble your illuſtrious Liberator.

The truth is, replied Mardana, I underſtood by Marteſia who had it from Feraulas, all that happen'd unto that illuſtrious Prince: and conſequently I know of his arrival at Heraclea, the day before the Queen Arbiana and the two Princeſſes were to go unto the Camp, becauſe Arſamones was ſick: Moreover, I know how the Queen of Bythinia took Spitridates at firſt for Cyrus, as heretofore ſhe took Cyrus for Spitridates: Nor am I ignorant of all that Princes endeavours to obtain the permiſſion of Arſamones to love Araminta: Neither am I ignorant of what Intaphernes and the Princeſs of Bythinia did upon the ſame deſign: For indeed Orcames, I know how obſtinately Arſamones denied them; I know all the defeat of Artanus, the meeting of Spitridates, and Araminta upon the bridge of Cabara. The generous reſolution of thoſe two Perſons, and in what manner Spitridates got Araminta out of that beſieged Town, ſtealing her from the victory of Arſamones, who would have kept her Priſoner, if he had taken her. I know alſo how Spitridates went with that Princeſs as far as Armenia, where they parted: and that in parting from the Camp, he wrote unto the King his Father, and unto the Princeſs his Siſter: But I wonder, that in relation of all theſe paſſages, I ſhould never hear any mention made of Atergatis.

The reaſon why thoſe who related the Hiſtory of Araminta were ſilent of the Prince Atergatis, replied Orcames, is, becauſe he had no hand in the defeat of Artanus, nor in any paſſage at Cabara; becauſe the very day on which the Princeſs came to the Camp, he fell ſick at Heraclea, where he remained until after the departure of Spitridates and Araminta, ſo that he could not contract any amity with that Prince as Intaphernes did; nor by conſequence, give thoſe who related unto you the ſtory of Araminta and Spitridates, any ſubject to ſpeak of him. Now, Madam, ſince you know all paſſages unto the taking of Cabara, I ſhall ſay nothing of them, but ſhall relate things from thence forward, and tell you that Arſamones was ſo incenſed at the action of Spitridates, that he ſaid he ſhould not ſucceed him, and that he would have every one look upon the Princeſs his Daughter, as ſhe that was to be Queen of Pontus and Bythinia: And the truth is Madam, he was ſo violently earneſt in it, that every one did believe it was his intention: But though it was the deſign of Arſamones, yet it was far from the intentions of the Princeſs his Daughter, who declared her ſelf ſo highly and ſo generouſly, that ſhe would never thrive by the misfortunes of the Prince her Brother, as Arſamones was no leſs incenſed againſt her than him; ſo that Intaphernes was conſtrained to grieve with that Princeſs, for offering her two Kingdoms. It is true, that his love had its part in this grief: For this Prince conceived, that as long as Arſamones was in the mind, he could never pretend unto the Princeſs whom he loved, it being eaſie to foreſee that Arſamones would never give her unto him, though upon no other reaſon than becauſe he was a profeſſed lover of Spitridates.

But as Intaphernes had this augmentation of his ſorrows, ſo Atergatis, who was recovered of his ſickneſs, was grieved to underſtand that Gadates, who was not ignorant of his affection unto Iſtrina, had ſent orders unto a Lady who was with her, to have a ſtrict eye over all her actions, and to render him an account of them; this Prince having ſtill a fancy, that when Cyrus had ended the War, he might perhaps by a treaty of Peace oblige the King of Aſſiria to marry Iſtrina, by obtaining for him a reſtitution of ſome part of his Kingdom: For Madam, though this fancy had but an ill foundation, yet he did, and ſtill doth feed himſelf with ſome hopes in it: And indeed, becauſe the Queen Nitocris with whom he had been in love, did earneſtly deſire it as long as ſhe lived, he thought that he was obliged by his reſpects unto that great Princeſs, not to let Iſtrina marry, as long as there was any poſſibility that the King of Aſſyria might marry her.

After this Madam, you may imagine that the lives of the Prince Intaphernes and Atergatis were not very pleaſing, ſince to live without hopes is the moſt difficult thing upon earth: Yet I am ſure, that if they did not hope yet they were not altogether deſperate, and yet they were perpetually full of fears: And all the conſolation which they had, was to know that they were not out of favour with the Princeſſes whom they adored.

As for Intaphernes, he was ſo happy as that the King did never ſuſpect his Love; ſo that he could ſee and talk with his Princeſs when he pleaſed. But all great changes in Kingdoms muſt needs be a while unſettled, ſo there were may commotions and ſtirs, which required he ſhould divide his Army into two Bodies, and that Intaphernes and Atergatis ſhould command them; Arſamenes reſiding ſometimes at Heraclea, and ſometimes at Calcedonia, to give out ſeveral orders to places as need required. Thus Madam, did theſe two Princes and theſe two Princeſſes live, whilſt the illuſtrious Cyrus (after he underſtood you were not dead as once he believed) was carrying on the war in Armenia, thinking that you were there. And thus they continued, until that generous Prince being upon the Frontiers of Lydia, there chanced that thing which I believe you are not ignorant of, but yet you neither know the cauſe nor the conſequence of it. I muſt therefore tell you Madam, that when the valiant Anaxaris who is now the Captain of the Guard, came to the Camp of Cyrus. I underſtood how he had told him that he had ſaved the life of the Prince Spitridates; and that he was at firſt deceived by that reſemblance which is be-between thoſe two great Princes.

But, Madam, certainly you do not know who brought Spitridates into that Paphlagonion wood where Anaxaris found him, nor who kept him there; nor how he went from the place unto which Anaxaris conducted him, after he had ſo valiantly defended him. Therefore I muſt tell you, that when Araminta would needs have Spitridates leave her in Armenia, and commanded him to wander from Country to Country until the Gods were pleaſed to change the ſtate of their Fortunes, yet Spitridates could not find a heart to go out of Armenia, ſince Araminta was in it, though ſhe had charged him not to ſtay there, becauſe ſhe feared leſt the King her Brother ſhould arreſt him; and becauſe ſhe would not have a Prince who had kept her from the power of the King his Father, fall into the power of the King of Pontus, who did not love him. So that Spitridates ſearching for a place where he might have beſt intelligence from Artaxates, whilſt the Princeſs Araminta was there; he thought that he could not better ſeat himſelf, than in ſome houſe upon the River Araxes, which runs to Artaxates: For as great Rivers cauſeth great commerce between great Towns, ſo he thought this place to ſute beſt with his deſign; and indeed the Village where he ſtayed was ſo great a Paſs, as it was eaſie to receive information of ſome things which he deſired to know.

But, Madam, as all humane Predence is extreamly limited; ſo it chanced that the ſame way he thought beſt to hear news of his Princeſs, and to keep him near her, the ſame was it which ſet him at a greater diſtance from her. For, Madam, as he was one evening taking the Air upon the banks of the River Araxes by himſelf alone, and being far from the houſe where he lodged, a ſtranger did accoſt him, and ſpeaking to him in a broken Language, he ſpoke as thinking him to be Artamenes, and as if he had ſeen him in the Court of Thomiris: Spitridates perceiving his error, would undeceive him, but he could not: For this ſtranger was ſo confident that this Prince would only conceal himſelf, as he never offered to examine ſeriouſly whether or no his eyes had deceived him; and indeed not giving any credit unto his words, he executed his deſign which he had upon the perſon of that Prince, and did it with eaſe. For ſince Spitridates was alone and without any Arms; and ſince this ſtranger was ſeconded by ten men, which lay in ambuſh, it was eaſie for them to force him to enter into a Bark which was not far off: and it was the more eaſie, because the ſtranger having told him that he would carry him unto a great Queen, where he ſhould receive no harm, provided he would repent himſelf of his flight, Spitridates thought it would be the more eaſie to undeceive him by arguing with him, than by defending himſelf in vain, ſince he was alone, unarmed, and againſt ten men, thinking that if he ſhould offer to make any obſtinate reſiſtance, it would the more argue him to be the man he was taken for. So that going into the Bark, and not being able to hinder the ſix Rowers from puting off the ſhore where he intended to ſtay a while, he began to make a thouſand proteſtations unto this Stranger, that he was not the ſame man which he took him for: but all in vain.

I beſeech you ſaid, Spitridates unto him, ask every one you meet what Reports go of Artamenes whoſe name is ſo famous, and I am ſure all will anſwer you, that he cannot be in Paphlagonia. I need not enquire of any, replied the man, when my own eyes tells me I am ſure: therefore, Sir, without murmur againſt my violence, I beſeech you give me leave to carry you unto a Queen whoſe Subject I am, and believe it, it ſhall be long of your ſelf if you be not favourably received. I came by orders from her, purſued he, to inform my ſelf of the cauſes of your Impriſonment (the news whereof hath reached the Queen Thomiris) to let you know, that if you will change your thoughts of her, ſhe will march with an Army of a hundred thouſand men to force you out of Ciaxares his Fetters, and ſet you out of a Priſon upon a Throne.

In order to this, the Queen Thomiris hath given me wherewith to ſuborn your Guards, and to attempt any thing for your Liberty, but I perceive, Sir, you have your ſelf procured it. Then Spitridates proteſted unto him again, that he was not Artamenes, but that he was ſtill a Priſoner unto Ciaxares, but the man would not believe him, and was ſo obſtinate in this miſtake, that Spitridates muſt ſubmit. The reaſon why this man was ſo hard to be undeceived, was, that though he had ſeen the Illuſtrious Cyrus a hundred times with Thomiris, yet as he told him, he never heard him ſpeak: ſo that the tone of Spitridates would not undeceive him, though there was ſome difference between the pronunciation of Spitridates, and that of Cyrus: Yet Spitridates did not a little wonder that he ſhould ſtill be taken for another; for ſince he did not then know that Cyrus and Artamenes were both one Perſon, he could not chuſe but think it ſtrange, that firſt they ſhould carry him unto Cambiſes as being Cyrus, and now carry him unto Thomiris as being Artamenes; yet go he muſt, for he was ſo ſtrictly guarded that he could not chuſe: But (ſaid he unto the man who thus forced him) It does not appear unto me by your ſpeeches that Thomiris ever appointed you to do as you have done: ſince, Sir, replied he, ſhe could not foreſee, I ſhould find you in ſuch a condition as I have done; ſhe could not command me to ſecure your Perſon with ten men only: but ſince ſhe honoured me ſo far as to tell me that ſhe would arm a hundred thouſand men to have you in her power, it was an implicite Command to bring you unto it, if I could by all the ways that Fortune and opportunity ſhould offer me. Alſo I have been this eight days, ſince accidentally I ſaw you in the Temple, in following you, and waiting for an occaſion to find you alone, as now I found you upon the Banks of Araxes.

Thus, Madam, did this man ſpeak unto this Illuſtrious Captive whom he knew not, and for his more ſafe Convoy, he would have him always lye in the Bark, and not ſet foot upon land, until he came to the place where Araxes bounders the Country of the Maſſagetes. He was no ſooner there but the man carrying Spitridates to lodg with a man of his acquaintance, which had a very good Tent upon the Banks of that River, he ſent one of his men to acquaint Thomiris that he had brought Artamenes unto her, and to know her pleaſure concerning him, not daring to bring him to her without having ſpecial orders for it. But whilſt this Meſſenger was on his journey, Spitridates obſerving that the Maſter of the Tent where he lodged was of a good wit, and that he underſtood broken Greek paſſably enough, which is ſo generally ſpoken over all Aſia, becauſe contrary to the cuſtom of the Maſſagetes, he had been a Traveller, he asked him concerning the Queen, and what they ſaid of her? Sir, ſaid he, the Queen is a moſt excellent Princeſs, and if her Paſſions were ſomewhat leſs violent, ſhe would be all Excellency and all Virtue; but indeed they are ſo predominate in her, that Reaſon often will not rule her; For if either Ambition, Choller, or Envy poſſeſs her, ſhe humours the Paſſion without reſiſtance. Indeed her Action againſt the Prince Ariantes her Brother, to Reign in prejudice of him; her action againſt the Prince Aripithes who was long ſince in love with her, and her Actions concerning the Ambaſſador from Ciaxares who ſtole from Court, and is called Artamenes: All theſe do make it manifeſtly appear that ſhe has no command over her Paſſions, and that Ambition, Anger, aud Love do eaſily get dominion over her heart, and reign there in full Tyranny: And indeed the voice is, that this Princeſs will raiſe a very formidable Army, either to be revenged upon Artamenes, or elſe to make him love her: as if it were as great a matter to conquer the heart of this Ambaſſador as to conquer a Kingdom, I know that Fame ſpeaks this Artamenes to be a moſt admirable man, and that if the Maſſagettans had ſuch a King, they might pretend eaſily to be Maſters of both Scythia's: But for all that, ſince the Queen hath a Son, and ſince Artamenes did ſteal away from the Court, I believe the War would be unjuſt, and the Event cannot be happy.

Spitridates hearing this man expreſs himſelf ſo wiſely, reſolved to open himſelf unto him, to try if he could procure his help to make an eſcape: So that whilſt all his Guards ſtood at the Entry of the Tent, which was very ſpacious, he told him how the caſe ſtood. But, Madam, ſuch was the Fate of Spitridates to be taken for Cyrus, that though this man had never ſeen either of them, yet he believed that he who ſpoke unto him was Artamenes: For, Sir, ſaid he unto him, if you be not he, you need not fear being Arreſted by Thomiris, ſince you may be ſure that as ſoon as ever ſhe ſees you, ſhe will ſet you at liberty, therefore, Sir, I need not endeavour your eſcape: But I fear, anſwered Spitridates, I fear leaſt the Queen ſhould be miſtaken in me, as the man who firſt arreſted me is; However it be, Sir, replied the man, your beſt courſe to make me endeavour your eſcape, is to confeſs ingeniouſly that you are really Atramenes: for if you be, I muſt confeſs unto you, that I am ſo devoted unto the Queens glory, as I am apt enough to take an occaſion from her, of doing a thing which would reflect upon her honour, if ſhe ſhould retain you Priſoner. The truth is, Madam, ſince Spitridates had no other courſe, he deceived this virtuous Maſſagettan, ſince he deſired to be deceived: And indeed the man did ſo well manage the matter, as he got Spitridates one night out of his Tent, by a back-way which his Guards knew not of; and to make his flight more ſafe, he would not let him attempt to croſs the River, which was very broad and deep, ſince there was not one Fiſherman whom he durſt truſt. Therefore he conveyed him into a poor Shepherds Tent which belonged unto him, where he lay hid above eight days. In the mean time he heard how grieved the man was who firſt took him: how joyed Thomiris was, when ſhe heard that ſhe was to have Artamenes in her power, and how vexed ſhe was when ſhe was told he was eſcaped. Her grief, Madam, was ſo great, that ſetting all conſideration aſide, ſhe went her ſelf to the River Araxes to ſearch for Artamenes in all the Tents about it: So that Spitridates knowing how the Queen and all her Retinue was to come unto the place where he was, and fearing that his reſemblance with Artamenes would betray him to her as it had done to many others; alſo longing to hear ſome news of Araminta, he reſolved by the help of his deliverer to ſuborn a Fiſherman, and ſo they did in all haſt. But though they reſolved that his flight ſhould be in the night, yet they could not ſtay ſo long, but he muſt depart preſently, becauſe they had intelligence that Thomiris was very near. So that haſtning their deſign, the Fiſherman was preſently provided, and Spitridates went into the Bark with a Horſe which his honeſt Hoſt gave him: and he took Boat juſt as Thomiris who was that day on horſeback was in ſight, and followed with abundance of company, ſome two hundred paces from the place where Spitridates was embarked. At firſt, the Fiſherman who was buſie about his Bark, took no notice of them, but rowed as hard as he could: yet when he was as far as the middle of the River, he ſpied the crowd of people which followed the Queen, and thought it was the Princeſs who was expected to come: So that being much frighted at it, in lieu of rowing on, he would carry Spitridates back to the place where he firſt took him in: but that Prince having got a good Cimiter before he Embarked, did draw it, and threatned the man to kill him if he did not row on and carry him quickly to the other ſide of the River: So that being extreamly terrified, he rowed with all the ſtrength he had, and got from the ſide where Thomiris was. But, Madam, to make this adventure more extraordinary: The Queen chancing to caſt her eyes upon the Boat wherein Spitridates was when he drew his Cimiter, ſhe was ſo ſurprized, and had her imagination ſo filled with the fancy of Artamenes, as ſhe did abſolutely take Spitridates to be him, imagining him to have the ſame ſtature and action, and fancying that ſhe ſaw the very ſame features of face though at that diſtance: So that her Spirits being all Choler and fury, when ſhe ſaw how this ſuppoſed Artamenes threatned the Fiſherman to kill him, if he did not carry him from her: ſhe both did and ſaid ſuch things as did not become her great Courage and Virtue. Could this ungrateful man know (ſaid ſhe aloud) that I intended to arm a hundred thouſand men purpoſely for his delivery, and can he threaten a poor Innocent to kill him, rather than ſee me? Canſt thou endure this Thomiris: Canſt thou ſuffer it? Fie, no, no, it cannot be endured, it is too much baſeneſs to be ſuffered. Then would ſhe give a hundred ſeveral and different Commands; one while ſhe commanded to get a Boat to go after him, another while being tranſported with the violence of her Paſſion, ſhe would go herſelf, another while fearing that a Boat could not be had ſoon enough to overtake him whom ſhe took for Artamenes; ſhe commanded her Guard to ſhoot a Cloud of Arrows at the Fiſherman, to make him ſtay the Bark, not conſidering that ſhe was out of diſtance for it: then in an inſtant after fearing they might kill Artamenes in lieu of the Fiſherman, ſhe forbad what before ſhe commanded, and choſe rather to let Artamenes live than to be revenged by his death: And all her thoughts were in ſuch a tumultous diſorder, as I am perſwaded that ſhe herſelf knew not what they were.

In the mean time, ſince thoſe that went after this ſuppoſed Artamenes, not being able to overtake him, it vexed her to ſee him in the Boat, to ſee him land, to ſee him take horſe, and at laſt to loſe the ſight of him. This adventure did ſo much incenſe her, that he who helped Spitridates to eſcape, was forced to provide for his own ſafety, becauſe there was ſome ſuſpition of the truth : ſo that he followed Spitridates, and afterwards meeting with him at Colchides, he acquainted him with all theſe paſſages, and how Thomiris employed ſeveral men to purſue him, and how the Queen was ſo extreamly grieved at this adventure as ſhe fell in a ſickneſs, as all Phyſitians did ſay it would be long before ſhe recovered. Spitridates being ſo fortunate as to meet accidentally with his Page, he was well able to recompence his deliverer, if he had been of an humour to enrich himſelf. But this virtuous Maſſagettan being declared Enemy unto all Riches, was contented to ſacrifice his Fortunes unto the Queens Glory, and refuſed the offers of Spitridates which was very conſiderable, for he had great abundance of Jewels in the hands of that faithful Page. Yet this generous Maſſagettan would not receive any gift, telling Spitridates that he was very well contented to adore the Sun which produced all thoſe excellencies without enriching himſelf by any of thoſe glorious Productions.

In the mean while, Spitridates thought upon nothing ſo much as Araminta, and enquired of her as much as he could ; but meeting with nothing but uncertainties, he imbarked on the Euxine Sea, intending for Paphlagonia, where he hoped for more certain intelligence : As for his Page, he knew nothing but as the common talk went : ſhe was not at Artaxates, nor with the King of Pontus neither : but that on the contrary, you, Madam, was there, and that Ciaxares brought the War thither, under the Command of the Illuſtrious Artamenes, who was known to be Cyrus.

Spitridates then being imbarked in a Merchants Ship, was ſo unfortunate in his Navigation, and had the winds ſo contrary, that after the Tempeſt had toſſed him from Point to Point, and ſide to ſide, not being able to land any where, he was at laſt driven to the Meotidan Lake, where he ſuffered Shipwrack, and that in ſuch a ſad manner, as the Ship, the Merchandize, all the men, except himſelf and five or ſix more did lamentably periſh. This ſad excident had not grieved Spitridates ſo much, if it had hapned upon the Coaſts of Capadocia, or any place where he might inquire of Araminta: But being caſt upon a place ſo far diſtant from the place where his buſineſs lay, it grieved him extreamly: Not that the Euxine Sea was ſo vaſt but that it might be paſſed over in few days with a favourable wind. But it was not ſo eaſie a matter for him to do it, being without a Ship, without acquaintance, and alſo without his Jewels, ſince his Page periſhed, and with him, all he had.

Moreover ſince all Aſia was in Arms, Commerce failed, and the Inhabitants upon the Meotidian Lake, ſent out no Ships; inſomuch that the unfortunate Spitridates was forced to go by land unto the place where he intended, having only as many Jewels as would buy him a horſe and bear his charges alone without any train. But Madam, the way was ſo long, and he met with ſo many rubs in it, that when he got into Paphlagonia, the Armenian War was ended: 'Tis very true, as you know, Madam, very well, that it did not continue long: but the Illuſtrious Cyrus was upon the Frontiers of Lidia, when Spitridates after ſo long and tedious a Journey, arrived in Paphlagonia: But when to his miſery, he heard by the publick vogue of the People (who ſeldom know, or talk any other thing but untruths, eſpecially in State-matters.) When he underſtood (I ſay) that for a concluſion of the publick Peace, the King of Pontus was to marry you, Madam, and that the illuſtrious Cyrus was to marry Araminta; at firſt he gave no credit unto it, but afterwards meeting with a Souldier who was returning into his own Country enriched with Plunder, which he had got in the Armenian War, he underſtood by him how civil the illuſtrious Cyrus was unto that Princeſs: ſo that though this Souldier did not tell him that you, Madam, were to marry the King of Pontus, nor that Cyrus was to marry Araminta, yet he did both believe what this Souldier ſaid, and what the Paphlagonian people ſaid alſo: ſo that ſorrows ſeiſing upon all his faculties; one could not be in a more miſerable condition than he was. His adventure upon the River Araxes was an addition to his miſery; For, ſaid he, ſince the greateſt Queen in the world was not able to reſiſt the Charms of Cyrus, though then ſhe did not know him to be the Son of a King, and ſince ſhe loved him without being loved, how ſhould Araminta reſiſt him? ſince the Conqueror of all Aſia is ſubmiſſive at her feet. After this, Madam, as Lovers do always think that none can look upon the perſons they love, but muſt love them alſo; ſo that Spitridates was ſo unjuſt as to doubt the fidelity of Cyrus: ſo that his ſoul being full of intollerable Torments, there was no violent Reſolution which he had not a mind to execute. One while he would go unto the Army of Cyrus, and ask him in the midſt of all his Troops, whether he was his Rival; and another while, he would go unto Araminta herſelf, and know from her own mouth, whether ſhe were culpable or innocent: but his greateſt care was to paſs unknown through the Army of Cyrus, by reaſon of his prodigious reſemblance.

As he was in all theſe uncertainties and reſtleſs thoughts, he accidentally met with a man of Quality called Democlides, whom he left with the Princeſs Araminta, when he parted from her in Armenia; and whom that Prince ſent to enquire of the King her Brother, when ſhe was kept a Priſoner at Artaxates.

This meeting was a great conſolation to him; but the worſt was, Democlides pitying to ſee ſo great a Prince in ſuch a miſerable condition, would needs perſwade him to return unto the King his Father: And the more to induce him unto it, he ſeemed to believe ſome truth in theſe reports, though really he gave no credit at all unto them: And further, Democlides thought it expedient to acquaint the Princeſs of Bythinia with the place where the Prince her Brother was, to the end ſhe might adviſe upon the beſt expedients to render him leſs miſerable: And he had a fitter occaſion for it than he thought of: For ſince Spitridates was in a condition to attempt any thing, he reſolved to ſend ſecretly unto the Princeſs his Siſter, to put him in ſome equipage, either to perform his reſolution of going into the Army of Cyrus, or to take the part of the Lydian King, if he found any certainties of Cyrus his being a Rival: But yet he would not upon any terms let the Princeſs of Bythinia know the place where he was, and therefore he expreſly charged the ſervant of Democlides whom he ſent unto her, to acquaint her: But Democrites writing unto her from himſelf, did intimate the truth of all things in his Letter.

In the mean time, Spitridates and Democlides remained in their Lodgings, which was in a Village not far from a Forreſt, where they uſed to walk and take the Air every day in expectation of his return whom they had ſent unto the Princeſs: For ſince there is only a nook of Galatia betwixt Paphlagonia and Bythinia where Arſamones was, his journey was not long. But Madam, not to repeat what you know already; one day as they were walking in the Forreſt they were ſet upon by certain Robbers, and were reſcued by the valiant Anaxaris, who left Spitridates much wounded, not knowing who he was; for Democlides, whom Anaxaris took to be the ſervant of Spitridates, would not tell him.

On the other ſide, the ſervant of Democlides coming unto a Calcedonian Port, he was there ſtopped to know who he was, from whence he came, and whether he was going; for Madam, you muſt know, that though Arſemones was quiet enough in his Dominions, yet he was as wary as if he feared every thing: holding this maxime, that a conquering Prince ought not always to truſt unto the fidelity of new Subjects; ſo that a Guard was kept at Chalcedonia, as ſtrictly as in times of War. So that the ſervant of Democlides having anſwered ſomething ſuſpitiouſly, and being upon examination trapped, he was ſtaid to be farther examined: But what needed further? An Officer belonging to Arſamones knew him to be the ſervant of Democlides, who was well known to go from Cabara with Spitridates, and thought that happily he knew where he was, and therefore he would advertiſe Arſamones of it; and brought this man before him, who did terrifie this more weak than wicked wretch, as he gave them the Letter of Spitridates unto the Princeſs his Siſter, and likewiſe Democlides to the ſame Princeſs; ſo that knowing by this laſt Letter where Spitridates was, he was committed unto cloſe Guard, keeping the buſineſs cloſe from every one, but ſuch as were to execute his intended courſe, ſo as no talk of it was in all the Court.

In the mean while Arſamones made choice of a fellow, and gave him twenty for his guard, to go unto the place where Spitridates was, giving him alſo the ſervant of Democlides with orders notwithſtanding to guard him ſafely, leaſt he ſhould eſcape and acquaint his Maſter. But to the end that his commands of ſecuring the perſon of Spitridates might be more punctually executed, he told the man who was to execute this great deſign, that he did not deſire to have Spitridates in his power, but only to force happineſs upon him: So that this man, thinking that his tranſaction was as well for the good of Spitridates as Arſamones, did proteſt unto him, that he would not hearken unto any Prayers, Promiſes, or Threats, which the Prince his Son ſhould make, but would infallibly bring him. After this, Arſamones commanded him that when he did bring the Prince his Son, not to enter into any Town, but to ſtay a days journey from Heraclea, and give notice how all things ſtood. But, Madam, without more particulars, be pleaſed to know, that this man came to the place where Spitridates was, and ſeized upon him, which was eaſie to be done; for he found him in Bed, not cured of his wounds, though out of all danger. Moreover the place was far from Towns: And ſince the Prince of Paphlagonia was then in the Army of Cyrus, Spitridates knew not of whom he ſhould ask protection? But to make the matter more eaſie, Democlides being perſwaded that this Prince would not be ſo miſerable in his own Country as where he was, adviſed him to ſubmit unto the force without murmur againſt the King his Father, ſince he was not able to reſiſt: Yet Spitridates did not yield before he had employed all his rhetorick to perſwade the man to let him go at liberty: but at laſt ſeeing he could not move him, neither by hopes of recompence, nor by any threats, he reſolved to go along with him, not being able to reſiſt twenty men, who at firſt diſarmed both him and Democlides, ſince Spitridates was very weak, they were forced to put him into a Coach: So, as though this Prince was as violent as any that ever lived, yet it was an eaſie matter to carry him. And he came within a days journey of Heraclea without any obſtacle: And the man who commanded the Guard ſent to acquaint Arſamones with what he had done: So that this violent Prince commanded him to bring Spitridates unto Heraclea in the night time, leſt the people ſhould grumble, and ſent more Souldiers that way Spitridates was to come, that his Guard might be the ſtronger: And the buſineſs was diſpatched with ſo much ſecreſie, that no reports of it were ſpread abroad: But ſince the Policy of Arſamones was ſomething ſevere to puniſh many, leſt all ſhould become Delinquents. Priſoners were ſo ordinary, that it was no wonder to hear talk that ſome were brought in the night into Heraclea. Inſomuch that the Princes Intaphernes and Atergatis knew nothing of Spidridates his impriſonment, no more than the Princeſs of Bythinia or the Princeſs Iſtrina: For indeed Madam, the Prince Spitridates was put into a Tower by the Sea ſide, with a ſtrong Guard; and Democlides was alſo his Companion, though he did earneſtly perſwade him to go unto Heraclea without reſiſtance.

In the mean time, Arſamones commanded that this Prince ſhould be very carefully looked unto: but ſo very few did ſee him, and thoſe that did were ſo faithful to the King of Bythinia, that for ſome days Spitridates was never thought of. But Arſamones going one morning to this Tower where Spitridates was, and not returning of two hours after, did move ſome ſuſpicion of ſome extraordinary Priſoners; for he returned out with ſo many ſigns of fury in his Face, as thoſe who waited upon him at the foot of the Tower, did eaſily obſerve it and divulge it, ſo as it was conjectured, that theſe Priſoners were ſome of great importance, but they knew no more: And Atergatis and Iſtrina did not know how much they were concerned in the Conference between Arſamones and Spitridates: For, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that Arſamones did not only move Spitridates to caſt off all thoughts of the Princeſs Araminta, but propounded a marriage with Iſtrina, not doubting but that Princeſs would willingly be Queen of two Kingdoms, and caſt off Atergatis, whom he knew Gadates would not have her to marry. But ſince nothing could ſhake the affection of Spitridates unto Araminta, he rejected the propoſition which Arſamones made. How Spitridates (ſaid Arſamones can you be ſo fooliſh as to renounce the two Kingdoms of Pontus and

Bythinia which I have Conquered, rather then renounce the Daughter of a Uſurper, and the Siſter of a Prince who hates you, and would heretofore have Araminta preferred Pharnaces before you? Conſider Spitridates, conſider ſeriouſly what the value of two Kingdoms, which now you may either gain or loſe, by obeying or diſobeying me. I have toſſed and toiled above this twenty years to ſet you upon a Throne; It hath coſt the life of the Prince your Brother, and twenty thouſand more who have all periſhed to break thoſe Chains which fettered you, and to ſet the Crown upon your head: And will you rather love a Slave, and be a Slave your ſelf, than enjoy the fruits of all my Victories? For to think, that I will ever ſuffer Araminta to be Queen of Pontus and Bythinia, is a thing which I hate to hear of: For beſides my reſentments of hatred, revenge, and glory alſo, which will not let me conſent unto it; even Policy only will not allow me to give a new title unto my Enemies, by this alliance. I know very well that Araminta is fair, witty, of much Spirit and Virtue, but ſince ſhe is Daughter and Siſter to my Enemies and Ruiners of my houſe: you muſt, Spitridates, either think no more upon her, or elſe think your ſelf my Enemy; She whom I motion unto you is as fair and vertuous as Araminta can be. Moreover, ſhe is the Daughter and Siſter of a Prince who wiſheth my Glory, and Siſter unto another, who hath helped me to that Throne upon which I would ſet you: Yet all theſe powerful arguments could not ſtagger the conſtancy of Spitridates: and as I told you before he rejected the motion of Arſamones with incredible reſolution though his mind at that time was much incenſed againſt Araminta. However Arſamones did not quite deſpair of changing his mind, but reſolved upon three things. The firſt, to acquaint that Prince with the meeting of Araminta and the King of Pontus by the permittance of Cyrus. The ſecond, to acquaint him with all thoſe reports of Cyrus his love to Araminta, though he knew them to be all falſe: And the third, that when he had infuſed jealous apprehenſions into his fancy, to acquaint the Queen Arbiana with the impriſonment of Spitridates, that ſhe might go to ſee him, and carry Iſtrina with her, hoping ing that the beauty of the Princeſs would ſooner change his thoughts from Araminta, than all his perſwaſions and policy. And indeed, Madam, in order to theſe Reſolutions, he did infuſe ſuch jealous apprehenſions into the heart of Spitridates, as this Prince could not enjoy one minutes reſt, and his Soul was ſo ſunk in ſorrows, that having found a way how to write to the Princeſs Araminta, he would not make uſe of that way to let the Princeſs her Siſter know of his impriſonment.

But as the firſt deſign of Arſamones did hit, ſo his ſecond did not; as I ſhall preſently tell you. However, ſince the day that Arſamones was with Spitridates, he came out from him much moved, every one was inquiſitive of the true cauſe, but could not find it out: Yet at laſt Arſamones hearing that Spitridates was much diſquieted, and knowing by ſome of the Guard that he made continual complaints againſt the Princeſs Araminta when he talked with Democlides, he thought it time to let him ſee the Pinceſs Iſtrina: So that acquainting Arbiana with the impriſonment of the Prince her Son, he permitted her to ſee him, and to carry with her the Princeſs her Daughter and Iſtrina, upon the condition, that they uſe all their endeavours to diſſwade him from his obſtinate thoughts of marrying Araminta. But he did not acquaint them with the propoſition he had made unto Spitridates concerning Iſtrina. Since Arſamones was terrible unto all that knew him; Arbiana and both the Princeſſes did promiſe what he deſired, purpoſely to ſee this illuſtrious Priſoner; ſo that they were conducted thither the ſame day. You may eaſily think, Madam, that Arbiana and the Princeſs her Daughter, could not ſee Spitridates in Priſon without extream ſorrow: And on the other ſide, that Prince could not ſee them without ſome conſolation, though his heart was full of grief. As for Iſtrina, it did exceedingly pity her heart to ſee this Prince in that condition: But for his part, though he did much eſteem her when he laſt ſaw her at Heraclea before he went to Cyrus, yet he was very ſorry to ſee her now, becauſe he thought ſhe was acquainted with the motion of Arſamones, and did interpret all her obliging expreſſions as a premeditated deſign to render him perfidious and to drive Araminta from his heart: So that looking upon her almoſt as an Enemy, which came to aſſault him by open force, he had much ado to hide the turbulency of his ſpirits. Furthermore, ſince Arbiana had promiſed to diſſwade him as much as ſhe could from his thoughts of Araminta, and indeed did wiſh it; ſhe would ſay ſomthing with as much ſweetneſs and prudence as ſhe could, which might perſwade him, that conſtancy is a virtue which ought to have its Limits as other virtues have; and that when one was reſolute upon a thing impoſſible, it was rather wilfulneſs than conſtancy, and therefore ſhe conjured him to conſider very ſeriouſly whether his reſolute denial of Arſamenes, was of ſuch a Nature as would merit the name of a Virtue. Spitridates hearing Arbiana ſpeak thus, was much moved, and moſt humbly beſeeched her not to loaden him with new puniſhments by forcing him to reſiſt her will, as he had the King his Fathers: For truly, Madam (ſaid he unto her) I am ſo fully reſolved never to forſake Araminta, as I ſhall not only be a Rebel unto the Kings will and yours, but I muſt declare alſo that if I could get out of this Priſon, I ſhould imploy my liberty only in going unto that Princeſs, though the Conquerour of Aſia ſhould love her, as they would perſwade me he doth: For the truth is, I cannot live without her. It is enough that the King hath driven the King her Brother out of his Kingdom, without deſiring to drive her out of my heart: Therefore, Madam, I beſeech your Majeſty to beleive, that though the King would reſign up up all his regal Authority, and ſet me upon the Throne to morrow, yet I would not accept of it, unleſs upon condition that the firſt Act of my Reign might be to Crown Araminta Queen. Therefore, Madam, all that I am able to do, is to beſeech you, that you will be pleaſed to perſwade the King, and perſwade your ſelf, how extreamly grieved I am, that Fortune and Love ſhould drive me to a fatal neceſſity of diſobeying him, and denying you. Spitridates did pronounce theſe words in ſuch feeling manner, as the hearts of Arbiana and the Princeſſes did even melt at the hearing them. But ſince they knew very well, that Arſamenes would not have permitted this Viſit, but in hopes of perſwading him, the Princeſs of Bythinia told Spitridates, that he muſt give them leave to tell Arſamones how they had ſpoken unto him according to his deſires: With all my heart, Siſter, replied he, provided ſtill you tell him that I am not changed in my mind, nor ever will. After this their diſcourſe changed ſubject, and Spitridates aſked how the Prince Intaphernes did, and earneſtly deſired to ſee him, adding that his Soul had ſomething which he longed to impart unto him, Iſtrina hearing this, aſſured him that there was ſuch a dear Correſpondency between the Prince her brother and herſelf, that he might truſt her with any thing he deſired to impart unto him; and therefore being uncertain whether Arſamones would let Intaphernes ſee him, ſhe would willingly do him that Office. That which I would impart unto the Prince Intaphernes, replied he, (and a little changed Countenance) is of ſuch a nature as I cannot well impart it unto you: All I can ſay, is to beſeech you by the Queens leave, if ſo it chance, that one of the moſt excellent perſons in the world do complain of me in his preſence, to tell him that I am not culpable, and that I think my miſfortune (to ſeem as if I did not eſteem her, though really I do infinitely) to be one of the greateſt which ever hapned. Since Iſtrina was unacquainted with the motion which Arſamones made unto Spitridates, ſhe underſtood him not: but for his part, he being perſwaded that ſhe was acquainted with it, did think the leaſt he could do was to put her off handſomly. But as Iſtrina was ignorant of it, ſo was Arbiana and the Princeſs of Bythinia alſo: yet Iſtrina promiſed to tell the Prince Intaphernes what he deſired. On the other ſide Spitridates, who fain would, but durſt not aſk the Queen his Mother what he ſhould think of Araminta, he had much wavering in his reſolution: but at laſt, being prompted by ſome ſuggeſtions of jealouſie, he aſked her ſome indirect Queſtions concerning her. And ſince the Queen imagined that the more faithful he beleived Araminta, the more obſtinate he would be, ſhe only told him what reports were, and not what ſhe thought: After which Arbiana and the Princeſs retired. In their return to the Palace, to gain more time, they reſolved not to do as Spitridates would have them; but on the contrary, to kep Arſamones in hopes as long as they could.

In the mean time Arſamones who was haſty and violent in all his actions, had ſent for Intaphernes whilſt they were with Spitridates, and diſcovered unto him his intentions of marrying the Princeſs his Siſter unto the Prince his Son. You may imagine, Madam, that ſuch a reſolution did much ſurprize and perplex Intaphernes: For his love to the Princeſs of Bythinia required one thing, and his Friendſhip to Atergatis required another; Alſo knowing how far the heart of Iſtrina was engaged, he did not think it poſſible for him, though he ſhould caſt off Atergatis, to perſwade her from him. Moreover, he thought that the Prince Spitridates would not obey Arſamones, and quit his pretentions unto the Princeſs Araminta: Yet he knew that if he did directly oppoſe Arſamones, he ſhould indanger to incenſe him highly, and to be baniſhed the Court; So that taking a middle courſe, betwixt confeſſing and denying what he deſired, he told him, that his motion was very glorious for the Princeſs his Siſter: but ſince it reſted abſolutely upon Gadates, and not at all upon him, he thought himſelf obliged to tell him, that he beleived Gadates would never conſent unto Iſtrina's marriage, as long as the King of Aſſiria was unmarried: Alſo it was not likely, that he being on the Part with Cyrus, he will give his Daughter unto a Prince who cannot marry her, unleſs he forſake the Princeſs Araminta, whom Cyrus doth highly protect. After this Intaphernes did ſweeten the matter with a thouſand obliging expreſſions, which though juſt and reaſonable, yet they diſpoſed Arſamones unto anger. If the Princeſs Iſtrina replied he, were in the Camp of Cyrus, perhaps the Prince your Father might refuſe the motion; But ſince ſhe is at Heraclea, perhaps he will be wiſer, then to prefer the uncertain hopes of marrying her unto a King without a Kingdom, before the certainty of marrying her unto a Prince who is ſure of two. Therefore all I deſire of you, is, that you diſpoſe the Princes Iſtrina to help me to drive Araminta out of Spitridates his mind, ſince ſhe is better able to do it than any I know, having all perfections which may move him to obey me and love her.

After this, Arſamones, not giving Intaphernes ſo much leaſure as to reply, did leave him, and left him in a great perplexity. However after he had ſeriouſly conſidered upon the matter, ſince love was ſtronger in him than any other thought, he reſolved to ſpeak unto the Princeſs of Bythinia, before he talked unto Iſtrina and Atergatis of the new perſecutions which were like to fall upon them: And accordingly without more delay, he went unto her, and eaſily found a fit oppertunity of talking with her, ſince there were no ſuch buſie Ladies at Heraclea, as Beriſa was, to hinder him: But he had the freedom to talk what he would, and acquainted her with the propoſition which the King her Father made unto him, asking her how ſhe would have him do in the buſineſs? Conjuring her, that as ſhe was full of goodneſs and wiſdom, ſo, that ſhe would conſider ſeriouſly upon the ſeveral Intereſts of the Prince Spitridates, of Atergates, of Iſtrina, and of himſelf, and deſiring her to examine very carefully, whether ſhe herſelf had any Intereſt in it. I have ſo much replied the Princeſs, that (as I conceive) none can have more then I have: for loving the Prince my Brother ſo tenderly as I do, and having promiſed an unviolable fidelity unto the Princeſs Araminta; Certainly it is my duty to endeavour all poſſible wayes that nothing ſhould ſeparate them: So that though I had no other motive but this, I ſhould as much as I was able oppoſe the mind of King my Father; Judge alſo what I ought to do, knowing his deſign of troubling the felicity of the Princes Iſtrina and Atergatis. But, Madam, replied Intaphernes, I do not hear you mention any Intereſt that I have in this preverſe reſolution: Since I do not mention my own (replied the Princeſs) you ought not to be offended at it; yet I think it would not be amiſs, replied he, if you would be pleaſed to conſider, that if I ſhould earneſtly oppoſe the King, perhaps he would baniſh me his Court, and perhaps alſo baniſh me out of your memory (and if I durſt ſay it) your heart. As the Princeſs of Bythinia was going to anſwer, the Princeſs Iſtrina came into her Chamber with Atergatis: ſo that having no time to tell Intaphernes what ſhe thought, the diſcourſe began more quietly than it ended; for Atergatis and the Princeſs were ſo ſurprized at the intentions of Arſamones, that they were not able to ſpeak.

At firſt, Atergatis looked upon Iſtrina as if he would look into her thoughts; preſently after he looked upon Intaphernes, as if his looks begged his protection: and perſently after he looked in the eyes of the Bythinian Princeſs, to ſee whether ſhe approved of the King her Fathers deſign. And laſtly, he conſidered with himſelf for a remedy againſt all theſe miſeries. On the other ſide, Iſtrina looked upon Intaphernes ſo earneſtly, that ſhe did penitrate into the very bottom of his heart, and knew how this troubled him. The Princeſs of Bythinia, for her part, did love Intaphernes too well to have him baniſhed, and did caſt about for ſome expedient which might keep Spitridates from incenſing Arſamones againſt him, and yet not prejudice any party. But after each of them in particular had conſidered on the buſineſs, and after they had long talked of it in general, they began by degrees to talk in particular: Intaphernes whiſpered with the Princeſs of Bythinia; and Atergatis, with Iſtrina. You ſee, Madam, (ſaid the laſt of theſe unto his adored Princeſs) that Fortune doth Court you with Crowns in all places, and poor I am deſtined to Petition againſt your Grandeur: But I moſt humbly beg of you, Madam, to be no more unjuſt unto me at Heraclea, than you were at Babylon; and give me leave to wiſh as zealouſly that the intentions of Arſamones may thrive no better than thoſe of Nitocris. I am ſo far from contradicting your wiſhes, replied Iſtrina, that I aſſure you Sir, I will add mine unto yours. Not but that I do as highly eſteem the Prince Spitridates, as I ſcorn the unjuſt Prince who ſlighted me; but my reaſon is——Oh I beſeech you Madam (ſaid Atergatis, and interrupted her) give me no reaſons which concern me not; but let me have the happineſs to believe, that if the poſſeſſion of two Kingdoms be indifferent unto you, it is becauſe the poor Atergatis is not altogether indifferent in your thoughts. There is no neceſſity, replied ſhe, that I ſhould explain my ſelf as you would have me; for the ſecrets of ones heart muſt not be diſcovered; and there is a ſort of thoughts never to be known, and but only gueſſed at: Then Madam, ſaid he unto her, I beſeech you give me leave to gueſs at yours to be as I deſire them: I give you leave (ſaid ſhe, and bluſhed) to think all you can for your own advantage, provided they be not diſadvantagious unto me. However I pray conſider the croſſneſs of my Fate: may it not very well be ſaid, that fortune takes a delight to perſecute me by the very ſame things which uſe to be the felicity of others? And ſo was the deſtiny of the Prince my Father, who when he was at the very point of being a King, was for ever baniſhed the Court by the very ſame Princeſs who would have had him Reign: I was once looked upon as one that was to be a Queen, though the King of Aſſyria looked upon me as a ſlave; yet after I had rooted all ambitious thoughts out of my heart, they tell me again of Kingdoms and Crowns only to torment me, and hinder me from Reigning over my ſelf. But ſince I do not owe ſo much reſpect unto Arſamones as I did unto Nitocris, I ſhall deny him with more force than he imagines, provided the Prince my Father does not take his part. Oh Madam, ſaid Atergatis, what cruel words do you pronounce, after ſo many favourable ones? Atergatis ſpoke this ſo loud, that the Princeſs of Bythinia heard him, and aſked what injuſtice Iſtrina did him? So that the Conference became general again, and they conſulted together what was beſt to be done: yet they could not all agree upon the beſt Expedient; for when Intaphernes for the intereſt of his love, ſaid that he ought not poſitively to oppoſe Arſamones, becauſe knew that Gadates would oppoſe it alſo: Atergatis did not think that advice good; but on the contrary he ſaid, to draw the Princeſs of Bythinia unto his opinion that it did extreamly concern the Prince Spitridates, for Intaphernes to let Arſamones ſee that his deſign was impoſſible, to the end he might let that Prince be at quiet in his Priſon, though he would not releaſe him.

He had no ſooner ſpoke this, but Intaphernes did very civilly oppoſe the opinion of his friend, and told him that if he ſhould do ſo. Arſamones who had a deep wit, would believe that he oppoſed him only in favour unto the paſſion which he bore unto the Princeſs his Siſter, and ſo he might perhaps move him to baniſh them both the Court, and keep Iſtrina there.

I do conceive it moſt fit, ſaid the Princeſs of Bythinia, that the Princeſs Iſtrina do undertake to oppoſe the King my Father, and that ſhe do endeavour to move Spitridates not to oppoſe him ſo much, purpoſely to appeaſe him, and therefore I conceive it beſt for the Princeſs Iſtrina and the Prince Spitridates both to reſiſt Arſamones with equal reſolutions. For my part, ſaid Iſtrina then, I am very ready my ſelf alone to oppoſe the Kings deſign: Yet I am perſwaded that if all of us did equally oppoſe him, our ſide would be the ſtronger: I am affraid Siſter, replied Intaphernes, that it would be the weaker; for if Arſamones ſhould be incenſed againſt the Princeſs, againſt Spitridates, againſt Atergatis, againſt you, and againſt me, who ſhall be the Mediator to appeaſe ſo great a difference? The reaſon of Intaphernes making the reſt to concur with his opinion, it was firſt reſolved to ſpin out the time as long as they could: and if ſo it hapened that Arſamones did not alter his mind, Intaphernes ſhould then tell him, that the Princeſs his Siſter proteſted ſhe would rather die, than marry a Prince who could never be her Husband, unleſs he were perfidious unto the moſt victorious Princeſs in the world.

This reſolution being agreed upon, Intaphernes bethought himſelf how to temper the mind of Arſamones, how to ſpin out the time, and how to give leaſure unto the fatherly tenderneſs and reaſon of that Prince, to overcome that politick obſtinacy and deſire of revenge, which made him ſo oppoſe the love of Spitridates unto Araminta: and indeed for a while his deſign did take, for ſince Arſamones had more hopes in the beauty of Iſtrina then any thing elſe, to work a change in Spitridates, he would not be over urgent whith his Son, to the end the fair eyes of that Princeſs might have ſome time to turn him Infidel.

In the mean while, the Princeſs of Bythinia thinking to add ſome comfort unto the Prince her Brother, as well as to ſatisfie her ſelf, ſhe went every day to ſee him. But Madam, the moſt obſervable paſſage was, that the Princeſs Iſtrina went thither alſo, becauſe Arſamones did not give the Princeſs his Daughter leave to ſee Spitridates, unleſs the Princeſs Iſtrina went with her: ſo that Intaphernes and Atergatis were not at all the happier: and this order of Arſamones did breed ſuch a confuſion in a few days, that theſe five perſons (as wiſe and reaſonable as they were) was at a kind of diviſion amongſt themſelves.

The truth is, Madam, Spitridates complained in ſecret againſt the Princeſs of Bythinia, for ſeeming as if ſhe intended to drive Araminta out of his heart by bringing the Princeſs Iſtrina always with her; for ſince theſe two Princeſſes could not ſpeak unto him without witneſs, they could not undeceive him: ſo that with murmur of heart he accuſed Intaphernes, for not being generous enough: Iſtrina, for not ſtanding enough upon her honour: Atergatis, for a very bad Lover: And the Princeſs his Siſter for not being conſtant to her firſt thoughts, and for not loving Araminta enough. And as for Atergatis he was in a lamentable plight, for he feared that Spitridates would turn Infidel to Araminta by ſeeing Iſtrina, and he feared that Iſtrina at the Queens deſire would turn Infidel to him.

Nor was he well ſatisfied with Intaphernes, thinking he might move Iſtrina not to accompany the Princeſs of Bythinia when ſhe went to Spitridates, murmuring alſo againſt the Prince Spitridates for receiving viſits from one they would have him marry, and complaining againſt the Princeſs of Bythinia, who without conſideration either of his caſe or the Princeſs Araminta's, unto whom ſhe had promiſed ſo much friendſhip, did ſtill ſee Spitridates once every day. But all theſe complaints were nothing in compariſon of thoſe which he himſelf made againſt Iſtrina for going every day unto a Prince, whom ſhe knew Arſamones would have her marry.

On the other ſide, the Princeſs of Bythinia complained, that Intaphernes in behalf of Atergatis, had preſſed her more than once to ſpare ſome of her frequent viſits unto Spitridates, and that Iſtrina would hardly be drawn to accompany her: Alſo ſhe murmured that Atergatis ſhould grumble againſt her: But ſhe did more ſharply reſent a kind of hollow coldneſs which ſhe obſerved in the mind of Spitridates.

As for Iſtrina, ſhe was off the hooks as much as any of the reſt; for valuing the ſatiſfaction of Atergatis very much, ſhe heartily wiſhed that the Prince her Brother, by vertue of his abſolute Authority over her, would hinder her from accompanying the Princeſs of Bythinia in her viſits to Spitridates: But ſince he did not ſo, ſhe murmured againſt him, and complained no leſs that the Princeſs of Bythinia ſhould want that piece of Complacancy to her. However, ſhe was very angry that Atergatis ſhould find fault with her too often viſits of Spitridates, and was alſo ſomething angry to obſerve that the illuſtrious Priſoner was ſomething civil towards her. Furthermore, Intaphernes thought much at Atergatis, knowing his paſſion to the Princeſs of Bythinia, that he ſhould offer ſo obſtinately to reſiſt him. Nor did he take it well that Iſtrina ſhould accompany that Princeſs with ſo many ſigns of unwillingneſs, though he would not have her break off with Atergatis. But he took it much worſe, that the Princeſs whom he loved ſhould not give him any hopes of his happineſs in a Conjuncture wherein he thought ſhe might will permit him to make tryal of it by diſcovering his deſign unto Arſamones. Thus theſe five illuſtrious perſons, murmuring in ſecret without any open Complaints, they knew not what to ſay when met together.

In the mean time Arſamones after he had given ſo much time as he thought requiſite for the beauty of Iſtrina to worke its effects in driving Araminta out of his ſons heart, he began to ſpeak big like a Prince that would be obeyed: and to declare unto Arbiana, unto the Princeſs his Daughter, unto Spitridates, and every one to whom he ſpake, that he was fully reſolved to Court Iſtrina unto the marriage of Spitridates, and that he was reſolved to hinder Spitridates from marrying Araminta. You may judge Madam, how this reſolution did perplex all the perſons that were concerned in the buſineſs: Then did the Princeſs of Bythinia, Iſtrina, Intaphernes, and Atergatis being all together, begin to juſtifie themſelves by accuſing each other. and laying the misfortune upon every one but themſelves: But when this ſecret poyſon which had lurked in their hearts, and cauſed many a throb, did begin to evaporate by complaints, they began to take freſh comfort. At firſt they vented their Complaints tumultuouſly and in much confuſion, but by degrees collecting their thoughts into ſome order, they did all juſtifie themſelves; and their paſſions teaching them to excuſe the paſſions of others, they made a Peace, and accuſed only themſelves for this ſecret ſchiſm which was like to have ſpoiled their whole buſineſs: So that eſteem, Love, and friendſhip aſſuming place in their hearts without any anger, ſpight, and a miſcellany of many other tumultuous thoughts, they began to complain of their own miſeries, and not of one anothers. But though this ſeemed to be ſolidly made, yet Atergatis whoſe love was very violent, he could not hope for any ſatisfaction of it, until he had found out a way to make the deſign of Arſamenes impoſſible. Though theſe perſons had infinite ſpirits and wit in abundance, yet they were extreamly puzled. For, ſaid the Princeſs of Bythinia, though it ſhould be poſſible to murder the paſſion of the Prince my Brother, yet I ſhould never conſent unto it: and though I believe his liberty would be his Exile, perhaps coſt him his life, at leaſt be very long, yet I wiſh he had it. It is the only remedy replied Atergatis, which can be found to comfort this illuſtrious Prince, and perhaps to force Arſamenes unto a ceſſation of his perſecutions; for truly, Madam, what comfort can you take to ſee the Prince Spitridates loaden with fetters, and to ſee him perpetually tormented by the King your Father? Though its true, replied ſhe, that it would be more advantagious for the Prince my Brother to wander like a fugitive, than to continue a Priſoner; yet there is a ſtrong reaſon which forbids me to procure his liberty if I could: For ſince the King my Father during the exile of the Prince my Brother, would declare me Queen, I ought not to expoſe my ſelf unto any ſuſpition of ſuch unjuſt ambition.

Oh, Madam, (ſaid Iſtrina) your generoſity is too ſcrupulous: How can the Prince Spitridates ever ſuſpect you of any thoughts to reign in his prejudice? you I ſay, whoſe ſoul is ſo high, ſo noble, and ſo diſintereſſed? and who is capable of no further ambition, but to render your ſelf worthy of more eſteem than ever any had? whilſt Iſtrina was talking thus, Intaphernes hardly hearing what ſhe ſaid, conſulted with himſelf, whether the liberty of Spitridates would be advantagious to him or no; and after a ſerious debate with himſelf he concluded, that as long as Arſamones had any thoughts of diſinheriting Spitridates he could never pretend unto the Princeſs of Bythinia; ſo that meaſuring the intereſt of that Prince by his own, he thought it better for him that he continued ſtill a Priſoner, than to wander over the world as he did during his exile. So that concurring with the opinion of the Bythinian Princeſs, and Iſtrina not daring to contradict them, Atergatis was ſingular in his opinion, and conſequently did ſubmit in appearance. However he was perſwaded that the violence of Arſamones would reach further than they imagined, and that there was no other remedy neither for Spitridates nor himſelf, than that which he had propounded: And he intended to try if there was any poſſible ways to ſet that Prince at liberty, and put it in execution when he thought beſt.

But whiles theſe four were thus reaſoning with themſelvs, Spitridates having received no anſwer from Araminta, to whom he had writ, he was extreamly ſad, in thought that her infidelity was the cauſe of her ſilence: For, Madam, he knew not how he who carried his Letter unto that Princeſs, and was to bring her anſwer, was ſtopped by the Forces of Crœſus, and carried unto Sardis, as we underſtood, after the liberty of Spitridates, ſo that this unfortunate Prince being every day forced by his paſſion to expreſs a thouſand teſtimonies of fidelity unto a Princeſs whom he thought perfidious, his deſpair was ſometimes ſo great, that he wiſhed himſelf able to hate Araminta. But for all that he ſtill loved her with a moſt unalterable conſtancy; and certainly he gave ſufficient teſtimony of it after the Peace was eſtabliſhed between Intaphernes, Atergatis, Iſtrina, and the Bythinian Princeſs: For Arſamones being infinitely enraged at his reſolute reſiſtance, went to ſee him, and gave him ſuch bitter and menacing language, as any other heart but that of Spitridates would have trembled: Yet he kept cloſe unto his preſcribed Principles; and without ſtarting the leaſt jot from his fidelity to Araminta, or reverence unto the King his Father, he reſiſted him without any tartneſs or complaint. But the more patient and wiſe he was in his ſorrows, the more violent and unjuſt was Arſamones in his anger.

Know thou baſe man that thou art, (ſaid he unto him) that ſince thou wilt not be like the ſon of a King thou ſhalt not be one: And to deprive thee of any title or right to ſucceed in two Kingdoms which I poſſeſs, I will declare and renounce the Kingdom of Bythinia, and that I have no other pretence unto it but as a Conqueror. Look upon me (ſaid this incenſed Prince) as an Uſurper, and not as a legitimate King: but as an Uſurper who can ſoveraignly diſpoſe of what I have uſurped, and as one that will never give it unto a man who is unworthy of it, and covers himſelf with eternal ſhame, if within one month he do not repent: this is the utmoſt minute that I will give him, to chooſe whether he will be a King or a ſlave: Then this violent Prince leaving him, he was at freedom to complain againſt his injuſtice. But Madam, why ſhould I conſume any time in telling you the inquietudes of a Prince whom the Gods had ſo pointed out for a ſufferer? It is more requiſite I acquaint you how Atergatis apprehending that Spitridates was reſolved not to obey Arſamones, and that Iſthrina was not ſo ambitious as to be Queen of two Kingdoms, he reſolved as I told you before, to try all manner of ways how to releaſe him; for being of a moſt liberal diſpoſition, and a winning ſpirit, queſtionleſs he was qualified for ſuch an enterprize. But, Madam, that which moſt advanced his Plot was, that whilſt he was tampering to ſuborn the Guards of Spitridates, which ſtood at the Gates of the Tower, to the end they might ſuborn thoſe who were nearer his perſon, this generous Priſoner was tampering with thoſe who were in his Chamber, to the end they ſhould corrupt thoſe which were placed at the Gate of the Tower: So that, Madam, though Atergatis and Spitridates held not any correſpondency together, yet they tranſacted as if they had, ſo that by chance working together upon thoſe whom they attempted to perſwade, it hapned that when the Guards which were within the Tower did propoſe the releaſement of Spitridates unto thoſe who were without, they found them upon the ſame deſign, and ready to make the ſame Propoſitions unto them within. So that there being a facility to inter-perſwade each other, the buſineſs was quickly concluded, and as ſoon executed: For ſince the Tower ſtood upon the Seaſide, Atergatis having provided a Bark ready the ſame night which he made choice of for the releaſement of this Illuſtrious Priſoner: It was an eaſie matter for the ſuborned Guards who were much the greater number, to quell the reſt, to releaſe this Prince, to carry him to the Bark, and to embark with him: But, Madam, the wonder was, Spitridates was releaſed, and none knew not who releaſed him until he came unto the Sea-ſide: For then the Prince Atergatis, who would ſee the execution of the buſineſs, did make himſelf known unto him.

And to compleat his generoſity, he gave him a Page, and told him that he ſhould find in the Bark all things requiſite or neceſſary for ſo long a Voyage: After which Spitridates giving thanks unto his Deliverer with all the haſt of a man that feared to loſe a happineſs which he was ready to enjoy, he parted from him, and making all ſail and oar they could, he went I know not whither; for after his departure from Heraclea, we never heard where he landed. We underſtood he was at Atarmes, where you Madam took him for Cyrus and that he ſaw you Embark with the King of Pontus, but we could never learn whether he went ſtraight from Heraclea unto Atarmes.

In the mean while, though he loved Democlides very well, who was in the ſame priſon with him, yet he was not releaſed; for the buſineſs was done ſo haſtily, that the Guards of Spitridates, never thought of going to the Chamber of Democlides: And Spitridates himſelf, doubtleſs all his thoughts were ſo taken up with Araminta, that he thought of nothing elſe.

But, Madam, the moſt obſervable paſſage was, that the Prince Atergatis was not at all ſuſpected: and if he had not himſelf confeſſed it unto the Princeſs Iſtrina; and Intaphernes, we had not known it. To tell you, Madam, how much Arſamones was both aſtoniſhed and angered when he knew of Spitridates his eſcape, were to attempt a thing impoſſible: As for Arbiana, ſhe was very glad, for ſhe began to fear the violence of the King. As for the Princeſs of Bythinia, ſhe both joyed and grieved, foreſeeing that this Exile would be worſe to him than the other: As for Intaphernes though he was glad for Spitridates, dates, yet he grieved for himſelf, becauſe he thought that the liberty of this Prince would be an obſtacle unto his deſign: And as for Atergatis, his joys were as plump as he could either wiſh or hope; and to make them more ſenſible to him he underſtood that Iſtrina was glad of Spitridates his eſcape.

In the mean time, ſince the pride of Arſamones would never let him complain long he affected to ſeem as if he were eaſily comforted for the abſence of the Prince his ſon, whom he openly ſaid ſhould never be his Succeſſor. Thus in a few days there was as great a calm in the Court, as if this ſtorm had never riſen: For ſince every one ſtood in fear of Arſamones, they durſt neither rejoice nor grieve openly at the liberty or abſence of Spitridates: And all that the Queen could do, was to obtain the liberty of Democlides, upon condition to depart from Heraclea.

After that things had thus reſted ſome days, it was known that the Governour of the Caſtle which ſtood upon the Frontiers of Bythinia towards Galatia, had ſent a Poſt unto Arſamones about ſome important intelligence, and that Arſamones had ſent twice to him. But that which did a little ſurprize all the Court, was, that Arſamones would have the two Princes, Intaphernes and Atergatis go with him unto the Frontiers of Bythinia. So that going neither to Calcedonia nor Chryſipolis, which are the two chief Towns, we went unto a little Village not above fifty furlongs from this Caſtle, whoſe Governour had given this intelligence, which we were all ignorant of, but preſently after knew what it was.

Be pleaſed to know, Madam, that the King of Aſſiria, after he went from Sardis, whilſt the illuſtrious Cyrus was gone with Spitridates to the Princeſs Araminta, and with intention to enquire into what part of the world the King of Pontus had hurried you, this King of Aſſiria received falſe intelligence, which cauſed his impriſonment. For you muſt know, Madam, he was told that the King of Pontus, whoſe Father Reigned with Soveraignty ſufficient to have many Creatures there, had yet ſo many friends left, as had plotted a great Conſpiracy againſt Arſamones, which would preſently break out into a flame; ſo that the King of Aſſiria being informed of the buſineſs, ſineſs, and that the King of Pontus after he had carried you, Madam, from Sardis, had carried you into Bythinia, to the houſe of the head-man in the Conſpiracy which was very ſtrong; and that he carried you thither, with intentions to hide you there until all things were in readineſs to ſet you upon the Throne, he bended his courſe that way.

Though this intelligence was not probable, yet there was in it ſome appearance of poſſibility, which that Prince thought he ought not to neglect: ſo that he reſolved for Bythinia, to ſatisfie himſelf of the truth. But ſince Arſamones, as I already told you, did keep a very ſtrict Guard in all his Dominions, as if the King whom he had vanquiſhed and driven out were ſtill in the head of an Army, the King of Aſſiria being to paſs a Bridg over the River Sangar, was ſtopped by the Guards there, to know from whence he came, and whither he went But he being of an imperious temper, in lieu of anſwering to thoſe Queſtions, begun to be angry, and his Examiners being ſomething inſolent with him, he drew his ſword, and wounded two or three of them. Since he had only one Page with him, ſince there was above twenty Souldiers there, and ſince many people of the Town at the end of this Bridg compaſſing him about, he was arreſted, after he had wounded many of them, and afterwards was carried to the Caſtle I ſpeak of.

As ſoon as he who commanded it did look upon him, he knew that he had ſeen him in the Army under the name of Philidaſpes, at the ſame time when Cyrus under the name of Artamenes got victory upon victory in the Wars then againſt the Kings of Pontus and Phrygia: So that this man conſidering the importance of his Priſoner, did look very carefully to him, and acquainted Arſamones, who no ſooner knew it but he came preſently from Heraclea, to the place I mentioned before, to the end he might the better dive into the deſign which the King of Aſſiria might have in coming into Bythinia: But being a Prince who never uſed to impart his thoughts, unleſs there was an abſolute neceſſity for it, he kept this intelligence very cloſe: ſo that though the Village where the Court was, was within fifty furlongs from this Caſtle, Yet we knew not who was in it, nor why we were there.

In the mean time, ſince Arſamones was concerned in all the harſh uſage of the Aſſirian King heretofore unto Intaphernes and Iſtrina, he ſhould not have any great diſpoſition to treat this Prince very well: Yet ſince the rule of all his actions was only his own intereſt, he never had any Friend with whom he would not break, if it would be advantagious for him; nor ever had he any Enemy unto whom he would not reconcile himſelf upon the ſame reaſon: So that having this Prince in his power, he conſidered what uſe might be made of him. Then he apprehended, that when Cyrus had releaſed you Madam, his deſires of bringing all Aſia into ſubjection, would move him to make War upon himſelf, and the Princeſs Araminta would prompt him to it; for he knew not yet how the Prince Phraartes had carryed her away.

Arſamones then, conſidering all theſe things, he thought fit to give the valour of Cyrus ſome employment, and to make unto himſelf an Allie, ſo brave and couragious as the King of Aſſiria was. Then his deſign was, to propound unto him a marriage with the Princeſs Iſtrina; and for the better acceptance, he offered to kindle a Rebellion in Babylon, by ſome correſpondencies which he had there, and to joyn with him againſt all his Enemies: For knowing very well that Gadates was zealous for this Match; and ſeeing there was no hopes for Spitridates, he thought it would not be a hard matter to bring Iſtrina unto obedience. Moreover, ſince he had indeed diſcovered that Intaphernes was in Love with the Princeſs his Daughter, his Plot was to give her unto him, upon condition he would move Iſtrina to marry the King of Aſſiria: And upon that condition, he would ſolemnly declare, that Spitridates ſhould never be King either of Pontus or Bythinia.

And in order to this, he ſent Atergatis unto Chalcedonia, under a pretence of ſome popular ſtirs there, which indeed were already appeaſed, to the end his preſence might be no obſtacle to his deſign. Atergatis then was no ſooner gone, but Arſamones went to ſee the King of Aſſiria, whom he treated with as high Civilities, as if he were upon his own Throne.

But, Madam, I cannot tell whether I ought to go on with my relation, and whether you will think good I ſhould ſpeak ſo particularly of a Princes love, who hath been a cauſe of your many miſeries: Yet the King of Aſſiria's buſineſs is ſo intertwiſted with the hiſtory of Intaphernes, Atergatis, Iſtrina, and the Princeſs of Bythinia, as I cannot relate the one without the other.

Since they are inſeparable, replied Mandana, I had rather hear you ſpeak of a Prince whom I do not love, than not to know the ſequel of their Adventures whom I do infinitely eſteem. Beſides, you know, that ſometimes one may be as inquiſitive of the actions of an Enemy, as of Friends: Therefore Orcames, I pray tell me all the paſſages in Bythinia, as if I had not been intereſted in them, and as if I did not hate the King of Aſſiria; upon this command Orcames went on with his relation.

Arſamones then being with the King of Aſſiria, and treating him, as I told you, with all poſſible Civilities, did at firſt condole his misfortunes, and after many obliging expreſſions, told him, that it ſhould only be long of himſelf, if he were not more happy: Then he offered to cauſe a Revolt in Babylon, to give him a conſiderable Army: And that he would joyn inſeparably with him to oppoſe the Conqueſts of Cyrus, provided he would marry Iſtrina as the Queen Nitocris wiſhed. As ſoon as Arſamones had done ſpeaking, the King of Aſſiria did ſharply anſwer, that he would moſt willingly accept of his Propoſition without the Condition annexed to it, but otherwiſe he could never think of it: For indeed, ſaid he unto him, ſince I could not love Iſtrina at a time when I was in Love with none; certainly I can never love her now, when I am in love with the faireſt and moſt divine Princeſs that ever lived: Therefore never offer me ſuch a thing as I cannot accept off, but let me go and ſeek out the King of Pontus who hath raviſhed away the Princeſs whom I adore, and that I may gratifie you for my liberty, by ridding you of an Enemy who will be a perpetual thorn in the Crowns that you have conquered. Since Cyrus ſeeks him with a hundred thouſand men (replied Arſamones) It is probable he will find him before you, Sir. Therefore I beſeech you, let not that be any hinderance unto your acceptance of this advantagious Propoſition.

The King of Aſſiria hearing Arſamones ſay ſo, did think he jeared at him, and began to be angry: And Arſamones being as violent as he, this Converſation, which began with Civilities was like to end with injuries. Yet the King of Bythinia thought his deſign might take, and that deſire of liberty might bring the King of Aſſiria unto his Bent: So that deſiring to prepare Intaphernes for his ends, he took him aſide the ſame night: and after he had told him how the King of Aſſiria was his Priſoner, he began to propound the marriage of Iſtrina with him. Arſamones had no ſooner pronounced thoſe words, but Intaphernes being tranſported with ſome violence; How, Sir, (ſaid he unto him) can I ever conſent my Siſter ſhould ever marry a Prince who hath moſt injuriouſly affronted me, and that ſhe ſhould caſt off one who is my intimate Friend? Fie, no, Sir, it is not poſſible, nor do I take the heart of Iſtrina to be ſo baſe, as to have any ſuch thoughts, though the King of Aſſiria were upon his Throne: Be not ſo haſty (replied Arſamones coldly) and to let you ſee, that I know a way how to make you like the motion; know, that if you do perſwade Iſtrina unto my deſires, and unto what you know very well the Prince your Father deſires, I will conſent you ſhall marry my Daughter whom I know you love; upon condition notwithſtanding that you promiſe me never to reſtore the Kingdom of Pontus, nor the Kingdom of Bythinia unto the unworthy Spitridates.

This Propoſition did ſo amaze Intaphernes, that for a time he was not able to anſwer: But as he was ready to reply, Arſamones left him, and ſaid, that he ſaw ſo much turbulency in his mind, that he would not have him anſwer confuſedly, but would give him time to conſult with his Ambition and his Love; after which he left him in a moſt perplexed condition: For on the other ſide, he found abundance of joys, in having a poſſibility to enjoy the Princeſs whom he adored: But when he conſidered, that to enjoy ſo great a happineſs, he muſt give his Siſter unto his Enemy, betray his Friend, and uſurp the Dominions of a Brother unto his Princeſs by accepting it, his Soul was in a very Hell. Nor did he believe that the Princeſs of Bythinia would ever marry him upon thoſe terms, though he ſhould promiſe her not to take any advantage of this declaration; for he had heard her expreſs ſomething which intimated as much: So that whether he conſidered his hatred of the Aſſirian King, his friendſhip to Atergatis, the averſion of Iſtrina to the one, her inclination to the other: Or whether he conſidered his duty to Spitridates, and the high generoſity of the Bythinian Princeſs: He ſaw that Arſamones offered him a benefit which he could not enjoy upon ſuch conditions, though he did accept them; and conſequently his ſorrows were not mean.

In the mean time, he knew not whether he ſhould acquaint firſt the Princeſs of Bythinia, or Iſtrina with it: But going into the Chamber of the Bythinian Princeſs, and finding them both together, he could not any longer let this vexatious ſecret lye lurking in his heart. You may eaſily conceive, Madam, how theſe two Princeſſes wondred when they heard the King of Aſſiria was Priſoner, and when they heard the King of Bythinia's Propoſition unto Intaphernes. Truth is, their wonder was ſo great, as they both did extreamly bluſh, though for different reaſons. But ſince the Princeſs Iſtrina's heart did extreamly hate the King of Aſſiria, and was very tender towards Atergatis, ſhe was the firſt that ſpoke, though it was not ſhe unto whom the Prince Intaphernes addreſſed his ſpeech: Oh Heavens (ſaid ſhe very heartily) can Arſamones ever think of forcing me to marry the King of Aſſiria; Oh, Madam, (added ſhe and looked upon the Princeſs of Bythinia) I beſeech you pardon me if I do not obey him: It is moſt juſt I ſhould (replied that generous Princeſs) ſince I am reſolved to commit the ſame Crime my ſelf: For though I do eſteem the Prince Intaphernes, and have given him a higher place in my heart, than ever any had; yet I aſſure you, I ſhall never conſent he ſhould take two Kingdoms from the Prince my Brother, nor be ever happy by making him miſerable. However, Madam, (replied Intaphernes and ſighed) I beſeech you honour me ſo far as to allow me ſome comfort for refuſing a benefit which you will not let me accept of, and which Honour forbids me as well as my Siſter, ſince ſhe cannot endure to be Wife unto the King of Aſſiria, rather than unto Atergatis: Do but acknowledge, Madam, that the generoſity of your Soul is the only impediment, and that if it were leſs, you could conſent unto my happineſs. I do acknowledge, ſaid ſhe and bluſhed, that I wiſh you were, but if you ſhould be capable of deſiring it by unjuſt ways, in lieu of wiſhing your happineſs, I believe I ſhould wiſh the contrary. But, Madam, not to conſume more time in repeating the diſcourſe of theſe three Illuſtrious Perſons; it was reſolved that they ſhould write unto Atergatis to invite his return, and that in the interim, Iſtrina ſhould take upon her to reſiſt Arſamones, ſince Intaphernes had not power to inceſe a Prince who had made him ſuch a motion as might make him happy if ſome unjuſt Conditions were not annexed to it: But that which moſt troubled them was, that they could not know whether the King of Aſſiria had denied Arſamones; but on the contrary had cauſe to believe, that he had not, and that deſire of liberty had altered his mind.

In the mean time, the King of Bythinia who was ever wedded to his own will, asked Intaphernes the next morning, if he had conſidered upon the motion, and that Prince in order unto their reſolutions, aſſured him, that there was ſo much glory to him in it, that he thought himſelf capable of committing Crimes rather than not to accept of it: but alſo he was obliged to tell him, that he verily believed that the Princeſs Iſtrina would never obey him if he commanded her to marry her Enemy. To this Arſamones anſwered, That a Prince who knew ſo well how to bring two Kingdoms into ſubjection, knew well enough how to make Iſtrina obey him; ſo that aſſuring himſelf of that, he bent all his endeavours to perſwade the King of Aſſiria: But all to no purpoſe, that Prince ſtill telling him, that you, Madam, and you only ſhould Reign in his heart as long as he lived: That he had nothing to do with Kingdoms, that he had no need of any Army, and that he only deſired his Liberty, adding ſome expreſſions which noted his extream averſion unto Iſtrina and Intaphernes, of whom he ſpoke with intollerable ſcorn, as we afterwards underſtood by one of the Guards in his Chamber.

Moreover, when Arſamones did one day preſs Intaphernes to the Declaration which he would require of him, never to reſtore the Kingdoms of Pontus and Bythinia unto Spitridates, he perfectly perceived, notwithſtanding all his handſome anſwers, that they did not proceed from his intentions: So that being very angry, and finding his deſign to be impoſſible, he plotted another which he thought more eaſie, by which he thought to be better revenged upon Spitridates, and to hinder Araminta and all her family from having any part in his Dominions, and this it was: His deſign was not to ſpeak of Iſtrina any more unto the King of Aſſiria, thinking his averſion to her was chiefly his reaſon for not accepting his offer. However, Arſamones would have the Queen viſit the impriſoned King, that ſhe ſhould carry the Princeſs her Daughter with her; and ſo they did, who not being able to gueſs at his deſign, were very glad to ſee a Prince whoſe Adventures were ſo extraordinary, and who was ſo much talked of over all Aſia. Since you are all goodneſs, Madam, I hope you will give me leave without any anger to tell you, that he received theſe Princeſſes with much civility, and uſed many expreſſions which were full of ſpirit, full of generoſity, and full of love to you: For he did moſt earneſtly intreat them to be Mediators unto the King for his liberty, that he might go and recover yours: And the more to oblige them unto it, he fell into moſt high Elogies of you. But after that, ſince the natural impetuoſity of his humour could not longer be hid; the Queen by chance naming Intaphernes, this violent Prince fell into ſuch an angry chafe both againſt him and Iſtrina alſo, and uſed ſuch unjuſt and injurious expreſſions, that theſe two Princeſſes were not able to endure it; yet having no mind to quarrel with a Prince whoſe impriſonment ſeemed to them unjuſt, they retired, promiſing him their interceſſions unto Arſamones for his liberty. But as ſoon as they were out of the Chamber, the King of Bythinia ſent to tell him that he would mention Iſtrina no more unto him, but would offer unto him the Princeſs his Daughter, and two Kingdoms, that he would recover Babylon for him by the help of ſome intelligence which he had: and aſſuring him that within fifteen days he would give him an Army able to reſiſt Cyrus, if he would make war with him. Tell the King your Maſter (replied this Prince unto the man by whom Arſamones ſent this meſſage) that if I could ceaſe being the Rival of Cyrus, doubtleſs I ſhould become his friend: for beſides all his rare qualities worthy of my amity, I muſt acknowledge that I owe him my ſelf: So that were I not his Rival I ſhould never raiſe an Army to oppoſe him. But aſſure Arſamones alſo, that though the Princeſs his Daughter be full of perfections; and though I have as great a diſpoſition to eſteem her, as I have averſion unto Iſtrina, yet I cannot hearken unto a ſecond Propoſition, with a more favourable ear than unto the firſt; For ſince I muſt ever be the Lover of the Princeſs Mandana, I can never be the Husband of the Bythinian Princeſs. But, Sir, (replied the man) were you in any hopes of ever obtaining the love of this Princeſs whom you adore, I ſhould not think it ſo ſtrange, that you ſhould refuſe this Offer: But I muſt confeſs, when I conſider how you have loſt your Kingdom, that the Princeſs Mandana does not love you, and that yet you ſhould refuſe two Kingdoms with one of the faireſt Princeſs's in the world; for one that hates you, my wonder is beyond my words: What e're it be (replied the King of Aſſiria very ſharply) ſuch are my real thoughts; and if the Empire of all Aſia were offered me, with a condition not to pretend unto Mandana, I would refuſe it, as I do the Kingdoms of Pontus and Bythinia: Oh Heavens (cried he) was ever any Fate like mine? Arſamones would give me two Kingdoms, and a Princeſs worth more than both, yet will not give me that liberty which unleſs he violate the Laws of Nations he cannot take from me: Is it poſſible that I alone ſhould be the only man in all the Univerſe unto whom he can give his Kingdoms, and the Princeſs his Daughter? I ſee very well (purſued this violent Prince) that he makes choice of me before any other, becauſe he knows that if I accept of them I ſhall never reſtore them unto the King of Pontus, or any of his Family, and ſo the hate he bears unto his Enemies is the cauſe of his choice: But ſince his Intereſt alone doth prompt him unto the offer, he muſt not take it ill, if mine prompt me to a refuſal.

fuſal. Tell him therefore, that if I had power not to love the Princeſs Mandana, and to overcome my ſelf, I had driven her out of my heart, before they drove me out of Babylon, and that I ſhould have conquered my ſelf before Cyrus did overcome me: Or to expreſs my ſelf better, if ever I could have left loving his Princeſs, it would have been when ſhe deſired me to do it with her Eyes full of Tears: And therefore I cannot follow theſe motions of hatred and revenge, which induce Arſamones to make ſuch odd Propoſitions unto me, that I cannot accept of them upon thoſe terms, though they ſeem very advantagious to me. Tell him then that I can be his Friend, but I cannot be the Husband of the Princeſs his Daughter: And ſo he needs not urge me to no purpoſe unto a thing which I cannot do; for the moſt certain truth is, I do love and am not loved, and I am fully reſolved ſo to do till death or fortune change my deſtiny. But if after all this Arſamones will wilfully keep me a Priſoner, and hinder me from releaſing Mandana, tell him then, that this King without a Kingdom whom he holds in his hands, and whom he thinks ſo weak and wanting all protection, perhaps is powerful enough to cauſe the ruin of his new Dominions, and make him loſe thoſe two Kingdoms which he offers me, ſince he hath a Rival ſo generous as to releaſe him, though he be his moſt mortal Enemy. After this the King of Aſſiria made a ſign with his hand unto the man, which intimated that he had no more to ſay, and that he ſhould return to the King his Maſter, and did it with as much auſtere Majeſty, as if he were ſtill upon his Throne. Alſo he who was a witneſs of his violence and choller was ſurprized, that after he had reported unto Arſamones, how the King of Aſſiria received his meſſage, he could not keep that ſecret which was ſuch a wonder to him: So that imparting it unto me, I was extreamly aſtoniſhed to hear that Arſamones ſhould alter his reſolution.

In the mean time, I thought it requiſite to acquaint the perſons intereſted in this odd deſign: For I muſt confeſs, Madam, that as reſolute as the King of Aſſiria's anſwer was, yet I thought he might change his mind. Therefore I reſolved to make the ſtate of things known unto thoſe who might find a remedy. As I went unto Intaphernes, nes, I found Atergatis with him, who returned ſooner than expected; but returned ſo ſad to hear that Arſamones would marry Iſtrina unto the King of Aſſiria, that Intaphernes was not able to comfort him; and as ſoon as he ſaw me he called me to help him to ſettle the mind of Atergatis: Alas, Sir, anſwered I, I am not very fit to comfort him and you alſo; for I aſſure you, when I have imparted all, the Prince Atergatis hath no other ſorrows but what will be yours; for the truth is, Sir, it is not Iſtrina whom Arſamones would have the King of Aſſiria to marry, but it is the Princeſs of Bythinia Theſe were ſuch words of wonder that both theſe Princes cried out: But, oh Heavens, how different were their tones, and how ſad was the ſound of Intaphernes his voice? Indeed, Madam, I am not able to expreſs what I ſaw in the Faces of theſe two Lovers: I ſaw in one minute deſpair to paſs out of the heart of Atergatis, into that of Intaphernes; fury was quenched in the Soul of one, and kindled in the Soul of the other; I ſaw ſorrow dye in the Eyes of Atergatis and revive in Intaphernes: And in an inſtant I ſaw the Comforter become the ſad man, and the ſad man become the Comforter. I ſhould abuſe your Patience, Madam, if I ſhould relate unto you all their Lamentations, or how Atergatis imployed the ſame Arguments of Conſolation unto Intaphernes, which he immediately before received from him: Nor will I relate all that the Princeſs Iſtrina, and the Princeſs of Bythinia ſaid, when they knew the buſineſs; for having formerly acquainted you particularly with their virtue, and the innocent paſſions of their Souls; you may eaſily conceive they expreſſed their ſorrows unto each other. However theſe croſs adventures produced one happineſs unto theſe two Lovers, ſince they obliged the Princeſſes whom they loved, to give them as ſweet and tender Language, as if their Souls were in much more tranquility: For doubtleſs there is nothing fitter to induce a perſon who loves to unmask affection, than misfortunes and ſorrows. Whilſt things were in this condition, it was known how the King of Pontus carryed you, Madam, unto Cumes; And that Cyrus went to beſiege it; ſo that this news having infuſed other thoughts into the mind of Arſamones, who was extreamly incenſed againſt the King of Aſſiria for his refuſal, every one was in a ſtrange wonder to hear that we muſt all return unto Heraclea: And our wonder was the greater, becauſe he appointed (without giving any reaſon for it) all thoſe only whom he had told that the King of Aſſiria was in his power, to keep it ſecret: After which all departed; this Prince, leaving ſo many men as he judged fit for the Guard of this Caſtle where the King was priſoner, yet not daring to leave ſo many as he wiſhed, leaſt that ſhould be ſuſpected which he would not have known. Since this Prince was of a very cloſe ſpirit, we could not then dive into thoſe myſteries which afterwards we knew: For indeed, Madam it was at that time, when Arſamones to be revenged upon the King of Aſſiria, and to get the King of Pontus into his power, did ſend unto the Illuſtrious Cyrus this meſſage, that if he would promiſe to reſtore the King of Pontus into his hands when he had taken Cumes, he in exchange would reſtore the King of Aſſiria into his power. But, as you know, Madam, the Illuſtrious Cyrus having received a Letter from this Captive King, he took a more heroick reſolution, and denyed Arſamones.

In the mean time, Intaphernes and Atergatis were not at all happy: for Arſamones leaving Arbiana and the Princeſſes at Heraclea, he carryed them unto Cabara, where he grew ſo melancholy (when upon the return of his Meſſenger, and the arrival of Hidaſpes he heard of the generoſity of Cyrus) that he fell ſick there: yet he would not let the Queen bring the Princeſſes with her, when ſhe came, but commanded her to leave them at Heraclea; for his ſoul was in ſuch a fury, that he could not endure Intaphernes, or Atergatis ſhould have ſo much comfort as to ſee the Princeſſes whom they loved.

In the mean time, his ſickneſs continued ſo long, that it did facilitate the liberty of the Aſſirian King. For though they told him that Hidaſpes when he departed was gone into Galatia, and Cappadocia; and that he drew out of all his Garriſons into a body, he could not believe that Cyrus had commanded him to attempt the delivering of his Enemy by force: but rather imagined, that it was to recruit the Army, than out of any deſire of his

Rival's liberty. So that his Policy being cauſed to ſleep by the violence of his ſickneſs, he gave Hidaſpes time to ſurpriſe the Caſtle where the King of Aſſiria was, and to deliver that Prince. 'Tis true, that Intaphernes and Atergatis were ſo afraid, leſt the fancy ſhould take Arſamones to make him either marry Iſtrina, or the Bythinian Princeſs, they were not very forward in giving any advice for his ſecurity: And though they did moſt horridly hate the King of Aſſiria, yet they wiſhed his liberty; And they were as much joyed, as Arſamones was angred, when the news of his ſurprizal was brought to Cabara: Inſomuch as Intaphernes not being able to hide his joys, this violent Prince ſuſpected, that he gave intelligence unto Hidaſpes to ſurpriſe the Caſtle: And his ſuſpitions of it were the greater, when he knew that the Prince Gadates had writ a Letter unto him, which he had not ſhewed, becauſe it appointed him to come thither; and Intaphernes not being able to be at ſuch a diſtance from the Princeſs of Bythinia, would not let Arſamones ſee it, leſt he ſhould move him to obey Gadates ſooner than he had a deſire. However, though this Prince was innocent of that the King of Bythinia did accuſe him, yet he was held guilty, upon bare Conjectures, and baniſhed not only from the Court, but alſo out of all his Dominions. Arbiana did what ſhe could to appeaſe him, but all in vain, for Arſamones would ſet no term when Intaphernes ſhould return into his Dominions; but when he brought with him, either the King of Pontus, or Araminta, or Spitridates. You may eaſily imagine, Madam, how ſad the Prince was, who after a thouſand good Services done unto Arſamones, was treated with ſuch Ingratitude and Injuſtice: Intaphernes out of a reſentment of honour, had a good mind to aſk leave he might carry Iſtrina with him; but conceiving it would be more for his advantage that ſhe ſhould remain with the Princeſs whom he loved, he rejected that thought. However, obey he muſt becauſe he could not help it, and the willinger, becauſe the Princeſs of Bythinia commanded him: Yet in ſpight of Arſamones, he had the ſatisfaction to bid her adieu; for ſince ſhe was at Heraclea, he went out of Cabara in a diſguiſe thither, and ſaw her, in the preſence of Iſtrina and Atergatis who followed him, and of my ſelf. I need not, Madam, make any relation of what theſe perſons did ſay, the thoughts of whoſe hearts were ſo full of tenderneſs: But I aſſure you, that never was any love or friendſhip, ſo fluent in ſweet and paſſionate expreſſions, as theirs, when they expreſſed their ſorrows to part from each other, and to part, not knowing when they ſhould be ſo happy as to meet again. The Princeſs of Bythinia proteſted unto Intaphernes, never to be any's if ſhe were not his. And Atergatis being to loſe his Advocate unto Iſtrina, deſired him to preſs that Princeſs in his preſence unto a Profeſſion never to chaſe him from her heart. Iſtrina and Atergatis then made new Proteſtations of amity unto each other, as well as Intaphernes and Atergatis, ſo as they tyed themſelves unto each other by ſuch knots, as I am moſt confident are indiſſolvable. But, Madam, depart he muſt, and indeed I went with him, to come unto that place where Gadates had ſo long deſired him; But hearing that Cumes was taken, and that you, Madam, were upon your march we changed our way, with intention to meet you upon the Rode.

In the mean time, as the Gods are the only diſpoſers of all Events, ſo the Prince Intaphernes uſing to ride alone, that he might the better contemplate upon his paſſion, he loſt his way in a wild Forreſt, having none with him but only one Page: For though I uſed to keep him company in ſuch ſolitudes, yet I was not then with him, but ſtayed behind with one of his men, and telling him how extreamly affraid I was to meet with the King of Aſſiria, when we came to you. But whilſt I was in fear that Intaphernes might meet with this Prince, the Gods who do not uſe to comply always with the wills of men, but often mock at all humane prudence, did conduct Intaphernes unto the banks of that little River, where the Aſſirian King was taking the Air, whilſt you, Madam, was in the Temple; and ſtayed in the pleaſant place until the hour of your ſetting out. I underſtand ſince by the Page which followed Intaphernes, and by Intaphernes himſelf, all the paſſages of this meeting: And ſince I underſtand by Marteſia that you, Madam, do not know it, but deſires information, I ſhall acquaint you with the particulars; and if I ſhould conceal an Action ſo gallant and noble I ſhould not make a perfect relation of Intaphernes his life. Be pleaſed to know then, Madam, that this Prince riding ſafely along the banks of this little River, hoping ſtill to meet with us again, leaſt he ſhould be forced to arrive at a place where he thought you was, without any Train or Equipage; Love did ſo take up all the faculties of the Soul, that he ſcarcely knew what he did, or ſaw. On the other ſide, the King of Aſſiria who ſeemed as deep in contemplation as Intaphernes, though according to his natural impetuoſity he went as faſt as if he had a great journy to go, he was alſo on the banks of this River, with one Page only; So as Intaphernes came towards the King of Aſſiria, as the King of Aſſiria came towards Intaphernes: who being both of them in deep ſtudies, they paſſed ſo neer each other, that their Horſes ſtarting at the ſame time made both of them think themſelves aſſaulted; So that rowſing out of their ſtudies, and ſtopping their Horſes, they looked ſternly upon each other to know who it was that aſſaulted them: and both knowing each other, the King of Aſſiria he thought that Intaphernes intended to fall upon him, as Intaphernes thought that the King of Aſſiria intended to put a new affront upon him: So as both being high in anger, they firſt looked upon one another as men who had diſpoſitions to quarrel. Yet Intaphernes gave him a Salute, but it was with ſo many ſigns of indignation, that his reſpects did not diminiſh the King of Aſſiria's fury: For as ſoon as Intaphernes had ſaluted him, he went two paces back, and began to ſpeak in a haughty and proud tone: For ought I ſee (ſaid he in a moſt ſcornful manner) you are as inſolent here, as you were ambitious in Babylon, and it ſeems alſo that you have been moſt unjuſt in Bythinia, in being ſo bold as to cauſe Arſamones to impriſon me, purpoſely to make me marry one, whom I do not think worthy to be the ſlave of her whom I adore. Oh Sir, (ſaid Intaphernes) you extreamly wrong me, do not urge me againſt my will to forget I have ſeen you upon a Throne, leaſt I ſhould not brook it: For, Sir, hitherto I never failed in my due reſpects unto you; I was never more ambitious at Babylon than did become me, and was ſo far from forcing you to marry my Siſter, that I muſt tell you, that ſhe did more reſiſt Arſamones, than you did, not being ſo baſe as ever to think of being a Wife unto a Prince who hath ſo much ſcorned her and wronged me. Therefore, Sir, I beſeech you, with all the Reverence I owe unto You, as Son unto the Queen Nitocris, do not force me to caſt off all thoſe reſpects: I cannot tell what thou meaneſt (replied the King of Aſſyria ſharply) but I am ſure I cannot brook the inſolency of a Subject, whoſe duty is to reverence me as much in my Fetters as if I were on my Throne. Upon theſe words the King of Aſſyria drawing his Sword he forced Intaphernes to draw his alſo, only at firſt to defend himſelf from the King of Aſſyria's blows: And indeed this generous Prince ſtriving to overcome his reſentments did recoil ſome paces in defending himſelf; and ſpeaking again, in the name of the Gods, Sir, (ſaid he unto him) do not urge me any further, for my patience can hold no longer: wiſh only that thy Valour may hold out (replied the King of Aſſyria, in preſſing harder upon him) unleſs thou wilt feel the ſharpneſs of mine. After this, Madam, Interphernes being not able to endure any longer, he did not only fight in defence of his life, but alſo to revenge himſelf. And his Page told me of ſuch prodigies which he did, which are not to be conceived unleſs one had ſeen them. For indeed, Madam, though the King Aſſyria had fought with the Illuſtrions Cyrus, and your ſelf, Madam, had been the Prize of the Combate, yet this violent Prince could not have fought with more Courage. But as Intaphernes had all the ſincerity of a moſt brave man, ſo he told all thoſe unto whom he related this paſſage, that if the King of Aſſyria had ſtood any thing upon his Guard, he ſhould have found a hard task to have vanquiſhed him: and his modeſty made him ſay, that if that valiant Prince had not precipitated himſelf unto his Arms, in ſtriving to finiſh the Combate quickly, he had not been overcome. Indeed, Madam, the King of Aſſyria having wounded himſelf in ſtriving to gain the Crupper, his Sword being broke, and he run through the right Arm with a touch from his Enemy, his great heart was conſtrained to yield. Yet Intaphernes would not abuſe his Victory, by inſulting over his unfortunate Enemy, as unjuſt as he was. But on the contrary, he uſed many generous expreſſions; he askt him whether he would be pleaſed that he ſhould conduct him, offering to hold him up, ſeeing he was not able to ſit on Horſe-back: but this furious Prince would have only his Page to help him; he forbad Intaphernes to come near him, and commanded him to retire. Since thou art ſtill my Subject, though my Conqueror (ſaid this violent Prince unto him) I command thee to get out of my Preſence, for I cannot any longer endure a man who hath ruined all my hopes, ſubverted all my deſigns, and hath retarded either my death or happineſs. Theſe ambiguous words which Intaphernes could not underſtand, moving him to think that his ſorrows for being overcome did diſtract the liberty of his mind; he began to pity him, and offered again to help him, but he fell into ſuch a Chafe, that Intaphernes ſeeing ſome Souldiers a far off coming that way, he was forced to retire.

In the mean time, in lieu of going unto the Caſtle where you, Madam, were, he returned back, being reſolved not to preſent himſelf unto you, Madam, nor unto Cyrus, nor unto the Prince his Father until you were on your march: Conceiving that the King of Aſſiria was in ſuch a condition as he would not be able to follow. And indeed, Madam, this Prince having happily met with us, ſome four Furlongs from the place where he fought, we went to wait upon you, Madam, at the houſe where you ſtayed, and where the Prince Intaphernes had the honour to be preſented unto you that night, by the Illuſtrious Cyrus.

Orcames having ended his Relation, Mandana thanked him for the pains which he had taken in ſatisfying her deſires, and to teſtifie how attentive ſhe had been, ſhe repeated the principal paſſages which he had related: But ſince the laſt words of the Aſſirian King had made ſome impreſſion in the mind of Mandana, ſhe asked Doraliſa what ſhe thought was the meaning of thoſe words, that Intaphernes by vanquiſhing the King of Aſſiria, had ruined all his hopes, ſubverted all his deſigns, and had retarded either his death or his happineſs: For truly (added ſhe) as the ſtate of things ſtand, it is not eaſie to conceive what in any reaſon he could hope for, nor what deſigns he could have which might be advantagious unto him; Nor could he fear any death from a Rival who releaſed him, nor could he ever imagine any happineſs from me: And yet it is to be ſuppoſed, that he ſpoke not theſe without ſome cauſe. I aſſure you, Madam, replied Doraliſa, to be ſo brave, ſo glorious, ſo violent, and ſo deep in love as the King of Aſſiria is, and to be vanquiſhed within a hundred Furlongs of his Rival, and of his Miſtreſs, is enough to make him not know what he ſaid: and therefore there is no heed to be taken unto what he ſaid. Whilſt Doraliſa was ſaying ſo, Marteſia was ſilent, though ſince ſhe knew of the engagement between thoſe two Princes, ſhe underſtood thoſe words better than they: yet ſince the King of Aſſiria was to ſtay behind, and ſince in ſuch a condition as was not to be feared, ſhe ſeemed as if ſhe did not underſtand them: And the Princeſs herſelf concurring with the opinion of Doraliſa, did make no further reflection upon them, but went on with her repetition of the Adventures of Atergatis, Iſtrina, and Intaphernes. After which, all the reſt of the Converſation was only of pleaſant and diverting paſſages, of which the poor Beriſa was the ſubject; For upon good examination of what Orcames had ſaid, the Princeſs Mandana did conlude that there was no Court in the World without a Beriſa, and ſometimes many Beriſa's; being ſure ſhe knew ſome at Themiſcira and at Sinope. Doraliſa for her part, ſhe knew ſome at Sardis, Pherenice remembred many at Suta, and Orcames profeſſed he knew above a douzen at Babylon. After all which the Princeſs remembring how it was reſolved to be ſtirring betimes in the morning, ſhe diſmiſſed Orcames, and retired, preſerving her fidelity ſo intirely for Cyrus, that ſhe would not ſo much as call unto her memory, any thing ſhe heard of the Aſſirian King: but her mind being clear from all manner of Objects, ſhe ſlept as quietly as one that had no manner of cauſe to fear any thing.

GRAND CYRUS.

PART VIII. Book II.

WHILST the Princeſs Mandana's ſleep was not troubled with any affrighting Dreams; and whilſt the huge multitude of Troops which conducted her, did reſt themſelves from the travels of the day, during the darke ſhades of night: whilſt ſleep, I ſay, like Death doth equal Kings and Beggers, happy and unhappy, and refreſh all, Cyrus, Mazares, and Anaxaris could not ſubmit unto one wink of ſleep, but employed every minute in thoughts of Mandana. Not that Cyrus, as the ſtate of things ſtood, was at all perplexed, but was all hopes and delights: yet thoſe delights which preceded from his hopes, were tempered with ſome perplexities, which interrupted his joys: Not that his couragious ſoul was troubled at the Combate he was to have with the King of Aſſiria, before he enjoyed Mandana; but the truth is, he was ſo little accuſtomed to happineſs, that he could not believe he was at the end of his misfortunes: ſo as not directly knowing what was the obſtacle unto his ſatisfaction, his heart reſented ſome reſiſtance of thoſe joys which in reaſon he might hope for. But though the illuſtrious Cyrus was troubled with a penſiveneſs of which he was ignorant of the cauſe; yet it was not ſo with the Prince Mazares, who being always to ſtrive with himſelf, was every minute in fears, leſt his vertue ſhould be vanquiſhed by his Love. Anaxaris was much more miſerable than he; for his Paſſion was ſo violent and high, that his reaſon did abſolutely ſubmit unto its Empire; and it may be truly ſaid that Mandana did not more ſoveraignly reign over the heart of Anaxaris, than the Paſſion of Anaxaris did tyrannically reign over his reaſon and vertue: Yet he was not ſo ſtark blind, but he knew very well that a thouſand reaſons did invite him to be the friend of Cyrus, and not his Rival: But for all that, when he ſaw it to be an abſolute impoſſibility for him to leave loving Mandana, he thought himſelf juſtified, and believed that whatſoever his love inſpired him with, were no Crimes. However, though he did never take ſo much pains as to ſtrive with himſelf, yet was he far from being happy: For by abandoning his ſoul unto his paſſion, he knew very well, that conſidering the ſtate of things, he abandoned himſelf unto all imaginable torments: however love Mandana he muſt, and ever would: But the oddeſt thing was, that ſtill he hoped againſt all manner of reaſon; and though he knew very well, that his hope had no foundation. Yet to find ſome eaſe unto his ſick ſoul, he endeavoured to make ſome intimate friend; not that upon ſecond and ſerious thoughts he intended to truſt him with his ſecret thoughts which he conceived not impartable unto any, but yet he would have one unto whom he might impart them if any need were; and in order unto that, he tampered and prepared the mind of Andramites. And ſince there is no ſurer way than to keep the ſecrets of others, before he truſt any with his own, he did inſenſibly engage Andramites to unfold all his thoughts, and contracted ſuch an intimate League of friendſhip with him, that a greater correſpondency could not have been if they had been all their lives well acquainted with each other.

Anaxaris carried the matter ſo handſomely, that by degrees he became Maſter of all the ſecrets in the ſoul of Andramites, without hazarding his own, or without giving Andramites any cauſe to ſuſpect that he had any which he ought not to impart unto him. But whilſt Cyrus, Mazares, and Anaxaris, had ſuch different thoughts cauſed by one and the ſame paſſion, there was a ſtrange curioſity in the minds of Mandana, Marteſia, Chriſantes, and Feraulas, to know in what ſtate was the King of Aſſiria. The Princeſs Mandana durſt not enquire, but Marteſia asked every one how he did.

On the other ſide, Mazares and Anaxaris did very carefully enquire of him, eſpecially the laſt of theſe, ſo as if this Prince had been an intimate friend unto all his Rivals; The Deliverer of Mandana, and the Protector of Marteſia, Chriſantes and Feraulas, they could not have been more deſirous to know the ſtate of his wounds, than they were; but as inquiſitive as they were, yet they could not know any more than what pleaſed Cyrus to impart; becauſe thoſe whom he left with the King of Aſſiria did give an account only to him: ſo that ſince Cyrus gave it out he was very ill, they knew no other.

In the mean time, this journey being a journey of jollity and victory, Cyrus did not only give order that Mandana ſhould not be diſtaſted at any thing, but contrived all way poſſible to pleaſe and divert her in her journey: ſo as if Mandana to reſt her ſelf in any Town, did ſtay a day there, the day was employed in ſeeing all that was remarkable in the place. The Ladies all aſſembled, they feaſted, they danced, they had races, and Cyrus carried Mandana unto no places of his Conqueſt, but he preſented the ſweet fruits of his victories unto her, ſo that betwixt Cumes and Ecbatan, ſeemed to be but one continual triumph. And the truth is, the people were ſo fully perſwaded of the vertues in Cyrus, that nothing but univerſal acclamations were to be heard in all places where he came. Alſo he had an extraordinary care, that the march of his Troops ſhould not do the leaſt injury unto the Country: And it may be moſt truly ſaid that he came unto no place during all this voyage, where he had not ſignalized ſome one of his vertues: For in one Town, he had left teſtimonies of his humanity in cheering up the people; in another he made his Juſtice to appear, in puniſhing ſome inſolent Soldiers; in a hundred places he had left glorious marks of his liberality, according as occaſions preſented themſelves: And in what place ſoever he came, he was always himſelf, which was always incomparable.

As for Mandana, ſhe gave ſeveral teſtimonies of her Piety during this Journey, by re-edifying ruined Temples, and giving them new foundations according to the peoples Petitions: And it is moſt certain that Cyrus and Mandana paſſed not a day without ſome excellent work of goodneſs. The Prince Intaphernes was ſuch an admirer of their vertues, that he could ſpeak of nothing elſe, when he talked with the Prince Artamas, with Myrſiles, Mazares, Anaxaris, or any elſe. And there chanced one adventure which gave him further ſubject of talk: For Cyrus deſiring that Mandana ſhould go but a very little journey that day, by reaſon of convenient Lodging, ſhe came unto a place, which afforded Intaphernes a ſubject of Compaſſion, and to talk further of her vertue. Cyrus then having reſolved that the Princeſs ſhould lye in a little Town upon the Road, not far from the place where ſhe lodged before; it was ſo long before ſhe ſet out, that ſhe came as late to her Lodging, as if her journey had been longer, yet ſhe came time enough to obſerve the extraordinary delightful, and odd ſituation of this Village where ſhe was to lye: She ſaw as ſhe came unto it, that ſhe was ſometimes high and ſometimes low, ſometimes on a mountain, and ſometimes in a valley, and between Rocks. Moreover, ſhe ſaw there an ancient and ſtately Caſtle ſtanding upon the point of a Rock, whoſe proſpect was towards a Forreſt: over againſt it, ſhe ſaw three great deep vallies, environed with Rocks, into which they deſcended by a winding path in the Rocks: And to make the place more pleaſant and extraordinary, there was to be ſeen at the foot of a hill, and on the ſide of a Torrent, two ſtately Tombs, the one built after the Egyptian, the other after the Grecian mode: So as the Sun ſetting that Evening without any cloudy umbrage, it might almoſt be ſaid that the Sun-beams did guild the whole Country, and made it the more delectable:

This magnificent object did make a deep impreſſion in the mind of Mandana, ſo as when ſhe arrived at this great Caſtle where ſhe was to lodg, ſhe talked of nothing elſe, enquiring very earneſtly whoſe were thoſe Tombs which ſhe ſaw as ſhe paſſed, and why one was built after the Egyptian manner, and the other the Grecian. The queſtions you ask, Madam, (replied the Maſter of the Caſtle, whoſe name was Eucrates, a man well in years, of a good ſpirit, and much travelled) is queſtionleſs worthy of your curioſity; for the truth is, Love was a cauſe of their foundation as well as Death; it being moſt certain, that if he who cauſed them to be built had not been in Love, they had never adorned the Country about this Caſtle. The Princeſs Mandana hearing the old man ſay ſo, was fuller of curioſity than before: ſo as preſſing him to tell her all he knew, he related unto her in few words, how a man of quality and high merits, called Meneſteus, deſcended from the race of the firſt Phocenſians, who left Phocides to go and build Phoceus which the Prince Thraſibulus had taken, being reſolved to travel after he had loſt his Wife, who left him one Son and one Daughter, he came into Egypt, where he fell deſperately in love with a Lady of Heliopolis, whom he with her conſent did carry away: That after this paſſing through Aſia, he came unto this Caſtle, where this fair Egyptian died within four days after he came thither, and from whence he would not depart, but built this ſtately Tomb after the mode of the Country; and ſince Meneſteus would never forſake her who had followed his fortunes, and left her own Country for the love of him, he built his own Tomb near hers, which is alſo his houſe where he waits for death to finiſh his day.

How (ſaid Mandana, and interrupted him) does he live yet, who cauſed theſe two Tombs to be built? and lives he in that which is built after the Grecian work? Yes, Madam, replied he, but it is in ſuch a manner as deſerves compaſſion: It may be ſaid, he lives dying, for he ſpends whole days in the Tomb of her he loſt, and never comes in his own but at ſuch hours when ſleep forces him to take truce with his ſorrows: ſo as I aſſure you Death and Love together did never make ſuch an emblem of deſpair, pair, as Meneſteus. Yet one would ſay, that the Gods take delight in his ſufferings, and lets him live, to pay an eternal tribute of ſighs and tears unto his loſt Lady; for he has already lived above eight years in this mournful manner, and yet cannot die. I wonder (ſaid Mandana then) that ſince he is of ſo good a Quality, his friends and neighbours have not forced him to change his heartleſs habitation. I aſſure you, Madam, replied Eucrates, that the illuſtrious Perianus his ſon (who ſhould be Prince of Phoceus after him, if the Armies of the invincible Cyrus had not conquered his Dominions) has done all he was able, to move Meneſteus unto a change of his living, but could never perſwade him: All he could obtain, was, to let two ſervants ſtay in a houſe next his Tomb, to bring him once a day only ſuch things as were of abſolute neceſſity.

At the name of Perianus, Cyrus who was then preſent, began to rub up his memory a little, and afterwards he began to ſpeak; Is this Peranius you ſpeak of (ſaid he unto Eucrates) Nephew unto the Prince of Phoceus, whom I underſtand by Thraſibulus, to be one of the braveſt men in the world? Yes, Sir, replied he, it is the ſame Perianus, a ſiſters ſon of the Phocean Prince, who rather than ſubmit, when the Prince his Uncle, and Alexideſmus forſook him, did perſwade all the Inhabitants of his Town to leave their Country, to embark and acknowledg him for their Head, and to go conquer others, rather than be the ſlaves of Thraſibulus, or to ſay better, yours Sir, ſince it was by your Arms that Prince did wage his War. To teſtifie, that he need not fear, replied Cyrus, that I ſhall load ſo brave a man as he with over-heavy fetters, I will to morrow viſit the Prince his Father, to let him know, that he who honours the very Tombs of vertuous men, does honour the men themſelves, though fortune have made them ſlaves. When Cyrus ſaid ſo, and this old man heard Mandana ſay ſo alſo, he told them that they would augment his ſorrows by their preſence: adding alſo to keep them from going, that the way unto theſe Tombs was ſo rough by reaſon of the Rocks and a Torrent, that they could hardly paſs: But when he ſaw that all would not diſſwade them, he was ſilent and retired.

However, ſince Mandana's Chamber did open towards theſe Tombs, ſhe was no ſooner up, but theſe ſtately objects puting her in memory of her deſign, ſhe was more earneſt upon it: ſo that ſending unto Cyrus to put him in mind of his laſt nights reſolution, that Prince came and ſaid that he was ſo mindful of it, as he had already ſent to ſee whether the way unto theſe Tombs were ſo difficult, and that he was told the way was ſo good, as ſhe might go in her Coach, ſo that without more ado ſhe went: But Cyrus being a reverencer of Love whereſoever he found it, except in the hearts of his Rivals, he was ſo conſiderate of Meneſteus, as that he would not too much diſturb his ſolitude by too great a company; therefore he permitted only Mazares Intaphernes, and Aglatidas to accompany him: And as for Mandana, ſhe admitted only of Doraliſa, Marteſia, Anaxaris, and ſome few of her Guard.

This ſmall company being conducted by Eucrates (though the night before he had no deſire to be their Convoy) they came to theſe Tombs the one whereof was much more ſtately than the other. That which was built after the Grecian manner, was a moſt admirable ſtructure, but had fewer ornaments than that which was after the Egyptian, whoſe Architecture was very regular: Indeed, though the Pyramide of this Tomb was but of a mean greatneſs, yet for its beauty it was comparable unto the Pyramides of Memphis: Its form was triangular, and ſo excellently well wrought, that the beſt eyes could not ſee one joynt in the whole work: A thouſand Curioſities of branched works did adorn the Fabrick, and one might perceive Hieroglyphick Characters, which expreſſed unto ſuch as beheld, and could underſtand them, the beauty of the Perſon whom they repreſented, and the love of the Founder.

Upon the top of this Pyramide was a figure of that Corinthian Copper, which was no leſs prized in thoſe times, then ſince the burning of the proud Town. So that this Statue did repreſent Fame, and turned upon a hinge according to the winds, one would have ſaid, that it was ſet upon this Pyramide with a Trumpet in its mouth, only to declare unto the world the death of that beauty for whom this Tomb was built; this Trumpet being made ſo artificially, that when the wind did blow, it ſent forth a ſad kind of ſighing ſound, full of ſorrows. This fame had her wings diſplayed as if ſhe were ready to flye: The skirts of her Garment was waved by the wind, ſo as diſcovering part of her thighs, it gave a good grace unto the Statue, and ſeemed to be more looſe from the point of the Pyramide, whoſe ſtately baſis was the Tomb of that illuſtrious Beauty, whom this renowned Mourner did ſo lament.

As for that of Meneſteus, it was built after the manner of a houſe, the Roof ſuſtained by twelve Columns, betwixt which upon the Frize, and under the Corniſh theſe words were engraven in Greek Characters:

Love and Death did build me.

When Cyrus and Mandana came near theſe Tombs, they ſaw Meneſteus coming to meet them, being advertiſed of their coming by Eucrates; But he met them in an Ayr ſo ſad and languiſhing, as made it apparent, that Time had not worn out the reſentment of his loſs, yet for all that he retained a high and noble preſence: His Clothes were mean but handſome and fit: And this ſolitary mourner ſeemed rather a melancholly Philoſopher, than a deſperate Lover.

As ſoon as he came ſo near Cyrus (who led Mandana) as to be underſtood, I give thanks unto the Gods (ſaid he unto him) that the beauty of that admirable Princeſs whom I ſee, hath taught the Conquerour of Aſia to reverence the Tombs of thoſe whom Love hath brought under his Dominions; and that in lieu of fearing the Ravages of a victorious Army, I am driven to the neceſſity of thanking the Conquerour for the favour he doth me in honouring the Aſhes of a moſt illuſtrious perſon by his preſence. My aims are, replied Cyrus, not only to honour the dead, but this Princeſs and I both, are come hither to honour an illuſtrious living perſon alſo, whom I wiſh I were able to perſwade out of this ſolitary Tomb in which he inhabits. For my particular (added Mandana) I ſhould be extreamly joyed, if I were able to perſwade you, Sir, unto ſome moderation in ſo violent and long a ſorrow as yours is: Since you can never know the cauſe (replied Meneſteus) I do not wonder, Madam, you ſhould not think my miſery incurable. However, I think my ſelf moſt ſenſibly obliged unto your charitable generoſity in wiſhing me capable of conſolation. After this, Meneſteus fearing leſt the Sun ſhould offend the Princeſs Mandana, did open a door which conducted her into a moſt ſtately Gallery.

As ſoon as Mandana and Cyrus were entred into this Tomb, they were forced to ſay, that the love of him who built it was great and high: The truth is, this Tomb was ſo richly adorned, that a place deſtined for the greateſt Feaſts could not be more magnificent: there was in the midſt of it a Sepulcher of incorruptible wood, inlayed with gold in a moſt rich and ineſtimable manner; and to let it be known, that the Corps which was there Interred had been the Star of Beauty in Heliopolis, upon this Sepulcher was to be ſeen a Sun repreſented by ſeveral gliſtering Diamonds and Rubies, whoſe glorious colours made it ſeem the Sun it ſelf when it was ſetting, and lending its light unto the other half of the world.

About this Sepulcher was placed twelve young Cupids excellently repreſented, who all with one of their hands ſeemed to wipe away their Tears, and with the other held up rich pots of Perfumes, no Garden full of Jeſſamin and Oranges comparable unto theſe which Art only compoſed. Moreover, there did hang in the top of the Vault a hundred Chriſtal Lamps, in ſuch order and proportion, as did make appear between every Pillar which ſuſtained the Roof twelve ſtately ſeats, on which might be ſeen the ſtatues of twelve women which ſeemed to weep and lament the loſs of her for whom the Tomb was made; and which by their ſeveral aſpects and emblems did repreſent ſome of her vertues for whom they mourned: The Engraver having given to every Statue ſuch lively emblems of each vertue, as the dulleſt capacity could not chooſe but know his meaning. Mandana could not chooſe but admire the excellency of the work, and confeſſed that there muſt needs be ſomthing that was high in the heart of ſo faithful a Lover as Meneſteus. As for Cyrus, after he had ſufficiently admired at every thing that was worthy of wonder, he began to conſider very ſeriouſly this mourning Lover, who as ſoon as he came into the Monument, was ſo wholly devoted to his ſorrows, that without almoſt any regard either of Cyrus or Mandana, or any of their company, began to fix his looks ſadly upon the Sepulchre, ſighing continually with unutterable bitterneſs of ſoul. The beauty of Mandana reviving in his mind the Idea of his loſt Lady, did renew his melancholy: And Cyrus admiring the ſorrows of Meneſteus more than his Tomb, did look moſt attentively upon him: His violent affection unto Mandana did make him moſt ſenſible of ſuch a loſs, as to loſe his own love ſo, as he had a diſpoſition rather to commend the deſpair of Meneſteus, than to blame him. But whilſt Meneſteus was ſighing, and Cyrus was ſadly looking upon him, Mandana went towards the Sepulcher to read ſome inſcription which was written in Golden Letters; and finding them to be Ægyptian Characters, ſhe called Cyrus to interpret them: So that when that Prince came to her, he told her, how the love of Meneſteus had cauſed thoſe Letters to be written; but as he was going from one end of the Sepulchre unto the other, he found a very rich Table-Book upon which was written in Great Characters, and in the Capadocian language;

To the Princeſs Mandana.

Cyrus no ſooner ſaw this, but he bluſhed; for he no ſooner looked upon the Characters, but he thought it to be the hand of the Pontean King: So as in the tumult of his mind he had certainly concealed it from Mandana, if that Princeſs ſeeing through his eyes the agitation of his ſoul, had not at the ſame time ſeen that which cauſed it: So as Cyrus perceiving by the Roſes that bluſhed in the cheeks of Mandana, that ſhe ſaw them as well as he, he preſented them unto her. Since, Madam, ſaid he unto her, it is to you this Table-Book is directed, therefore it belongs unto you; but whilſt you are peruſing it, I beſeech you give me leave to ask Meneſteus where he is at this preſent who writ this which I now preſent unto you.

The Princeſs Mandana being as much aſtoniſhed as Cyrus deſired him to read it as well as ſhe: So that opening it, they began to read it whilſt Meneſteus took no notice of them; but the truth is, it was not only his ſorrows that hindred his obſervance: For ſince Doraliſa could not think ſo long a ſolitude and ſorrow could be without ſome diſtraction of ſpirit, ſhe began to talk with him, and had engaged in diſcourſe, the Prince Intaphernes, and Aglatidas with Eucrates and Marteſia: As for Mazares this Tomb calling it to his memory his ſolitary life which he led in a Grott when he thought Mandana dead, he was taken up enough with his own thoughts, without diſcourſe with others. And for Anaxaris, his thoughts were as much buſied as Mazares: So that Cyrus and Mandana reading the King of Pontus his Letter, they found theſe words.

Madam,

IT is too much, extreamly too much, to purſue me even to a very Tomb, and to drive me from a Sanctuary, which all Laws both divine and humane would have inviolable: But ſince it is your pleaſure, it muſt be ſo; could I have hoped to have ſeen you here without that happy Rival in your company, I ſhould have ſtaid here and aſſumed the glory to expreſs my Sorrows and my Love. But ſince it is enough for you to triumph in my heart without him, I muſt ſhun you, that I may ſhun him, ſince it is not poſſible for me to do otherwiſe, though I owe him both my life and my liberty. Yet I do conjure him (if it be lawful to intreat a Rival, and if I may do it with due reverence to you) not to expoſe himſelf unto any pity, if you be not capable of any; conſidering that after I have loſt two Kingdoms for the love of you only, yet you drive me from a Tomb where I intended to inhabit with the moſt faithful Lover in the world. I beſeech you, Madam, oblige my Rival neither to follow me, nor to ſearch for me; and the better to induce him, put him in memory, that if I had not had the good fortune to ſave you from the enraged waves, he had never had the glory to be at this day favourably looked upon: But alas my ſorrows make me wander; for after all the Rigour, I think it had been better for me to have writ unto my Rival to obtain a favour from you, then to have writ unto you to obtain any thing from him; However it be, Madam, though you ſhould cauſe me to be ſearched for, to wait upon the Chariot of my Enemy, yet you ſhould be fruſtrated, ſince whoſoever is Maſter of his ſword, is alſo Maſter of his life and liberty. I ask nothing elſe of you, Madam, but only to believe, that if I do live, it is not with any intentions to comfort my ſelf, or to leave loving you: For I do proteſt, that as long as I do live, I ſhall maintain againſt all my Rivals, that there is not one of them which loves you with more zeal and reverence than I do, as rigorous and inexorable as you are unto me.

The King of Pontus.

After the reading of this Letter, which was ſo ſad as deſerved to be read without any anger: Cyrus ſcarcely daring to look upon Mandana, leſt he ſhould ſee ſome compaſſion in her eyes he ſpoke the firſt. To ſpare my ſorrows, Madam (ſaid he unto her) that you ſhould ask me a favour for ſuch a Rival as the King of Pontus, I will prevent your asking, and tell you that as the ſtate of things do ſtand, I freely content that a King who hath had the misfortune to loſe two Kingdoms, and you alſo, ſhall not be ſo miſerable as to fall into the power of his Enemy, an Enemy unto whom he thinks himſelf a little obliged: Yet, Madam, I muſt needs ask you leave to enquire of Meneſteus how the Prince came hither? Though I ſhould not for your ſake (replied Mandana) yet for my own, I deſire you to ask him: Since I aſſure you, the adventure doth augment both my curioſity and trouble: For when I conſider how it was near the Tomb of Abradates that you met the King of Aſſiria: And that you were very near meeting with the King of Pontus in the Tomb of this fair Ægyptian, I do almoſt believe I ſhall find perſecutors in Ecbatane, when I am there: So they have no greater power to hurt you Madam (replied Cyrus) than the King of Pontus hath, you need not fear their violence.

After this Mandana went to Meneſteus, unto whom ſhe ſhewed the Letter which Cyrus found upon the Sepulcher, and asked him where he was which did write it, and whether he knew him well? Meneſteus was at firſt ſurprized to ſee this Letter, which he knew to be upon the Monument; but coming preſently out of his aſtoniſhment, and being not determined what to anſwer; I aſſure you, Madam, replied he, I thought him who left this Letter in this Tomb, to be one of the moſt ſad, the moſt noble, and the moſt vertuous man in the world. But, Madam, ask me no more, for I neither know his quality, nor the cauſe of his ſadneſs, nor where he is at this preſent; and though I did know, yet I think when you know how he made me promiſe not to diſcover him, you will be ſo generous as to preſs me no further: Cyrus perceiving by the ſpeeches of Meneſteus, that he apprehended no deſign of any violence for giving harbour, did engage his word, that though he whom he had harboured were now in the Tomb, yet there ſhould no hurt be done unto him: So as Eucrates hearing what Cyrus ſaid, came nearer, and not ſtaying for the anſwer of Meneſteus, Sir (ſaid he unto him) ſince it was my ſelf that made this Illuſtrious Stranger known unto Meneſteus, ſo I think it fit, it ſhould be my ſelf who ſhould tell you all I know, which yet will ſatisfie you little more, than what he hath already told you. For truly, Sir, all I can tell you of him whoſe name I know not, is this, that about eight days ſince, according to the Laws of Hoſpitality which are inviolably obſerved in this Country, he came unto this Caſtle, which hath the honour to lodge you at this preſent, and demanded of me entertainment; for being then very ill, as ſtill he is, he found himſelf unable to continue his journey: He had with him only one man, which ſeemed more like a common Souldier,than any Gentleman,and he ſeemed to me to be ſo ſad,that I joyfully conſented unto his deſire,giving thanks unto the Gods for an occaſion of aſſiſting a man ſo handſome as he, and who ſeemed ſo extreamly grieved. So that lodging him as conveniently as I could, he looked out of his Window, and ſeeing theſe two Tombs, he asked me whoſe they were? And I think he was inquiſitive of nothing elſe, and I believe this ſad Object did ſuit with his melancholy humour; ſo as I acquainted him with the retreat of Meneſteus, and the ſolitary life that he led: He was ſo much taken with the ſtory, that though he was ſo weak as hardly able to ſuſtain himſelf, yet he would needs have me carry him thither, and ſo I did. And after that time, he went thither every day: For though Meneſteus was uſed to avoid all company, yet the melancholy of this Stranger admitted him ſooner than any other: And Meneſteus was ſo taken with him, that he deſired his viſits every day as long as he ſtaid with me. But when news was brought yeſterday, that I ſhould have the honour to receive you, Sir, into my houſe, he appeared to be extreamly troubled, and prepared for his departure the very ſame hour, though he was in a moſt unfit condition for it. However, I believe his apprehenſions of your coming hither was the true cauſe why two wounds which he ſaid he had received in the Wars, and which he thought almoſt healed, did open again: So that then it being impoſſible for him to go far by reaſon of the blood which he loſt, and reſolving not to ſtay in a place where you, Sir, were to come, I adviſed him to hide himſelf in this Tomb, not foreſeeing your curioſity of ſeeing it: And indeed he took my counſel, ſtaying here until yeſterday at Evening, when I acquainted Meneſteus with your reſolutions of coming hither, and it muſt be he who can tell you better than I, how he received the news. It is then you (ſaid Cyrus unto Meneſteus) who muſt better inform us, and tell us why he of whom we ſpeak, did fear my coming hither. Sir, replied Meneſteus, he told Eucrates as well as me, that he being engaged in the contrary part unto yours, he would not expoſe himſelf unto the danger of being your Slave, and he ſaid it with ſo much ſadneſs in his face, that I am confident being ſo generous as you are, you would not have inchained him if you had ſeen him in the ſame condition I did, though he had been your moſt mortal Enemy. As ſoon as he heard that the Princeſs Mandana was to come hither, and you alſo, he told me that he muſt be gone, as ſoon as ever the Moon which then ſhined, was ſet, that he might paſs unſeen: And ſeeming as if he would reſt two hours purpoſely to have time to write this Letter, he deſired my favour to paſs away his time in the Tomb, thinking it, as he ſaid, to be more ſafe than any other; and ſo cauſing his Servant to carry ſome Cuſhions for his better eaſe, I left him there until the hour he ſaid he wou'd depart: And he being told that the Moon was ſet, he prepared for his departure, not ſpeaking a word of the Letter which he left. But truly, Sir, he departed in ſuch a deplorable condition, that I then knew his flight had a more urgent cauſe than he told me: For though his wounds began to bleed afreſh, yet he gone he would, maugre all my deſires to the contrary, aſſuring him that I would find a way to hide him ſo in the Tomb as he ſhould not be diſcovered: When I ſaw his reſolute intention, I preſſed him to tell me the reaſon of his haſte, and he told me with a ſighing imbrace, that the very ſame Paſſion which kept me in the Tomb cauſed him to go out, and prayed me to think that if I knew his miſery, I ſhould ſay he were the moſt unfortunate man in the world. After this, Sir, he took horſe in extream pain, and without any followers but this one man which waited upon him; he took along the Torrent, maugre the darkneſs of the night, and the weakneſs of his condition: So as in all likelihood, he is either fallen into the Torrent, or wandered in the wild Forreſt, or dead of his wounds and ſorrows: Whilſt Meneſteus was ſaying ſo, Mandana held down her eyes, as being the innocent cauſe of the miſeries of this Prince, ſhe could not chuſe but pity him, who had been as virtuous a man as any lived, had he not loved her too well, or had not his Paſſion confounded his Reaſon. Cyrus himſelf though his Rival, was moved unto pity, and doubtleſs had been more, had he not obſerved the Compaſſion of Mandana: Yet he kept himſelf within the preſcribed limits of his intention, notwithſtanding the contrary guſts of his heart: So then conceiving that if he ſhould give orders to follow the King of Pontus, he ſhould have him in his power; he would not out of his generoſity do it; and indeed becauſe he thought Mandana would blame him, and alſo becauſe he had promiſed Araminta to wave his revenge for her ſake: So that addreſſing himſelf unto Meneſteus, though the King of Pontus whom you harboured (ſaid he unto him) be one of the Princeſs Mandana's Perſecutors, and one of my greateſt Enemies in being my Rival; yet I muſt commend you for your aſſiſtance. and aſſure you to make your reception of him his Sanctuary, I will not ſuffer him to be followed. Indeed (added Mandana with as much ſweetneſs as generoſity) I do conceive that revenge of Crimes ought to be left only unto the Gods, and not executed upon any Enemy that cannot hurt.

In the mean time, as the aſtoniſhment of Meneſteus and Eucrates was great to hear that it was the King of Pontus whom they had aſſiſted; ſo the wonder of Mazares and Anaxaris was greater, and that of Intaphernes, Aglatidas, Doraliſa, and Marteſia, was no leſs. Yet the wonder did produce different effects in the minds of Mazares and Anaxaris: For the firſt conſidering that if had not carried away Mandana from Synope, the King of Pontus had never been reduced unto this pitiful condition, he became extreamly melancholy, conceiving that the Princeſs Mandana could not call to mind the King of Pontus his Adventure, but ſhe muſt alſo revive in her memory thoſe fallacies which the exceſs of his Paſſion cauſed, and muſt in her heart accuſe him for it. But for Anaxaris, he had one of the oddeſt conceits that ever love infuſed into any mind: For though he hoped that the King of Pontus might perhaps dye of his wounds, when he eſcaped out of Cumes in a Fiſhers Boat, yet now he was joyed to ſee that Cyrus had more Rivals living than he thought of: So as never conſidering that the King of Pontus could not be the Rival of Cyrus, unleſs he were his alſo; he thought only that as miſerable as he was, that he would be an Obſtacle unto the happineſs of Cyrus: So as if he were ſad at this Accident, it was only to imagine that perhaps he would dye by his own haſty flight. As for Intaphernes, though he had cloſely adhered unto Arſamones againſt the King of Pontus, yet he could not chuſe but infinitely commend Cyrus and Mandana, for their generoſity in not following this unfortunate King. However ſince this Accident was very ſtrange, it cauſed the diſcourſe to continue ſo long, that before Mandana and Cyrus had ſeen the ſecond Tomb, and had talked with this ſolitary Mourner of his love and ſorrows, before they had got to the Caſtle and had dined, it was ſo late that they reſolved to ſpend all the reſt of the day in that place, and not to depart until the Morning. But whilſt Cyrus was buſie in giving out ſeveral Orders for the march of his Troops, and the way he would have them hold when they came near Cappadocia; Mandana called Marteſia into a little Cloſet, and began to talk of this adventure: Certainly Marteſia (ſaid ſhe unto her) I am deſigned for ſtrange things; may it not well be ſaid, that the Gods have taken from me the power and comfort of hating all thoſe who wrong me, and deprives me of the pleaſure of ſweet revenge? If reflecti-on be had upon paſt things, you will ſee that I have reaſon for what I ſay. If I look upon the King of Aſſiria, Mazares and the King of Pontus, as Princes who have raviſhed me away, and cauſed all the miſeries of my life, have I not the greateſt reaſon in the world to hate them, and be revenged; and yet the Gods do ſend ſuch intelligence of them, as muſt needs abate my hate, and will not let me wiſh their Ruine. What ſtrong teſtimonies have I of the grief and repentance of Mazares when he thought me dead? Hath not Orcames fully informed me of the Aſſirian Kings moſt violent affection to me? and hath not Meneſteus ſufficiently told me the very heart of that Prince unto whom I as well as Cyrus are Debtors for our lives, and whom I have coſt two Kingdoms? Really Marteſia, I could not Imagine that ever three Princes ſhould be ſo unjuſt as to raviſh me away, and yet be ever worthy of my pity. The ſtrangeſt thing, Madam, replyed Marteſia, and the moſt glorious for you, is, that all theſe Princes do merit to enjoy you, if they had not made themſelves unworthy of it, by their unjuſt carrying you away; And if the Gods had not ſent a Prince who alone hath higher parts than they all have, and who adores you with ſuch a reverent Paſſion, as never gave you the leaſt cauſe of complaint.

The truth is, replied Mandana, I ſhould be very ungrateful, and by conſequence very unjuſt, if I did not rank Cyrus in my higheſt eſteem and friendſhip, and if I did not think my ſelf very happy in Reigning over the heart of ſuch a man whom the Gods have thought worthy to Reign over all Aſia. As the Princeſs pronounced theſe words, Cyrus having diſpatched all his orders, entered into the place where ſhe was, and as ſoon as ever ſhe ſaw him, ſhe bluſhed, as if ſhe were affraid he had overheard her. Cyrus perceiving it, did bethink himſelf what might be the cauſe of that Carnation in Mandana's Complexion: for as the Actions of perſons loved are never indifferent; ſo he was ſomthing troubled at the alteration in the Countenance of that Princeſs whom he adored: Though, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that ſweet bluſh ſeemed to give a freſh Luſtre unto your beauty, yet I could not chooſe but be troubled at it, out of my fear leaſt I was the cauſe of it, by interrupting you uncivilly; I could perhaps, if I would (replied Mandana with a ſmile, and bluſhed more) conſent unto half you ſay without diſobliging you: but ſince your unjuſt ſuſpition of interrupting me uncivilly deſerves a puniſhment, you ſhall know no further. Did you but know, Madam, replied Cyrus, what puniſhment it is for a Lover to be ignorant of what paſſeth in the heart of her he adores when he deſires to know it, doubtleſs you would ſay, your Puniſhment exceeds my Crime: though indeed I muſt confeſs my weakneſs, and aſſure you, Madam, that I would do almoſt any thing in the world to know the cauſe of your bluſh. I know very well, that this fond curioſity is one of thoſe follies wherewith the Paſſion which poſſeſſeth me is upbraided: but yet for all that, I find it to be well grounded. Indeed (purſued he and ſmiled) ſince it is permittable in War to have Spies in the place which one would take, it is as well allowable to have ſome in the heart which one would Conquer, and ſo hold intelligence: Since Spies are only imployed (replied Mandana) to know what paſſeth amongſt Enemies; you ſtand in need of none to know what paſſeth in my heart: for there is no War declared betwixt us. However, I aſſure you, Madam (replied Cyrus) that ſomtimes one may as much long to know the thoughts of her he adores, as to know the deſigns of his Enemies: and for my particular, I had rather have a faithful Spy in your heart, than have a hundred with the King of Aſſyria, or the King of Pontus, though they were Maſters of Babylon or Sardis. Yet, Madam, I beſeech you do not think that this my Curioſity hath any ſmack of Jealouſie, nor that I am one of thoſe Lovers, who are extreamly inquiſitive for what they would not find: But, Madam, the reaſon of it is (ſince I muſt confeſs it) becauſe there is notable difference between thoughts of eſteem which are expreſſed by obliging Language, and hidden thoughts which are concealed almoſt from the parties themſelves, and which others can know only but by gueſſes. Think it not ſtrange then, Madam, that though I am not ſo impudent as to think you have any advantagious thoughts of me which you would not honour me with the participation, yet I cannot chuſe but deſire that I were able to dive into the ſecrets of your heart. I muſt needs deſire to have a ſight of all the Virtues together, and wiſh your heart were open, that I ſhould know all your thoughts, and all your deſires. To ſatisfie one part of your Curioſity (replied Mandana to divert the diſcourſe) I muſt tell you, that I have a ſtrange deſire to know all the thoughts of Meneſteus, ſince this eight years that he hath lived in the Tomb of this fair One whom he loved and loſt Oh, Madam ſaid Cyrus, by ſeeming to ſatisfie my Curioſity, you rather aime at your own, and not my ſatisfaction; But it is not my part to preſcribe Laws unto you, therefore ſince it is not your pleaſure, I ſhould be more ſcrutinous into your Soul: and ſince you had rather I could talk of Meneſteus, than of you or my ſelf, I ſhall tell you, that I cannot eaſily conceive all his eight years thoughts, for love and ſorrow are two inexhauſtible guſts of thoughts, if I may ſo expreſs that bottomleſs Abyſs in the mind of a grieved Lover, and which wholly poſſeſſeth him as long as his love and grief laſts: But the greater wonder is, how he hath lived ſo long, after the death of her he adored. For really Madam, without any aggravation of my ſorrows at Synope, when I had cauſe to fear your being drown'd, I can truly proteſt, that I had not one day more to live, when I heard you were living: I am much obliged to you, Sir, replied Mandana for your engaging ſorrows, though I will not beleive it to be ſo violent as you expreſs, leaſt you ſhould upbraid me with ingratitude: yet truly I muſt confeſs, that the moſt ſenſible ſorrow of all ſorrows is the death of the Party loved; and I am ſo fully perſwaded of this truth, that as oft as I imagine that there is an abſolute neceſſity I muſt one day hear of the death of perſons whom I love, or they hear of mine, I am ſo melancholy as I hardly know my ſelf. Oh, Madam, (cried out Cyrus) what a diſmal Image do you make to paſs out of your Spirit into mine? I ask you pardon, Sir, replied ſhe; but yet I think you are obliged to concur with me: for ſince I cannot think without a ſad remembrance that you muſt one day hear of my death, or I of yours, methinks it is a mark of amity ty which merits a pardon for my ſad diſcourſe: Your expreſſions, Madam, are ſo obliging, replied Cyrus, that I owe you a tribute of a thouſand thanks; but for all that, Madam, I beleive I ſhall ſcarcely pardon you this day, for infuſing into me ſuch apprehenſions of your death.

As ſoon as Cyrus had pronounced theſe words, Eucrates came to acquaint him that there was a man of Quality from Phoceus, whoſe name was Thrymetus, whom the Son of Meneſteus had ſent unto his Father, who deſired to ſpeak with him, and who arrived immediately after he was come out of the Tomb: Adding that he was accompanied with two ſtrangers, unknown either by their Habits or Language. Since Mandana conceived that this man could have no buſineſs with Cyrus which her preſence might hinder, ſhe deſired that Prince, that Thrymetus might have audience before her, which Cyrus accordingly commanded: and Eucrates obeying, Thrymetus with his two ſtrange Companions was brought into Mandana's Chamber, who with Cyrus ſaluted them, Thrymetus having a Letter (which was only of Credence) to preſent, he uttered theſe words; Sir, (ſaid he unto him in Greek) I am ſent unto you from a Prince, whoſe good or bad fortunes you have power to make; but ſince he hath been ſo happy as to be engaged in a Party oppoſite unto yours, and conſtrained to preſerve his liberty by abandoning his Country unto your Victorious Arms, and to have recourſe unto flight: I cannot tell, Sir, whether his hopes of reception be well grounded: but I am moſt certain that the Prince Meneſteus his Father, unto whom I came upon a meſſage, is ſo charmed with your generoſity, that he makes no doubt but that I ſhall obtain my demands. To teſtifie, replied Cyrus, that I have a great diſpoſition to grant any thing unto a Prince of his merit who ſent you; I will not aſſume the Right of Conquerors, which ne're allow their vanquiſhed Enemies the names of thoſe Countries which are conquered from them. But on the contrary, though Peranius was never yet called the Prince of Phoceus, becauſe he who left him that Title did not periſh untill ſince his departure, yet I will be the firſt that will call him ſo, and intreat you to name him no otherwiſe : for ſince the Prince Thraſibulus hath given once ſuch noble Characters of his Virtue and Valour. I am reſolved to treat him as favourably as I have done others, who merits it no more than he. Oh Sir, replied Thrymetus, I ask no more, for ſince you are pleaſed to acknowledge Peranius in the preſence of theſe ſtrangers, to be a Prince, and the Prince of Phoceus, you have granted as much as I had in Commiſſion to ask : and you have made him the moſt happy Prince upon Earth, if I may phraſe a man ſo, who hath not the glory to be particularly known unto the greateſt Prince in the World. Since the expreſſions of Thrymetus did ſurprize both Cyrus and Mandana, and ſince they obſerved much joy in the face one ſtranger, and much ſorrow in the eyes of the other, they were full of Curioſity to know the cauſe of this adventure : So as Mandana ſpeaking Greek as elegantly as her natural Language, ſhe very obliging asked Thrimetus the interpretation of it, and the true cauſe of his Voyage. Cyrus alſo deſired to know where the Prince of Phoceus was, deſiring to be informed of all his Actions ſince he was choſen chief of that fugitive Troop. Alſo he asked who thoſe ſtrangers were whom by their habits he knew not, what intereſt they had in the Prince of Phoceus ? and how is was poſſible, that three or four advantagious words which he had ſpoken in his behalf, ſhould make him happy ? The Queſtions which you ask, Sir, replied Thrymetus, is not to be anſwered in few words, no more than thoſe the Princeſs Mandana was pleaſed to enquire of : But, Sir, though you ſhould have the goodneſs and the leaſure to lend an ear unto ſo extraordinary an adventure. as that of the Phocean Prince (ſince you are pleaſed I ſhould give him his right name) yet, Sir, before I tell it, I muſt beg one Favour my ſelf, which is, that you would be pleaſed, Sir, to employ your perſwaſions and Authority upon the Prince Meneſteus, that he would quit the Tomb wherein he dwells, and go into a place where you do eſtabliſh a new Dominion upon the Prince his Son. The more you ſpeak, replied Cyrus, the leſs I underſtand you, and the more inquiſitive I am : And therefore ſince I know the Princeſs to be as full of curioſity as my ſelf, I do declare unto you, that I will not grant any thing, unleſs you will tell her the life of that Prince who ſent you. But ſince it would be perhaps unjuſt to oblige you unto a long narration before you have reſted your ſelf, I ſhall intreat Eucrates to have a care of you, and thoſe in your company, and to bring you hither in the Evening, that the Princeſs may have the Pleaſure to hear you, if you do not deny her. It ſo much concerns the Prince who ſent me, replied Thrymetus, that you ſhould not deny the Favour which I ask; that I ſhould do very ill ſervice, if I ſhould not relate an adventure which is infinitely glorious unto him: Therefore, Sir, I will obey when you ſhall pleaſe to command.

After this, and many obliging paſſages from Cyrus, and Mandana, he and the two Strangers retired, who one might perceive did perfectly underſtand what was ſpoken, but were not ſo verſed in Greek, as to ſpeak it before a Prince and a Princeſs who underſtood it ſo admirably well. As Thrymetus went out of Mandana's Chamber, Mazares, Myrſiles, Artamas, Andramites, and many others entred, who extreamly wondering at the uncouth habits of theſe Strangers, asked Cyrus who they were? For my part (ſaid Artamas, after Cyrus ſaid he knew them not) I had thought that your Valour had ſet confines to your Conqueſts, becauſe it could find no more to Conquer: But yet I ſee there are people which the Conqueror of Aſia knows not. Since we fought only (replied Cyrus modeſtly) for the liberty of the Princeſs, we have ſet Confines to our Conqueſts in delivering her, unleſs we ſhould do juſtice unto her merits, and make her Queen of all the world, or unleſs ſhe have a deſire to make new Subjects of theſe Strangers whom we know not. I aſſure you, Sir, replied Mandana, that though I think you worthy to be Maſter of all the World, and think you able to conquer it, yet, Sir, your life, and the lives of ſo many great Princes who have aſſiſted you in your Conqueſts, are ſo dear unto me, that if you never make any War but to ſatisfie my Ambition you ſhall ſheath all your Swords in perpetual Peace. Whilſt Mandana was ſpeaking thus, Doraliſa and Pherenice who had met with Marteſia: and who were talking with Andramites in the corner of the Chamber which was not large, they heard what Cyrus and Mandana ſaid: And Doraliſa finding a kind of barbariſm in the Air of theſe Strangers, ſhe told Andramites who came to her, that the Princeſs had good reaſon not to deſire the Conqueſt of ſuch Subjects: After which ſhe began to make ſuch pleaſant deſcriptions of the Airs, Garbs, Poſtures, Reverence, and Habits of theſe two men, that though there were ſome injuſtice in her fine Railary, yet thoſe who heard it could not chuſe but be much delighted; inſomuch as Marteſia, Pherenice and Andramites laughed heartily: But the rareſt part of the accident was, that Mandana who had a marvellous peircing wit, did gueſs the truth, and imagined that Doraliſa had found a ſubject of Diverſion in theſe Strangers, though they were very magnificent and handſom: And therefore deſiring to give a teſtimony of her goodneſs, and find ſuch a ſubject of diſcourſe as might put off thoſe Applauds which they began to give her, ſhe told her thoughts unto Cyrus and Myrſiles, who being always glad of any occaſion to hear Doraliſa ſpeak, beſeeched the Princeſs with a ſmile, to correct her injuſtice: So that Mandana being willing to pleaſe Myrſiles, ſhe went to Doraliſa: Were not you Doraliſa making ſome fine deſcriptions of the two Strangers (ſaid ſhe) when you talked unto Pherenice, Marteſia, and Andramites, and cauſed them to laugh ſo loud? I aſſure you, Madam, anſwered ſhe, I deſerve no great Commends for ſo eaſily moving their mirth for it was ſuch good ſport to ſee theſe Strangers, that the very remembrance of them is enough to move laughter: Really Doraliſa, replied Mandana, you are a ſtrange woman, for ſince they ſpoke not, ſince they are very magnificent, and ſince they are handſome enough, you cannot upbraid them with the faſhion of their Habits, and Garb which is different from thoſe you ſee every day: ſo as doubtleſs they think you as different from the Ladies they uſe to ſee, as you think them different from the men you ſee, and as amiable as you are, perhaps they think of you, what you think of them. I aſſure you, Madam, replied ſhe, and laughed, if I make them as merry as they make me, we are much beholding to each other. Fie, Doraliſa, ſaid Cyrus, and ſmiled, your ſpeeches do make me exceedingly afraid; for I being a Perſian born, and you a Sardinian, I fear that the firſt time you ſaw me, I ſeemed as great a Stranger to you as theſe; therefore I conjure you to tell me ſeriouſly, how I ſeem now your eyes are accuſtomed to ſee me? Oh, Sir, (with her natural and ſprightly vivacity) ſuch Conquerors as you, are Strangers no where: And I may well ſay you are the ſame at Perſipolis that you are at Babylon, at Sardis, at Ecbatan, at Artaxates, at Suſa, at Themiſcira, and at Cumes: So as I aſſure you, all the World is your Country, and you a Stranger no where. Indulgency to Strangers (replied Mandana, and ſmiled) is a duty; and if I ſhould humour my own inclination, I would excuſe them all: Yet ſince you are ſuch a pleaſant Critick to obſerve ſo ſubtilely the faults of others, I muſt confine you unto your own Country and acquaintance. But as for theſe Stangers, who are ſo ridiculous to you, I do intend to take them into my Protection, and tell you further, that if any Ethiopians, Indians, or Scythians come to Ecbatan, when I am there, I will defend them againſt you; for I muſt confeſs I cannot endure this kind of injuſtice, though it be almoſt univerſal. But, Madam, I beſeech you with all due reverence, replied Doraliſa, give me leave to juſtifie my ſelf, and examine the matter a little: With all my heart (replied Mandana) though I am confident you will have much ado with all your wit to prove it no inhumanity to jeer a Stranger, meerly becauſe he is a Stranger. For my part, ſaid Cyrus, I am clearly of opinion with the Princeſs. That opinion is ſo juſt (ſaid Mazares) as I cannot think it will admit of any argument: If I ſhould ſpeak without intereſt (ſaid the Prince Myrſiles, and looked upon Mazares) doubtleſs I ſhould concur with you in the opinion of the Princeſs: But ſince I am no ſtranger unto Doraliſa, I do ſo much fear that if ſhe be induced to make peace with Strangers, then ſhe will declare War with me, as I dare not declare my ſelf againſt her in this buſineſs. For my part (ſaid Artamas) my reaſon is contrary to yours, ſince I am not of Doraliſa's Country: Yet I muſt adhere unto the opinion of the Princeſs by intereſt, though the ſame reaſon were not, ſince Juſtice and goodneſs are on her ſide. For ought I ſee (replied Doraliſa undauntedly) you have brought me to that paſs as I cannot but come off in this diſpute with honour; for there are ſo many Illuſtrious Perſons againſt me, that though I be vanquiſhed, yet I need not be aſhamed: And if I be not, then I ſhall have more glory than ever any had; ſince never any did overcome ſome of thoſe whom I ſhall vanquiſh. But yet (ſaid Mandana) what can you ſay to excuſe your ſelf of that injuſtice whereof you are accuſed? Have not every Nation, every Kingdom their particular Cuſtoms? Nay, has not every Province, every Town their different Faſhions? either in their Habits or in their Civilities; their Graces of body, and all thoſe trifling exteriour things which reach only the eyes, but not at all the Soul and Mind. I do confeſs it, Madam, replied Doraliſa, but I confeſs withal, that it is this difference which diverts me by its odneſs, without any injuſtice to the Stranger; for I give him the ſame liberty which I take my ſelf, and not caring what he thinks of me, I think of him what I pleaſe. But Doraliſa you think not right, replied Mandana, if you blame him becauſe he is habited after the mode of his Country, as you are after yours: I do not blame him in particular, replied Doraliſa, but I blame all his Nation in general: Then are you the more unjuſt (replied Cyrus, and laughed) to ſcoff at three or four hundred thouſand men at once, becauſe one or two of them only does not pleaſe you: Furthermore (added Mandana) it is unreaſonable to deſire that an Ægyptian ſhould be a Perſian, when he is at Perſipolis; or that a Perſian ſhould be an Ægyptian at Memphis, for that changing himſelf in every Town he comes in, he would make himſelf called that Creature which aſſumeth ſeveral Colours as he changeth his Air: For ſo Doraliſa doubtleſs muſt he. All I require in a Stranger, Madam, replied ſhe, is to conform himſelf as much as he can unto the cuſtoms of that Country where he is, and that he do not amaze all eyes by his odd Garments, unleſs at ſome ſtately entrance amongſt a great Company. I would have him alſo to ſpeak very little, unleſs he be aſſured to ſpeak well: I would have him alſo contented with ſeeming Liberal and Magnificent, without pretending unto any Politeneſs or Gallantry; ſince they are things of faſhion and uſe, and have their particular decency in every Nation, which a Stranger is often abſurd in, out of his own Country: But above all things, I would have him leave me ſo much liberty as to laugh harmleſly at all he ſays or does which is againſt my mind. For truly, Madam, if he will not allow me that liberty, I ſhall not let him take it; and I do the more deſire this freedom, becauſe I ſhould uſe it without offence: For there is a great difference between Railary upon a man of ones own Country, and Railary upon a Stranger; provided it extend only to ſuch things as are particular unto his Nation: Since the firſt of theſe proceeds from malice, and thoſe who divert themſelves at that rate do ſeldom purchaſe any eſteem unto themſelves: But, Madam, as for the other, I profeſs that my laughing at a Stranger does not proceed from any malice of heart: And though theſe two men I ſaw this day, did much divert me, yet I do verily believe they may be very compleat men, and Gallants in their own Country: So that taxing neither their Wits, nor their Honeſties, nor Courages; I do conceive my ſelf not ſo culpable as you make me: And truly, Madam, if the nature of my laughing at ſuch things be well examined, it will be found nothing ſo malicious as to laugh (as moſt of the world do) when a Horſe throws his Rider, or when ones head is broken; for it argues much more malignity to laugh at ſuch things as do hurt, and is a greater ſpite unto thoſe upon whom they happen; than to laugh and be merry, as I am, at a fantaſtical and uncouth Habit; at an out-of-faſhion Congee, or a word ill pronounced: yet, Madam, you know how ordinary and unhumane it is to laugh at ſuch ſad accidents; and as wiſe, as pitiful as you are, I cannot tell whether you have not been ſomtimes moved to ſmile at ſuch an accident. Doraliſa ſpoke this in ſuch a jolly manner, that Mandana and all the Company could not chuſe but laugh, and confeſs withal, that ſhe deſerved the liberty of laughing, not only at all Strangers, but alſo at all ſhe knew; and to teſtifie unto you (ſaid Cyrus unto her) that I think what I ſpeak, I give you a free right, to play upon me when you pleaſe, and to be merry at my expences when you find any occaſion. Should I never divert my ſelf, replied ſhe, but when you give me occaſion, I ſhould live a moſt weariſom life: But, Sir, added ſhe, and laughed, ſince you are out of your goodneſs, pleaſed to let me laugh at theſe two Strangers, I deſire no more theſe eight days. Yet for all this, all the Company concurred, that it was very unjuſt, not to be very kind unto Strangers, or to take the Faſhions of their Countries for incivilities, or arguments of defect in Spirit: And all concluded with one voice, that as a man may be but very meanly accompliſhed, though he be moſt compleat in his Habit, though he have the faſhionable Cringe, and Garb of his Country; and though he have the Court tone to a tittle: So alſo it may very well be, that a Stranger who has none of theſe Qualities, yet may merit much Eſteem and Commendations, though his Cloaths be odd, his Carriage bad, and his Tone worſe: And ſo we muſt ever be civil unto Strangers, and ſearch for their Qualities either good or bad, in their minds and ſouls; that is the only way to judge of them aright. After this, Diſcourſe began to change Subject, and much Company coming in, it laſted until Supper-time; then all the crowd of Princes and Gallants followed Cyrus, and left the Princeſs Mandana to Sup in private: But as ſoon as that Prince knew ſhe was riſen from the Table, he took Thrymetus who ſupped with him, as well as his two ſtrange Companions, and claimed promiſe of him, and carried him to Mandana's Chamber, leaving thoſe who came with him in the company of Eucrates; becauſe Thrymetus acquainted Cyrus that he had many things to tell, which he would not have one of thoſe Strangers to hear. After which, they went unto Mandana's Chamber, and found her prepared with all neceſſary Curioſity, to give attention unto the relation which Thrymetus was to make. Since Cyrus knew well, that one does not love to make a long Narration before much Company, he brought none with him to Mandana's Chamber: ſo as Doraliſa, Marteſia, Anaxaris, Cyrus, and Mandana were all the Auditors of Thrymetus his Relation, which began in theſe Terms.

The Hiſtory of PERANIUS Prince of PHOCEUS, and of the Princeſs CLEONISBE.

SInce it doth extreamly import the Prince of whom I am to ſpeak, that you ſhould have a perfect knowledge of all his Excellent Qualities, I ask your permiſſion, Madam, as well as that invincible Prince who hears me, to make you acquainted with him, whoſe Adventures you deſire to know. And as to his Glory, I am to relate unto you ſome of his Heroick Acts, ſo I muſt decare ſome of his Virtues, that all the reſt may the better appear unto you; for without any touch upon his Modeſty, I ſhall tell you of his great courage, Spirit, Generoſity, Honeſty, and all other excellent Qualities of his Soul and Body: I ſhall tell you then, Madan, that the Prince of Phoceus is worthy to be deſcended from that Renowned Grecian, who raiſing a Collony of Gallant men in Phocides, paſſed into Aſia and there founded the Town of Phoceus, which all his Poſterity have peaceably enjoyed, and in great Glory, until the Victorious Arms of Cyrus did ſubject it, and chaſe out a Prince, Uncle unto him of whom I ſpeak, whoſe unjuſt violence made him unworthy of ſuch a Nephew. But, Madam, without ſearching amongſt the Phocenſians for matter of Commendations unto this Illuſtrious Prince of whom I am to treat; give me leave to tell you, that he was born with all high and noble Qualities: And that I am moſt confident, all Greece, which furniſhed the world with ſo many great men, never had a ſoul more heroick than his. Since he had a Father adorned with all excellent endowments, this Father was infinitely indulgent in the education of his Son; and not contenting himſelf with what Phoceus could afford, he ſent him to Athens, there to be inſtructed in all requiſite Arts befitting his quality, and diſpoſition, which was even from his Cradle Martial, and apt for high things: And he made choſe of Athens rather than Phoceus, becauſe he had no mind to quit his Tomb wherein he lives.

It was then at Athens, Madam, where he was inſtructed in all the excellencies his age was capable of, yet he would not in that place ſtudy the Military Art, before he could put it into practice: Always affirming that the theorick of War was nothing, and that precepts without practice would not profit him: Indeed he became a Souldier at fifteen years of age, and did ſo highly ſignalize himſelf, that his reputation made the braveſt men jealous of him, even at a time when he might be thought a young Scholler in the School of Mars. I ſhall not make any exact relation, Madam, of all his Acts in ſeveral Wars, from his fifteenth year until his four and twentieth; for as on the one ſide it is not very neceſſary, ſo on the other, I might perhaps make you queſtion the truth of my words, by the multitude of Heroick actions which that Prince hath performed. Nor will I do, like thoſe who commending only in a general way,do make it ſuſpitious that they have nothing to ſay in particular.

But to take the medium between theſe two extreams, and to acquaint you with the martial inclination of the Phocean Prince, even in his greeneſt years, I muſt tell you how he made his firſt ſtep into the Field, that you may thereby judge of his Courage. Give me therefore leave, Madam, to tell you, that he being at Athens in his fifteenth year, and the Athenians in general being weary of a long and tedious War which they waged with the Megarians, about the poſſeſſion of the Iſle of Salamine, they ſet forth an Edict, by which they did forbid all thoſe who had voices in the Council of publick affairs, to make any more Propoſitions of continuing this War. Inſomuch as Solon (whoſe Name and Merits, Madam, I am confident is not unknown unto you) being exceeding angry that they ſhould give over ſuch an important War in ſo ignominious a manner, he endeavoured with all circumſpectial diligence to quaſh this Edict which was proclaimed, without expoſing himſelf and his Country unto ſo much danger, as to loſe the aſſiſtance of each other. But all his endeavours had proved ineffectual, if the great ſoul of this Young Prince had not helped him out. Be pleaſed to know, Madam, that the Prince of Phoceus was the intimate friend of Piſiſtrates, and ſaw him almoſt every day: And being one day with Solon, as they were talking of this Edict which prohibited any motions of War, this young Prince ſeemed ſo troubled, that Solon taking notice of his heroick ſadneſs, did much eſteem him for it, eſpecially when asking him the cauſe, he heard his anſwer. For as Solon asked him his reaſon why he was ſo angry at this Prohibition. Why Sir, replied he, does not the very ſame reaſon which forbids the continuance of the War, forbid men alſo to be valiant? If the Athenians give over a juſt War becauſe they cannot wage it without danger, of what uſe is their valour? For my part, if this Edict be obſerved, I had rather return to Phoceus, than ſtay amongſt a multitude of Cowards who are ſo baſe as to ſuffer it: And I know there are many young Sparks which murmur at it in ſecret as well as my ſelf.

If any one were ſo hardy, replied Solon, as to propound the continuance of the War unto the Athenians, would you willingly ſecond him? Never doubt it, replied he, and I am moſt confident that Piſiſtrates would follow, and that we ſhould cauſe the greateſt part of all the Sparks in the Town to back us. Solon hearing the young Peranius to ſay ſo, did highly applaud his Courage, and without imparting his deſign, becauſe he thought him too young to be truſted, he only did extreamly commend his generoſity; giving him afterwards many reaſons which proved this Edict to be moſt ignominious and diſadvantagious unto the Athenians, not doubting but he would afterwards repeat them unto all thoſe he diſcourſed with. The truth is, this Prince did ſo well ſecond the intentions of Solon, that within three days Piſiſtrates and he had diſpoſed all the Youth in the Town unto a general revolt unleſs this Edict was revoked, which would but ruſt their valour.

Solon ſeeing things ſucceed to his hearts wiſh, reſolved to make uſe of that invention, which was ſuch a wonder unto all Greece, to ſee that man who was ſo highly fam'd for wiſdom, ſhould have recourſe unto fooliſhneſs to compaſs his project. But for all that, this invention which had paſſed for a piece of extravagancy if it had not hit, was taken for a moſt rare invention, becauſe it did proſper. Since I do not doubt, Madam, but you are acquainted with this action of Solon, I ſhall not particularize it unto you; but only tell you in two words, that he having compoſed ſome verſes fit to incite all the youth unto a demand of the Wars continuance againſt the Megarians, he did counterfeit himſelf to be out of his wits, and went unto a great place in Athens where he knew that Piſiſtrates and the Prince of Phoceus were walking with a great number of their friends. As ſoon as he was there, he got upon a high ſtone Place where the publick Crier uſed to publiſh all Proclamations unto the People. He had no ſooner recited thoſe verſes which he had compoſed to incite deſire of War, but Piſiſtrates and the Prince of Phoceus clapping their hands, and approving of what he had ſaid, and cauſing others to do the like, they went unto every ſtreet, and cried that this Edict muſt be revoked which was ſo ignominious to the Athenians, and ſo contrary to the Weal-publick: They ſpoke with ſuch efficacy, that in leſs than two hours all the young men in Athens, brave and ſimple did joyn with them; and as young as they were, they ſpoke with ſuch vehemency and authority, that none was ſo hardy as to reſiſt them. So that, Madam, this Edict muſt of neceſſity be revoked to appeaſe the Tumult, and begin the War: And well may I ſay that Solon, Piſiſtrates, and Peranius only did it.

However, the deſign of Solon having ſo well taken, he became wiſe again the next morning; and ſo well was he known to be ſo, that they conferred upon him the conduct of this War, wherein the Prince of Phoceus did follow him, and did miracles. But Solon knowing that the rich men of Athens would ſtill murmur at the great charges which this War would put them unto, he found a way how to eaſe them by a piece of policy, in which the Prince of Phoceus did highly ſignalize himſelf as well as Piſiſtrates. He went by Sea unto a famous Temple dedicated unto Venus, unto which he knew many Athenian women of quality did reſort; and chuſing out a cunning and truſty fellow, he ſent him unto the Megarians, which were not far from thence, with Orders to counterfeit the Traytor, in offering them a prize of all thoſe Athenian women, and aſſuring them that they would all be at the Temple of Venus at ſuch a time, where they might be all eaſily taken: The Plot did take, the Megarians believed the fellow, and came with a Ship full of Souldiers to the place at the time appointed.

In the mean time, Solon cauſed all the Ladies and women to forbear coming unto that place; and dreſſing a good number of brave youths in the habit of women; he brought them thither, the Prince of Phoceus was of the number; for being both young and as valiant as any Hero, he was very fit for ſuch an expedition: And placing himſelf in the Front of all theſe ſeeming Ladies, who had all Swords hidden under great looſe Mantles, which they uſed to wear over their Gowns: He went according to the orders of Solon, along the water-ſide, ſeeming as if they walked and waited until the hour of Sacrifice, as it was the ordinary cuſtom of thoſe who came over-ſoon.

As ſoon as the Megarians ſaw them, they made all the Sail and Oar they could, and came to the place where they thought they ſaw ſo many Ladies: and landing in all haſte, they came to take away thoſe Ladies, thinking after this, that the Athenians would be glad to treat and make a Peace with them, to redeem their Wives from being ſlaves.

But they were ſufficiently amazed, when the Prince of Phoceus (who was the firſt that fell upon them, ſeeing them come towards him) threw off his Mantle and Hood upon his head, and put himſelf in a poſture of armed defence: This ſtrange Metamorphoſis did moſt terribly ſurprize them; for he being at that time very fair, one would have ſaid that Venus was in an inſtant turned into Mars.

The change was not particularly in the Prince of Phoceus, for all the reſt in an inſtant followed his example; and the Megarians were ſtrangely terrified, to find ſuch ſtout enemies in lieu of Ladies: They offered a retreat unto their Ship, but the Prince of Phoceus ſeconded by Piſiſtrates, getting betwixt the Sea and them, they paſſed almoſt all upon the point of the Sword, after which, being maſter of their Ship, they made uſe of a ſecond fallacy, which did thrive as well as the firſt: For imbarking all their Souldiers, they went towards Salamine as if they had been Megarians, and as if they had brought all the Athenian Ladies, which they deſigned to fetch: So as the Inhabitants of the Iſle never oppoſing their landing, but on the contrary preparing themſelves to receive thoſe in the Ship, as men who had done them good ſervice, they were extreamly ſurprized to find that they had ſuffered Enemies to land, and more ſurprized to obſerve with what miraculous valour the young Prince of Phoceus did aſſault them. The terror was ſo great in the Iſle, that Solon arriving in a Ship preſently after, did ſtrike a deeper terror amongſt the People; who believing that this Ship would be ſeconded by a great Fleet, were all ſo damped with a panick fear, that Piſiſtrates and the Prince of Phoceus became Maſters of the Iſle with much eaſe, and returned unto Athens with more honour, as well as Solon, whoſe wiſdom was crowned with happineſs, by their valour and his own contrivance.

This, Madam, was the firſt bud of Peranius his valor: Since that he hath done a thouſand glorious Acts: There has not been any glorious buſineſs in all Greece wherein he was not one. But the wonder is, he is as well experienced in matters at Sea as Land, and knows as well how to be a Pilot as a Captain of a Ship. The truth is, Madam, the valour of this Prince is ſuperlative: He hath been ſeen to aſſault whole Navies all lined with Archers; and maugre the thick clouds of Arrows and Darts, he hath carried Fire, and burned the whole Fleet: He hath been ſeen with one ſingle Ship to give chaſe to three others, and take two of them: On the other ſide, he hath been ſeen to be ſet upon by five, and not taken. Furthermore, what hath he not done both in private and general Combates, both by Sea and Land? Yet for all this, though he had all the fury of an incenſed Soulder in his Heart and Eyes, when there was any occaſion, yet he had all the imaginable ſweetneſs in the air of his Countenance and Spirit, when no occaſion was for his valour: And I am able to aſſure you of a truth, that he was as great a lover of the company of Ladies, as of Honour: And certainly in his perſon it might be ſeen, that War and Love were not incompatible. Indeed he was a lover of all merriments which were the conſequents of Peace, I mean Poetry, Muſick, Painting, and in general all that belongs to the Muſes. He writes moſt elegantly, either in matters of ſerious, or matters of gallantry; and I am ſure he can both deſcribe a Battle very well, and alſo a combat of Love in his heart if he would declare his paſſion. As for his perſon it is infinitely pleaſing, though his voyages at Sea hath a little blaſted the great beauty of his youth: His ſtature is tall and big, his carriage high and noble; the Air of his Aſpect, ſmiling and ſerious both, but never was any more ſweet, nor of a greater Civility. The firſt time one ſees him, he commonly ſpeaks little but there appears ſo much judgment in what he ſpeaks, as it is eaſie to ſee, that if he would he can ſpeak more, and ſpeak well.

Moreover, one ſhould never hear him ſpeak upon matters of War among women unleſs he were forced: and much leſs of any glorious acts which he had done, for he could not endure that any ſhould commend him. But on the other ſide he was extreamly zealous in commending the valour of others upon all occaſions, and would be juſt even unto his greateſt Enemies. Moreover, he was one of the faithful Friends, and the moſt violent Lover that ever was, and he was as liberal as he was brave; but he was as apt for Ambition as Love, and no leſs jealous of his Glory than of his Miſtriſs.

Further than this Madam, I have no more to ſay of the Phocean Prince, only that he ſeemed wiſe in all his undertakings, and the impetuoſity of his humour never appeared but only in love and war, for out of them he was ſo compoſed as it cannot be ſaid there was ever turbulency in his heart or diſorder in his ſpirit. This, Madam was the temper of the Phocean Prince: and thus he was when he heard that his Country was entring into wars, and he returned to defend it. Though he knew very well that the Prince his Uncle was engaged in an ill cauſe, and knew the pretentions of the Prince Thraſibulus to be juſt; yet for all that, ſince it is ſometimes Juſtice to defend thoſe who are unjuſt, therefore he went unto Phoceum, and there behaved himſelf, as the Prince Thraſibulus hath acquainted the illuſtrious Cyrus: At his return into his Country, he found that his ſiſter named Oneſicrite was grown one of the faireſt and moſt amiable perſons that could be ſeen: Yet he was not joyed at the ſight of her, becauſe he found her all in tears, by reaſon of her fears to ſee her Country ruined. She would have gone out of the Town if ſhe could, though ſhe had gone and cloyſtered up her ſelf with Meneſteus in the Tomb; but the Country was not open, and there was as much danger in going out of Phoceus, as to tarry in it, ſo as ſhe was forced unto patience: Alſo there being a man of high eſteem and great merit, Son unto one whoſe name was Sfurius, and whoſe own name was Menedorus who was in love with her, I believe it no ſmall reaſon of her ſtay in Phoceus. However, the Town was in a very deplorable condition, when the late Prince of Phoceus, accompanied with Alexideſmus and many enormious perſons, who drew the wrath of the Gods upon our Town by leaving it in the night time, without acquainting any, or leaving a Souldier to defend it. You may imagine Madam, how the Inhabitants were amazed at ſuch an accident: At firſt they caſt their eyes upon the Prince Peranius, who would have exhorted them to defend themſelves; but fear of ſervitude quaſhing their ſpirits, he could not prevail; ſo as reſolving in a tumultuous manner to quit their Countrey for the preſervation of their liberty, they intreated this Prince, that he would be pleaſed to be their General; teling him, that as his Predeceſſors carryed into Aſia the Collony which built Phoceus, ſo that he would pleaſe to conduct them unto ſome Country, promiſing him moſt exact obedience: He would once more have perſwaded them to defend their walls, but it was impoſſible to perſwade them unto a certain death. Inſomuch as the Prince being forced to yield, and chooſing rather to fly than yield without blows, as he muſt have done if he did not yield unto them, therefore he amuſed the Prince Tora bulus under colour of a two dayes parley; during which time he tackled up all the Ships in the Port, which was no ſmall number, and in one night loading them with all that was precious in Phoceus, even to the very ſtatues of the Temples, all the people of this ſtately Town embarked. But Madam, they imbarked in ſuch diſorder and confuſion that never was a more pittiful ſight to be ſeen, than theſe miſerable Inhabitants loaded with their goods and children, followed by their wives and ſervants, all forſaking their Town with tears, and making the moſt lamentable cryes ther ever was heard: Many were ſo haſty in entering into the Ships, as they fell into the Sea, where death quitted them from that ſervitude which they feared.

For my part, I muſt confeſs I never ſaw the like; for in lieu of prayers which Pilots uſe at leaving the Port for a favourable wind, nothing but a confuſed noiſe of crying Children could be heard; women lamenting, men curſing their hard fortune, and Marriners crying. Whole families might be ſeen ſtriving to get into one ſhip; Friends with Friends, Lovers with Lovers deſired they might periſh together if ſtorms did riſe.

In the mean while the Generous Prince who was General of this Fleet, having aſſembled moſt of the Women of Quality together, he put them into a ſhip that was to be his own, with the Princeſs his Siſter, chooſing three hundred of the beſt men for Souldiers. As for Menedorus, he left his Father Sfurius, and was with the Prince of Phoceus, that he might in this general misfortune be nigh unto her he loved, and mix his ſighs and ſorrows with hers.

At laſt Madam, all being imbarked, Anchors weighed, and day ready to dawn, the Prince of Phoceus gave command to ſail towards the Iſle of Chio, hoping the Inhabitants of that Iſle would ſell unto them the uninhabited Iſles which are in that Place, and therefore he made that way. But that you may the better ſee how ſtrangely the fear of ſervitude had poſſeſſed the minds of the Phocean Inhabitants, be pleaſed to know, that they made a publick oath, by which they engaged themſelves never to return again unto their Town; and for a teſtimonial obligation thereof, they caſt into the Sea a heavy piece of Iron, with Oath never to return until that Iron did float upon the water again, making a thouſand curſes upon him that ſhould be the firſt propounder of a Return.

This terrible Oath being made, the Fleet ſet forward; but day no ſooner did permit them to diſcern objects, but all this navy conſiſting of ſo many ſhips, both overloadned and ill equipped, perceived that contrary winds did riſe with the Sun. For my part, being in the ſhip with the Prince of Phoceus, I did admire at his exprrience in the preſages of a ſtorm, for he no ſoomer caſt his eyes upon the open Sea, but he knew by the colour only that a Tempeſt was nigh: and indeed the Sea beginning to ſwell upon a ſudden, there was great reaſon to fear that this unhappy Fleet would be diſperſed. However, ſince they never uſed any veſſels in our Town but ſuch as had Oars, they went on, notwithſtanding the contrariety of the winds: I need not tell you Madam, in what a fright this great number of women were, who never ſo much as ſaw the Sea before, but as they walked to take the Air in a ſerene afternoon, yet this was not the laſt tempeſt which we found. At laſt Madam, we came to the Iſle of Chio, but in lieu of being received with humility, they denied us the entrance into any of their Ports, and were ſo far from ſelling unto the Prince of Phoceus the uninhabited Iſles which belonged unto them, and are called the Iſles of Enuſſus, that they looked upon us as Enemies, and told us that they would not admit of ſuch Neighbours which might become ſtronger than themſelves, and might hinder their Commerce: ſo as all we could obtain from them, was ſome ſuch refreſhments as we ſtood in need of: Thus were we in a moſt deplorable condition. The great courage of the Phocean Prince had a mind to make theſe Inhabitants more pitiful by force, who were ſo cruel as to deny us admittance, which they might ſo eaſily have granted. But all the ſhips being full of Women, Children, and Servants, and having almoſt no Souldiers, he could not attempt any thing upon them; for though he could eaſily have poſſeſſed himſelf of the Enuſſian Iſlands, yet he would not, becauſe it was impoſſible to keep them: So then to Sea again we muſt, not being fully reſolved what courſe to ſteer: But juſt as we were ready to weigh Anchor at the riſing of the Moon, at which hour the Sea commonly is moſt calm, the Pilots of the Ships did ſay, they heard a voyce which bade them go unto Epheſus, and the Goddeſs there adored would tell them where they ſhould find a habitation. Theſe Pilots had no ſooned told what they heard, but a confuſed noiſe was heard in every ſhip, which ſaid that this voyce from heaven muſt be obeyed, ſo as though the Prince of Phoceus gave no credit unto what theſe Pilots told him, yet he muſt obey the greater number, ſo that to Epheſus we muſt. But ſince it was not a place where this Fleet could ſafely harbour, nor where it was likely they would receive us, I was made choice of to wait upon the Princeſs Oneſicrite, who would her ſelf go and offer a Sacrifice unto Diana: Indeed, we came to Epheſus in a Boat, and afterwards went unto that famous Temple, where that Goddeſs is adored, to ask of her what courſe we ſhould take.

As ſoon as the Sacrifice was ended, ſhe who commanded the vailed Virgins, whoſe name was Ariſtonice, came unto Oneſicrite to tell her, that the goddeſs had appeared during the ſacrifice, and had let her underſtand that ſhe would take us into her protection; That ſhe would have us ſteer our courſe towards the Iſle of Cyrus, and that from thence we ſhould ſubmit our ſelves unto the conduct of the wind and waves: Adding, that when we were arrived at the Harbour unto which ſhe would conduct us, ſhe would there be adored under the figure of a Statue which ſhe would ſhew us, and which was like unto that in the middle of the Temple, only not ſo great: And to evidence unto you (ſaid Ariſtonice unto us) that you need not doubt the words of the Goddeſs whom I ſerve.

I muſt further tell you, that ſhe having abſolutely commanded me to go my ſelf to found a Temple unto her honour in the place where ſhe intends to conduct your Fleet, I am ready to go with you, and teach you by my example how to truſt unto her promiſes. I muſt confeſs, Madam, that the ſpeech of Ariſtonice did ſurprize me as well as Oneſicrite, and raiſed a greater confidence in me than I had before: For I ſaw one, whom I knew to be a perſon of great vertue and ſpirit, ready to quit her Country, and follow ſtrangers whom ſhe knew not. Moreover, be pleaſed to know, that the Phyſiognomy of Ariſtonice was ſo noble, ſo wiſe, and ſo Majeſtical, that ſhe attracted the eyes of all Beholders: Alſo there was a great diſpoſition in the Princeſs Oneſicrite to reverence and believe her: And Ariſtonice having aſſembled all the vailed Virgins, ſhe told them that the Goddeſs had commanded her to go and build a Temple in a place which ſhe did not know: After which, ſhe ſurrendred her authority over them unto another, and left them, to go with us, waited on only by two of her Companions.

Thus we returned unto our Fleet, who received us with more joy than I am able to expreſs: The Statue of Diana was looked upon by all the People with unexpreſſible raptures of joy, and Ariſtonice was reverenced by all the Fleet, as if ſhe had been the Goddeſs her ſelf. This Image of Diana for the ſatisfaction of the multitude, muſt be ſet upon the Poop of the Prince of Phoceus his ſhip, that it might be viſible to all the Fleet. As for the Prince of Phoceus, though a Souldier, yet did he fear and reverence the Gods: he honoured Ariſtonice as a woman conſecrated unto them; but afterwards he admired her as a perſon extraordinary, when he diſcovered the greatneſs of her ſpirit and vertue.

In the mean time, though he had doubted of the apparition which ſhe ſaid ſhe ſaw, yet he could not chuſe but follow her orders, ſince the multitude had ſo great a confidence in what ſhe ſaid. We ſailed therefore to the Iſle of Cyrne without any obſtacle; for ſince our fleet ſeemed to be a Navy, and that a great one, there was no fear of any Pirats: and from Chio the wind was ſo favourable that we came to Cyrne without the leaſt ruffle of the Sea. Hitherto, the Prince of Phoceus ſubmitted unto the conduct of Ariſtonice without contradiction: But after he had taken in all neceſſaries at that Iſle, ſhe would have perſwaded him that the Pilots muſt ſubmit all unto the wind and waves, and make choiſe of no Courſe but as the wind directed; then his Faith began to ſtager, and he would never have obeyed, if the multitude ſtronger than he had not compelled him.

Spurius, who was the moſt conſiderable man in the Fleet next the Prince of Phoceus, was very hardly brought to conſent unto it: Menedorus murmured extreamly, and I muſt needs confeſs I did what I could to oppoſe it. But the People being all for Ariſtonice, ſubmit we muſt unto the waves, wind, and fortune. All this while Ariſtonice was calm, and had ſuch a ſtrong confidence in the Goddeſs whom ſhe adored, that ſhe doubted not the fulfilling of her promiſes.

Now Madam were we in a ſtrange condition ſince we went we knew not whither, and without any deſign but as the wind did waft us: Yet were we in much more deplorable condition; for the Gods doubtleſs to puniſh our unbelief, did raiſe a moſt hideous tempeſt: For Madam, the Wind ſeemed to blow from all Coaſts, and the waves were ſo high that they daſhed over all the ſhips. Moreover darkneſs, thunder, lightning, rain mingling with waves and winds did all make ſuch a horrid noiſe, that the roaring of the Sea could not be diſtinguiſhed: Now did every one think to periſh, and repented of their truſting too much unto hazard. But as for Ariſtonice in the worſt of the Tempeſt, when the whole Fleet was ready to be diſperſed, and ſhe her ſelf at the point of periſhing, ſhe kept ſtill in the ſame tranquility and confidence.

As for the Prince of Phoceus, he ſeemed reſolute and conſtant, but it was only out of his great heart which feared not death,and not out of any hopes to eſcape. As for Menedorus, though he did not apprehend the danger in reſpect of himſelf, yet he was not ſo reſolute as the Prince of Phoceus; for his fears of the Princeſs Oneſicrite did fill him ſo full of compaſſion, and he was ſo greived to ſee her in danger, that if throwing himſelf into the Sea would have calmed the tempeſt, he would willingly have been the victime to appeaſe incenſed Neptune. But amidſt all theſe murmurs, Ariſtonice with her ordinary tranquility did ſpeak with the ſame freedom of ſpirit, as if the Seas were all ſerenity and calmneſs. Poor men that you are (ſaid ſhe unto the murmuring Mariners) though you do not believe my words, yet believe that the ſame Gods which raiſed can calm this Tempeſt, and perhaps make it ſerve to bring you unto a Port: Leave the Rudder to their providence, and be guided by them, ſince they are wiſer than you. The truth is Madam, after we had been weather-beaten three whole dayes, our Maſts broken, and our Sailes ſhattered, upon a ſudden the Winds ceaſed, the Waves abated, the Rain diminiſhed, the Heavens cleared, and the Sun ſhined: ſo as in an inſtant paſſing from an extream roughneſs into a calm ſmoothneſs, hope began to cheer up our hearts: Yet I muſt tell you, our hopes were but weak; for our ſhip was in a very bad condition, and our whole Fleet was extreamly diſperſed, two ſhips were not together, and doubtleſs the happier for us; for had not the winds ſeperated them one from another, they had infallibly fallen foul upon each other and enter-ſhaked. As ſoon as all was calm, Ariſtonice getting upon the Deck, kneeled before the Image of Diana, and in behalf of the whole Fleet thanked that Goddeſs for preſerving them: After which riſing up, ſhe was the firſt that diſcovered Land, Then ſpeaking with authority as if inſpired by the Gods; Courage (ſaid ſhe unto the Prince of Phoceus who was next her) for I ſee the place where Diana will have a new Altar, and where ſhe will find us a moſt ſafe Sanctuary. As ſoon as ſhe had ſaid ſo, the Prince of Phoceus ſpied ſome Rocks which ſeemed to confine the Sea; ſo as not knowing whether that Land was Friend or Enemy, they ſteered thither. Since all the Fleet ſtrived to rally together, and endeavoured to repair every ſhip which the Tempeſt had ſhattered. It was long before we came there, for the Storm had ſo weather-beaten them, that they were almoſt out of hopes to get unto the Shore, it was ſo far off: but the Marriners being very induſtrious, and life being very ſweet, every one was both laborious and full of invention, ſo as we came neer enough to diſcern a moſt pleaſant Country.

Then we diſcovered very near us, three little Iſlands almoſt at an equal diſtance from each other, and made a Regular Triangle: where there was a Port able only to receive fifteen or twenty Ships; the Prince of Phoceus made towards theſe Iſles, which were ſeparated from the Continent about thirty Furlongs, that he might there reaſſemble all the Fleet; and from thence ſend to know what Country it was which they ſaw and ſeemed ſo pleaſant at ſuch a diſtance: Since his Pilot had not loſt his Rudder though he had neither Sail-yard nor Maſt, he cauſed him to Row by ſtrength, and leaving all the reſt of the Ships a good way behind he arrived at theſe Iſles, the Sea being as calm as any Lake. When he was ſo near to diſcern that they had no Trees, he ſaw come out betwixt theſe Iſles a great Painted and Guilded Bark, whoſe Sails were Sky-colour, as well as all the Cordage, which had up-the Poop a moſt ſtately Tent, under which were many Ladies and ſome men talking to them. But as the ſight of the Bark rejoyced all that were in the Prince of Phoceus his Ship, ſo this ſhattered bottom moved thoſe that were in this Bark unto compaſſion: but their compaſſion was mixed with ſome wonder; for ſince they eſpied at that time a great Fleet behind our Ship, we perceived that in lieu of coming to us, they ſent out a little Boat to know who we were. This Encounter being both full of wonder and delight unto us, conſidering the ſtate wherein we were, and the need we had of help; the Princeſs Oneſicrite, and all of any quality in the Ship got upon the Deck, and began to look at the Bark with as much curioſity as they looked at us. But when this little Boat was come up to us, we made ſuch ſigns of Peace unto them as we uſe upon our Seas, not knowing whether or no they underſtood us, we perceived that the Habit of thoſe three men in it, was altogether unknown unto us. Ariſtonice her ſelf, who thought ſhe had ſeen men of all Nations in the World at the Temple of Epheſus, ſhe confeſſed, that ſhe could not imagine of what Country they ſhould be: However, though their Habits were ſomewhat barbarous, yet there was ſomething of handſomneſs in them, as you may judge by thoſe who came with me. But, Madam, the worſt at firſt was, that when they ſpoke unto us we did not underſtand them; ſo as not thinking that men whom we underſtood not, could underſtand us, we began to expreſs our misfortune by ſigns. But one of the three hearing us talk to one another, we much rejoyed to hear him leave that language which he uſed at firſt, and ask us in Greek of what Country we were? whither we were going, and what Fleet that was behind us? Madam, I cannot eaſily expreſs our joys; let it ſuffice I tell you, that it was ſo great a wonder that we were almoſt raviſhed out of our wits: For though it was only the part of the Phocean Prince to anſwer, yet almoſt every one upon the Deck did anſwer ſomething; Ariſtonice ſaid that Diana conducted them unto their Country: Oneſicrite, that war had driven them from their Country; the Prince of Phoceus ſaid, that fear of ſervitude had chaſed them away: Menedorus, that Tempeſt had caſt them upon their Coaſts, and, we were not able to judge of her excellencies. Since ſhe was all Curioſity to ſee thoſe whom ſhe was to ſave, ſhe advanced a pace out of her Tent before the reſt of the Ladies with her, and we eaſily diſcerned which was ſhe before ſhe was named unto us. Fancy, Madam, a great perſon, whoſe high and noble ſtature was ſo majeſtick, as one ſhould conceive Pentheſilea to be: But fancy withall, that though ſhe had the ſtature of that fair and young Amazon who died by the hand of Achilles, yet ſhe had not her fierceneſs. But on the contrary, ſhe had ſo much ſweetneſs, and ſo many Charms in her Aſpect, though her mind was high, as it might well be ſaid, that as one could not love her without fear, ſo one could not fear her without love: Since never any had ſo many charms, ſo much Modeſty, nor more Beauty: Yet, Madam, do not fancy Cleonisbe's complexion to be of the daſling whiteneſs, which often hides many a fault, or at leaſt leſſens them. On the contrary, her Complexion was black; but ſuch a black ſo uniform and luſtrious, as was the perfecteſt beauty in the world: As for her Hair, it was of that colour which ſuits well with all Complexions; neither ſo hard as the blackeſt hue, nor ſo yellow as ſome, but the lovely curling brown which ſets off the beauty of her that owns it.

Moreover, Cleonisbe hath the moſt pleaſing uniformity in her face that is imaginable: It cannot be ſaid her face is oval, or that it is round; but ſuch a juſt proportion of parts as both thoſe kind of faces can give unto an exact beauty. Her mouth was the handſomeſt that ever eye beheld; for it was not only well made, and her lips were not only that lovely Carnation which animates beauty, but it had an unexpreſſible Charm, which would perſwade you, though you looked only upon that part, that ſhe muſt of neceſſity be eloquent, and that ſhe had abundance of wit, there being ſuch a kind of little Dimples at the corners of her mouth, and ſuch a kind of ſprightly ſmiling and melancholy together, which always appeared, and forced every one to believe what ſhe ſaid.

But, Madam, now I have made an imperfect deſcription of Cleonisbe's Stature, Mind, Complexion, Hair, Face, and Mouth; how ſhall I deſcribe her Eyes? Yet ſince I am engaged to deſcribe them as well as I can, I muſt tell you, that they are black, great, ſparkling and ſweet; indeed they are ſo ſprightly quick, ſo wonderous modeſt, and ſo ſweetly paſſionate, that they inſpire love in the very hearts of all Beholders: Moreover, they are not ſuch Eyes as uſe to aſcertain tumultuous ſtirring in them, as will not ſuffer one to judge of them becauſe they are continually changing Objects. But on the contrary, though they be very quick and lively, and though ſhe have moſt penetrating looks with them, yet they are all ſweetneſs and tranquility: Whatſoever ſhe looks upon, ſhe looks upon it applicatively, and without abandoning her extream modeſty which is inſeparable from all her Actions, ſhe never caſts her Eyes off thoſe who ſpeak unto her, and by conſequence doth ſuffer one to look and admire thoſe million of Charms which are in them; for indeed there appears in them a miſcellany of Wit, Spirit, Love, Languiſhing, Modeſty, Paſſion, Vivacity, Virtue, Goodneſs, Mirth, Melancholy, Beauty, and Charms. So that, Madam, if you joyn ſuch Eyes as I have deſcribed, unto all the reſt the ſuperlative Excellencies which I have related, unto ſuch a buxom Plumpneſs as uſually is in youth, you may eaſily believe that people who had three days of Tempeſt together; ſeen the Image of death about them, were pleaſingly raviſhed to ſee the admired Cleonisbe on the Deck of her Bark: I cannot think that thoſe of the Iſle of Cyprus, who ſaw Venus in that Magnificent Shell which was both her Cradle and her Ship, did more admire her, than we Cleonisbe. She was that day dreſſed after the African mode; to wit, her Hair half looſe, part whereof was braided with Ribbonds of lively colours behind her head: Her Gown which was of Carnation and White, was of a very pleaſing Faſhion and Gallant, which without hiding the Comelineſs of her Stature was very Majeſtical: The Claſpes of this Gown was Lockets of Diamons, all before, and likewiſe about her ſhoulders: Her Sleeves were half turned up, and ſhewed the fair hands and arms of the wearer, as well as her neck, about which was a rich Carcanet of Diamonds covered with thin Tiffany. To add ſomething more of Gallantry unto this little Maratine Triumph; round about the Tent in which Cleonisbe was, were ſet green boughs whoſe Odor reached us before we came unto the Bark; there might be ſeen a thouſand Branches of Orange Trees full of Flowers, mingled with Branches of Myrrh, Jeſſemine, and ſuch as making a Canopy over Cleonisbe's head did perfume the Air. This Miſcellany of Leaves, of Flowers, of Diamonds, and other rich Ornaments, did make a moſt admirable and pleaſing Object.

In the mean time, though we were very attentive in beholding Cleonisbe, yet we obſerved that there was many handſome Ladies with her, and among the men there was one who ſeemed to be one of high Quality, both by his Port and by his Habit; and alſo by the Carriage of Cleonisbe towards him. I beſeech you, Madam, pardon me for being ſo tedious in relating how Cleonisbe appeared unto me the firſt time I ſaw her: I will now acquaint you with the paſſages in the Bark of Cleonisbe, and tell you that the Cock-boat going before us, as ſoon as it came near enough for the Prince of Phoceus to ſee and be ſeen, he ſaluted her with all poſſible Reverence: After which Hipomenes carrying him into the Bark, he carried him unto this Princeſs who received him with much Civility. You ſee here, Madam, (ſaid he unto her in Greek) an unfortunate Prince, who gives you hearty thanks for keeping all the People of a great City from periſhing: For I am moſt confident that it is your preſence which calmed the incenſed Waves and cauſed the Storms to ceaſe which wou'd have ruin'd us. And, Madam, after my thanks for ſaving the lives of ſo many miſerable Souls and innocent Perſons, I beſeech you out of your goodneſs preſerve them, by obtaining from the King your Father, an entrance into his Ports for our weather beaten Ships, that he would be pleaſed to lend an Ear unto the cauſe of our Exile, unto a relation of our miſeries, that he would afford us ſome comfort in our extremities, and fulfill the promiſes of a great goddeſs. Sir, replied Cleonisbe, I am ſo glad to find an occaſion of helping the miſerable, eſpecially eſpecially ſuch unfortunates as your ſelf, that I have much ado to ſay, I am ſorry for your diſaſters, ſince they give me a fit occaſion for doing you a good Office, and of letting you know, that our Nation is not ſo barbarous as it is believed to be.

In the mean time, ſince I underſtand by Hipomenes that there are Ladies in your Ship, I beſeech you let us go and take them into my Bark, ſince a place wherein they were like to have periſhed cannot be pleaſing unto them: And when we have taken them in, you may ſend Orders unto your Fleet to ſhelter themſelves amongſt theſe Iſlands, until I have preſented you unto the King my Father, and obtained your deſires from him; for let me tell you, Sir, once more, that I do hold it ſo glorious to do all the good that one is able, as I am confident, that I ſhall be more joyed in protecting you, than my Protection can be profitable to you.

Oh Madam (replied the Prince of Phoceus, and looked upon her with admiration) is it poſſible to find ſuch a perſon as your ſelf in the remoteſt parts of the Earth? Can Fame be ſo injurious as not to make you known unto Greece, and maugre the huge Sea which ſeparates, make you adored? Thoſe who taught me the Grecian Language, replied ſhe, and ſmiled, did alſo teach me, that Credit is not always to be given unto the flatteries of your Nation, and therefore waving your Commendations, I will hear no more of them from a man who queſtionleſs is moſt knowing in all things, ſince he is of that Country, where the ignorance that reigns in ours is baniſhed.

After this, Cleoniſbe ſeeing the Prince of Phoceus his Ship was near, ſhe commanded her Bark to meet, and entreated that man of quality who was with her, whoſe name was Bomilcar to go and receive the Princeſs Oneſicrite, and Ariſtonice, and to bring them to her. So as Bomilcar obeying her with much joy, he was alſo at this time very haſty in his obedience, and went to preſent his hand to Oneſicrite: But ſince that Princeſs would have Ariſtonice go firſt, out of her reverence to the Goddeſs whom ſhe ſerved, Bomilcar did lead her: So as Menedorus did help his adored Princeſs out of the Ship, and ſo they went unto the Princeſs Cleoniſbe, who was talking with the Prince of Phoceus: Ariſtonice at her going out of the Ship did ſafely lay up the Statue of Diana, and committed the care of it unto ſome truſty men: And the Prince of Phoceus ſent orders that the Father of Menedorus ſhould command the Fleet in his abſence. It is not an eaſie matter, Madam, to relate the reciprocal admirations of Cleonisbe, Oneſicrite, and Ariſtonice: Nor can I verbatim relate the ſpeeches of theſe excellent perſons; therefore I beſeech you, Madam, diſpence with me, and imagine them. For my part, I was ſo ſurprized to ſee Cleonisbe, and ſo aſtoniſhed to hear her ſpeak, that I could not chuſe but think, ſhe had been either at Athens, or Corinth, or Delphos, or Thebes. I perceived alſo, that her politeneſs had communicated it ſelf unto almoſt all about her, and that moſt of the Ladies with her had nothing of barbariſm in them. Bomilcar alſo had the Air of an ingenious man, and of a great ſoul, ſo as being all wonder, I admired and looked, and looked and admired, and ſaid nothing till we came unto the ſhore.

In the mean time, I obſerved one amongſt the Ladies, whoſe name was Glacidia, whom Cleonisbe preferred before all the reſt, and addreſſed her talk unto her, when ſhe commended the beauty of Oneſicrite, or when ſhe talked of Ariſtonice, and I perceived alſo that the Lady was of no mean merit. And I had alſo time enough to obſerve the agitation which was in the Prince of Phoceus his heart; and to obſerve that Bomilcar perceived it as well as I did: I heard him ſay unto Glacidia in a low voice and ſmile, that conſidering how this ſtranger doth gaze upon Cleonisbe; it is to be feared that after he hath eſcaped the Tempeſt, he will be Ship-wrack'd in the Port. If ſuch a misfortune fall upon him (replied Glacidia and ſmiled as well as Bomilcar) I ſuppoſe the conformity of your fortune will move you to contract a friendſhip with him. Oh Glacidia, replied he, you know very well that ſympathy in ſuch matters as theſe, do never make the ſufferers to love one another. Thus, Madam, I underſtood that Bomilcar was a lover of Cleonisbe, but I could not then diſcover whether he was well or ill treated; becauſe Glacidia taking notice that I might underſtand them becauſe they ſpoke Greek, ſhe turned towards me, and deſired me to tell her in ſhort the condition of our fortunes.

In the mean time, the nearer we came to the ſhore, the more pleaſant the Country ſeemed; for amongſt a thouſand ſeveral Trees, whereof the Country is full, one might ſee upon the right hand great ſterile Rocks, which made the fertility of other places ſeem the greater. There was alſo on the ſame hand, a mountain whoſe bottom was full of ſtately Pines; and upon the top, which was very ſteep, ſtood a Tower of an irregular ſtructure, which as ancient as it was, yet was it a great ornament unto that ſide of the Country.

On the other hand, the Country was very plain, yet mingled with little Hills, Valleys, Rocks, Meadows, Fountains, Rivers, and a hundred pleaſant inequalities of different Scituations, which made the houſes built there very delightful. Moreover, one might ſee abundance of Olive Trees, Pomegranat Trees, Mirtles, Lawrels; and all their Gardens full of Oranges, Jeſſimines, and a thouſand other delightful varieties; I do not think any Country more pleaſant, or where the Sun produceth more ſweet Spring-times, longer Summers, richer Autumns, or ſhorter Winters. The Heavens are always clear, the fruits are always good, their Seas are full of Fiſh; and the Hunters do find ſuch abundance of Game, that be one of what quality or humour one will, there is enough to give full ſatisfaction.

But to return again into the Bark, out of which I wandered to make this deſcription: Give me leave to tell you, Madam, that as ſoon as the Bark was in the Port, we ſaw many Cabins of Fiſhers along the ſhore ſide, and many Houſes diſperſed about the Country, whoſe proſpect was limited by far-off mountains, on the tops of which might Snow be ſeen, though it ſeldom or never falls in the place where we landed. The Princeſs Cleonisbe having many Coaches waiting for her by the water-ſide, ſhe deſired the Ladies with her to go into ſome of them, and to make room for us, that we might go ſome thirty Furlongs unto a Caſtle where ſhe left the King.

But as ſoon as we were all landed, we heard upon a ſudden a great noiſe of horns winded by men which were hunting, and we ſaw a great crew of Hunters, which though ſomething barbarous yet was pleaſant, and ſomething of magnificence: All the Dogs had great Collers of of Silver ſtudded with Gold: The Footmen had every one a kind of ſhell, which they call Trumpets, and which they uſe inſtead of Horns, which made a noiſe as ſhrill as the Tritons before Neptune. The Horſemen had Bows, Arrows, and Javelins; and for their Habits, they were mixed with ſuch variety of lively colours, as could not chuſe but much take the eye. Every one then turning towards the place from whence theſe Hunters came, we ſaw one who ſeemed to be the Maſter of all the reſt, and who leaving the multitude which followed him, he came ſtrait towards the Princeſs Cleonisbe, who told the Prince of Phoceus that he who was coming towards them was the Prince Carimantes her Brother. She had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but the Prince alighted from his Horſe and came to her, and we ſaw him to be extreamly handſome, and not above four and twenty years of age. When he was near enough to diſcern thoſe who were with Cleonisbe, he was ſurprized, eſpecially when he diſcovered a great Fleet. Yet he was not long in his wonder; for the Princeſs Cleonisbe preſenting unto him this brave, but unhappy company, who had put themſelves under her protection: as happy as your Chaſe can be (ſaid ſhe unto him and ſmiled) I am ſure mine upon the Sea is more, and you have not enjoyed more pleaſure all the day, than doubtleſs you will have, in helping me to negotiate unto the King in behalf of theſe excellent perſons which you ſee here, and whom I beſeech you to protect. Oneſicrite being as fair as any eye ever ſaw, ſhe had ſo attracted the eyes and mind of the Prince Carimantes, as he hardly knew what Cleonisbe did ſay unto him. 'Tis true, he did as much as if he had heard her, for he was ſo full of civilities unto Oneſicrite, the Prince of Phoceus, Ariſtonice, and unto Menedorus, that they had reaſon to be very well ſatisfied.

However, ſince that place was not fit for any long diſcourſe, Carimantes carried Oneſicrite unto Cleonisbes Coach, telling the Prince of Phoceus, Menedorus, and my ſelf, that we ſhould go on Horſeback with him; for having at all huntings many ſpare Horſes, there were as many as we ſtood in need of: So that as ſoon as the Prince of Phoceus had waited upon Cleonisbe unto the Coach where Oneſicrite already was, and that Bomilcar had waited upon Ariſtonice; and that the Coaches began to go, they all took horſe and followed: The Prince of Phoceus all the way did talk with Carimantes, and acquainted him with the deſolation of his Country, the fortune of their Arms, the greatneſs of their Conqueſts, the reſolution of the Phocean Inhabitants, the command of the Goddeſs which is adored at Epheſus, the ſtorm we endured, and the meeting with the Princeſs Cleonisbe, who underſtood the ſame things from Oneſicrite more particularly than ſhe had them from Hipomenes. Though the way was not very long, yet I obſerved Bomilcar to have much ſpirit: A ſpirit ful of activity, as one might ſee by his Phyſiognomy that he was poſſeſſed with more than one violent paſſion. He asked me a hundred indifferent Queſtions, and enquired very narrowly concerning the Phocean Prince: Alſo I asked Hipomenes all that my curioſity did prompt me unto, hoping that ſince he was a Grecian, I might have all good Offices from him; and amongſt the reſt, I asked and deſired him to tell me who Bomilcar was? Sir, ſaid he unto me, he is a man ſo conſiderable in this Court, that he is looked upon as the man who only put an end unto the War between the Carthaginians and the Segoregians: For being a very potent man in his own Country, it was by his negotiation doubtleſs, that thoſe two Enemy-Nations are at this time in peace. I beſeech you, ſaid I unto him, is not Bomilcar originally of this Country? No, replied he, the proud Carthage is the place from whence his Father had his being.

After this, paſſing from one diſcourſe unto another, I underſtood that the King of the Segoregians had no other children but Carimantes, and Cleonisbe; and I underſtood alſo that I was not miſtaken, when I believed Glacidia was much in favour with Cleonisbe; for he told me, that ſhe did very much eſteem and love her; adding, that ſhe very well deſerved this happineſs, becauſe ſhe madeuſe of Cleonisbes favour only to do good offices unto all well qualified men. At the laſt Madam, we came unto the Caſtle where the King was, which was one of the moſt Princely Seats which ever I ſaw, a Seat which had a hundred delicate Rivulets and pleaſant Meadows about it, and a Proſpect of ſo vaſt an extent towards the Sea, that ones eyes could find no other limits but their own weakneſs, which would not permit them to diſcern beyond the confines which Nature had preſcribed unto them: In coming to it we ſaw a great Walk ſet on both ſides with Lawrels, above eight hundred paces long. We paſſed through a long aſcent rayled and balliſtred, planted in order with thouſands of Orange Trees, intermixed with Pomegranets and Citrons, which pleaſing more than one ſenſe at once, did perfume the Aire in which we breathed. We ſaw alſo in the midſt of the Garden an admirable ſpring of Water which Nature had caſt into an excellent figure, and which did riſe in a murmuring noiſe, and fall again into a little River in a Meadow behind this Garden. We obſerved alſo in coming to this Caſtle, that all the walls of the Court were covered with Mirtle; and that there was a rare border of odoriferous herbs behind the Caſtle, where one might ſee Arbors of Lawrel, Fountains and Rivers in a moſt admirable method. But our greateſt wonder was, the magnificence within this ſtately houſe, and particularly in the Kings Chamber: Truly Madam, though it was not adorned either with Pictures, or, hung with Sydonian Tapiſtry or purple; yet what we ſaw was much more rich and glorious than any that ever I ſaw: For Madam, I beſeech you to imagine this Chamber to be the highth of the houſe, and one of the moſt raviſhing objects that ever any eye beheld. The walls and roof were Enamelled with a kind of irregular Arabian work all of mother of Pearl and Coral: The bow of Heaven had not more ſplendant colours than the reflection from the mother of Pearl: and being mingled with Coral of all colours that nature ever produced in the Liguſtick Sea which is not far off, it made the moſt beautiful object in the world. For ſome being White, ſome Black, ſome Flame-colour, ſome Carnation, ſome Roſe-colour, this Miſcellany is impoſſible to be deſcribed: and therefore not to inſiſt long upon it, give me leave to tell you Madam, how the King of the Segoregians received us.

Cleontsbe being of no leſs excellency of judgment than ſpirit, ſhe ſent before to acquaint the King with her adventure, as ſoon as ſhe landed, to the end he might not be ſurprized, when we came into the Hall of the Caſtle, Carimantes preſented his hand unto Oneſicrite, who now could not let Ariſtonice go before her, ſo that Bomilcar did lead her. As for the Prince of Phoceus, he preſented his hand unto Cleonisbe, who moſt obligingly told him, that ſince the Prince her Brother would preſent Oneſicrite unto the King ſhe would do him that good office as to preſent him. As for Menedorus, he gave his hand unto Glacidia. Since the King did underſtand the Grecian Language as well as Carimantes and Cleonisbe, he was moſt ſenſibly moved at what the Prince of Phoceus ſaid unto him: after that the Princeſs his Daughter had preſented him: for though his Speech was but ſhort, yet he told him all our misfortunes, and in few words did ſo explain them as the King might moſt eaſily underſtand and remember them, he made choice of ſuch apt words to expreſs our miſeries as the longeſt and moſt Eloquent Oration in the world, could not work more tenderneſs in the hearts of Auditors. To be ſhort, Sir (ſaid the Prince of Phoceus unto the King at the end of his Speech) you ſee here a company of miſerable men, whom fear of ſervitude hath forced to forſake their Country, who have not one foot of ground to tread upon unleſs you give it them, or unleſs they uſurp it; a weather-beaten people, loaded with ſorrows, who have nothing but our liberties and hopes of your favour: nor could we ever hope unleſs the Princeſs Cleonisbe had promiſed to be our Patroneſs and Mediator to you, and alſo obtained the ſame favour for us from the Prince Carimantes. Thus, Sir, upon you depends our Deſtiny, ſince if you do not permit us entrance into your Ports for our Fleet, we have nothing elſe to do but die patiently. As the King was ready to anſwer, Ariſtonice began to ſpeak: Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, give me leave to tell you in all due reverence, that this Tempeſt which hath caſt us upon your Coaſts, hath given you an ample occaſion to ſhew your Virtue in receiving us: It was a great Goddeſs who did conduct us hither; who deſiring to have a Temple erected unto her Glory in your Country, and to be known amongſt your people, hath commanded me to do what I have done.

Take heed, Sir, of incenſing her by rejecting thoſe who are unfortunate, who as miſerable as they are have in their Ships ineſtimable Treaſures, ſince they have there a great number of Virtuous men, men full of wiſdom and knowledg, excellent Artiſts in all things, who have all the Arts and Sciences in their Ships, which they can impart and communicate unto your people: if you will be pleaſed only to allow them ſome Corner of your Countery, to build a Temple in, and to enjoy that liberty which hath coſt them their Country. Once more, I adviſe you to beware how you refuſe thoſe Favours which the Gods do offer you, and know that the Goddeſs whom I adore does promiſe you by me, to make your Country ſo famous over all the World, if you receive us favourably, that it ſhall excel all other parts of the World, Ariſtenice ſpoke this with ſo good a grace and ſo much authority, that all the Company were much moved, and eſpecially the King; And he anſwered the Prince of Phœcus and Ariſtonice with all imaginable ſorrow, and preſently conſented that their Fleet ſhould enter into his Ports, upon condition that there ſhould be but a certain number of armed men in every Ship: And as for giving them a place to inhabit, he told them, that he would aſſemble the Sarronides and confer with them.

In the mean time, he would permit them to hope for a favourable anſwer. Since Madam, this word Sarronides may perhaps be a ſtrangre to you: I think it requiſite to tell you that the Sarronides amongſt the Gaules in general, are very like unto the Magi in Perſia, with this difference, that the Magi meddle only in matters of Religion, and the Sarronides in civil matters and particular differences. This ſort of Philoſophers, Prieſts, and Magiſtrates altogether were firſt inſtituted by the third King of the Gaules, named Sarron, who would after his own name have them called Sarronides: yet there were ſome part of the Gauls where they were called Druides; becauſe in the Reign of one of their Kings, called Druis, he would have them called ſo. They alſo are divided into ſeveral Orders, and into ſeveral names, for thoſe who do officiate in Sacrifices, are called Vaces: Thoſe who ſtudy the knowledge of natural things, are named Eubages, and thoſe who are appointed to ſign the Heroick Actione of virtuous men, are called the Bardes. As for thoſe who bear the name of Sarronides, or Druides, ſince they are the moſt knowing of all, they are called as I ſaid before, unto the Councel of Kings to render Juſtice, to teach the people, and particularly to inſtruct the youth. Tis true, that among the Segoregians all theſe ſeveral names are not uſed, as they are amongſt the Celtique Gaules, the Belgique Gaules, and amongſt the Allobroges which are other Gaules: But the name of Sarronides only amongſt this people, doth comprehend them all.

The King then having referred this buſineſs unto his Councel which was compoſed of theſe Sarronides: The Princeſs Cleonisbe ſeemed to be well ſatisfied therewith, aſſuring Oneſicrite, that thoſe men who taught humanity unto others, would adviſe the King her Father as ſhe ſhould deſire, promiſing her to ſolicite them in the buſineſs. Carimantes for his part did promiſe the ſame. Afterwards the King talking one after another with the Prince of Phoceus, Ariſtonice, Oneſicrite, and Menedorus, he was ſo extreamly well ſatisfied with them, that he could not chuſe but give them great Commendations. Moreover, Madam, we were ſo happy in pleaſing all the Court, as I may well ſay, never ſtrangers were ſo little ſtrangers as we were there: for we found ſuch earneſtneſs to do us good Offices, that there is great reaſon to believe it was the act of the Gods to diſpoſe all hearts unto our good reception.

In the mean time, the King thinking theſe ſtorm ſhattered people to be in need of reſt, he commanded that the Princeſs Oneſicrite ſhould be carried into a fair Chamber next Cleonisbe's; and that all the reſt of the Ladies with her ſhould be lodged as conveniently as might be, as well as the Prince of Phoceus and Menedorus: Commanding afterwards that all the Fleet ſhould come into the Port which was too little to contain them all: You would wonder, Madam, if I ſhould tell you how careful Cleonisbe and Carimantes was to ſee the King obeyed: for it is hardly credible, that perſons of their Quality ſhould be ſo officious unto ſtrangers whom they knew not;

Indeed they gave ſuch expreſs Commands unto all the Kings Officers to wait reſpectively and magnificently upon theſe perſons, as it was apparent their Merits and Misfortunes did much move them unto Compaſſion. Glacidia for her part was ſo full of obliging Acts both towards Oneſicrite and Ariſtonice, and all the reſt of their Company, as I ſaw Hipomenes had good cauſe to tell me, that ſhe deſerved the favour of Cleonisbe; for ſhe was ſo full of all all-goodneſs and ſpirit both, that ſhe purchaſed much eſteem from the Prince of Phoceus. One paſſage hapned that night, which ſince made it evident that the Gods reſolved that the Prince ſhould in a ſhort time get much love, much eſteem and much friendſhip, amongſt all theſe perſons who knew him ſo little, yet in a little time after loved him ſo much. For, Madam, be pleaſed to know that as ſoon as the Prince of Phoceus knew, Cleonisbe was gone unto her Chamber, he went thither to preſent his firſt viſit, and was accompanied with Menedorus: Whilſt Carimantes alſo went to ſee Oneſicrite, the firſt time accompanied with Bomilcar. For my part, I follow'd the Prince of Phoceus, and was a witneſs of his long diſcourſe with Cleonisbe: In going thither, I acquainted him how Glacidia was Cleonisbe's Favourite, and from that time he was very careful to ſpeak ſuch things of her as might be pleaſing; after much other diſcourſe, wherein he did very much commend her, and ſaid, that he had obſerved her to be a perſon of much ſpirit and goodneſs. Oh Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, do not judg ſo ſoon of Glacidia; for I do aſſure you, that in ſo ſhort a time you cannot judg of her without much Injuſtice: ſince it is not poſſible, be as ingenious as you can be, that you ſhould know all her excellent Qualities. I aſſure you, Madam, replied the Prince of Phoceus, I am confident ſhe hath all ſhe can have, ſince you love her ſo well. That reaſon is not very convincing (replied Cleonisbe very modeſtly) but to let you ſee that though I live amongſt a people whom the Grecians called barbarous, yet that know who are of merit, I muſt deſcribe Glacidia unto you; I ſhall not ſpeak of her Perſon ſince you know it already, nor ſhall I tell you, that I do commend her moſt for her beauty, though as you ſee, ſhe is fair, pleaſing, and of a good ſtature: nor ſhall I acquaint you with the graces of her wit, nor the inexhauſtible treaſure of it, becauſe I will hereafter hear her Elogy from your own mouth: Neither will I tell you how ſhe has a thouſand Excellencies which ſhe never vaunts of, and which out of her modeſty ſhe hides: but let me tell you that her Birth is very Noble, and that never any was more ſolidly generous, nor more truly good: The Quality which I moſt love in Glacidia is, that ſhe is capable of a moſt tender and conſtant friendſhip, and that never any woman living had a Soul leſs biaſſed and intereſted than hers. Though her Fortunes have met with many Rubs, yet ſhe armed herſelf with ſuch an invincible patience, as merits the Commendations of all the wiſe.

In the mean time, her own perplexities did never cauſe any perplexities in any other; for ſhe knew ſo well how to cloſet up her ſorrows in her own heart, that they never appeared either in her eyes, her actions, nor her words: but on the contrary ſhe is continually of ſuch an even temper, as that ſhe ſeems to take delight in every diverſion, even when her heart doth throb the moſt. Moreover the vertue of Glacidia is neither ſevere nor ſalvage: and though ſhe ſeem to be the moſt ſerious perſon in the world, yet none is more knowing in all matters of Gallantry than her ſelf: But the quality which I moſt applaud in her is her juſtneſs even to her greateſt Enemies; For ſhe will commend them when any occaſion is given, with as much earneſt ſincerity, as if they had never diſobliged her.

Furthermore, I muſt acquaint you, Sir, that if ever you become one of her Friends, you may be ſure that none dare give you half commendations in her preſence; for ſhe is ſo ſenſible and zealous in behalf of them ſhe loves, as ſhe thinks they are never enough applauded: She cannot endure any Raillery upon her Friends: and I aſſure you, there is not any one in the world has a greater number of them than ſhe: For ſince Fortune had carried her into the Court of the King of Celtes, where ſhe continued a long time, and that ſhe hath been ſince in many ſeveral places, I can aſſure you, ſhe got friends in all of the beſt ſort: And believe me, replied the Prince of Phoceus, her merits never got her any whom ſhe eſteems more than your ſelf: 'Tis true, replied Cleonisbe, that is her error; but I am confident that if her quality were above mine, as mine is above hers, ſhe would love me as ſhe doth. Grandeur would never change her, but ſhe would be as juſt to me as I am to her. She is ſo reſerved (added ſhe) that if I had not uſed a little violence upon her, I ſhould not have got her unto this recreation; for ſhe affects home better than the tumults of a Court which ſhe cannot endure but for my ſake. You repreſent Glacidia ſo advantagiouſly, Madam, replied the Prince of Phoceus, that I muſt needs think her loved by all the world: And ſo ſhe is of all that know her, replied ſhe, but yet I aſſure you ſhe is not prodigal of her friendſhip, though ſhe be ungrateful unto none; for ſhe is very full of acknowledgments, and hates ingratitude as much as marriage, unto which ſhe has a ſtrange averſion. Since you do love her, Madam, replied the Prince of Phoceus, ſhe has need of a grateful ſoul, if ſhe will acquit her ſelf of ſuch an obligation: But, Madam, I beſeech you give me leave to beg a pardon in behalf of all Grecians, for the wrong they have done unto your Nation in calling them barbarous, becauſe for ought I ſee they are barbarous themſelves in ſaying it, eſpecially if they ſaw you. No, no, replied Cleonisbe, do not unjuſtly accuſe them, for I muſt confeſs we are ſo, and I muſt for my own glory confeſs it; ſince if I do merit any commendations, it is only becauſe being born in a Country from where all knowledg is baniſhed, yet I have ſome glimpſes and inclination unto all excellencies. But for you who are of that Country where all minds are cultivated with care, where ignorance is a crime, where Politeneſs is general, and where their diſcourſe is neither groſs nor ſtupid, nor rude, how is it poſſible you can accuſtom your ſelf unto a Court, wherein are ſo few ſociable perſons? You ſee (added ſhe and ſmiled) that in a ſhort time you have purchaſed a great ſhare in my good opinion; ſince one while I tell you that you ſhall not find us ſo barbarous as we are believed, and ſince now I confeſs that we are more than is believed. Oh Madam, ſaid the Prince of Phoceus, thoſe who can ſpeak as you do, cannot be barbarous; I am ſure all Greece would confeſs it, if they had the honour to ſee how you excell them in all things.

As the Prince of Phoceus was ſaying ſo, Carimantes entred with Oneſicrite, who would not ſtay until the morning without a viſit unto this Princeſs in her Chamber: And Glacidia entring with her, chance did ſo contrive it, that ſhe did ſit next the Prince of Phoceus, who fell inſenſibly to talk with her in a low voice, whilſt Cleonisbe talked with Oneſicrite, and he told her that Cleonisbe had made ſuch an admirable deſcription of her, as he could not think her Glaſs could more perfectly repreſent her face, than ſhe had the beauty of her ſoul and mind: I make no queſtion replied Glacidia, but the Princeſs can make an excellent deſcription; but I have great reaſon to doubt whether that Picture which you ſay ſhe made, do reſemble me; for as thoſe are not the beſt Painters who make pieces like, ſo I think without offence unto the Princeſs, that ſhe hath ſo ſtriven to make Art correct Nature, that ſhe hath done mine not well. But for my part, Sir, who have no greater ſkill in that excellent art than to imitate what I ſee, I could draw her picture better than ſhe mine. To know that, replied the Prince of Phoceus, you muſt let me ſee it; for I think, that I am already ſo well acquainted with the Princeſs Cleonisbe, that I am able to judge juſtly.

Doubtleſs you know her beauty, replied Glacidia, and ſome part of her mind: But, Sir, it is impoſſible you ſhould know the height of that merit which is in that excellent Princeſs; and therefore that ſhe may be eſteemed by ſo excellent a man as your ſelf, I will do her ſo much right as to acquaint you with ſuch things of her as you cannot know without the expences of a long experience: It's not enough replied the Prince of Phoceus, to tell me what ſhe is, but I beſeech you let me know how ſhe came to be what I ſee ſhe is? Oh, Sir, replied Glacidia, you muſt aſk that of the Gods, and they will tell you, that Cleonisbe is a moſt ſingular perſon. Chance hath ſometimes brought into this Court, men that are well qualified from all parts of the world; and ſince the peace which Bomilcar hath made with the Carthaginians, there hath been many men of that famous Town amongſt us. But yet for all that, ſince the natural Genius of our Nation is War and hunting, I do aſſure you that Cleonisbe do merit the glory of that Politeneſs which is in her, ſince the glimpſes only of her mind have enlightned all the Court: believe it, Sir, you will never ſee any whom ſhe cannot imitate: and on the contrary, you will find, that thoſe who have any ſparks of goodneſs, have them only out of their deſigns of reſembling or pleaſing her. The truth is, Sir, ſhe is obliged only unto her ſelf for what ſhe is, and by prodigy has more divinity than ever was taught her, and all the vertues were born with her. When I ſay all the vertues, I ſay it without any diminution, for I am confident ſhe has them all without exception. I cannot expreſs my delight to hear you ſpeak this of her, replied the Prince of Phoceus; for I do proteſt, lovely Glacidia, I am already ſo much devoted unto the glory of that Princeſs as I ſhould exceedingly grieve to diſcover any fault in her: I aſſure you, replied ſhe, you ſhall never grieve at that, for I am moſt confident you will never find any. The truth is, Cleoniſbe is generous in the higheſt degree of generoſity: She loves glory above her ſelf: She is pitiful, even ſo far as to diſturb her own tranquility to procure it in others: She is all goodneſs, all tenderneſs and ſweetneſs, and yet her great ſoul is moſt heroick and couragious. Moreover, ſhe ſpeaks with as much judgment as wit, and with as much eloquence as judgment; her very tone and accent doth expreſs part of her goodneſs; for ſhe hath ſuch a kind of feeling and paſſionate ſound in her words, as makes it evident her heart is neither fierce nor proud.

Furthermore, though amity be a quality which is ſeldom found in perſons of her birth and condition, yet it is not ſo with Cleoniſbe; for ſhe does ſo cloſely love thoſe whom ſhe thinks worthy of that honour, as I muſt needs commend her for it above all things in the world: The truth is, ſhe is none of thoſe who thinks their quality may diſpence with the true laws of friendſhip, and that equality ought always to be in the minds of ſuch as love truly: But on the contrary Cleoniſbe thinks her ſelf obliged to love as much as any other loves her: ſhe permits one to chide her if ſhe fail in any point of true friendſhip: And ſhe knows ſo well how to put a difference between the King of the Segoregians daughter, and Cleoniſbe, that one cannot ſufficiently ciently admire her. Moreover, though the temper of this Princeſs be ſomething inclinable unto melancholly, yet no perſon upon Earth had a ſweeter Jocundry of mind than ſhe, nor who better pleaſed thoſe unto whom ſhe was freely pleaſed to communicate her ſelf; and ſhe knew ſo well how to turn any thing which ſhe ſaw or heard in a witty and pleaſant manner, as I do not think any in the world could be more knowingly merry than ſhe.

Again, ſhe is liberal after ſo noble a manner, and knew how to make her choice with ſo good a grace, that her gifts never moved any to murmur, but ſuch as were unjuſt or envious. As Glacidia ſaid ſo, Bomilcar who was next her, and partly over-heard her, becauſe her zeal made her louder than ſhe intended, he came and told her in her ear, for heavens ſake Glacidia (ſaid he unto her) let time make known Cleonisbe unto a man who I fear knows her too well already. This ſaying of Bomilcar cauſing Glacidia to laugh he was moved to grumble a little: But as ſhe was turning again towards the Prince of Phoceus, Cleonisbe began to talk unto her, ſo as their diſcourſe was for that night interrupted, and preſently after, every one returned unto their Chambers. But Hipomenes and I did not part ſo ſoon; for ſince by ſpeaking Greek, we came to be acquainted, and to know that his Father and mine had been old friends, we found many occaſions of diſcourſe. But ſince I knew how much it concerned us to know the ſtate of that Court wherein we were, eſpecially conſidering we hoped for a Sanctuary in it I carried him unto the Chamber of the Phocean Prince, who being very importunate with him to know things, he ſatisfied his curioſity. You come hither Sir, (ſaid he unto him) moſt opportunely to ſee this Court in its greateſt glory that ever it can be, and alſo to ſee it in the greateſt diſorder, if the Gods do not give order unto things; for, Sir, you muſt know that the Segoregians have a cuſtom which is peculiar unto themſelves; which is, that the men do never make choice of thoſe they are to marry; but it is the women, who make choice of their Husbands: and by the Laws of the Country a Father is never to force his Daughter. The ſame Laws do alſo require, that the Daughters of their Kings ſhould have the ſame liberty which others have, and that when they have accompliſhed the age of eighteen years, they are to make choice of their Husbands, provided they be of Quality proportionable unto their own: Inſomuch as ſince it is not above two months before Cleonisbe be at her age fit to make her Choice, all the Grandees in the Kingdome, and alſo of our Neighbours which can pretend unto that honour, are here at this preſent, amongſt which Cleonisbe muſt make one happy, and all the reſt miſerable. For, to be open to you, Bomilcar who has a moſt extream ambitious ſoul, is extreamly in love with her: A Prince of this Country named Britomartes is the like: and another Prince amongſt the Celtique Gaules no leſs than he, whoſe name was Galathes, ſo as in all likelihood theſe three Rivals will divide the Court. In the mean time, we are all Feaſts and Diverſions in expectation of this Grand Feaſt, which muſt be ſo ſad unto many.

Whilſt Hipomenes was thus talking, the Prince of Phoceus did hearken with as much attention as if he had been already intereſted in the choice which Cleonisbe was to make. I beſeech you, ſaid he unto him, is it not gueſſed whom the Princeſs will make choice of? No Sir, replied Hipomenes, for ſhe has thus long lived in ſuch a way as makes it believed that ſhe cannot chooſe any to her ſatisfaction; but on the contrary ſeems to be very melancholy ſince ſhe ſees the time of her election draw nigh: Yet certain it is, that ſince ſhe is much obliged unto Bomilcar, it is probable ſhe will make him her Choice: For the truth is, he hath behaved himſelf moſt glorioully both by Land and Sea, in the ſervice of the King her Father. It was by his only means that the Peace was made between the Carthaginians and us: His Father was alſo the cauſe of another Peace, which gave name unto the Princeſs Cleonisbe; for having concluded the Peace by his wiſdom, it chanced ſo that the Segoregian Queen being brought to bed that day of the Princeſs, the King to confirm the alliance between theſe two Nations, did give her two names, to wit, the one of her Country, which was Giptis, and the other of Carthage, which was Cleonisbe. But ſince the laſt of theſe was more agreeable than the firſt, ſhe would alwayes be called by it, ſo as the Carthaginians as ſtill more obliged by it. Bomilcar was much joyed that the Princeſs would bear a name of his Country: But as for her, Sir, I do not think ſhe loves any thing but glory; and though ſhe has the free liberty of her Choice in her ſelf, yet ſhe will chooſe none but whom the King would have her. And it is viſible that Bomilcar, Britomartes, and Galathes, do as much Court the King and Carimantes, as they do Cleonisbe: Alſo they are very obſequious to pleaſe Glacidia; but to ſpeak the very truth, all their endeavours that way are to no purpoſe, for ſhe fancied none of their Councels. Since there are abundance of People about the King, replied the Prince of Phoceus, I doubt you cannot hint unto me which was Britomartes, and which was Galathes. The firſt of theſe replied Hipomenes, is a great black man, and handſome, who has a ſurly and proud Garb, who ſtood behind the King when you talked with him: And Galathes was he who had a gold chain fixed to the Pomel of his Sword, which was a Lion of the ſame, mettle, who is of a middle ſtature, whoſe Hair is fair, the air of his Countenance very ſweet, and his Garb noble. If theſe two Rivals of Bomilcar replied the Prince of Phoceus, have minds ſuitable unto their bodies, and hearts as high as their Garbs, I conceive they have all three great cauſe both to hope and to fear: Certainly replied Hipomenes, they are all three perſons of great minds and courage, though they do not reſemble each other.

Britomartes is a man of Courage, Honeſty, and Wit, but there is a mixture of Gauliſh roughneſs in him which does not pleaſe. As for Galathes, doubtleſs he has a great heart, but ſubtle withal, and I believe that Gaul is able to over-reach a Grecian, he is pleaſing, civil and full of flattery; and though his aſpect doth promiſe all the ſincerity which is attributed unto his Nation; yet certianly he is one that doth leaſt diſcover his thoughts. But as for Bomilcar Sir, it may be ſaid, that if ſome of his ambition were taken away, there would no fault be left in him, for he was as valiant as any could be; He is generous, and a moſt zealous friend; he is liberal and civil; he is moſt exact in performance of all his promiſes, ſtriving to be above his promiſe. He is a man of great wit, his frequency in the world, his travels, and his natural Genius make him able to ſpeak admirably well. But yet for all that, the activity of his temper being joyned unto two moſt violent paſſions, did make him perpetually reſtleſs, ſo as he was not able to ſtay long in any place, unleſs with Cleonisbe or Glacidia, whom he eſteemed very much: Your character of Bomilcar replied the Prince of Phoceus makes me think him fit to be preferred before the other: Yet I am ſure, replied Hipomenes, that he is in great fear not to be choſen. After this, ſince it was very late, we left the Prince of Phoceus, yet he would not go to bed until he knew that our Fleet would not depart from the Iſles until the morning, and then they came into the Harbour a little after the Sun was up.

In the mean while, ſince the beauty of Oneſicrite had moſt ſenſibly touched the heart of Carimantes; and ſince for her ſake he was zealous in the protection of this Phocenſian Collony which had forſaken their Country, he no ſooner knew that Cleonisbe was awake, but he went unto her Chamber, to deſire her, that ſince ſhe was in favour with the chief of the Sarronides, ſhe would go unto him before the King had conſulted with him, and know of him whether theſe ſtrangers were to be received or no, and to perſwade him to let them inhabit in the Land.

Since Cleonisbe had obſerved that the beauty of Oneſicrite had extraordinarily pleaſed Carimantes, ſhe looked upon him and ſmiled: methinks, ſaid ſhe unto him, that in lieu of bidding me go unto the chief of the Sarronides, and negotiate for an entertainment of theſe, you had better have bid me negotiate for a ſtay of that fair One only, whom you gazed upon yeſterday with ſo much admiration. Indeed Siſter replied he, I muſt ingeniouſly confeſs, that the greateſt part of my compaſſion upon thoſe miſerable ſtrangers, doth proceed from the admiration I had of Oneſicrite, whoſe beauty I confeſs hath ſurprized and charmed me. But you may well think (added he) that I am not deſperately in love with her in ſo ſhort a time,or at leaſt I think ſo:yet I muſt confeſs unto you,that I do already love her ſo much, that I cannot endure a perſon of her quality and beauty, ſhould after a tempeſtuous ſtorm at Sea be reduced unto ſuch extremity at Land, as not to know where to inhabit. And therefore ſince my admiration doth beget ſo much pity in me as that I cannot reſt. I conjure you to do as I deſire: And I do proteſt unto you, I am ſo deſirous to effect this deſign, that I wiſh with all my heart you were as compaſſionate of the Phocean Prince and his misfortunes, as I am of Oneſicrite and hers: As for matter of compaſſion (replied Cleonisbe, and ſmiled again) I aſſure you that I am as inclinable to it as you; but I would have it of another nature than yours, which is cauſed rather by the greatneſs of Oneſicrites beauty, than by the greatneſs of her misfortunes. However, I beſeech you believe, that I have ſo much pity as willingly to conſent unto your deſires: And in my opinion, it would be advantagious unto the King, that men ſo civilized as theſe whom the Seas has caſt upon us, ſhould qualifie the rudeneſs of this maritine people which inhabit along this Coaſt.

Carimantes being of a hot compoſition,and full of impatience, he told the Princeſs his Siſter that Time was not to be delayed, and therefore ſomething muſt be done immediately; adding that the King muſt not know that ſhe had ſeen him whom they intended to employ in the buſineſs: So that upon a ſerious examination of the buſineſs,they reſolved that Cleonisbe ſhould ſend for Glacidia, and deſire her to go unto this chief of the Sarronides,who dwelt one part of the year at that Tower which was built upon that Mountain,which I told you we ſaw upon the right hand as we came from the Iſles unto the Port. But becauſe Carimantes would have Oneſicrite and the Prince of Phoceus know what they did for them; he contrived it ſo by the means of Hipomenes, that I ſhould go with Glacidia to be a witneſs of what ſhe ſaid: ſo that after ſhe had received her inſtructions from the mouth of the Princeſs, I went along with her in her Coach, without any other company but one woman, and two footmen, and came to the foot of that Mountain, which as I told you was full of Pine-trees. When we came there we muſt go on foot, for the Mountain was ſo rocky and uneven, that a Coach could not paſs: But to avoid the inconveniency of this rugged way, we found horſes to carry us a foot-way out of the Wood, and better half of the Mountain, whoſe top was ſo ſteep the horſes had much ado to climb it: ſo that with Glacidia alighting from our Horſes, we went the reſt of the way on foot, which was not ſo difficult as one would imagin it, by reaſon of a pair of ſtairs in a Rock which makes the riſe more eaſie, there being at ſeveral diſtances little houſes ſuſtained by Pillars, wherein thoſe who climb the Rock may reſt themſelves in a ſhade. Thus going by this odd kind of way, I helped Glacidia to climb; who talked to me ſo pleaſantly, that I climbed this Mountain, and never looked back, though it be a natural action in all that climb, to look down upon a place from whence they came: ſo as ſince we never reſted until we came unto the laſt of theſe little houſes, which was not above twenty Paces from the Tower, it was only there where I enjoyed the moſt pleaſant proſpect in the world.

The truth is, Madam, I do not think that a ſweeter object was ever ſeen then from the height of this Mountain: For imagin you ſaw a moſt admirable Port in which was a moſt prodigious number of Ships; and to render the Proſpect more beautiful, imagin a vaſt number of Cabins, which ſeem a long and large City wherein Fiſhers inhabit along the Sea-ſide: Beyond which is a moſt pleaſant Country; On the other hand are the three Iſles whereof I ſpake, which pleaſe the eye exceedingly. A little more on the left hand, one may behold barren Rocks, and a Country ſo wild and ſavage, as if one were in a Deſart a hundred thouſand Furlongs diſtant from any habitation, but turning on the other ſide, one may behold all oppoſite objects: A Country as fertile as the other is ſterile, and as pleaſant as the other is wild. One may behold Gardens full of Oranges, Meadows, Hills, Valleys, and all that can make a Country delightful: beyond which, might Mountains be diſcovered afar off, which ſeemed to be ſo piled one upon another, and in ſuch fantaſtical figures, that they much pleaſed the eye, and did limit the proſpect that way. And look but towards the Sea, and it is very delightful, becauſe it is continually full of Fiſher-boats.

I beſeech you, Madam, pardon my tedious deſcription of this pleaſant Mountain, where I ſtayed with Glacidia; and to repair my fault, I ſhall not trouble you with any thing I ſaw in the Tower which ſerved for the habitation of him unto whom we went, whom we found ready to go unto the King, who had ſent for him.

This grave Sarronide, whoſe wiſe and ſerious looks had a mixture both of grandeur and pleaſingneſs in them, did receive Glacidia with all poſſible civility, and ſufficiently teſtified by his expreſſions that he much eſteemed her. But after the firſt Complements paſt, and Glacidia had preſented me unto this ſage Sarronide; after ſhe had in few words declared our misfortunes, telling him the reaſon why Cleonisbe had ſent her unto him, ſhe joyned her perſwaſions unto prayers, and uſed ſuch Rhetorical arguments, that though his ſoul had been of the moſt flinty compoſition in the world, ſhe would have melted him into pity of ſo many miſerable people Do not think (ſaid he unto her, after ſhe had ſpoken her mind) that all your words were needful to perſwade me unto what the Princeſs deſires: For I do profeſs unto you, that as ſoon as ever you began to ſpeak, I was reſolved to do what you deſire, but I muſt confeſs I took ſo much delight in hearing you, that I could not find a heart to impoſe ſilence: and indeed I was glad to receive inſtructions from you, that I might the better know what arguments to uſe unto the King, and perſwade him unto what you deſire: Oh Father, replied Glacidia (for ſo out of reverence ſhe termed him) do you not fear to puff one up into a vanity of conceit by ſpeaking thus? You Sir, I ſay, whoſe words are all ſincerity? No, replied he, never fear it, for I am ſo well acquainted with the ſolidity of your vertue, that I fear no ſuch weakneſs in you. However, you may aſſure the Princeſs that I am ſo infinitely joyed to receive ſuch commands from her, as I can obey with much delight: Tell her further, that I am abundantly ſatisfied to ſee her ſo ſenſible of the miſeries of poor unfortunate people, for humility and compaſſion are Qualities ſo hard to be found in perſons of her Rank, as I cannot enough admire and honour her for it. And therefore Daughter (added he)

I adviſe you contribute all your endeavours unto the cheriſhing of ſuch a noble and laudable diſpoſition in her, omit no occaſion of commending her for it or any vertuous quality: and alſo be ſure you blame her boldly and home, when you diſcover any obdurity or inhumanity in her: The truth is, you cannot do her better ſervice, than to infuſe pity into her ſoul: I know very well, that Cleonisbe needs none of theſe precepts; yet I am ſuch a profeſſed Enemy unto all ſuch as are not ſenſible neither of publick nor private misfortunes, that I do every day tell my ſelf as much as I deſire you to tell Cleonisbe, leſt I ſhould inſenſibly become not compaſſionate enough. And therefore (ſaid he, and turned towards me) do not think I would have Glacidia exhort Cleonisbe unto any goodneſs becauſe ſhe wants it; but know that I do it only, becauſe I am perſwaded that Princes and Princeſſes can never have too much of vertue and goodneſs. For to be juſt unto Cleonisbe, I believe ſhe has all the vertues in a high degree; and that her compaſſion extends it ſelf ſo far, that ſhe never knew any unfortunate perſon whom ſhe did not pity and help alſo, if ſhe could. After this, Glacidia confirming what he ſaid, I added what I conceived might be advantagious unto the Prince of Phoceus, the Princeſs Oneſicrite, Ariſtonice, Sfurius, Menedorus, and all the Fleet in general. Thus, Madam, our buſineſs being well diſpatched, we returned unto the Caſtle to give an account of our Voyage unto the Princeſs Cleonisbe, who ſent immediately unto Carimantes to tell him that the chief of the Sarronides was pliant unto his deſires, appointing me to acquaint the Prince of Phoceus, and the Princeſs Oneſicrite what ſhe had done for them.

In the mean time the progreſs of our buſineſs was not ſo ſuddenly reſolved upon: For the King being deſirous to aſſemble many Sarronides to conſult upon ſuch an important buſineſs, it could not be concluded until the expiration of eight days: not but that he had already conferred with that old wiſe Counſellor with whom Glacidia had ſpoken, yet he would not abſolutely determine any thing before he had aſſembled the Councell, with whom he uſed to reſolve upon matters of great conſequence. In the interim, he treated us exceedingly well, and received all the perſons of any Quality which were in our Ships, when the Prince of Phocæus preſented them unto him, eſpecially Sfurius: Inſomuch, Madam, as there being an infinite number of perſons in our Fleet,all the Fiſhers Cabins were full of Greeks, who being very deſirous to be entertained in ſo good a Country, did ſo flatter up their Landlords, and recompence them ſo liberally for every thing they took, that the People did much forward the King in his Reſolutions, and to ſay that he muſt let us live in their Country, which we ſhould make much better than it was: For our Ships being much better built than theirs, our Arms handſomer and better wrought; they ſaid that we ſhould better them in their Arts, and teach them the uſe of Olives, whereof that Country was full, and which they yet uſed only as an ornament: ſo that in eight days all the people were ſo deſirous to have us dwell in their Country, that they ſaid aloud, if they would not permit them, they would put fire unto their Ships, and hinder them from going away. But the thing which moſt prompted them unto this reſolution, was a report that there was a great Goddeſs who aſſured them they ſhould be favourably received, and that on the contrary, if they did not receive us, they ſhould be involved into all manner of misfortunes.

In the mean time, this Caſtle of the Kings being near a great Town, all our perſons of any quality were conveniently lodged: And, Madam, whereas it is the cuſtom of all ſtrangers to conform themſelves unto the habit of that Country where they are,it was not ſo with us: but on the contrary, in three days the whole Court was got into the Grecian mode:For there being in our Ships men of all Profeſſions, there needed no more time to ſatisfie the deſires of the Prince Carimantes and the Princeſs Cleonisbe, to leave the habit of their own Country, and take ours, which indeed did become them much better than their own. However,during the eight days which the King took to give a definitive anſwer, the Court was full of Pleaſures and Diverſions: In all which Ariſtonice had no ſhare; for ſhe with her two Companions imployed all the time in prayers unto the Gods to move the Kings heart; ſo as having cauſed the Image of Diana which ſhe brought from Epheſus to be put in her Chamber, ſhe was continually at her Devotion whilſt we were all at our Pleaſures.

'Tis true, the Prince of Phoceus and Menedorus, did not reliſh their Pleaſure with a full guſt; for the firſt of theſe felt love to grow in his heart; and the ſecond began to be jealous to ſee how earneſt Carimantes was to pleaſe the Princeſs Oneſicrite. Bomilcar alſo, perceiving that the Prince of Phoceus looked upon Cleonisbe, like a man who was in love with her, had ſome reſtleſs diſpoſition to wiſh that the King wou'd not permit us to live in the Land. Yet he was ſo generous as not to wiſh our ruin, for I do believe he was fearful to incur the diſpleaſure of Carimantes and Cleonisbe, if he had negotiated any ſuch thing.

On the other ſide, Carimantes having diſcovered that Menedorus was in love with Oneſicrite, and alſo obſerved that ſhe did caſt a favourable eye upon him, was vexed to the heart, that he could not retain the perſon which pleaſed him, unleſs he retained the perſon alſo which diſpleaſed him: But in concluſion, ſeeing he could not loſe the one, but he muſt loſe the other alſo, he choſe rather to endure the ſight of Menedorus, than to loſe the ſight of Oneſicrite. As for Cleonisbe, ſhe took abundance of delight in the converſation of the Phocean Prince, and in the company of ſo many pleaſing perſons who were with Oneſicrite, and thought herſelf infinitely happy to ſee in her Fathers Court ſo many men ſo qualified, as ſhe fancied all compleat men ought to be.

As for Britomartis and Galathes, they thought upon nothing but how to be choſen by Cleonisbe, when the hoped for time was come; for though the laſt of theſe perceived as well as Bomilcar that the beauty of Cleonisbe had reach'd the Prince of Phoceus his heart, yet he never feared a weather-beaten Prince whom a tempeſt had caſt into the Court, could ever prejudice him: Thus he knew that he had a Rival, and was never troubled at it: And I aſſure you, Madam, that Bomilcar and Galathes were not ſo much perplexed to diſcover that the Prince of Phoceus was in love with Cleonisbe, as the Prince of Phoceus was at his being in love with that Princeſs; for he was extreamly reſtleſs when he heard all the Sarronides was come, and that the next morning would be the fatal time of the Kings poſitive reſolution, whether they ſhould be entertained or excluded the Country. When he firſt heard this news, he was with Cleonisbe, whom he courted very aſſiduouſly during all theſe eight days; and he was then with her without any other company but Glacidia, who acquainted the Princeſs with the coming of the Sarronides; and I underſtood from that diſcreet Lady, how the Prince of Phoceus hearing that he was to receive his doom the next day, did bluſh exceedingly: Alſo I underſtood from her, how extreamly his heart was perplexed when he conſidered, that perhaps to morrow he ſhould be for ever baniſhed from his adored Princeſs, in whoſe ſight he took ſuch infinite delight. This thought did not only beget a diſorder in his heart, but it forced him to diſcover ſome part of his thoughts. It is to morrow, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that muſt make me either happy or miſerable, when I ſhall either have a Country, which is dearer to me than my own, or ſhall be a vagabond, and a fugitive: But more then that, I muſt have the happineſs to ſee you all the days of my life, or the miſery to loſe the ſight of you for ever. And truly, Madam, if the laſt of theſe be my fate, I ſhall complain againſt the compaſſion which you have had of ſo many miſerable people; and ſhall be ſorry that the Port unto which you brought us, was not a Rock to ſplit our whole Fleet, and ſo diſable us for a departure from that Country, where ſomething is to be ſeen, which doubtleſs cannot be ſeen in any other place of the World: Do not think, Madam (ſaid he unto her) that it is the purity of your Air, your Sun, your Oranges, your Pomegranats, your Lawrels, your Mirtles are ſuch from which I ſhould be ſorry to be baniſhed: No, Madam, theſe are nothing, but it is from the divine Cleonisbe, who cannot be found in any other place of the World; it is ſhe only that my ſoul cannot depart from, without a Sea of ſorrows I am very ſenſibly obliged unto you Sir, replied Cleoniſbe, for preferring me before ſo many excellencies which beautifie our Country; and for that the obligations which you think you have unto me for affording you ſome aſſiſtance, ſhould move you unto ſo much friendſhip to me: I aſſure you I accept of your eſteem very kindly, and wiſh with abundance of Paſſion, that the King my Father would do as I would, were I in his place, and which truly I believe he will. Truly, Madam, replied Glacidia, you need not doubt it; for I believe your mediation and the Prince Carimantes will ſo work, that there will be full ſatisfaction unto the Prince of Phoceus. I pray unto the Gods it may, replied he, yet I cannot chuſe but fear it, and ſhall be in a reſtleſs impatience until I know the Kings reſolution, aſſuring you, Madam, (ſaid he unto Cleonisbe) that I never deſired any thing in my life with ſo much zeal as I do, to continue in a Country which is ſo dear unto me. Oh Sir, replied Cleonisbe, your expreſſions are above belief; for I am confident, that if a Ship ſhould at this very hour arrive from your own Country, which ſhould bring you news that your Conquerours are conquered, that your Country is out of ſervitude, and that you might ſafely return unto Phoceus, you would return thither with joy, and leave us very willingly. Oh Madam (ſaid he) I cannot be ſo generous as you imagine me; the love of my Country is not ſo much in my heart as you believe; yet it is both natural and juſt to love ones own Country beſt, replied Glacidia, and to tell you truly, it is to be thought that a Prince who ſeeks for liberty by ſuch a dangerous way as this you take, does prefer his Country before all things elſe whatſoever.

The truth is, replied he, that when I came from Phoceus, I had ſuch thoughts as I ought to have, and ſuch as you think I have; but it is alſo more true (if there be any difference in truth) that I am not now a Phocenſian or an Aſian Greek, but all my thoughts run upon your Oranges and Myrtle Trees.

If any of us Gauls (replied Cleonisbe, and ſmiled) ſhould chance to be driven by fortune either into Aſia or Greece, I am ſure our Civility and Complacence would not be ſo great as yours, but we ſhould prefer our own Country before all the world. However, added ſhe, I perceive we love ſo well to be flattered, that though we know all obliging expreſſions are not poſitively true, yet we give them a willing hearing: and certainly there are many truths which are nothing ſo pleaſing as this obliging untruth which you now tell me. If what I ſpeak, Madam, be not a truth, replied the Prince of Phoceus, then there is no truth in the World. Since none are brought to unſpeak thoſe Praiſes which they give in ſpeaking unto the perſon whom they praiſe, replied ſhe, I will not preſs you any further to confirm this pleaſing untruth by adding another, nor that you ſhould unſpeak it: And therefore I will believe, that ſince you have left none in Phoceus, and ſince all your friends have followed your fortune, you look upon the place where you ſee them as your own Country, where ever it be. I muſt confeſs, Madam, replied he, that if all the perſons who were here; or if you pleaſe in the Iſle of Cyprus, which is the moſt pleaſant in the world, I ſhould not then ſpeak as I do: Glacidia knowinw very well, that Cleonisbe would be very glad that this talk were broken off, becauſe ſhe did not love to be commended to her face, began to avert it handſomly. Methinks, ſaid ſhe, that what the Princeſs hath ſaid deſerves much conſideration; and that her diſtinction deſerves ſome inquiſition. For truly, I would gladly know whether this affection which every one has to his own Country, be cauſed by thoſe who inhabit in it; or whether it be the Land, the Sun, the Air, the Sea, the Rivers, and the Towns which ſo ties them unto it: and whether it be the living Country (if I may call it ſo) or the inanimate Country, which moves this great tenderneſs to it? I know very well (added ſhe, and addreſſed her ſelf unto Cleonisbe) that to ſpeak in general, theſe two things are joyned together; but ſince it appears by the example of the Phocean Prince, that fortune hath ſeparated them, ſince all the Inhabitants of Phoceus are here, and the Town of Phoceus where it was, I would gladly know whether if he found an habitation ſo good and convenient as it was, he would deſire to return into his Native Country; for if ſo, Madam, then it muſt be concluded, it is not only his Kindred and Friends which makes him love his Country, but it is as well the place it ſelf where he was born, as they.

For my part (replied Cleonisbe) I am perſwaded that there is a genius, a natural inſtinct which draws us to affect the places of our Nativity, as well as the Perſons which inhabite there: And that our Air, our Sun, our Sea, and our Land are more really our Country, than our Kindred, our Friends, and Fellow-Citizens: For truly, our Kindred die, our Friends do often fail, our Fellow-Citizens are often wicked men, and ſometimes our Perſecutors: But the other things which I named before, they never change for us, and we ought never to change for them. So I conclude, that though to ſpeak of a Country in general, is meant an aſſembly of People who live in the ſame Land, and under the ſame Laws; yet the moſt indiſſolvable part of a Country is the circumſtance of place, and not of perſons, becauſe the one may change and be diſſolved by ſtrange accidents, but the other can never alter; for the ſame Sun which gives Rubies to your Pomgranets, and guilds your Oranges, the very ſame Sun ſhines upon them, and will eternally.

Your arguments, Madam, replied the Prince of Phoceus, are very good, and full of wit, yet my experience tells me it is not ſo always: For I do proteſt that if I could obtain liberty to dwell here, I ſhould never lament the loſs of my Country, nor that ſtately Town I quitted, or any thing elſe which makes ſuch a Country as this unalterable.

For my part, ſaid Glacidia, I am not of your mind; for there is ſuch a ſympathy betwixt my Country and my ſelf, that I would defend it in every thing, thinking if I ſhould live any where elſe, I ſhould never live at reſt; not that I could eaſier part with my Friends than from our Oranges: But my meaning is, that the Princeſs hath great reaſon to ſay, that we are tied unto Places as well as Perſons; and that a Native Country is to be preferred before any other though more pleaſant. I ſhould be extreamly aſhamed, replied the Prince of Phoceus, to entertain thoughts oppoſite to theſe of a Princeſs ſo wiſe in all things, and unto a perſon ſo judicious as Glacidia; yet I am ſo far from being aſhamed of an opinion which is good, that methinks I merit ſome honour for making my ſelf a way ſo extraordinary, and for not being capable of ſuch a kind of love unto ones Country, as to be tied unto Rocks and Forreſſs.

As the Prince of Phoceus ſaid ſo, Bomilcar entred, unto whom the Princeſs did put the ſame queſtion, not telling him her opinion, nor Glacidia's, nor that of the Phocean Prince; ſo as he ſtudying how to anſwer ſo as might concur with the thoughts of the Princeſs Cleoniſbe: For my part, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I am perſwaded that one does naturally love the Land where one was born, and that the Air ſuits beſt with their Conſtitutions; and I believe alſo, that the ſympathy is ſo ſtrong, that nothing can quaſh it, unleſs ſome violent paſſion, as Ambition, or Love. Then according to your rule (replied the Prince of Phoceus faintly) one cannot find any happineſs in a ſtrange Country, unleſs ſome reaſon of Ambition or Love do break thoſe bonds which tye them unto their Country. I am ſo confidently perſwaded of it Sir, replied Bomilcar, that whenſoever I ſee any ſtranger forget his Country, and not to grieve for being out of it, I always conclude him to have one of theſe two paſſions in his heart. Bomilcar had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Cleoniſbe bluſhed, and the Prince of Phoceus obſerved her; ſo as ſeeing the change in her face, he was much joyed at it, imagining that ſhe applied the words of Bomilcar unto her ſelf: So in lieu of contradicting him, he extreamly approved of what he ſaid: Yet it was in ſuch a facetious way, as one would really have thought that he had no ſecret deſign in concurring ſo eaſily unto a thing which he might ſo eaſily have oppoſed. So that, Madam, Bomilcar unawares was the firſt who cauſed Cleoniſbe to ſuſpect that her heart had ſome ſparks of love for the Prince of Phoceus: And the firſt alſo who gave his new Rival an occaſion to make her gueſs at his Paſſion who was the cauſer of it.

However, after he was retired unto his Chamber, he began to think that Bomilcar had good reaſon to ſay nothing was ſo fit to make one forget his Country, than to fall in love in a ſtrange Contry: His apprehenſion of it was ſo ſtrong, that he could not ſleep, yet his reaſon did muſter up all its forces to oppoſe this growing Paſſion, but it was grown too ſtrong already to be overcome What a fondneſs is it (ſaid he to himſelf, as he told me afterwards) to be ſo deſirous of dwelling in a place where I find ſo dangerous a perſon as Cleoniſbe? were it not more wiſdom to depart from it as ſoon as ever I could, and by ſhip-wrack to quench thoſe flames which ſcorch me, than hopeleſly to expoſe my ſelf unto all the torments of Love? Is not Cleonisbe within theſe two months to make her choice of him whom ſhe pleaſeth to make ſo happy; and can I be ſo far out of my wits as to think ſhe can chuſe me? Me, I ſay, a deſpicable Exile who has neither Country, nor a Houſe to dwell in; who never did her any ſervice, nor can ſcarcely be admitted to dwell with her. What then ſhould I do, living in a Country where I muſt ſadly ſee her I love, enjoyed either by Bomilcar or Britomartes, or by Galathes? and yet not dare to murmur at it? For what right have I to oppoſe their Pretentions? No, no, I have none, and therefore if I will be wiſe, I will depart from a place where I can never be happy, and ſave the King of the Segoregians a labour of conſulting with the Sarronides: But doſt thou think of departing, wretched man that thou art, added he, when as thy heart tells thee thou art inſeparably tied unto the divine Cleonisbe? Why, whilſt thou thinkeſt thou haſt ſome ſoveraignty over thy ſoul, thy deſires revolt, thy will mutinies, and thy heart prompts all thy thoughts unto rebellion. Thus, Madam, did the Prince of Phoceus ſtrive to reſiſt the inevitable power of Cleonisbes charms: But as I told you, his Paſſion was grown too ſtrong to be quelled. But on the contrary, it did the more increaſe by the reſiſtance of his Reaſon, and he waited until the next morning, in a reſtleſs impatience, which would not permit him to take any reſt. Caramantes for his part was no leſs impatient than he, did as zealouſly wiſh that Onesicrite might ſtay there, as the Prince of Phoceus wiſhed for himſelf.

On the other ſide, Menedorus wiſhed themſelves were baniſhed: Bomilcar would not have been ſorry if they were, and Galathes would have been glad of it. Cleonisbe would have been angry at it as well as Glacidia: and Britomartes alone was indifferent in the buſineſs. Furthermore, though Galathes did not much fear that the Prince of Phoceus could hurt him, though he were his Rival, yet he went to ſolicite one of the Sarronides, who was to be of the Kings Councel, and who was much his friend, purpoſely to oblige him in oppoſition to the Phocean Prince, ſuggeſting all the reaſon which might move the King not to receive ſo many Strangers into his Country: So as ſome ſoliciting for our ſtay, and others endeavouring to oppoſe it, I aſſure you, opinions were never more divided than amongſt all thoſe illuſtrious perſons.

In the mean time, the hour of the Councels Aſſembly being come, Ariſtonice with her Companions went to ſpeak with all the Sarronides one after another: But in lieu of ſoliciting them as men who had much power to help or hinder the ſtay of the Fleet which ſhe demanded; ſhe boldly told them, that it was not in their power to hinder the King from entertaining ſo many illuſtrious unfortunate perſons, whom the Goddeſs ſhe adored had ſent unto them for their glory, and for the happineſs of their Country; and that ſhe came now only to acquaint them, that the firſt favour ſhe would ask, as ſoon as the King had received them, ſhould be to give her a place where ſhe might build a Temple unto the honour of Diana. Ariſtonice ſpoke this with ſuch a confidence, and ſo much majeſty, that they looked upon her with more reſpect than before: And ſince their cuſtom was never to make any great Sacrifice but under Oaks, the propoſition of Ariſtonice did perplex them, fearing to diſpleaſe the Gods whom they adored, by eſtabliſhing a new Relion in their Country. But in concluſion, not knowing themſelves what opinion they were of, they went unto the King in the Councel-Chamber, where the Councel was to be held, upon which the deſtiny of ſo many men depended: And there was ſuch a multitude of all ſorts in the Caſtle, that there was not one corner which was not full of Phocenſians and others. But to ſtrengthen our Cauſe, all the Fiſhers which did inhabit along that Coaſt where we landed, hearing that this was the morning on which we were either to be received or rejected, they flocked in great troops into the baſe Court of the Caſtle, and demanded to ſpeak with the King, ſaying aloud that he muſt receive us, and that they would never let men, who could inſtruct them in ſo many profitable things, go out of their Country.

But the Officers of the Guard having deſired them to ſtay unto the end of the Councel, this croud of Grecians and Segoregians mingled together, which made ſuch a hurly burly, were all quiet in expectation of the Kings reſolution. We underſtood ſince by one of the Sarronides, that the King after he had propoſed the buſineſs unto them, did expreſs unto the Aſſembly, that he ſhould be exceeding glad (if the good of the State would permit it) to aſſiſt ſo many miſerable people, and give ſanctuary unto ſo many illuſtrious perſons as were amongſt us; yet adding, that he preferred the good of his people before his own inclinations: and that if they thought it dangerous to receive us, he would endeavour to deny his own deſires, and reject us. At the firſt, opinions were divided: But ſince the chief of the Sarronides was for us, and being a man of a ſound judgement and wit, he brought all to concur with him, except him whom Galathes had ſolicited. But he, ſince he had the pretence of the publick good to favour the deſigns of his friend, he made uſe of it with abundance of zeal againſt us; and if the chief of the Sarronides had not been as reſolute as he was obſtinate, we had all been baniſhed. For my part Sir, ſaid he unto the King, I know very well that not to conſider the miſeries of thoſe who deſire Sanctuary from you, and to deny their deſires doth ſeem to be a piece of cruelty: But I know alſo, that conſidering the dangerous conſequences which the favour they ask might bring with it, if conſented unto, there is great reaſon to deny them: For it is not one particular which which demands receipt of you; but it is a huge people, who by their multitudes may become terrible to you, and alſo by the abundance of good qualities which are attributed unto them; for the more wit and ſpirit theſe Greeks have, the more they are to be feared, it not being expedient that your Subjects who are faithful in their ſimplicity ſhould become more knowing by the converſation of Strangers, leſt they ſhould grow mutinous. Do you not ſee already, Sir, how theſe Fiſhers who uſe themſelves only to their Lines and Nets, begin to meddle in matters of State, and will have you entertain theſe Strangers, who begin already to have a ſhare in your authority? Moreover, theſe Strangers are Rich, they are a Warlike People; abundance hath made them luxurious and voluptuous; and it is to be feared, that thoſe, who they ſay can teach all the Arts unto your Subjects, will communicate the vices of their Country unto them alſo. Ignorance and Poverty, Sir, are good properties to make Subjects obedient; and therefore I conceive that thoſe People who can take from your Subjects theſe two Properties, which make a Soveraign ſo abſolute, ought not to be received without great and ſerious conſideration.

Moreover, the new Religion of theſe Strangers will either ſubvert your own, or at leaſt raiſe abundance of ſcruples and errors in the minds of your People. And I know not, Sir, whether they may not ſhake your Throne it ſelf: So that in my opinion, to ſatisfie the rights of hoſpitality without any danger to your Kingdom, the beſt expedient were to permit theſe Grecians to repair their Fleet, and to give them all things neceſſary for a long voyage, and to let them go and ſeek a Sanctuary ſomewhere elſe, but not to let them inhabit here. This friend unto Galathes was ſo vehement, that ſome of thoſe whom the Prince Sarronide had brought unto his opinion, began to waver, and return unto their firſt thoughts. But this wiſe and good old man, ſeeing their minds begin to ſtagger, and to anſwer all the reaſons which this friend unto Galathes had delivered. I am not ignorant, Sir, (ſaid he unto the King) that to conſider the buſineſs in hand with a byaſſed intereſt, there is ſome ſhew of doubt in it: But I am ſure to conſider the true grounds of the buſineſs, and not to be deluded by appearances, there is all the reaſon in the world to be of my opinion. For Sir, the moſt ancient of all Laws, and that which ought certainly to be moſt inviolable, is the Law of Hoſpitality: And I am not afraid to ſay, that upon ſome occaſions a King may be more culpable in uſing Strangers ill, than in uſing his own Subjects ill.

Moreover, this whole multitude which is uſed as an argument to hinder your Majeſty from being pitiful, is an argument to oblige you the more unto it, ſince it is more glorious to relieve many than a few.

But to anſwer poſitively unto the objection of Fears which this multitude of perſons may cauſe, I only anſwer thus, that in compariſon of the multitudinous number of your Subjects, theſe Strangers are ſo few and weak, as there is no reaſon of any fears in the world: Alſo being of a Country ſo far diſtant from yours, and a Country wherein they have no power, they never dare attempt any thing againſt you, ſince they cannot hope for any relief from any part; and ſince it is a moſt eaſie matter for you to ſuppreſs them, whenſoever they ſhall incenſe you. Furthermore, ſince all theſe Grecians have their whole Families in your Land, it may very well be ſaid, that you have moſt ſure Hoſtages of their fidelity; ſo as you may with much leſs danger receive this numerous multitude, than if they were fewer, and had not with them ſuch perſons as are moſt dear unto them, and unable to bear Arms.

Again, I do admire any one of wiſdom ſhould ſay, that the more wit theſe Grecians have, the more they are to be feared; and that Poverty and Ignorance are two neceſſary Qualities to make faithful Subjects. For truly, Sir, my opinion is ſo contrary to that, as I dare undertake to maintain unto your Majeſty, that the greateſt care of a Prince ought to be to make his people rich, and to teach them their duty to their King. The truth is, as ignorance will ſometimes keep them under, ſo it will after make them mutiny without a cauſe: It will make People wilful without reaſon; It will fit them for tumults and ſeditions; it will not let them underſtand their own intereſts; it will ruin themſelves in ruining the State; and for want of knowledge they will ſubvert Kingdoms, fall off from their duty to their Soveraigns, and alſo from their duty to the Gods: So as the Link of Society being once broken between ſo many perſons whom reaſon ſhould reunite, it muſt of neceſſity follow, there will be an univerſal confuſion which is equally prejudicial both unto Princes and Subjects. Believe it, Sir, the more wit and ingenuity theſe Greeks have, the ſooner you ought to receive them, ſince tho they produce no other benefit unto your People, but to communicate their wit and ingenuity unto them, it is a great benefit ſince they will teach them to know their duty. Alſo by teaching your Subjects ſo many admirable Arts, wherein they are knowing, they will baniſh idleneſs out of the Country, which is the moſt abundant cauſe of Revolts. And as to that objection concerning the Fiſhermen, how they ſhould begin already to meddle in matters of State, I muſt anſwer, that this beginning of rebellion,is an argument, one ſhould not give a bruitiſh people any cauſe to know their own ſtrength; ſo therefore, though only in this conſideration I muſt couclude it requiſite to receive the Phocenſians, leaſt by incenſing the Segoregians, they ſhould come to know what they can do before they know what they ought to do, which is one of the moſt dangerous diviſions that can be amongſt a people.

Again, as for the vices which are feared to grow out of the abundance of riches; Truly me-thinks their fears go too far, in fearing leaſt the greateſt good of all goods ſhould ſow evil in an age or two; and it would be much injuſtice to reject men who are eminent in a thouſand vertues, only becauſe they fear leſt the Riches they bring with them ſhould produce ſome one vice which ſometimes does follow them, but are not always Concomitants: alſo I can anſwer, that as Riches and Abundance have their Vices, ſo Poverty and Want have theirs alſo. As the one makes them voluptuous, the other alſo makes men ſteal and kill thoſe that are richer than themſelves. Now Sir, as to the buſineſs of Religion (added this ſage Sarronide) I muſt tell your Majeſty, that though I have as much zeal unto my own as any hath, yet I do believe that humanity is to be found in all Religions in the world; and it were great cruelty to make ſo many miſerable, only becauſe their Religion is different from ours: On the contrary, if we will be indeed zealous in our Religion, we ſhould ſtrive to convert a People who know not the manner of our Worſhip, and to perſwade them that our Sacrifices are more perfect than theirs: Thus this argument of Religion which is uſed to hinder ſo many illuſtrious unfortunate People from having a Sanctuary amongſt us, is a ſtrong reaſon why we ſhould grant it unto them.

Alſo according to the univerſal opinion of all the Sarronides, it is not fit for men to judg of things which exceed their underſtandings, but it is their duty to believe, that ſince the Gods do ſuffer men in ſome places to offer unto them innocent victims, in other places to ſacrifice men, and in other places they bring nothing unto their Altars but Flowers, Fruits, and Incenſe: In ſome places they build Temples unto them; and in other places they are forbidden to build them, and commanded to ſacrifice in Woods and Hills: And thus it is the pleaſure of the Gods to be adored in a hundred ſeveral manners. For upon a true examination of the matter, it being agreed on all ſides, that every People do believe that the Gods whom they adore, are the makers and maſters of Heaven and Earth, it muſt of neceſſity be concluded that every People do adore one and the ſame God under different names, and in different manners: And as there is but one Sun in the whole World over all People, ſo alſo there is but one powerful Divinity which is to be adored over all the Earth. So Sir, it is to be feared that you anger the Gods, if your Majeſty ſhould deny a Sanctuary unto men who gave ſo many teſtimonies of Piety, ſince they came amongſt us: ſo as whether you conſider their miſeries, their vertues, the good of your people, or the glory of your Majeſty, I find it moſt requiſite to entertain theſe miſerable men, and to receive them as a happineſs which the Gods have ſent unto us.

As ſoon as this wiſe Sarronide had ended his Oration, the King did approve of it exceeding well, and there was no further conteſt about the buſineſs: ſo that the Councell being ended, the King cauſed the Prince of Phoceus, Sfurius, Menedorus, and eight or ten others the moſt conſiderable in their Fleet to be brought in, and told them that he gave them leave to dwell in the Land: and to inhabit in the ſame place where they landed; this Prince conceiving it moſt ſafe for himſelf to let them live together, and not to diſperſe themſelves into his Dominions, becauſe they would not ſo eaſily perſwade them unto the Religion of their Country.

To tell you Madam, how joyed the Prince of Phoceus was, and all the Phocenſians except Menedorus, is more than I am able to do: Nor am I able to deſcribe the joys of Caramantes, Cleonisbe, Glacidia, and all the Gallants of the Court, except Bomilcar, and Galathes. But as their ſatisfaction was great, ſo that of the Fiſhermen was greater: And they expreſſed it by ſuch ſhouts of joy, as did let the King know that the chief of the Sarronides had prudently adviſed him. But amongſt all that rejoyced at the reſolution of the King, Ariſtonice was in the higheſt degree, conceiving her ſelf very inſtrumental in the glory of that Goddeſs who had ſo happily guided us. But Madam, not to be over-tedious in particularizing ſo many uſeleſs things unto you, give me leave to tell you, that the next morning the King himſelf ſhewed unto the Prince of Phoceus the extent of that ground and the place where he would permit us to build: And to begin the Foundation of this Town with an action of piety Ariſtonice with her own hand did not only meaſure out the place where ſhe would Erect a Temple unto Diana, which was near the Sea ſide, but alſo the very place where the Image of that Goddeſs ſhould ſtand. As for the Prince of Phoceus, ſince he ever held Minerva in great veneration having been long at Athens, he ſet out a place for a Temple to be built to that Goddeſs: After which the great multitude of workmen amongſt us, beginning to work by the directions of the Phocean Prince, one might ſee that done in a few dayes which one could not believe fieſable in many months. The truth is Madam, the Grecians did work ſo very hard, the Segoregians did help them ſo willingly, and all wrought with ſo much alacrity and ſpeed that in one month and a half we had built two Temples, and a great Town. That which did much facilitate, the Country, which though very fertile was yet ſo ſtony, that all our work was to heap ſo many ſtones together as we ſtood in need of. Moreover, ſince the winds do often uſe to beat againſt that mountain where I told you the chief of the Sarronides did uſe to inhabit one part of the year; ſo it chanced that a little while before we came into that Country, the violence of the winds had ſo beaten down abundance of wood at the foot of this mountain, and waſted the Trees to the ſhore, that we had nothing more to do but to work them up. You may may eaſily imagine, Madam, that this Town was not ſo ſtately built as Babylon or Ecbatan: but yet there was not one Greek who had not a handſom and convenient lodging: There was three publick Market-places in this new built Town, which was much more long than large; becauſe having encloſed all the Fiſher Cabins within our Circle, we were confined unto that narrowneſs. There was alſo good fountains and an admirable Port; and though its ſcituation was upon a hanging ground, and conſequently a little inconvenient, becauſe the ſtreets were uneven, yet it was very pleaſant; tho' the Grecian Architecture was not ſet out in its full ornament; for ſince our Aims were only for Lodgings; it may be ſaid that they were Cabins regularly built rather then houſes; yet they were very convenient and handſom, and ſeemed Palaces unto Exiles. But Madam, it was a wonder to ſee how the Greek did ſtrive to get the Segoregian language, and how earneſt the Segoregians were to get the Greek, for they did ſuddenly ſo perfectly underſtand each other, that I do not think there is at this time one of the Kings Subjects who does not underſtand Greek nor one Grecian who does not underſtand the Language of that Country where they now inhabite. As for Ariſtonice, ſhe Cloyſtered up her ſelf within the Verge of that Temple which ſhe built as ſoon as ever it was finiſhed: and not medling with any thing but her devotion, ſhe lived in a wonderful reſtraint.

In the mean time, ſince the Prince of Phoceus knew very well that it was not enough to build a Town, unleſs it were governed by good and politick Laws, he began to ſettle the order of them: And to avoid all envie amongſt thoſe who had acknowledged him for their head, he appointed a great number unto the tranſaction of publick affairs, naming the number of ſix hundred who had determinative voyces in Councel: But for the diſpatch of urgent affairs he conſtituted a number of fifteen without aſſembling a general Councel; and of this fifteen there was three with whom he adviſed in matters of ſecreſie according to occaſions. Thus Madam, this Councel conſiſting of ſix hundred, out of which ſix hundred was named fifteen, and out of fifteen, three, and out of three, one, all which made up but one Authority, was the government of this new Town, whoſe model I deſire ſire to deſcribe, before I proceed with the love of the Phocean Prince.

Methinks (ſaid Mandana, and interrupted him) you have forgot one thing which deſerves ſome curioſity, which is, to tell us whether this Town was called the new Phoceus, or whether they gave it the name of the Country.

Your queſtion Madam (replied Thrymetus) is more worthy of Curioſity than you imagine, ſince their happned a very odd paſſage about it. For Madam, it was never in the power of the Phocean Prince to call this Town Diana's Town, as he intended, but was forced to yield unto a multitude, who had got a cuſtom of calling it Marſeilles, having no other reaſon for it, unleſs the forming that name of two Greek words corruptively put together, for the one half of that name in the Æolian language ſignifies Fiſher, and the other half in the pure Greek ſignifies to tye: But Madam to interpret the oddneſs of the thing a little better unto you, be pleaſed to know, that when our Fleet came to this Port, a great multitude of Fiſhers were got together to ſee us land: ſo as the Marriners of every ſhip caſting out their Cables, and knowing them to be Fiſhers, becauſe they had Lines and Nets in their hands, they prayed theſe Fiſhers to tie their Cables to ſome ſtakes which were upon the ſhore, that they might ſerve in lieu of an Anchor: ſo as the two words which they pronounced at landing, that is to ſay, Fiſher, and Tie, which in our Language ſignifie Marſeilles a little corrupted, they would by all means have called the name of the Town thereafter. However Madam, Cuſtom was ſtronger than Reaſon, and the People more powerful than the Prince, ſince being Founder of the Town, he was not able to give it the name he deſired; but muſt permit thoſe two Greek words which had no reaſonable ſignification, to be the name of a Town, the government whereof was conſtituted wholly by reaſon and Prudence. However Madam, I muſt return from whence I digreſſed, and acquaint you with the loves of the Phocean Prince, of Carimantes, of Bomilcar, of Menedorus, of Britomartes, and of Galathes, from the time the King permitted us to ſtay in the Country: And Madam, I muſt tell you, that the love of the Phocean Prince to Cleonisbe, and that of Carimantes to Oneſicrite, did extreamly increaſe; for then looking upon the Perſons whom they loved as thoſe whom they ſhould ſee and adore as long as they lived, their Paſſions were the more inflamed: But this did kindle abundance of jealouſie in the heart of Bomilcar, of Galathes, and of Menedorus.

Furthermore, the eſteem which the Princeſs Cleonisbe had already of the Phocean Prince, did abundantly increaſe by acquaintance, and the friendſhip which this Prince had with Glacidia, became ſo great in a few days, that ſhe did not value Bomilcar who was moſt in her favour at a higher rate than ſhe did him

In the mean while, the Segoregian King being returned unto the Metropolis of his Kingdom, which was not above half a days journey from the place where we landed, he would by all means have the Prince of Phoceus, after he had given all requiſite orders for the building his new Town to accompany him, with Menedorus, my ſelf, and many others, Sfarim ſtaying behind as an overſeer of the works.

'Tis true, ſince the diſtance was not far, the Prince of Phoceus went thither very oft; but he always made ſuch haſt, and choſe his hours ſo conveniently, that not a day paſſed but he ſaw Cleonisbe, with whom was Oneſicrite, betwixt whom was already an intimate love: Moſt of the Phocenſian Ladies did alſo follow her, ſo as this Court did flouriſh as much as any Court in the world. As for the Prince of Phoceus, he was pleaſing unto the King, and univerſally unto all that ſaw him, as nothing but his merits were talked of, and he became ſo familiar with the Princeſs Cleonisbe, that Bomilcar who had been acquainted with her all his life, was not more: 'Tis true, Glacidia did much contribute unto it; for indeed ſhe was a great admirer of the Phocean Prince, and being a zealous commender of her friends, ſhe continually talked of him to Cleonisbe. Yet ſhe did not commend him only unto her, for ſhe had ever a moſt charitable deſire to unite all her friends as much as ſhe could, and to make them love one another, as well as ſhe did; therefore ſhe ſpake often of the Prince of Phoceus unto Bomilcar, to the end that begetting an eſteem of each other, a friendſhip might grow betwixt them. But Madam, her good intentions did but half hit; for though they had all imaginable eſteem of each other outwardly, yet there was an implacable antipathy in their hearts: And I do not think that ever ſince love and ambition did make any Rivals, there was ever two who more hated each other, yet lived ſo well together, as the Prince of Phoceus and Bomilcar: Doubtleſs the vertue of Cleonisbe, and the prudence of Glacidia did much contribute to the keeping of Peace and Civility between theſe two Enemies: But moſt certainly, if they had not both been moſt excellently accompliſhed men, they had not agreed ſo well. However, as ſoon as we came to the place where the King did ordinarily reſide, we found nothing but feaſting and pleaſures, and ſince ſtrangers have any where that priviledg to be ſhewed all the diverſions of the Country, it was unto Oneſicrite and the Prince of Phoceus, that the King, Carimantes, and Cleonisbe did ſhew all the delights of the Court: Yet Madam you muſt not imagine their Feaſts to be ſo magnificent as thoſe in the Aſian Courts, nor in the principal Towns of Greece; but for all that, though they ſmelt ſomthing of the ruſticity of their firſt inſtitution, yet were they handſom and delightſom: And the admirable ſpirit of the Princeſs Cleonisbe did add much unto their luſtre, though in themſelves they were but meanly magnificent: For truly their greateſt feaſts were thoſe of Bulls, of Shepheards, of Fiſhers, and another which had moſt of gallantry in it, which they called the Feaſt of Flowers, or the triumph of the Sun: The greateſt beauty of the firſt of theſe feaſts, was to ſee four or five hundred Bulls of a prodigious bigneſs, whoſe horns were painted and guilded, who had upon their backs cloaths embroydered with a thouſand ſeveral colours, and about their necks garlands of flowers: So as theſe fierce animals going two by two, and their natural fierceneſs being moved by a kind of ſhrill harmony which thoſe who drive them do make, they make a ſhew ſo ſtately, that they move much delight, in paſſing under the Kings Palace, where all the Court are that day. After which, out of a ſuperſtition of the Country, they are carried round about the Town, where the People do offer them little bundles of freſh graſs; conceiting that if they eat them, they ſhall have a plentiful harveſt, and if they refuſe, then not. But this Feaſt does not end thus, for as ſoon as theſe Bulls have gone the round, they chooſe out twelve of the faireſt and ſtrongeſt of them, and bring them unto a place before the Kings Palace where they are baited. As for the feaſt of Fiſhers, indeed it is very delightful, as that of the Shepheards; for ſince they are perſons of Quality who make them both, there are a thouſand pleaſant paſſages to be ſeen.

But Madam, I will not trouble you with a deſcription of them: But as for the triumph of the Sun, I beſeech you give me leave to be a little longer in the deſcription of it, becauſe it was this Feaſt which gave all thoſe whoſe hiſtories I relate ſome light to know the thoughts which they had in their hearts. Since we were there at that time of the year when they were wont to celebrate this Feaſt, we were all the diſcourſe of all the Ladies in the Country: every one wiſhing that it might be the Princeſs Cleonisbe, who ſhould receive all their honours: For Madam, be pleaſed to know that ſince the Sun ſhines clearer in that Country then any where elſe, becauſe it is ſeldom or never obſcured by any Clouds, and ſince there are more flowers there, than in any other place of the world? the Inhabitants do believe it their duty to render homage to that bright Planet: ſo that every year they engrave upon certain little ſhells the names of all the Beauties in the Court, and put them confuſedly together into a great Baſin inlaied with mother of Pearl: After which the King puts his hand into the Baſin and draws out one; and the Lady whoſe name is engraved upon that ſhell which the King doth draw, is ſhe who is deſtined to repreſent the Sun, and to receive all the honours which are done unto that glorious Planet which ſhe repreſents:

The day of this ceremony being come, chance ſeconding the wiſhes of all the Aſſembly, the name of Cleonisbe was found upon the ſhell which the King drew, ſo as it was the office of this Princeſs to receive all the honour of the Feaſt which was to be celebrated eight days after, as hereafter I ſhall tell you:

Imagin then, Madam, that all the great Streets in a great Town were all decked up with Garlands of flowers, from the very tops of Houſes to the bottom, and all the ground ſtrewed with variety of the ſame flowers, certainly you would conceit this to be a moſt pleaſant object; yet I am moſt confident you cannot imagin it half ſo beautiful as it was: However, it being as I tell you, all the Ladies who were not Actors in this Ceremony, ſtood in the windows which were round about the place where it was to be celebrated, in the midſt of which was erected a Throne, over which was a great Canopy,ſupported by four Pillars, decked with Flowers, and wreathed with Mirtle: But the moſt delectable object of all was, that in the midſt of this Canopy was the face of the Sun moſt admirably repreſented unto every beholder. For my part, Madam, I muſt ingenuouſly confeſs, that all I ſaw this day was ſo new unto me, and did ſo exceedingly delight me, as I never in all my life found a more excellent diverſion.

But the hour of beginning the Ceremony being come, I ſaw the Gates of the Palace which joyned unto that place to open, and a little Chariot in which was Oneſicrite, appeared, who repreſented Aurora, which is always the Uſher of the Sun, had Garments ſuitable unto what ſhe repreſented. Her Chariot and Horſes were painted with Aurora's colour, reſembling the Sun, a little before it appears in our Horizon: ſo as Oneſicrite both young and fair, ſhe really appeared more freſh than Aurora it ſelf which ſhe repreſented, eſpecially in the eyes of Cariman-tes and Menedorus, who were both of them more in love with her, and more jealous of each other: But after this Chariot had gone round the place, and vaniſhed out of ſight, the Chariot of Cleonisbe which repreſented the Sun, appeared with ſo much luſter, as I aſſure you this Princeſs dazled the eyes of all the Aſſembly. And though the brown beauty of Cleonisbe do not ſeem very fit for the reſemblance of the Sun, yet her dark coloured hair did produce the ſame effect that day, as that dusky Azure doth which is about the Sun, when the Heavens are moſt ſerene and clear, and when that ſplendent Planet is in its greateſt luſtre; for certainly her hair gave a great luſtre unto her. Her Chariot was inlayed with mother of Pearl, and ſtreaks of gold, and done with ſuch art by ſome Grecian Artiſts that were employed, as this Chariot by reaſon of the ſeveral reflections from the mother of Pearl and ſome Topazes which were ſet in ſeveral places, was no leſs glorious than the Sun it ſelf: As for Cleonisbe, ſhe was adorned with ſo many Jewels, that her luſtre could hardly be looked upon: And to reſemble the Sun which ſhe repreſented, ſhe wore a Sun of Diamonds upon her head: In one hand ſhe held a veſſel of Mother of Pearl full of flowers, as being the chief work of that Glorious Star, in the other hand ſhe held the reins of the Horſes, whoſe fineneſs made them worthy to draw the Chariot of the Sun. Cleonisbe being then in ſuch ſtate as I have told you, and the day being as fair and glorious as was poſſible, that place was an Epitome of the whole world; and ſhe carried her ſelf with ſuch applauſe, that the Air ecchoed with a million of acclamations.

As for the Prince of Phoceus, he was ſo charmed with the ſight, that if he had not already been in Love, he would now. But after Cleonisbe had gone round the place, ſhe left her Chariot at the foot of the Throne which was prepared for her, upon which ſhe aſcended by the help of four men of Quality who ſtood at the bottom of the ſtairs: The dreſſes of theſe four men who repreſented the Four Seaſons of the Year were very rich. The firſt was Bomilcar, the ſecond Britomartes, the third Galathes, and the fourth the Prince of Phoceus: Thus Cleonisbe when ſhe was upon her Throne, ſhe ſaw at her feet four Slaves, whom Chance had brought together, and whom love had wounded with one and the ſame Arrow. But perhaps, Madam, you will ask me why the Four Seaſons of the Year was repreſented by men? To which I anſwer, that ſince there was not one Beauty who would repreſent Winter, Cuſtom brought it in, that this Feaſt was repreſented by four men. However, Cleonisbe was no ſooner upon her Throne of flowers, but the great Gates of the Palace being opened, there appeared thirty perſons, every one in a ſeveral little Chariot, which came gently one after another to render homage unto Cleonisbe.

But, Madam, that you may the better underſtand the nature of this homage, be pleaſed to know, that every one of theſe fair perſons repreſented a ſeveral flower which they made choice of according unto their fancies: ſo as theſe Ladies to ſignifie the flowers which they repreſented had a Crown compoſed of them on their heads, and another in their hands, their Chariots being trimmed up with the ſame flowers.

And to compleat the gallantry of this invention, their habits were of the ſame colours with the flowers which they repreſented, and every one had a Banner on which was a device ſuitable: Every Banner had a flower painted, and ſome Inſcriptions under it: So that, Madam, ſince the ſeaſon in which they did celebrate this feaſt, all ſorts of flowers did grow at once in that Country, I am confident a more delightful ſight could not be ſeen. For, I aſſure you, Madam, theſe thirty Chariots painted, guilded, and trimmed with flowers, did make a moſt admirable ſhow; and theſe thirty fair ones, whoſe Dreſſes were both gallant and rich, and all Crowned with flowers, were beyond all imagination, admirable.

The firſt which came out of the Palace to render homage unto Cleoniſbe, was Crowned with Orange-flowers, the ſecond Roſes, the third Jeſſimine, the fourth Olives, the fifth with Violets, the ſixth with Pomgranets, the ſeventh with Lillies, the eighth with Gilly-flowers, the ninth with Flower de-luces, and ſo with others: ſo that this lovely Miſcellany of flowry Crowns worn by theſe Beauties, did make a ſhow beyond all imagination delightful. As ſoon as theſe Chariots came unto the Throne of the Sun, thoſe Ladies which were to repreſent the flower wherewith they were Crowned, they prepared themſelves to render homage: And preſenting the Crown which they held in their hands unto one of theſe men who ſtood at the foot of the Throne, offered unto the Sun only ſuch flowers as the ſeaſon which they repreſented, did produce. So, ſince there are Orange-flowers in Winter, it was Britomartes who offered the Crown, becauſe he repreſented that ſeaſon. It was the Prince of Phoceus who offered Roſes, becauſe he repreſented the Spring: It was Galathes who offered the Crown of Olives, becauſe he repreſented Summer: And it was Bomilcar milcar who offered Jeſſamine, becauſe he repreſented Autumn: For as I have already told you, Madam, there is one ſeaſon in that Country, in which they have all manner of flowers together.

In the mean time, as theſe Ladies paſſed before Cleonisbe's Throne, they ſaluted her, and tendred unto her their Crowns; and they were heaped one upon another with ſo much Art, That when the laſt of theſe Ladies had offered her Garland, there was ſuch a Trophy of Garlands raiſed unto the glory of Cleonisbe, all whoſe flags were ſet in ſuch order, as the Motto's might eaſily be read. But whilſt all theſe little Chariots paſſed before the Princeſs Cleonisbe, and thoſe within them were doing homage unto her, Muſick compoſed of ſeveral Inſtruments impoſed ſilence upon the People, who made no diſorder, becauſe the place was rayl'd round about, and hindered them. Nor did the heat of the Sun offend; for this Ceremony was not begun until it was declining, and moreover the Palace and Houſes were ſo high, as they caſt a ſhadow over all the place; and there chanced contrary to the cuſtom of that Country to be ſome little Clouds that day, which made a ſhadow, and one would have ſaid that this bright Planet to honour the Feaſt, had reſigned its luſtre unto Cleonisbe.

In the mean while, according as theſe Chariots paſſed by, they ranged themſelves next the Chariot of Cleonisbe, unto which ſhe went as ſoon as ſhe had received the laſt homage of flowers. The four Seaſons cauſing to be carried before her that Trophy of Garlands which were offered unto her: After which theſe four Seaſons did follow her every one in a ſtately Chariot, entring with her into the Palace-Court: ſo as Oneſicrite going firſt in repreſenting the Aurora, the four Seaſons followed the Sun, and the thirty flowers the four Seaſons.

After which, Cleonisbe went to offer this Trophy of Garlands at a Temple which was at the furtheſt part of the Town, and then returned to the Palace where a Banquet was prepared ſuitable to the Feaſt, for it was only of fruits, for the cuſtom was for it to be of no other: Yet was it very admirably ſet out both with rare and excellent fruits, in great abundance and variety, and in moſt exquiſite order. The Banquet being ended, they went unto another place, where I ſaw the fineſt ſhow that can be imagined; for indeed, Madam, all this glorious Troop followed by all the Court, entered into a great Hall, whoſe ſight ſurprized me beyond my expreſſions.

Suppoſe, Madam, this Hall to have all its walls of flowers, and the roof ſupported with pillars of flowers ſo compoſed as if they were Marble; and from the roof a thouſand Garlands and Crowns did hang, compoſed of Orange flowers and Jeſſamine: Thus, Madam, was the place adorned where the Ball was afterwards to be kept; and it was late before the Aſſembly broke up; for ſince all the devices which belonged unto theſe Crowns did furniſh out much diſcourſe upon them, all the men did ſtrive according to their inclinations to applaud thoſe which beſt pleaſed them: And amongſt the reſt, that of Glacidia, who repreſented the Amaranthes, extreamly taking the Prince of Phoceus, he did highly commend her unto Cleonisbe, and told her that Glacidia had good reaſon to make choice of that flower which ſhe repreſented, ſince ſhe had given ſuch evident demonſtration of of the conſtancy in her affection.

I hope (ſaid Mandana, and interrupted him) that there was none of thoſe thirty Ladies which repreſented thirty ſeveral Flowers, and had thirty ſeveral Devices, which you eſteemed ſo little, as to forget what they were.

Pardon me, Madam, I beſeech you, replied Thrymetus, If I ſhould have received the honour to have ſeen you preſently after this Feaſt, I ſhould have repeated them all; but now at this time I can only remember two of them, and I think Glacidia repreſented the Amaranthes, with this Motto,

I never Change.

For ſince this Flower hath that priviledg never to loſe its beauty, nor fade, Glacidia made choice of it to expreſs the laſtingneſs of her love to Cleonisbe and the conſtancy of her heart. Then there was another Lady of Quality, whoſe name was Amathilde, who choſe that day a Crown of Roſes: She was very young and fair, and had ſuch a conceit of her own beauty as ſhe would often ſay ſhe would not deſire to live but till twenty years of age, upon condition ſhe were the faireſt in the world: maintaining very peremptorily, that ſhe had much rather die young, than live long, ſince ſhe could not live long and be fair, ſo as ſuiting her Device unto her humour, and the flower which ſhe repreſented, it was this:

My Reign is ſhort, but beautiful.

Now, Madam, I beſeech you excuſe me for the reſt; for the Truth is, I am forced to conſeſs unto my ſhame that my memory fails me, though I am ſure they were all, as full of pleaſant wit as theſe I have named. But to return from whence I digreſſed, give me leave to tell you, Madam, that the Prince of Phoceus beginning to commend Glacidia unto Cleonisbe: Truly, Madam, ſaid he unto her, Glacidia is very happy in being loved by one who knows ſo well how to proportion her love according to the merits of every one: But I muſt tell you alſo, that thoſe who are conſcious of their own worth, are very unhappy; for to live without hopes of your eſteem is a moſt unexpreſſible torment. Thoſe who are not worthy of my eſteem (replied Cleonisbe, and ſmiled) do value it ſo little, as it's likely the deprivation of it never troubles them: and therefore you imploy your compaſſion very ill, if you pity ſuch as are no ſufferers, and ſuch perhaps as you know not. I aſſure you, Madam, replied he, I know one who has moſt ſtrange apprehenſions and fears of not obtaining this glorious eſteem whereof I ſpeak: Then they muſt needs have an ill opinion either of me, or of themſelves, replied Cleonisbe: I cannot tell, Madam, replied the Prince of Phoceus, whether or no they have a bad opinion of themſelves, but I am ſure they have a very good one of you.

As Cleonisbe was ready to reply, Bomilcar according to the liberty of the Ball, did take her out to dance, which did much vex the Prince of Phoceus; yet it was not long before he had his revenge in the ſame nature; for after Cleonisbe had danced, and Bomilcar had talked a while with her, he took out Cleonisbe to dance from Bomilcar, as Bomilcar took her from him.

In the mean while, Galathes and Britomartes who had alſo their Pretenſions, did both of them eaſily obſerve with what an Ayr Bomilcar and the Prince of Phoceus behaved themſelves in the buſineſs, ſo as equally to hinder both they both applied themſelves unto the Princeſs, and would not leave her; ſo as all the reſt of that day none of all the four could ſpeak unto her in private. Though the Prince of Phoceus was an abſolute Maſter of himſelf when he pleaſed, unleſs ſince he was in Love, yet he ſpake but very little, fearing leaſt he ſhould ſpeak too much, and more than he would have either his Miſtreſs or his Rivals to know. But as for Bomilcar, his tongue was freer, and he uttered many things, which gave Cleonisbe to underſtand that he was jealous of the Phocean Prince, though he gave no ſuch language as could anger either her or him: As for Britomartes, who was of a more ſincere ſpirit, and never gloſſed over any hidden meaning, he ſet no watch over his words. But as for Galathes, the Prince of Phoceus did eaſily perceive that he underſtood Bomilcar as well as him, and that his Paſſion was not unknown him.

On the other ſide, Menedorus, he was not without his ingenuities; for the Prince Carimantes having thought Aurora that day to be fairer than the Sun it ſelf, he was continually with Oneſicrite, and talked with her with much delight, whilſt Menedorus durſt not diſturb them. Oneſicrite, who obſerved the diſorder of Menedorus, had a deſire to break off this diſcourſe; but it was not fit ſhe ſhould be uncivil unto the Son of a King, who had given them a being in his Country; ſo as ſhe being diſordered as well as Menedorus, Carimantes perceived that her ſpirit was diſtempered in her diſcourſe, and did gueſs the reaſon. Yet he had no mind that Oneſicrite ſhould perceive he knew the cauſe of that perplexity which appeared in her eyes and mind, whether ſhe would or no; but on the contrary, deſiring to put it off upon ſome other cauſe, I perceive, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that our Feaſts and Diverſions do not pleaſe you ſo well as thoſe of your own Country: and I ſee their ſimplicity is not witty and gallant enough for your ſublime fancy: And, Madam, the truth is, you have great reaſon to complain againſt the Lot which is uſed at this Feaſt; for indeed it was fit you ſhould have had the place of Cleonisbe. Oh Sir, replied Oneſicrite, you do me the greateſt wrong in the world, if you think I am not infinitely well pleaſed with every thing I ſee here; and you are extreamly unjuſt to ſay that I ſhould have the Princeſs Cleonisbies place: you would be much more equitable if you would ſay, I did not merit that which I had: For really, Aurora is a thing ſo glorious, as it may well be ſaid, I had abundance of vanity in me, in daring to repreſent it: For my part, replied Carimantes, I dare confidently affirm, that if Aurora be as glorious as your ſelf, ſhe deſerves as many Sacrifices as the Sun. Nor do I think (ſaid he and ſmiled) that you would not ſpeak as you do, but becauſe you do not often ſee Aurora. 'Tis very true, replied Oneſicrite, I do ſee the Sun oftner than I do Aurora, and am fitter to judge of the nights beauty than it. Oh fie, Madam, replied Carimantes, ceaſe to be unjuſt; and believe as I do, that you are abſolutely the faireſt perſon in the world: And believe, I beſeech you withall, that there is no man upon Earth does more admire and adore you than I do. I would I could perſwade my ſelf of what you ſpeak, Sir, replied ſhe, but when I caſt my eyes upon ſo many ſuperlative Beauties as here are, and remember what my Glaſs ſhews unto me every day, it is impoſſible any ſuch pleaſing flatteries ſhould add any joys unto me: So, Sir, ſince I am forced not to believe you, I am extreamly ſorry that I cannot be what you ſay I am: Oh Madam (ſaid Carimantes and interrupted her) if you have never any greater cauſe of ſorrow, than at finding your ſelf not lovely enough, you will be ever the happieſt perſon alive: I wiſh to the Gods you could as well know thoſe who love and adore you, as you may know the Charms which force them unto it: Carimantes pronounced theſe words with ſo much vehemence, as it was eaſie for Oneſicrite to perceive that he was Loveſick.

But ſince ſhe would return him no anſwer, and ſince Amathilde after ſhe had danced, did come and mingle diſcourſe with them: But Menedorus was in ſuch anguiſh of mind, as it was evident he found no great joy in the Feaſt.

In the mean while, Cleonisbe having about her the Prince of Phoceus, Bomilcar, Galathes, and Britomartes, ſhe did ſo plainly perceive the ſecret thoughts of their hearts, as that ſhe was much diſquieted at them: She obſerved alſo, that though there was a great averſion between all theſe four Rivals, yet the feud was much more violent between the Prince of Phoceus and Bomilcar, than betwixt any of the reſt, though ſhe yet obſerved, that they did infinitely eſteem of each other.

Moreover Glacidia, whom ſhe called unto her, did know all this as well as ſhe did. Thus this Feaſt of Flowers did much encreaſe the Loves and Jealouſies of all theſe Rivals, and made all their thoughts known unto Cleonisbe. But ſince it grew late, all this fair company broke up, every one carrying with them ſeveral thoughts.

Moreover, Madam, as it is the common courſe of the World to ſee a miſcellany of Joys and Sorrows ſucceeding each other, news was brought the next morning, that the Silick Gauls which bordered upon the Segoregians, and had taken Arms under the pretence of a War with the Tectoſages, had now made an eruption into their Frontiers, and had poſſeſſed themſelves of a very conſiderable Caſtle: Inſomuch as the King having no Army in readineſs, was a little ſurprized at the news. Yet ſince the Gaules are all even born Souldiers, there needed no more but to aſſemble ſo many men together, and to have a well-compoſed Army. Furthermore, the Prince of Phoceus, deſiring to embrace ſo fit an occaſion of teſtifying his Zeal and Courage, here did offer the King all the Grecians in his new built Town; telling him it was but juſt, that thoſe men who had their beings from him, ſhould expoſe their lives in his ſervice: And indeed, the King having great hopes in our ſuccours, becauſe we were better armed than his Subjects or his Enemies, did accept of the offer from the Prince of Phoceus, at which neither Bomilcar, Galathes, nor Britomartes was very glad.

In the mean time, ſince the time of Cleonisbes choice of a Husband did draw nigh, they could not believe that the Prince of Phoceus was or could be in any capacity of being choſen, nor that the Princeſs her ſelf durſt chooſe him, though ſhe had a mind unto it. For the truth is, Madam, though the Law do give her the freedom of her choice, yet commonly they never chooſe any but by appointment.

But not to inſiſt too long upon this, let me tell you, Madam, that the Prince of Phoceus had ſuch a deſire to ſerve the Segoregian King, as he left in Marſeilles, only old men, women, and children, forcing all the reſt of what profeſſion or quality ſoever they were, to take up Arms and follow him, though their new Town was not yet quite finiſhed.

Furthermore, the King, Carimantes, Bomilcar, Galathes, and Britomartes muſtering all the men they could, the Army was very conſiderable: But ſince we were better experienced in military Arts than any of them, except Bomilcar, the Prince of Phoceus got great reputation in the firſt Council of War, wherein alſo Sfurius and Menedorus did worthily acquit themſelves.

But, Madam, becauſe I will not be too tedious in particularizing a War which laſted not above fifteen days; give me leave to tell you, that the Army marched towards the Eenemy; that the King regained the Caſtle which the Enemy had taken; that he repulſed them; and entring into their Country, he forced them to beg conditions of Peace which themſelves had broken: For the natural Genius of that Nation is to be ſoon appeaſed and ſoon incenſed; and thoſe who ground great hopes in their diviſions, do often find themſelves miſtaken. However, Madam, give me leave to tell you, that the Prince of Phoceus did miracles, ſuch as got him the reputation of one of the moſt valiant men in the world. Bomilcar alſo carried himſelf ſo excellently as the Prince of Phoceus did much eſteem him; but this eſteem was ſo far from leſſening the averſion which was between them, that it did the more increaſe it: Britomartes alſo and Galathes did ſignalize themſelves: Carimantes and Menedorus did fight like men that would have Fame ſpeak loud of them unto Oneſicrite: And I aſſure you, Madam, all the Princes returned back unto Clenisbe with abundance of glory; and ſhe her ſelf did gallantly tell them when they returned, that though Lawrels were very plentiful in her Country, yet ſhe did not think there were enough to make ſo many Crowns as they deſerved. However, maugre the averſion which was between the Prince of Phoceus and Bomilcar they ſpoke very worthily of each other, and did equal juſtice unto both their vertues. But as for Galathes, whoſe thoughts were different from theirs, and thought it not fit even to commend a Rival, he ſpoke not one word of them, but turned them all into Commendums of the Prince Carimantes.

As for Britomartes, he was more ſincere, and ſpoke of things according to his knowledge: Alſo believing that he ſhould be the man who ſhould be choſen, becauſe he was of that Country; as his hopes were more, ſo his jealouſie was leſs: But that which was the greateſt advantage unto the Prince of Phoceus, was, that the King did really think himſelf indebted for the happy ſucceſs of this War, not only unto his peculiar valour, but alſo unto the valour of his Troops: And the very truth is, every one of them had ſuch an earneſt deſire to teſtifie their acknowledgment unto the King who had given them a harbour, that they did things beyond all imagination: And he ſpoke ſo advantagiouſly of them unto Cleonisbe, as ſhe thought her ſelf obliged to look kindly upon the Prince of Phoceus, and tell him of it: But ſince never man living was in a higher degree modeſt, which is an infallible mark of heroick valour, he reverently rejected thoſe applauds which ſhe gave him, and gave her others in ſuch a paſſionate way, that ſhe repented ſhe ever began to commend him, though ſhe did not repent of her eſteeming him, but on the contrary did eſteem him much more But, Madam, give me leave to tell you in the firſt place, that ſince our return to the Court, there grew ſo great a league of amity betwixt the Prince of Phoceus and Glacidia, and between Glacidia and Bomilcar, that it may very well be ſaid that Cleonisbe did not love her better than theſe two Rivals did, and that ſhe loved Cleonisbe no better than ſhe loved them: One might alſo ſay, that Fate had a deſign to have it ſo, for a hundred ſeveral chances hapned which did ſo oblige them all unto it, as they could not deny their friendſhip without ingratitude. By this, Madam, you may imagine that unleſs ſhe had been a woman of extraordinary prudence, ſhe could never have long continued a friend unto two men who were both Rivals, Enemies, and of ambitious ſpirits, who wiſhed both of them for the ſame things, and who thought they could never be happy but by the ruin of one another: yet Glacidia did carry her ſelf ſo exceeding well between them as ſhe never had the leaſt ſquabble with either of them: And the truth is, ſhe was ſo exactly faithful both unto them and unto Cleonisbe; that though ſhe knew very well what the Princeſs thought of the Phocean Prince, and of Bomilcar; and tho ſhe knew what thoſe two Rivals thought of each other, and alſo knew the paſſions of their ſouls, ſhe never told any thing but what might contribute unto their ſafety, ſatisfaction, and glory; carrying her ſelf ſo exactly even, that ſhe never gave any of them any cauſe to ſuſpect ſhe had any thoughts which ſhe concealed: And I aſſure you, that but for her, there had been ſome fatal Quarrels between two men in whom both love and hatred was ſo high. But they were both of them ſo reſpective of her, that when they met with one another at her houſe, they were as civil unto each other as if they had been very good friends, yet had they much ado to be all of one mind: But the Prince of Phoceus was ſo much maſter of himſelf when he pleaſed, that he would by no means quarrel publickly. I remember one day above the reſt, I had an opportunity to obſerve this Antipathy between theſe two Rivals: For, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that Glacidia being once ſo ill that ſhe kept her Chamber, much good company came to viſit her; and amongſt the reſt Amathilde of whom I ſpoke before, ſhe was there moſt of the afternoon. I know, Madam, you have not forgot how I deſcribed her to be both young and fair, and that it was ſhe who was crowned with Roſes upon the Feaſt day: And that ſhe had ſuch a great conceit of beauty, as that ſhe thought one not fit to live after the loſs of it, and conſequently that one ſhould not wiſh to live long, unleſs one had a particular priviledge to be both old and fair. But before I relate the diſcourſe which did evidence the averſion which cauſed ſuch jealouſie and love in the hearts of theſe two Rivals, it is requiſite that I make a more particular deſcription of Amathilde unto you : and that I tell you, ſhe did not only think none ought to live longer than they were fair ; but alſo ſhe was in the humour of thoſe who becauſe they are not above ſixteen or ſeventeen years of age themſelves, do think four or five and twenty to be old age ; and who are ſo blinded with their own youth, that they ſpeak of thoſe who are five or ſix years elder than themſelves, as if they were people of another generation ; that ſuch can have no ſhares in beauty, and that they can pretend no farther unto it, than to ſay they have been fair. However, Amathilde was extreamly lovely, and few of the greateſt Beauties did excel her youth.

Now, Madam, I muſt tell you that Amathilde coming to viſit Glacidia, as I entred, I was a witneſs of this diſcourſe which I am to relate. She was no ſooner entred, but Bomilcar entred alſo, and being exceeding tender of Glacidia's health, he asked very earneſtly how ſhe did : But Amathilde not giving Glacidia ſo much leaſure as to anſwer, told Bomilcar that ſince the ſickneſs of Glacidia had not altered her complexion, certainly ſhe was not very ſick, and conſequently not much to be pitied : For my part (ſaid ſhe in her frolick humour) I always meaſure my compaſſion according to the alteration which I find in the faces of my friends when they are ſick : And therefore ſince Glacidia has no yellowneſs nor paleneſs in her Complexion ; her eyes not ſhrunk, nor her looks melancholy : And ſince ſhe has no ſymptoms of a languiſhing ſickneſs, let us endeavour rather to divert her than to pity her ; for my opinion is, a little pain which does not take away ones beauty, nor ones plumpneſs, is not to be over-much condoled. Yet there are ſome pains, replied I, which are ſhort and violent ; and which, though no great danger in them, yet deſerve ſome compaſſion, becauſe they are painful. Howevever it be (ſaid ſhe) what I ſaid is my opinion : When one hath as much to loſe as you have, replied Bomilcar, certainly they muſt needs fear ſuch ſickneſſes, as in one night may blaſt more Lillies and Roſes in a complexion, than a whole Spring can bloom. For my part (ſaid Glacidia, and interrupted them) I think there needs no more to cure Amathilde of the love ſhe has unto her own beauty; but to wiſh her only eight days of ſuch a ſickneſs as has no name unto it, which without any great pain or grief will by degrees make one lean, or become yellow or green, and make ones eys ſhrink in their heads, their lips look pale, and cauſe ſuch a ſudden alteration, as the faireſt would quickly become ugly. Oh Glacidia (cried ſhe out in a pretty fury) you put me into a moſt terrible fright, and methinks you have given me this diſeaſe by wiſhing it, and I do already perceive ſomething which makes me change colour. Amathilde at this ſaying did riſe up, and looked upon her ſelf in a glaſs to ſee if what ſhe ſaid was true, though it was only to ſet her hood in a little better order: After which, ſitting down in her place again: Thanks be to the Gods (ſaid ſhe unto Glacidia) your wiſh has not yet taken any effect, nor I hope ever will: But to prevent any more ſuch wiſhes, know cruel Glacidia, that if ever ſuch a misfortune fall upon me as you wiſh, I ſhall think I only receive it from you; for ſince I never had any ſickneſs but once, I think my conſtitution ſo ſound and healthy as I cannot believe any one under poyſoning can hurt me: But I beſeech you, replied I, did that ſickneſs which you had work any terrible alteration in you? No, replied Amathilde, and laughed, but on the contrary it did me the greateſt good in the world; for ſince I was then a little of too high a colour, it brought me to ſuch a right complexion, that the alteration was to my advantage. This is a great happineſs, ſaid Bomilcar, that one ſhould grow fairer by ſickneſs. Yet this ſoundneſs of Conſtitution, replied Glacidia, which makes her ſo fair at ſeventeen, will one day make her ugly, ſince it will make her live everlaſtingly. Oh fie Glacidia, replied Amathilde, you are the moſt cruel perſon in the world to preſage ſuch misfortune unto me: why (ſaid I and wondred) do you call it a misfortune to live long? As ſhe was ready to reply, the Prince of Phoceus entred, and preſently after Britomartes and Galathes. But ſince the conteſt between Glacidia and Amathilde was too pleaſant to end ſo ſoon; and ſince Glacidia was deſirous of ſome jolly diſcourſe, to prevent her four Rivals from a more ſerious, ſhe began it again; and looking upon thoſe who newly entred, ſhe told them the cauſe of their Conteſt, and the complaint which Amathilde made againſt her, for preſaging that ſhe ſhould live long. If I could live long, and not alter, replied ſhe, but continue always as if I were eighteen, I ſhould be contented: But to imagine what I ſhall be when I am old, it is beyond my patience to endure. However, replied Glacidia, I will tell you plainly that you ſhall never be fairer than you are, and every year you live will detract ſomething from your Cheeks.

For my part, ſaid the Prince of Phoceus, I think it abundance of prudence in any one to prepare themſelves for ſuch a miſchance, and to look for it. He had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Bomilcar, though he was of the ſame opinion, yet he oppoſed it, as if his deſign were only to take Amathilde's part, though indeed it was only to be againſt the Prince of Phoceus: And Galathes and Britomartes out of reſentments of jealouſie and love, did not ſtrive ſo much for a reaſon of what they ſaid, as to be contrary unto the reſt. Thus the Prince of Phoceus was ſure to be againſt the opinion of Bomilcar, of Britomartes, and of Galathes: Bomilcar on the contrary was ſure to contradict the Prince of Phoceus, Galathes, and Britomartes: Galathes he employed all his wit to thwart Bomilcar, Britomartes, and the Phocean Prince: And Britomartes he would be ſure not to concur in opinion with the Prince of Phoceus, with Galathes, nor with Bomilcar.

Thus though it may ſeem there could be but two oppoſite opinions upon one thing, yet here there were four ſo different, that it may be ſaid they were all oppoſite unto each other, ſo as for a while this converſation was the oddeſt that ever was; for no ſooner had one of theſe Rivals given a reaſon for his opinion, but all the other three did earneſtly contradict it: And they did ſo thwart one another with their ſeveral Reaſons, that the diſpute was ſo intangled as they ſcarce underſtood each other: In ſo much as Glacidia, Amathilde, and my ſelf could not chuſe but laugh at them, and they themſelves perceiving it as well as we, could not chooſe but laugh alſo: However, to reduce them unto ſome order in their diſputations, Glacidia commanded ſilence, and told them, that in her intentions of correcting of Amathilde, there needed not ſo many men talk to her at once: and that it was ſufficient if after ſhe her ſelf had accuſed her, and received her defence, they ſhould then ſpeak what they thought good: But I beſeech you, ſaid Amathilda, and interrupted them, what can you accuſe me of? I can accuſe you of an error replied Glacidia, in thinking one ought not to live above five or ſix years: For in your opinion one begins but to live at fifteen, and one muſt die when beauty begins to fade.

The truth is, anſwered ſhe, that the age which is ſpent in toys cannot be called happy, no more than that age when youth and beauty begins to fail: But I beſeech you, replied Glacidia, let us examine your maximes a little better, and conſider I conjure you, how little you have lived happily hitherto, and how little time you have to live; for truly according to your Tenents, your life did but begin at fifteen, and I know you have not lived in full ſatisfaction; for I remember you did not think your ſelf fat enough, and feared you ſhould not be full enough: But now you are grown to an admirable ſtature, and it is as plump and freſh as the luſty Grape, is it not true, you are in fear of being either too fat or too lean? But though you did not, yet ſince you think five and twenty to be old, certainly your youth will be quickly gone; for if you ſhould deduct from the time you have lived, and from the time, at which your beauty will decay, thoſe days and nights in which you ſlept ill, thoſe days in which you wore ſome Gowns which were not well made, thoſe days on which you were not advantagiouſly dreſſed: Thoſe on which you ſaw no body; thoſe on which you ſaw only ſuch as did not pleaſe you, it will upon this be found, that your life is ſo ſhort, as can ſcarcely be ſaid you have lived one year. Though I ſhould grant all this, replied Amathilda, yet I ſhould not alter my opinion; for ſince the very beſt time of ones life will not afford an abſolute happineſs, I cannot conſent that old age is a thing deſireable: For my part, I muſt ingeniouſly tell you my mind, that though I never had much beauty, yet I do not wiſh to live longer than I may be put in the Catalogue of thoſe who have ſome: For when I conceit that my Glaſs, which ſhews ſome ſymptoms of youth in my face, will ſhew alſo ſome wrinkles of age if I ſhould live ſo long, death ſeems deſirable to me: And I do profeſs unto you, that when I think upon the difference there is between a Maid of ſixteen and a Wife of ſixty, I had rather die at twenty than live to fifty. I have already told you, replied Glacidia, that the ſame health which makes you now ſo fair, will make you live a whole age, and therefore you muſt prepare your ſelf to be neither fair nor young. If ever ſuch fatal miſery fall upon me (replied ſhe) I will break all my Glaſſes in a thouſand pieces; I will ſhun the world as much as it will ſhun me, and I believe I will never look you in the face again for fear I ſhould ſee my ſelf in your eyes; for really my imagination abhors ſo ſtrange a Metamorphoſis: I have much ado to endure ſo many Mothers and Aunts, who go in company with their Daughters and Neeces; and do you think I ſhould ever endure it in my ſelf? If ſuch an alteration ſhould come upon a ſudden (replied Glacidia and laughed at what Amathilda ſaid) I ſhould confeſs it were to be wondered at: and if you ſhould go now this night to bed young and fair as you are, and riſe the next morning old and ugly, I ſhould then permit you to break ſome of your Glaſſes: But Amathilda it will not be ſo; but when you come unto the firſt point of your decline, every minute will gradatim ſteal ſomething from you: So as ſince the alteration comes undiſcernably upon you, and ſince you ſee your ſelf every day, the change will be inſenſible: Oh Glacidia, replied ſhe, this can never come to paſs; and I had much rather dye young, than it ſhould: What pleaſure is it poſſible I ſhould find in an age, wherein all I do now, is ridiculous then? when I muſt change my manner of life; when all the world is weary of me; when I muſt alter all my cloathes; when colours is not alowable. No, no, Glacidia, I am not able, for I muſt confeſs I cannot change my way of living, and forſake my pleaſures: And if you will have me open my heart unto you, I muſt very ingeniouſly tell you, that if I ſhould live long, I ſhould not only be ugly, but alſo ridiculous; culous; for I am confident I ſhould be perſwaded to dance at ſixty, though I danced by my ſelf, and I ſhould wear Jewels and colours until the hour of my death. The truth is, I ſhould do the very ſame things I do at this day; for I know no other thing that can divert me.

Really Amathilde (ſaid Glacidia and laughed) you are the ſtrangeſt woman in the world to ſpeak thus: Yet let me tell you, to put you out of all thoughts of dancing at ſixty; that as the diverſions of your infancy are not ſuch now unto you, ſo thoſe things will not divert you hereafter, which pleaſe you now: your pleaſures will change with your face, and both with years: And when all your beauty is gone, you will think it ſweet to live: For my particular, I know that though I ſhould live to be extream old, yet I ſhall wiſh to be older, though I ſhall find no other pleaſures but to ſee the Roſes blow, and ſmell the Orange and Jeſſimine Flowers. Moreover, ſince age is ſuch a bug-bear to you, do not beſtow it ſo ſoon upon others: Conſider that ſome women are fairer at five and twenty than at fifteen: Leave your invectives againſt age I conjure you; for commonly when four or five young perſons are together, you talk as if you would never be above ſeventeen; yet at the very ſame time when you are cenſuring this Lady to be ugly, and that Lady old, you are drawing towards the ſame ages your ſelves; I beſeech you replied Amathilde do me the honour to teach me how I muſt live: you muſt enjoy your beauty and your youth, replied Glacidia, as two things which you muſt infallibly loſe: And you muſt bring your ſelves to ſuch a paſs, as to be ſtill amiable when they are loſt. I will freely give you leave to enjoy your youth and beauty with all variety of delights, but yet ſo as it may be without pride, and ſo as you may part from them without deſpair: I conſent you ſhould guſt all the advantages of youth and beauty, with a full ſwing; but I would not have you jear at others who are not ſo fair as your ſelves; for certainly it is the greateſt folly, and the moſt unjuſt thing in the world, to ſcoff at what you may be your ſelves. For if I were to preſcribe Laws unto ſuch as delight themſelves in railary, I would make this inviolable, never to mock at ſuch things as we may be our ſelves upbraided with: To play upon ſuch as are ſtupid and ignorant there is no danger of any retort, and the like of a hundred examples: But to mock at any woman, becauſe ſhe is not fair or young, is to mock at what you muſt certainly be your ſelves, this is a thing I abhor, that ſuch as are neither young nor fair, and yet behave themſelves as if they were. When one arrives at the twi-light of Beauty, and the medium between youth and age, when one may chooſe whether they will paſs for young or old, according to their humours, I would then have them incline more unto reſervedneſs, than unto jollity; yet notwithſtanding I would not have them deſpair, nor paſs from extremity of mirth unto extreamity of melancholy: I would have ſuch renounce all ſuch vanities which were allowable when they were younger: I would have them ſtill be handſom, but without all affectation: I allow them all good company: I would have them ſtrive more to keep Friends, than to get Lovers. I give them the free liberty of walking; that they ſhould have eyes for all excellent objects, and ears for muſick when decency and occaſion preſent themſelves. So Amathilde depriving you only of a few gaudy Ribbons, and ſome Lovers, which moſt of them very likely are perfidious, methinks you need not deſpair though I do foretel that you ſhould live long. When I hearken unto you, replied Amathilde, I am almoſt perſwaded you are in the right; but when I hearken unto my ſelf, I can ſcarcely believe it: And I an ſo confident, that as ſoon as I am out of your ſight, I ſhall hearken unto my own dictates, as I am in the greateſt fear in the world, you ſhould take it ill that I do not follow your advice.

Amathilde ſpoke this ſo pleaſantly, that Glacidia, and all the company laughed: But as the Prince of Phoceus, Bomilcar, Galathes, and Britomartes were about to give their opinions of this pleaſant Conteſt, an old Aunt of Glacidia's entered, who was ſo very much marked with all the grim wrinkles of age in her face, as is imaginable: In ſo much as though two very young and fair Ladies followed her; yet Amathilde not being able to endure ſuch a ghaſtly object, ſhe prepared to go away; but firſt ſhe came to Glacidia, and asked her in a low voice, will you yet maintain that old age is deſireable? Yes (replied Glacidia, as ſhe told us afterwards) and I will maintain alſo that you will deſire it, when you are a little older: Say you ſo (ſaid ſhe, and laughed aloud) then I will to morrow become what you ſay I ſhall be afterwards.

After this, Amathilde, Galathes, and Britomartes went out, and the Princeſs Cleonisbe coming in a little after, this old Lady, who put Amathilde in ſuch a fright, went out alſo: ſo as there remained only the Prince of Phoceus, Bomilcar, and my ſelf.

As ſoon as Cleonisbe was ſet down Glacidia related unto her the diſpute betwixt Amathilde and her: And ſhe had no ſooner related it unto her, but ſhe asked the Prince of Phoceus what opinion he was of? And when he anſwered that he concurred with Glacidia, ſhe turned towards Bomilcar, and asked his opinion? Truly Madam, replyed he, I ſaw ſo many againſt Amathilde, that I took her part, not conſidering whether it was reaſonable or no. Such a generous motive, replied ſhe, deſerves a pardon for maintaining ſo bad a cauſe: Yet I muſt confeſs (added the Princeſs) that I do not love ſuch generoſity as conſiſts only in protecting imbecility againſt reaſon Doubtleſs I would not have weak people oppreſſed; but I am ſo great a lover of reaſon, as I cannot endure they ſhould be protected againſt it; And in ſuch diſputes as theſe, I would have one ſpeak againſt ones deareſt friends, if their opinions be contrary unto it, and ſide with their greateſt Enemies when they are in the right. The laſt of theſe is a task a little too difficult; and I think it Madam a much more eaſier matter to ſide with my Friends though they be in the wrong, then not to thwart my Enemies, though they be in the right.

Truly (replied the Prince of Phoceus) I ſhould be very hardly perſwaded to go againſt the rules of right and reaſon in either: But I muſt confeſs, I ſhould much rejoyce ſometimes, when one I love not, takes an ill ſide. Though there be ſome kind of injuſtice in that, replied Cleonisbe, yet you are more reaſonable than Bomilcar: At the leaſt Madam, replied Bomilcar, he is much more happy, ſince you think him more reaſonable than my ſelf: Doubtleſs I am, replied the Prince of Phoceus, ſince I do entertain any thought which the Princeſs approves on; She I ſay, who has ſuch a delicate, juſt, and diſcerning a judgment in all things. The thing which I moſt admire at (ſaid Glacidia and interrupted them) is, that Bomilcar ſhould defend that to day which I know he hates in his heart the moſt of any man living: and I am moſt confident,he would never have taken Amathilde's part,but only becauſe he is of their opinion, who thinks all diſcourſe not worth a ſtraw, when all jump in one opinion: I aſſure you replied he, I cannot ſay that to be the cauſe which moved me to it: Bomilcar ſpoke this with ſuch an Ayr, as the reaſon why he would not confeſs the cauſe which moved him to take an ill ſide, was evident unto Glacidia; who thinking it expedient to turn the diſcourſe, ſhe asked Cleonisbe if ſhe ſaw Oneſicrite that day? And paſſing from one diſcourſe to another, I told her how I ſaw that morning a branch of Coral of a huge bigneſs, and of an admirable hue. Cleonisbe then asked me where I ſaw it? I told her it was in the hands of one who intended to preſent it unto her upon that day which was deſigned for her to make her choice of a Husband; for it is the cuſtome, that as ſoon as the choice is made, all perſons of any quality do offer unto the Princeſs ſome rich and magnificent preſents.

As ſoon as ever I had ſo ſaid,there appeared in the cheeks of Cleonisbe as freſh a culour as the Coral which I ſaw: The Prince of Phoceus and Bomilcar obſerving it, did eaſily imagine that the reaſon of her bluſh was, becauſe that day on which depended her good or bad fortune was ſo near, and ſhe never remembred it. But Bomilcar, ſince his hopes were above his fears, he was not ſo much perplexed at it as the Prince of Phoceus, who I ſay ſeeing no foundation of any hopes, could not think upon that day of rejoycing without extream ſorrow. But Bomilcar being of a haſty temper, and his imagination flattering his reaſon, he would needs talk of that Feaſt unto Cleonisbe: For ſince he believed that ſhe could not ſpeak any thing in advantage of the Phocean Prince, it pleaſed his fancy to be talking before his Rival of a Ceremony which would put him out of all hopes: And therefore fore arming himſelf with a a confident boldneſs; Truly Madam, ſaid he unto Cleonisbe, I do not think there was ever ſuch a cruel feaſt as this which is now drawing nigh; for there will be abundance of illuſtrious and brave men aſſembled, with certainty that only one of them muſt be happy, and all the reſt miſerable. Tis very true. replied the Prince of Phoceus, this Feaſt will be very ſad unto ſuch as pretend unto the Choice, and ſad alſo unto ſuch as not pretending unto that honour, are only ſo bold as to wiſh it: However, I believe (ſaid Cleonisbe) that this Feaſt will be more ſad unto her who is to chooſe, than unto them who are not choſen. Oh Madam (cried out Bomilcar) then certainly the reaſon is becauſe ſhe finds none worthy of her choice, for otherwiſe the matter were eaſily determined. I aſſure you, replyed ſhe, there is a difficulty in every choice: The Princeſs hath much reaſon to ſay ſo, replied Glacidia and laughed; for I aſſure you that I in my choice only of flowers, cannot tell ſomtimes which to fix upon: And my hand and mind doth waver when I cull either Roſes, Oranges, or Violets: And you may well imagine, that in matters of great importance the Princeſs hath great reaſon to be as much perplexed in her choice as thoſe whom ſhe doth not chooſe: this is ſo full of truth, replied Cleonisbe, that if the Laws of this State would permit me, I wou'd ſolemnly diſclaim from this Cuſtom, and would much rather ſubmit unto the King my Father, than have the liberty of choice. Then Madam, your reaſon is (replied Bomilcar very ſadly) becauſe you find none worthy of your choice: However the Laws will have you chooſe, and it is very like that your judgment hath already choſen him whom your mouth would upon the day of Ceremony pronounce to be your Choice, Though I am not obliged to reveal ſuch a ſecret unto you replied ſhe, yet I will aſſure you that my Choice is yet to make: And if I muſt chooſe one, it ſhall be him whom the Gods ſhall pleaſe to inſpire into my mind, when I am in the Temple. The Princeſs ſpoke this after ſuch a manner, as equally perſwaded both the Prince of Phoceus and Bomilcar, that ſhe ſpoke as ſhe thought; ſo as the firſt of theſe was abundantly joyed and the ſecond extreamly grieved. For ſince the Prince of Phoceus was never in any hopes of being choſen, he found ſome ſweetneſs in thinking that others had no greater hopes than himſelf: But as for Bomilcar, ſince he conceited himſelf to have ſome right to be elected, and verily hoped for it, he was in a ſtrange deſpair to find the Princeſs yet unreſolved whom ſhe ſhould chooſe, his ſorrows augmented his hatred of the Phocean Prince, becauſe he ſaw him in poſſibility of being elected as well as himſelf. But ſince ſuch tumultuous thoughts as theſe are great diſturbers of the mind, he ſcarcely talked any more that day: But the Prince of Phoceus talked more than he did before, and ſpoke ſuch things as did diſcover the thoughts of his heart, though he ſpoke nothing but what would admit of another interruption.

But in concluſion, Cleonisbe being ready to go away, theſe two Rivals waited upon her to her Coach. After which, the Prince of Phoceus went to the King, and Bomilcar returned to Glacidia, from whom he departed immediately after: But ſince I had the honour to be much in that lovely Ladies favour, and it being in ſome ſort neceſſary that I ſhould know all the paſſages amongſt theſe perſons. I underſtood from her ſince, that as ſoon as Bomilcar was at liberty to talk in private with her, he began thus, I beſeech you dear Glacidia, ſaid he unto her, if ever you intend to oblige me, of two things do one of them for me: Doubtleſs Sir, replied ſhe, I have a moſt ſtrong inclination to do you any ſervice, therefore I beſeech you tell me preſently what are thoſe two things of which you give me the choice? Either to contrive it ſo, anſwered he, that the Prince of Phoceus may be no longer my Rival, or elſe that he be no longer your Friend; for the truth is, I cannot endure he ſhould either love Cleonisbe, or you. Suppoſe the Prince of Phoceus (replied Glacidia, and ſmiled) ſhould deſire me to contrive it ſo, that either Bomilcar ſhould not love the Princeſs, or that I ſhould not be his friend, what anſwer would you have me return? I would have you anſwer him, replied he, contrary to what I would have you anſwer me.

Fie Bomilcar, replied ſhe, in this you are not juſt: But ſince I will not be unjuſt after your example, I will give you the very ſame anſwer I would give the Prince of Phoceus, if he ſhould propound the ſame unto me. Know then Sir, that as I will never ceaſe being a friend unto you, though you be an enemy unto the Prince of Phoceus: So I will never ceaſe being his friend, tho' he be not yours. And as relating unto your paſſions, as I will neither hinder nor help you, ſo I will only exhort you both to vanquiſh your paſſions. As for Cleonisbe, I will adviſe her unto nothing; but let her follow the dictates of her own reaſon, which is much beyond my own.

Thus Bomilcar I ſhall be your friend without prejudice to the Prince of Phoceus, and ſhall alſo be his without prejudice to you. Though your friendſhip unto him replied he, can do me no other harm, but that I ſhall often ſee him with you, and be civil to him, yet I ſhall have great cauſe to grudg at it: But Sir, replied Glacidia, though you do ſee him yet he ſees you alſo; and if he doth love the Princeſs as you think he doth, the ſight of you troubles him, as the ſight of him doth you: And ſince he carries himſelf civily to you, be not you leſs rational than he is: For if you give me any juſt cauſe to think that he is more complaiſant towards me than you are, then perhaps retaliating friendſhip for friendſhip, I ſhall be more for the Prince of Phoceus than I am for Bomilcar. Oh cruel Glacidia (ſaid he unto her) I had rather endure the ſight of my Enemy, then endanger to ſee you more his friend then mine: As long as you carry your ſelf as you ought Sir, replied ſhe, I ſhall continue the ſame I am: but if you think to oblige me unto any injuſtice, you will but deceive your ſelf, for as I told you before, if the Prince of Phoceus ſhould affront you, I would take your part: and if you affront him, I will take his: I know he eſteems you, as you eſteem him: I know alſo that he loves me as you do: And I know further, that he who firſt falls out, ſhall loſe me, and I will become a friend unto his Rival.

Oh Glacidia, replied Bomilcar, were you my Miſtreſs, you could not lay a more tyrannical injunction upon me: You may better ſay Sir (replied ſhe, and ſmiled) that were I the wiſeſt of the Sarronides I could not ſpeak more juſtly than I do; for the very truth is, you have no juſt cauſe in the Earth to hate the Prince of Phoceus, he hath not raiſed either quarrel or faction in the Court; he hath ſeen the Princeſs, and he cannot chooſe but think her amiable: What hurt in all this? Alſo, whether he love her or not love, ſtill the choice is in her: and queſtionleſs ſhe will make her choice, without conſidering whether you love her, or he love her: And ſince Reaſon only is her rule, I can aſſure you, that though the Law allow her the choice, yet if her inclination do not concur with reaſon, certainly ſhe will reject it. Thus your good or bad fortune depends meerly upon the Princeſs, and not at all upon the Prince of Phoceus; Live therefore civilly with him, as he will live with you; and make me not to become partial between two whom I infinitely eſteem, and am much obliged unto: And be confident that I will not ſpeak any thing either in his favour nor yours, unleſs you provoke me. Oh Glacidia (ſaid he) you are too wiſe to be a friend unto a Lover, who is ready to run out of his very wits, for I perceive by Cleonisbe, that ſhe knows not yet whom ſhe ſhall make choice of: And yet methinks ſhe ſhould; for ſince I have done her a thouſand ſervices, and adored her with all reverent devotion; methinks I deſerve to be preferred before either Britomartes, or Galathes, or the Prince of Phoceus, who is only an unfortunate Exile.

If the Prince of Phoceus, replyed ſhe, ſhould tell me that you are only an unfortunate Carthaginian, I ſhould blame him for giving ſuch invective terms, as I blame you for upbraiding a great Prince with that term of Exile: an Exile yet whoſe cauſe is glorious, ſince he left his Country only to preſerve his liberty.

Furthermore, let me tell you, that I know not whether the Princeſs hath yet fixed upon any or no: but though I did know it, I profeſs unto you I would never tell it: For I am reſolved to be faithful not only unto the Princeſs, but unto you, and unto the Prince of Phoceus, all who are my dear friends, but alſo unto my very Enemies: Therefore Bomilcar believe that I will neither tell Cleonisbe nor the Prince of Phoceus any thing wherewith you ſhall intruſt me, ſo I will not tell you any thing they are pleaſed to entruſt me withal: Let it ſuffice I promiſe you, never to do you any prejudice, but will do you all the Offices that the Laws of a prudent and generous friendſhip can oblige me unto: But to the end you may not deceive your ſelf, let me tell you that I will promiſe the Prince of Phoceus, the very ſame I promiſe you, if occaſions offer themſelves: And to teſtifie that I am very ſincere, I tell you again, that I will not buſie my ſelf on any ſide between the Princeſs Cleonisbe, and the Prince of Phoceus, nor between the Princeſs and you, unleſs I be provoked: But ſince I hope I ſhall never be put unto any ſuch neceſſity, you may expect from me all the ſerviceable offices in my power, provided they treſpaſs not upon the friendſhip which is between the Princeſs and me, and the Prince of Phoceus: Once more let me tell you Glacidia (ſaid Bomilcar to her) you are ſo very wiſe that you make me deſpair; for by offering me all, you offer me nothing: For ſince you will do nothing in prejudice of my moſt feared Rival, you cannot do me any good office at all: And yet methinks, replied ſhe, that you have two others who are as much to be feared; for if you conſider how Britomartes is of the ſame Country, and Galathes a great Neighbour, you will find them conſiderable: 'Tis very true (ſaid he) but ſince you cannot prejudice them, unleſs you do a good office unto the Prince of Phoceus as well as my ſelf, I cannot tell whether I ſhould deſire it.

I ſhould never make an end, Madam, if I ſhould repeat the whole diſcourſe between Bomilcar and Glacidia, but at laſt he left her, and had as great an eſteem of her vertue, as love to Cleonisbe.

In the mean time, ſince the Prince of Phoceus was extreamly deſirous to know whether or no the Princeſs was yet unreſolved of her choice, he went betimes the next morning unto Glacidia, and found her alone. And being no leſs angry to find Bomilcar with her, then Bomilcar was to meet him; he told her it was the greateſt cruelty in the world unto him, that hitherto he could never ſee her he eſteemed moſt, unleſs he ſaw the man he loved leaſt. But, Madam, ſince I have not Glacidia's Art, to dreſs the ſame matter in different terms, and like her, put the grace of novelty upon it, I ſhall omit a great part of what ſhe ſaid unto the Prince of Phocens, becauſe it was almoſt the ſame ſhe ſaid unto Bomilcar.

But, Madam, let me tell you, how this Prince not being able to contain the fulneſs of his heart, did the ſame day unload it unto Glacidia. You ſhall ſee (ſaid he unto her after much other talk) that I am as confident of your ſincerity as of your generoſity, ſince though you have told me that you are as friendly unto my Rival as my ſelf, yet I will diſcloſe the very ſecret of my heart unto you: I am infinitely obliged unto you, Sir, for your confidence in me, replied ſhe, and I look upon it as an evident teſtimony of your eſteem: Alſo I wiſh with all my heart I could cure you of this tormenting paſſion, ſince I can do you no other ſervice. Oh Glacidia (replied the Prince of Phoceus) do not wiſh the cure; for I had much rather be ſick of that diſeaſe which torments me, then enjoy the health you wiſh me.

Furthermore, in ſome ſort to imitate your generoſity, I will not move you to prejudice Bomilcar, though it be the thing which moſt of any thing I deſire, next the enjoyment of Cleonisbe: But as between two friends who are equally loved, one is obliged in generoſity to have a greater care of him who is unfortunate, than of him who is not: I beſeech you let your compaſſion be upon my miſery, and oblige you to put ſome difference between Bomilcar and me his Enemy: Pity me at leaſt, becauſe I deſerve it more than he doth: For truly he is allowed to be in the happy Catalogue of thoſe who may pretend unto her choice, he hath done a thouſand ſervices both unto the King and Cleonisbe: You have ſpoken a thouſand times in your life in his advantage unto the Princeſs: he hath ſeen her many years together, and is known unto her: the King loves him, and a thouſand motives gives him hope of happineſs and choice: But as for me, Glacidia, I am a poor miſerable wretch that can hope for nothing: I love, but perhaps it is unknown, at leaſt but imperfectly: I love, and dare not pretend unto any love again, nor unto any choice: I love, with the miſery to know, that even common prudence will not permit me to be choſen; yet notwithſtanding there is ſomething in my heart, which is neither vanity nor pride, that often hints unto me, I ought not to yield unto Cleoniſbe, neither unto Bomilcar, nor Britomartes, nor Galathes; ſo as changing my thoughts, I have ſome glimpſes of hope: and though I cannot hope for full happineſs, yet ſometimes I think it not abſolutely impoſſible. 'Tis true I am an Exile, but I am ſo with a great people who are obedient unto me: And I can boaſt of an eſtate, which as ſmall as it is, may extend its limits further than the power of Bomilcar can: Since I have many Ships, men enough to man them, and Riches ſufficient to maintain a long War, and carve out ſome important Conqueſt.

Indeed Glacidia, my birth is equal unto Bomilcar's, my heart is as noble as his, and the paſſion of my ſoul, not a jot inferior. But for all this, all my feeble hopes do vaniſh ſo ſoon as I am often ready to deſpair: And therefore I conjure you Glacidia, as a Cordial to my comfort, tell me whether you think the Princeſs ſpoke ſincerely yeſterday, when ſhe ſaid that her choice was yet to make? For if ſhe did, it is a comfort beyond my expreſſion, though I know no reaſonable ground for any hopes to be built upon it. Since I am very ſincere, replied Glacidia, and ſince flattery of friends, are but meer deluſions, I muſt ingenuouſly tell you, that I wiſh with abundance of Zeal, you were able to quench theſe flames which thus torment you: for though I find you moſt worthy of the Princeſs, yet I have ſome cauſe to fear, that though Cleoniſbe ſhould have the ſame thoughts of you, and in her heart prefer you before either Bomilcar, Britomartes, and Galathes, yet ſhe dare not chooſe you, leſt it ſhould incite ſome trouble in the State.

After this, Sir, ask me no more; for ſince I muſt not reveal the ſecrets of Cleoniſbe, and ſince if Bomilcar ſhould ask me more, I would be ſilent: I ought to be ſo unto you, ſince I am put upon a croſs conjuncture which will not permit me to ſerve you, unleſs I diſſerve him; nor ſerve him, without diſſervice unto you: And to tell you ſincerely, I am not able to give you any particular ſatisfaction, though the conſideration of Bomilcar would allow me, becauſe I never thought it my duty to dive too deep into the ſecrets of Cleonisbe's heart. And therefore conſult with your own reaſon without me, ſince I am not able to give you any faithful counſel, unleſs I ſhould be perfidious unto the Princeſs and Bomilcar. Oh Glacidia (replied the Prince of Phoceus) if I ſhould be my own Counſellor, I ſhould run into ſtrange inconveniences: You are ſo prudent, Sir, replied ſhe, that you need not fear your ſelf: I am ſo far under the commanding power of Love, replied he, that you may expect nothing of reaſon from me: I ſhould talk boldly of my Love unto her who is the cauſer of it: I ſhould expreſs my odium unto Bomilcar, conſpire againſt Galathes, and oppoſe Britomartes with as much fury as he himſelf is capable of. The truth is, Glacidia, I ſhould attempt any thing, rather than yield unto the enjoyment of Cleonisbe. Since I am not at free liberty to tell you all I think (replied ſhe) I find my ſelf at a great puzzle: but yet without giving you any cauſe to ſuſpect me a favourer of Bomilcar unto your prejudice, I will adviſe you once more conſult ſeriouſly with your ſelf before you offer to act your tumultuous reſolutions, whoſe Conſequences may prejudice you more than you can imagin: However, remember I beſeech you to carry your ſelf ſo fair towards Bomilcar, that I may preſerve the ſame neutrality between you, which I intend to do, leſt if you force me to his ſide, you ſhould weaken your own.

But, Madam, Glacidia did not only know all the ſecrets of the Prince of Phoceus and Bomilcar's hearts, but ſhe knew Cleonisbe's alſo. And going to her one evening when no company was with her, for privacy ſake ſhe took her into her Cloſet, where ſeeming to be very melancholy, Glacidia asked her the reaſon: I do aſſure you, replied ſhe, I cannot directly tell you: for I have ſuch a miſcellany of ſeveral thoughts which diſpleaſe me, as I cannot tell unto which to attribute my melancholy: Yet truly I think the greateſt cauſe of it is, becauſe I ſhall ſhortly be put unto the neceſſity of making a Choice, which has more difficulty in it than is imagined. But, Madam, replied Glacidia, I thought your mind had been before this ſufficiently prepared for it, and that you would not make choice of any but whom the King appoints.

That hath hitherto been my reſolution, replied ſhe, but truly I begin to grow weary of it, becauſe I fear he will not adviſe me to my ſatisfaction: Then, Madam, (anſwered Glacidia) ſince the Law gives you the liberty of your own choice; Chooſe him whom your own Reaſon dictates unto you, and never refer it unto the King. Oh Glacidia, replied ſhe, the queſtion is to know whether it be my reaſon which bids me to have ſuch a ſtrange averſion unto Bomilcar. Glacidia ſurprized at this ſpeech, was a while ſilent before ſhe would ſpeak, purpoſely to conſider how ſhe might neither prejudice Bomilcar, nor the Prince of Phoceus: and in order to that, ſhe endeavoured to know from whence this averſion unto Bomilcar might proceed, intending that if ſhe preferred either Britomartes or Galathes, to prejudice them as much as ſhe could, becauſe ſhe did not think them worthy of Cleonisbe's choice, and becauſe ſhe might well do it without offence unto either of her two friends. I do confeſs, Madam, ſaid ſhe unto her, that I have always obſerved you never had any great inclination unto Bomilcar, though I never thought your averſion ſo ſtrong: But, Madam, I beſeech you (added ſhe) is it not Galathes or Britomartes that pleaſeth you better than he doth, and conſequently are cauſes of your averſion to him? No, replied Cleonisbe, and bluſhed, I aſſure you neither of them are prejudicial unto Bomilcar; however Glacidia (purſued ſhe) you are a little beholding unto me, for forcing my ſelf to conceal from you the natural antipathy which is betwixt me and him; for truly had he not been one of your friends, I ſhould long ſince have imparted my thoughts unto you; yet I know very well, that my thoughts are injurious; nor am I ſo ignorant as not to know him to be a very brave compleat man, nor am I ſo blind as not to ſee that he loves me. But for all that, there is ſomething in my heart, which will not let me reliſh his merits, which forbids him entrance into it; and which makes me have ſuch thoughts of him, as may rather be phraſed hatred than averſion. Yet I know very well that all reaſon bids me choſe him : and in all probability the King will order me to prefer him before all others : Judg therefore, Glacidia, whether my ſoul can ſit ſatisfied, and ſee ſuch a ſad day drawing upon me : Sad, I will ſay, ſince Bomilcar is odious unto me, and eſpecially of late ſo abominable that I can hardly endure him. And truly it may be ſaid (added ſhe and bluſht) that he himſelf contributes ſomething unto my horrid averſion: For I beſeech you conſider a little how unjuſtly he is ſtill thwarting the Phocean Prince, unto whom both the King, the Prince my Brother, and my ſelf are ſo civil and reſpective : I took not ſo much notice, Madam, replied Glacidia, as either to approve or diſallow of what Bomilcar did againſt the Prince of Phoceus : And all I am able to ſay for him is, that certainly he does not deſerve the misfortune of your odium. But I pray, Glacidia, ſaid Cleonisbe, do not you know the reaſon why Bomilcar and the Phocean Prince do thus claſh ? for truly being both of them your Friends, methinks you ſhould know the very bottom of their hearts : Believe it, Madam, replied ſhe, I have done as much as is poſſible to make them friends, but cannot ; and the hatred that is betwixt them (if I be not much miſtaken) has a higher cauſe than I can tell you ; and I do not think, Madam, but you are beſt able to divine it : Yes, Glacidia, I can do ſo (replied ſhe, and bluſht again) and it is a reaſon why I am ſo much incenſed againſt Bomilcar : For the very truth is, I do abhor his bold impudence in being jealous of the Phocean Prince. And though that Prince have all requiſite qualities to cauſe it, yet he ought not in relation to my ſelf. And therefore Bomilcar may be aſſured that unleſs my Father do poſitively command me to chooſe him, I ſhall never do it.

However (purſued ſhe and ſighing) if ſo it chance, that to my grief the King will needs have me chooſe him, I beſeech you my dear Glacidia help out my reaſon, and uſe ſuch arguments as may induce me to obey him. Since you may very well believe, Madam, replied Glacidia, that I would not ſpeak in advantage of Bomilcar, but only becauſe he is my friend, therefore I declare that I will never ſpeak in his behalf.

Oh my Glacidia (replied Cleonisbe angerly) do not forſake me now, I conjure you, in a buſineſs which is of the greateſt concernment of all my life; for let me tell you once more, my reaſon ſtands in great need of your aſſiſtance. Madam, replied Glacidia, I would gladly know why you ſpeak ſo? For truly (purſued ſhe purpoſely to diſcover her real mind) if you have ſuch a ſtrong averſion to Bomilcar, why do you not deſire the King to give you the choice of Galathes, or Britomartes? Oh Glacidia (replied ſhe haſtily) I do not value them at ſo high a rate, as my diſobedience to the King: It ſhould never be they, but doubtleſs it ſhould be the —— At theſe words Cleonisbe bluſht, and was ſilent, not being able to get out with her thought; but having ſpoken enough to make Glacidia underſtand her, ſhe was extreamly aſhamed, though ſhe uſually imparted her moſt ſecret thoughts unto her: but at laſt, being reſolved to open her very heart, ſhe confeſſed that if ſhe might follow her own inclination, ſhe would prefer the Prince of Phoceus before either Bomilcar, Britomartes, or Galathes, and confeſſed that ſhe had as great a diſpoſition to love him, as to hate Bomilcar. Judg now, my dear Glacidia (ſaid ſhe unto her) whether I had not good reaſon to ſay I ſtood in need of your Reaſon to ſupport my own: And therefore I conjure you to do two things continually, until the ſad day of this fatal Ceremony be paſt: The one, to leſſen my averſion unto Bomilcar; the other to leſſen my affection unto the Prince of Phoceus. Though it was never yet in my power to diſobey the leaſt of your commands, Madam, replied Glacidia, yet I beſeech you to excuſe me in this: For truly, Madam, I have ſo fully determined to keep my ſelf a Neuter between theſe two whom I equally honour, as I am fully reſolved neither to hurt nor help either of them in a buſineſs wherein I cannot oblige the one, but I muſt diſoblige the other: and therefore I beſeech you take it not ill if I diſobey you; for which choice ſoever you make between the Prince of Phoceus and Bomilcar, you cannot chooſe amiſs. Had I diſcovered a diſpoſition to prefer Britomartes or Galathes before either of them, I ſhould have oppoſed it with all my power; but ſince I do not, I have no more to ſay: if you overcome your averſion to Bomilcar, you will be juſt unto his merit and his love: And if you follow your inclination to the Prince of Phoceus, you are but juſt unto his vertue and his paſſion.

Thus, Madam, which ſoever you do, you will do well: and which ſoever you do, I ſhall have cauſe both of joy and ſorrow; and ſince by making one happy, you make the other miſerable: I ſhall rejoyce with him you chooſe, and grieve with him you reject: and therefore I beſeech you do me ſo much honour as not to move me any further to contribute any thing unto the miſery of him whom you ſhall doom unto ſuch a cruel puniſhment. But Glacidia, replied Cleonisbe, by thinking not to contribute unto it you do extreamly; for if you do not put me in mind, that if I diſobey the King, and favour an exiled Prince, then I ſhall diſhonour my ſelf, and perhaps bring a War upon the Kingdom: Bomilcar will never be choſen: Let it even be as you pleaſe, Madam, without any intermedling, replied Glacidia; for truly, Madam, I neither can, nor ought to meddle; and if I durſt ſay it, you would not have me obey you. I do almoſt confeſs it, Glacidia, replied Cleonisbe and ſighed; for if you ſhould deſire me to leſſen my averſion unto Bomilcar, I fear you would encreaſe it. But truly, I muſt confeſs, I know not well what I would have, though I am moſt certain I would have nothing done againſt my own glory: But however my dear Glacidia (added ſhe) ſince I have truſted you with my averſion unto Bomilcar, and my inclination unto the Prince of Phoceus, be ſure you let neither of them have the leaſt glimpſes of my thoughts; for if you ſhould, there is ſo much injuſtice in my hatred of Bomilcar, and ſo much weakneſs in my affection to the Phocean Prince, as I ſhould be eternally aſhamed.

You may well conceive, Madam, that Glacidia was ready to make this promiſe unto Cleonisbe; and you may alſo believe ſhe would perform it.

In the mean time, Carimantes being of a fiery nature, and having a flaming paſſion in his heart, he reſolved upon a courſe which much tormented Menedorus, and grieved Oneſicrite: For perceiving that this Princeſs entertained ſo favourable thoughts of Menedorus, he acquainted

Sſurius with it, and deſired him to oblige his Son unto a quitting of Oneſicrite: hinting unto him, that ſince he had given him a being in his Country, it was the leaſt of favours he could do for him; adding withall, that he would be ſo great a friend unto him, as he ſhould have good cauſe to be well ſatisfied with his acknowledgments. Sſurius being always of an humour to prefer the publick good before any particular, though he approved of his Sons affection unto Oneſicrite; yet he promiſed his Son ſhould pretend no further unto that Princeſs. Aſſuring Carimantes, that though Menedorus would, yet he ſhould not be able to diſobey: And in purſuance of this promiſe, Carimantes was no ſooner gone, but he ſent for his Son. At firſt he went about to perſwade him by arguments drawn from reaſon: That having a Rival unto whom he was ſo much obliged; and a Rival who would e're long be in power to ruin him, if provoked, it were wiſdom to ſubmit, ſince it were neither prudent nor juſt to expoſe ſo many innocent perſons unto the fury of a Prince for the ſatisfaction of his love: adding further, that ſince it concerned the intereſt of their Town in general, he ought to ſacrifice all his private pleaſures for its ſafety, and the rather, becauſe he was not in any power to diſobey. As ſtrong as all theſe reaſons were, yet they could not prevail with Menedorus: So as then joyning this authority unto his reaſons, and perſwaſions, he abſolutely commanded him to think no more upon Oneſicrite, telling him that though he would, yet he could not diſobey him. You may well imagine, Madam, that Menedorus was extreamly ſtartled, yet his love would not give leave to ſubmit; but ſeemed ſo reſolute, that Sſurius grew angry, and gave him harſh language, inſomuch as perhaps he had been forced to yield, had he not been tampered withall by Galathes. For, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that this Prince, according to his cloſe way, had plotted with ſeveral Greeks, and held private intelligence with a friend to Menedorus: So that fearing extreamly leaſt Carimantes ſhould be well treated by Oneſicrite, and conſequently induced to favour the Prince of Phocea, he ſent unto Menedorus, and bid him ſtand firm to his principles; aſſuring him that the King would never allow of Carimantes his paſſion, and conſequently he needed not to fear, ſince he ſhould have him for his Patron. Thus, Madam, Menedorus in ſpight of all his Fathers reaſons and menaces, did not change his mind.

In the mean time, Sfurius aſſured Carimantes that he would keep Menedorus from being any obſtacle unto his deſign, deſiring him only to have a little patience, and give him ſome days to work ſo great a cure: And indeed Sfurius applied a moſt ſad remedy unto Menedorus, for he went unto the Prince of Phocæus, and told him what Carimantes ſaid unto him, conjuring him to uſe his utmoſt authority to diſſwade Oneſicrite from Menedorus. For truly, Sir, ſaid he unto him, as glorious as your alliance would be, I would never adviſe you unto it, ſince I ſhould then expoſe you, and all the Grecians here, unto the violence of an amorous Prince. Therefore, Sir, ſince the Gods would have him to be our Patron, by the means of his affection unto the Princeſs your Siſter, I conjure you to be as zealous in hindering the Princeſs your Siſter, as I ſhall be in oppoſing Menedorus my Son.

The Prince of Phocæus hearing this, was much joyed to ſee it was in his power, and that he might have the honour of favouring the deſigns of Carimantes, and to croſs thoſe of Menedorus: Conceiving that ſince this Prince did think Oneſicrite was worthy of him, Clemisbe might alſo think him not unworthy of her: Therefore he gave Sfurius a very civil anſwer, proteſting that though he had a greater mind unto his alliance rather than unto Carimantes; yet ſince he was ſo generous as to prefer the publick good before the ſatisfaction of his Son, he were not worthy of his friendſhip, if he were leſs generous than he; and if he did not deprive himſelf of a happineſs which he deſired, rather than hazard the ruin of their new Common-wealth. So that after this, they conſulted together upon the beſt expedients, and reſolved to work firſt by all ſweetneſs upon Oneſicrite. In order to that Ariſtonice muſt be employed, who was much in her books, and it was reſolved they ſhould move Oneſicrite unto a little journey out of Marſeilles, without letting her know for what ſhe went: And accordingly the Prince of Phoceus did carry the matter ſo handſomly, as ſhe conſented unto his wiſhes: But to the end the buſineſs might take better effect, the Prince of Phoceus doing me the honour to truſt me with all the ſecrets of his life, and to acquaint me with the ſtate of things, he ſent me the night before to prepare Ariſtonice: So as when Oneſicrite came to her, Ariſtonice carried it ſo handſomly, as that Princeſs never imagined the Prince of Phoceus to have any hand in the Counſel which ſhe gave her. At the firſt meeting, nothing paſſed but Complements of Welcome, and expreſſions of mutual amity. Afterwards Ariſtonice, whoſe diſcourſe did always aim at the bettering of others, began to tell very obligingly, that ſince ſhe had received from Heaven ſo great a Talent of Beauty, and ſo many admirable parts, ſhe was extreamly afraid, conſidering her age, leſt ſhe any ways abuſe thoſe excellent graces which the Gods had given her: And truly Daughter (ſaid ſhe, for ſo ſhe called her) it is not enough to appear all vertue, and abſtain from the commiſſion of horrid crimes, which perſons well born ſeldom are guilty of; but one muſt do all the good one can, and above all things not to prophane thoſe gifts which they receive from Heaven, And therefore Daughter, ſince you have received ſuch extraordiry beauty from the Gods, it is your duty to be extream careful not to abuſe ſo great a favour: For truly the beauty of Helen was fatal unto all Aſia, and all ſucceeding ages will impute the burning of Troy unto the lovely fire of her eyes: Therefore be ſure you remember always, that the Gods did not beſtow ſo much Beauty upon you, but with intentions you ſhould employ it well, not in doing harm, when therefore your Beauty gives you a power over any one, remember to conſider whether any unfortunate perſons had any need of his credit, over whom you have got that power, to the end that drawing a good from the weakneſs of another, you may merit a reward from Heaven: For example, I hear that the Prince Carimantes does highly eſteem you; you muſt be ſure to make uſe of him as a Patron to all thoſe Grecians whom he hath already ſo generouſly protected.

Oneſicrite hearing Ariſtonice ſay ſo, began to bluſh, and bluſhed ſo much, with ſuch diſorder in her eyes, that ſhe diſcovered her heart in an inſtant. Oneſicrite being of a very ſweet diſpoſition, and a little timerous, though ſhe had ſpirit enough, the diſcourſe of Ariſtonice came ſo home to her heart, that ſhe reſolved to put her whole confidence in her, and asked her how ſhe ſhould carry her ſelf to be rid of Carimantes his love without incenſing him, or moving him to attempt any thing againſt Menedorus: So after ſhe had apologized for her weakneſs, ſhe related the affection which Menedorus bore unto her, ſhe confeſſed the inclination ſhe had unto him; afterwards told her how Carimantes ſeemed to profeſs a Love unto her, and what Sſurius had ſaid to his Son: Adding withall, whatſoever ſhe thought might move Ariſtonice to give her counſel not to diſingage her ſelf from the affection of Menedorus, and to ſhake off Carimantes. But ſhe was much ſurprized, when Ariſtonice after a plauſible hearing, returned her anſwer: I render thanks unto the Gods, who brought you hither (ſaid ſhe unto her) for ſince it appears they love you very dearly, I would not for a world you ſhould abuſe their favours: I will not blame you for your compliance with the affection of Menedorus; for ſince it appears to proceed from vertue, I will not condemn it, though in reaſon it had been much better you had received his heart without giving your own. But ſince both your Parents and his did approve of your affections unto each other, I have no more to ſay againſt it: But Daughter, things now have changed faces; for ſince Sſurius would not have you marry Menedorus, and ſince the Prince Carimantes would marry you, it is moſt expedient you caſt off the firſt, and entertain the ſecond: Why Mother, cried Oneſicrite, do you think the Gods would ever pardon me, if I ſhould change my thoughts of Menedorus? Do you think Daughter, replied Ariſtonice, that the Gods would ever pardon you if you ſhould be a cauſe of Ruin unto this vaſt multitude of People which they by their providence have brought hither? Could you ever anſwer it, if Carimantes mantes ſhould ſet our Town on fire, which he permitted us to build.

No, no, Oneſicrite, deceive not your ſelf; and though I cannot ſpeak any pleaſing truths unto you at this time, yet I had rather diſpleaſe than betray you. Know Daughter, that the Prime Duty hath an influence over all the reſt: and ſince there is none more powerful than that which ties us unto our Country, no other can ever diſpence with you from it. The truth is, we are born for it before any thing elſe whatſoever: You were a Grecian before Menedorus was your Lover; and conſequently you can make him no promiſe in prejudice of your Country; and though you ſhould, it is not to be kept. Let me tell you, the deſtiny of Marſeilles is wholly in your hand; you may preſerve it, or you may ruin it. If you adhere unto the affection of Menedorus, you deſtroy it; if you entertain the offers of Carimantes, you ſave it: Thus ſince the ſafety of ſo many innocent perſons depends wholly upon you, you were in a moſt high degree ſinful, if you do not ſurmount your ſelf: And Menedorus is moſt unworthy of you, if he be not ſo generous as to prefer the publick good before his private ſatisfaction: You have power, my dear Daughter, to do what you pleaſe; yet you are in a Country wherein you have no right but what the Prince whom you ſhall treat ill doth give you; for you know that without him the King had never received us: Moreover no Ship can ſail out of our Port without the permittance of the Phocean Prince, or Spurius: Do you think they will ever permit your departure, and incenſe a Prince who e're long ſhall be King, and make you a Queen? And though they ſhould wink at your departure, or that you ſhould ſteal away, into what place of the world could you go? Phocæa is full of Perſians, and we have no other Land or Country but Marſeilles, which you would ruin: Should a perſon of your age, vertue and quality wander from Coaſt to Coaſt, and from Sea to Sea, without any other reaſon but becauſe ſhe is in Love? Do you no better remember the terror of incenſed Seas, out of which the Goddeſs whom I adore did bring us to a Port? Will you again expoſe your ſelf into thoſe dangers, and be upbraided with ſo much weakneſs was not to ſtrive againſt a Paſſion, which to ſpeak truly, hath no other force in it but what ones ſelf doth give unto it? But that the intereſts of the party loved may oblige you: Conſider Daughter, ſeriouſly conſider, unto what danger you expoſe Menedorus, if you ſhould ſuffer him to continue a Rival unto Carimantes. Firſt, he will paſs in the opinion of the world for an imprudent man, next with the Prince for an ungrateful perſon: But though the quality of a faithful Lover be very conſiderable, yet that ought not to let you expoſe his life, as doubtleſs you would if you do not break off with him, nor oblige him to leave behaving himſelf as your Lover. For Carimantes is young, and of a haſty temper: Moreover he is the Son of a King, one unto whom you are much obliged, and ſo is not Menedorus: Take heed therefore Oneſicrite, take heed for your Lovers ſake, though you will not for the Grecians: I'ts better it coſt you ſome tears, than him his life, or you your reputation: and therefore Daughter, ſince the intereſt of your Country, your own glory, the life of him you love, and all is at ſtake, ſtrive with your ſelf, and generouſly reſolve abſolutely to unlooſe your ſelf from the affection of Menedorus: But Daughter, never think to untie the knots which fetter you by degrees, for they are of ſuch a nature, as they muſt be broken upon a ſudden, and with violence; for otherwiſe in thinking to unty them gently, they will the more intangle, and be made indiſſolvable. Fix therefore Daughter upon a reſolution worthy of your ſelf. I conjure you to it for your Country ſake, for your glories ſake, and for Menedorus his ſake; and to uſe a more prevalent argument, for the ſake of that Goddeſs whom I ſerve, who ſince ſhe was never in love, would doubtleſs moſt ſeverely puniſh you if you ſhould ruin all this multitude of people whom ſhe hath ſaved, only becauſe you love Menedorus.

All the while that Ariſtonice ſpoke, Oneſicrite looked down and ſighed continually, ſo as ſhe made it apparent that her heart was extreamly perplexed: But at laſt, being forced to anſwer, her tears was a prologue to her words: and do what ſhe could it was impoſſible to retain them. But the wonder was, that this ſymptom of imbecility which ſhe was not able to keep from the ſight of Ariſtonice, was the reaſon of her force to ſurmount it; for ſhe was ſo extreamly aſhamed, that deſiring to repair her weakneſs by an act of Courage, after ſhe had dried up her tears, and ſtood a while ſilent, ſhe promiſed Ariſtonice ſhe would uſe her beſt endeavours to follow her counſel: Yet I do not promiſe (added ſhe) to overcome my ſelf; but I promiſe to ſtrive, which is more than ever I thought I could do. But Mother, I beſeech you (added ſhe) is there no medium between theſe two extreams? Can I not reject the affection of Menedorus, without entertaining that of Carimantes? Receive me, I beſeech you into the number of your Companions: And by that means let me not give the unfortunate Menedorus any cauſe to ſuſpect me of ambition, or inconſtancy.

Oh Daughter (ſaid Ariſtonice and ſmiled) Virgins conſecrated unto Diana never ought to fear making their Lovers jealous, and her Nimphs entertain no hunters for their Gallants. But to be more ſerious, if you have a mind to deſtroy that Temple which I am building, you need only to ſhut your ſelf in it: And therefore for a further gueſs for a remedy unto that diſeaſe which hath no other than what I propound, ſacrifice your paſſion for your Country: Your own Country affords a thouſand examples of brave men, who have ſacrificed their lives for theirs, yet I impoſe no ſuch rigid task upon you; but on the contrary, I adviſe you to live, and live happily. Oh Mother replied ſhe, I do not think that to be poſſible: However, though you adviſe me to break thoſe cords with violence which tye me unto Menedorus, yet I beſeech you let me unlooſe them more gently, and give me ſome days to do it.

Ariſtonice ſeeing ſhe had obtained more than ſhe hoped for, conſenting unto her demand, and gave her many wiſe inſtructions to confirm her in her reſolution.

But Madam, Oneſicrite returning to the Court, Menedorus much wondred to ſee her ſo melancholy; and more, when upon the firſt occaſion of talking with her in private, ſhe conjured him to obey his Fathers commands. Then did he expreſs himſelf in all the terms that the moſt violent paſſion could deviſe, he aſſured her that the King would never conſent ſhe ſhould marry Carimantes, and therefore it would be in vain for her to be perfidious: Afterwards he fell into all his Prayers and Complaints to move her unto a conſtancy of mind: So as Oneſicrite finding her heart to melt, and her reſolutions to ſtagger, ſhe parted from him without any power, either to break off or to renew affection; and for ſome certain days things reſted thus.

In the mean time, ſince the ceremony of Cleoniſbe's choice drew very near, the Court began to ſwell into a tumultuous multitude: And theſe four Pretenders were ſo ſolicitous in their deſigns and hopes of being choſen, that nothing elſe was talked of, and theſe Pretenders were perpetually either with the King, or Carimantes, or Cleoniſbe, or with Glacidia. As for Britomartes, he was the leaſt buſie; for being of a lofty mind, and of that Country, he believed that certainly he ſhould be preferred before the reſt. As for Galathes, he neither truſted unto his merits, nor quality, nor any thing elſe, but ſolicited the King, and plotted the ruin of his Rivals. To that end he alledged, that Bomilcar being originally a Carthaginian, he would not be acceptable to the People: That Britomartes being already very powerful in his own Country, he would be too potent by that Alliance: And as for the Prince of Phoceus, it was not probable he would permit the Princeſs to marry a poor man who had no being but what he gave him.

On the other ſide, he Courted Carimantes with all poſſible ſubmiſſions, he addreſſed himſelf unto Cleoniſbe with complacency and reverent reſpects, and ſolicited Glacidia by a thouſand expreſſions of friendſhip.

In the mean time he held intelligence with Menedorus, and ſuborned ſome Segoregians to murmur againſt the Grecians, to the end the King, Carimantes and Cleoniſbe might caſt a leſs favourable eye upon the Prince of Phoceus. As for Bomilcar, he never had any plots againſt Galathes or Britomartes, but had a vigilant eye upon the Prince of Phoceus, who for his part employed his whole mind in prejudice of Bomilcar. All of them were extreamly obſequious unto Cleoniſbe and Glacidia, and for two days before this Ceremony, but for the prudence of that wiſe Lady, they had all fallen very foul upon one another. I beſeech you (ſaid the Prince of Phoceus one day unto Glacidia) if I be ſo unfortunate as to be any cauſe that the Princeſs ſhould have any advantagious thoughts of Bomilcar, let him not know until the very laſt: Defer this ſatisfaction until the very laſt fatal minute of the Ceremony, ſo as the ſudden ſurprize of ſo great a happineſs, may make him dye of joy, as well as I of ſorrow: For the truth is, Glacidia, if Bomilcar be choſen, and does not dye with joy, he does not love her as he ought.

On the other ſide, Bomilcar out of the like apprehenſion made another requeſt unto Glacidia, for he was moſt zealous with her, that if ſhe knew the Prince of Phoceus had no hopes of any choice, that ſhe declare it to him as ſoon as ever ſhe could, imagining it the greateſt delight in the world, to make him ſoon ſenſible of his misfortune. But Glacidia being immoveable, ſhe conſtantly denied both her Friends, as oft as they ſolicited her againſt each other, keeping her ſelf cloſe unto her reſolution, either in ſpeaking unto them, or unto Cleonisbe.

In the mean time it was the happy fortune of the Phocean Prince to be in the Pallace Garden, as the Princeſs was in the Evening walking without any other company but her own Women, and he addreſſed himſelf unto her with all imaginable devotion, and preſenting his hand unto her, he carried her into a long walk of Orange Trees, at the end of which were ſeats of Graſs: So as it being that ſeaſon of the year when their Oranges were moſt in flower, and the ground all ſtrewed with them, a fitter place to reſt in could not be imagined: In which they being ſet down, their diſcourſe began with things much different from thoſe they ended with. For Madam, they began with their choice of odoriferous Flowers; Cleonisbe examining in what rank ſhould be placed the ſmell of Violets, of Roſes, of Pinks, of Jeſſemine and of Oranges, under which they were ſhaded. But after a very pleaſant diſcourſe of ſo delicate a ſubject, the Princeſs ſaid that the only fault of Perfumes was, that cuſtom made them loſe their vertue, and by poſſeſſing them, one does not poſſeſs them: And ſo if one will enjoy any pleaſure, they deprive themſelves of it for a certain time, ſince otherwiſe others enjoy it, and not they themſelves: and truly this rule is almoſt general; for after one is accuſtomed unto fetters, they are not heavy; ſlaves are not ſenſible of their Chains; Pleaſures ceaſe to be Pleaſures by a long habit, and ſo the ſame of Sorrows This rule Madam, which you think ſo general, replied the Prince of Phoceus, hath yet its exceptions: For truly Madam, I know a miſerable man who ſuffers in ſuch a manner, that though his miſeries cannot encreaſe, yet he is ſtill more ſenſible of them; and habit as powerful as it is, doth not diminiſh his grief; but on the contrary, the more he ſuffers, the leſs he is accuſtomed to his ſufferings, and is ſo extreamly impatient, that he not only complains, but he murmurs and repines alſo. Patience (replied Cleonisbe faintly) is yet a remedy which is more provoked by murmuring, than it is eaſed by complaints. Yet truly Madam, replied he, I am perſwaded that there is much eaſe in Complaints, and Sighs from a grieved Heart do carry with them ſome of that ſorrow which lies heavy upon it: but when thoſe ſighs are ſtifled, and ſorrows ſit ſilently within, believe it, Madam, there is no ſuch deplorable condition: The truth is, it cannot continue long, for one muſt of neceſſity either complain or dye. Methinks the choice of theſe two (replied Cleonisbe and ſmiled) is very eaſie. Since you conceive it ſo Madam (replied the Prince of Phoceus) I hope you will not be offended, if now, ſeeing me put to a neceſſity either of dying or complaining, I make choice of the laſt: And I conjure you to give me leave not only to complain unto you, but of you, and of my ſelf; for truly, Madam, you have brought me into the moſt pitiful condition in the world. I did not think Sir, replied Cleonisbe and bluſhed, that I had given any cauſe of complaint unto any, much leſs unto you: But ſince it ſeems I am miſtaken, I muſt tell you in general, that I never had any intention to hurt you: but I beſeech you, expect no further ſatisfaction from me than this I have given you; for in the humour I am, I fear nothing more than too many explanations: Heavens preſerve me Madam, replied he, from being too offenſive: No, Madam, all I deſire is, you would be pleaſed to hear me, and not be angry. If you ſhould tell any thing, replied ſhe, which will cauſe it, I conceive it better both for you and me, that I did not hear you. Oh Madam (cried he) I muſt needs tell you in what a miſerable condition I ſhall be upon that day of Ceremony, when you ſhall make him happy whom you ſhall think worthy of your choice: For my part, I am ſure that I cannot in any reaſon pretend unto it: Yet I am able to proteſt that I love you more than all your Adorers. Your language does ſo much ſurprize me, replied Cleonisbe, that I know not how to anſwer it; for truly I thought you had known me better. I know you Madam, replied he, for the faireſt and moſt excellent Princeſs in the world.

But ſince it doth extreamly concern me that you know me to be the moſt miſerable man alive, I muſt let you know how much I have ſuffered, ſince the firſt minute I ever ſaw you: Alas Madam, you do not know the greatneſs of my Paſſion; and perhaps looking upon me as a miſerable Exile, you think it unworthy of your ſelf to put it ſo much as in any doubt, whether I ſhall be choſen. To teſtifie I much eſteem you, anſwered Cleonisbe, I will not ſcrupulouſly inſiſt upon the ſtrict rule which would have wholly rejected all that can be called Love; and therefore will argue with you upon a buſineſs which much concerns my happineſs, but I think not yours. And the rather, becauſe the laws do permit me the choice, and allow me to ſpeak of it without any offence unto decency, I ſhall therefore ingeniouſly tell you, that you have merit enough to pretend unto this choice: But Sir, though the Law do give me the liberty of choice, yet I do not think ſo well of my ſelf, as to truſt unto my ſelf in a buſineſs of this nature: So as I indeed chooſe in appearance, but the King in effect, ſince I only do what he pleaſeth. So as if it were true that you loved me, and that I were not diſpleaſed at it, yet all your complaints would do me no good, ſince I will not ſo much as pleaſe my own ſelf: And to teſtifie that I have much confidence in your vertue, I will confeſs unto you, that amongſt all thoſe who at this ceremony will pretend unto my choice, there are three orders of them in my mind; ſome are meerly indifferent unto me; ſome I hate; and perhaps there will be one whom I would not hate, if it were permitted me to love him.

However, being perſwaded that perhaps the King will appoint me to chooſe one of thoſe I hate, and ſince I know he will not appoint me to choose him whom I would, if I did follow my own inclination, I am reſolved to humour him with a blind obedience: ſo Sir, it is upon him my good or bad fate depends, and therefore never make any vain complaints; for ſince I will not ſeek my own ſatisfaction, it is not probable I ſhould yours.

Whilſt Cleonisbe was talking, the Prince of Phoceus looking her full in the eyes, to ſee if he could find in them which of theſe orders he was; and his mind was ſo extreamly diſcompoſed, that almoſt in one minute, he thought himſelf in the rank of indifferency, in the rank of the hatred, and in the happy rank of him that was loved. But Madam (ſaid he unto her) will you not be pleaſed to let me know in which of theſe orders I am? I cannot well tell (replied ſhe, and roſe up) whether you be in any of the three. At leaſt Madam, honour me ſo far (added he) as to aſſure me that I am not in the number of thoſe who are hated: Doubtleſs you are not, anſwered ſhe, but perhaps you will, if you put me once more to the neceſſity of hearing more of this diſcourſe. The Prince of Phoceus had a great mind to have retained her a little longer, but he could not; for ſhe calling one of her Women to mend ſomething about the dreſs upon her head, would not give any further occaſion of diſcourſing upon his paſſion: So as he being reſolved to talk of nothing elſe, and not daring to diſobey, he was ſilent, and waited upon her unto her Chamber, where preſently after ſo much company came, that he could not poſſibly talk alone with her.

In the mean while, great preparations were made for this Feaſt: and though only one of theſe Princes were to be choſen, yet they were all as rich in their habits and equipage, as if they were all ſure of this election. And all the Ladies ſet their inventions upon the rack for the neweſt dreſs and faſhion: And Amathilde amongſt the reſt was as choice of that colour which would beſt become her, as Cleonisbe was whether ſhe ſhould ſubmit unto the Kings mind, or follow her own according to the permittance of the Law. It was all in vain for her to ask the advice of Glacidia, for ſhe was unalterable. So that her own reaſon only ſtriving againſt her hatred of Bomilcar, and againſt he inclination unto the Prince of Phoceus, ſhe was not without many inquietudes. But the Eve of this great Feaſt being come, the apprehenſion of theſe four Rivals were ſo high, that one would have thought they had loſt their wits and reaſons. They were no ſooner in one place, but they were in another: They met with one another at a hundred turns: And the hatred which was between Bomilcar and the Phocean Prince did begin to flame, and was ready to flame out.

As for Cleonisbe, ſhe was ſo ſad as would have moved pity; yet endure it ſhe muſt that night, in which all the Court was with her. Yet this multitude was one way advantagious to her for a while, for none of her four Rivals could talk in private with her. But this laſted not long; for the Prince Carimantes coming in, after a quarter of an hours diſcourſe, he went out again, and carried the Prince of Phoceus with him: And the Company changing places, Bomilcar got next Cleonisbe, without either Britomartes or Gathales; for the laſt of theſe was gone unto Menedorus, to plot ſome deſign with him, and the firſt went unto the King, both of them going out with Carimantes: Then Bomilcar taking this opportunity, he uſed it ſo well, that he ingaged Cleonisbe, againſt her mind, to let him talk low unto her. I beſeech you Madam (ſaid he unto her, as afterwards ſhe told Glacidia) deny me not the favour which I ſhall ask; and do me the honour to tell me, whether I may hope you will be pleaſed to make a bad choice to morrow, as to the merit of the perſon, but a juſt one, as to the greatneſs of his paſſion, who is ſo bold as to ask whether he may hope to be choſen. I once told you, replied ſhe, that I would chooſe none but him whom it ſhould pleaſe the Gods to inſpire into my thoughts: And I tell

I tell you it again, and I aſſure you, it is more of them than me that you ought to ask what you ſeem to deſire, ſince truly I know neither your deſtiny nor my own. Is it poſſible Madam, replied he, that you ſhould not know whom you intend to make happy? If ſo, alas I may be ſure you will make me miſerable: For after ſo many ſervices which I have done you, and ſo many teſtimonies of my love which I have given you, if you intended to do me juſtice, you would not ſpeak thus unto me: However, Madam, me-thinks that if you were reſolved upon my ruin you ſhould do me ſo much favour as to tell me, to the end, that preventing your choice, by my death, I might ſave my ſelf ſo much ſorrow as to ſee my Rival happy, and keep you from being taxed with inhumanity: Me-thinks, Madam, neither Britomartes nor Galathes have ſo much right to pretend unto your affection as I have: I have adored you before they ever thought of you: And as for the Prince of Phoceus, he hath had the honour to know you ſo very lately, and is ſo much obliged unto you, that he were exceedingly unjuſt, if he ſhould offer to think you ſhould do more for him, than for me. However it be, ſaid Cleonisbe, and interrupted him, you ſhall know to morrow about this time, and ſo ſhall I, whether I be juſt or no. As Bomilcar was ready to reply, the King came in and prevented him; yet he was very glad to be ſo interrupted, becauſe he hoped that he was come to ſpeak unto Cleonisbe in his behalf: ſo that with-drawing out of his reſpect, the King began to talk with Cleonisbe in a low voice: In the interim Bomilcar addreſſed himſelf unto Glacidia, and to conjure her, that ſhe would not ſtill continue in the ſame mind ſhe was, in relation to the buſineſs betwixt the Prince of Phoceus and him. Since I never uſe to alter my opinion out of humour, replied ſhe, I cannot do as you would have me, ſince the very ſame reaſons which induce me to be neither for you nor for him, nor againſt him, nor againſt you, do continue ſtill, and are as good to day as yeſterday: And therefore do not take it ill if I alter not, ſince to change is a thing I ſeldom uſe, unleſs ſome convincing reaſon tell me that my ground is unjuſt. Though the Prince of Phoceus, replied, Bomilcar, hath done me no other hurt, but hindering you from being my Mediator unto Cleonisbe, yet I can never hate him enough for it; for had he never come hither, you had been a great promoter of my deſires; I do confeſs it, replied ſhe: But I muſt tell you alſo, that if you had not been a Rival unto the Prince of Phoceus, I would have done him all the good offices I was able unto Cleonisbe.

Oh Glacidia, replied he, you have done him too much in doing me none: I aſſure you Sir, replied ſhe, I have done him no more than I have done for you. However it be, ſaid he, I am forced to tell you, that if I be not choſen, I do not think I ſhall be able to keep within thoſe limits you preſcribe me, ſo as me-thinks you ſhould wiſh my happineſs, leſt if I be not I ſhould be forced to take ſome violent courſe. To prevent it replied Glacidia, let me adviſe you this day to prepare your ſelf to be miſerable to morrow, to the end that your ſoul not being ſurprized, may not be ſhaken. Oh Glacidia, ſaid he, I am in extream fear; you know what I muſt be: No ſaid ſhe, but I adviſe you, as I would my ſelf, if the caſe were mine, and as I would adviſe the Prince of Phoceus, if he ſhould ſpeak as you do: As ſhe ſaid ſo, the Prince of Phoceus entered, who ſeeing the King talking with Cleonisbe, and Bomilcar with Glacidia, went to his Rival, that he might receive ſo much ſatisfaction as to interrupt him, and keep him from perſwading Glacidia to any thing which might prejudice him.

As for Bomilcar, he was vexed, and in ſuch fear of incenſing Glacidia, that he thought it better to retire, and leave his Rival alone with her, than to ſtay with him. But he was no ſooner gone, then the Prince of Phoceus began to conjure Glacidia not to be unfaithful to him: And at leaſt, though you will not favour me, yet do not hinder me: And if I can obtain any more from you, let the Princeſs, if it be poſſible, rather chooſe Britomartes or Galathes, than Bomilcar, that ſo if I be not happy, he may fare no better than my ſelf.

Since your requeſt is unjuſt, replied ſhe, I muſt deny it, and on the contrary declare, that I will do all I can to perſwade the Princeſs that there are none but you and Bomilcar who are worthy of her choice, to the end that if ſhe chooſe not you, ſhe may chooſe him; and if not him, ſhe may chooſe you; thus being officious unto you both, I will prejudice both your Rivals: and certainly I ſhould do very well in it, ſince I conceive it to be advantagious unto Cleonisbe. As Glacidia pronounced theſe words, the King left Cleonisbe, and me-thought as if he had ſpoken ſomething which diſpleaſed her, for there appeared more melancholy in her eyes than before: And certainly I was not deceived; for after the King was gone, Glacidia underſtood that his viſit had diſpleaſed Cleonisbe.

In the mean while, the Prince of Phoceus who was returned unto the Princeſs in hopes to find opportunity of privacy with her, was forced to retire without ſpeaking one word unto her; for conſidering the ill aſpect of Cleonisbe, he thought beſt to follow the King. But as ſoon as all the Company was gone out of the Chamber, ſhe called Glacidia unto her, and told her how the King, with many aggravations, had ſhewed her reaſons why he preferred Bomilcar before all the reſt of the Pretenders, and had abſolutely commanded her to chooſe him.

As ſoon as Cleonisbe had imparted this unto Glacidia, one knockt at the door, and ſaid that the Prince Carimantes deſired to ſee her; and as Glacidia went out of the Cloſet, Carimantes entred, where as ſoon as he was ſeated, he began to ſpeak unto her. You have had ſo much company (ſaid he unto the Princeſs) that I thought it not fit to ſpeak unto you of a buſineſs whereupon depends your happineſs as well as mine; but now you are alone, I conjure you to tell me whom you intend to make your choice? Since the King, replied ſhe, hath not left me the liberty of my choice, but that I muſt follow his deſires againſt my own inclination, Bomilcar muſt be preferred. Oh Siſter ſaid the Prince Carimantes, ſince the King hath no lawful power abſolutely to command you: And ſince without infringement of the Law, he can only intreat you, I conjure you with all the earneſtneſs of my heart, to chooſe the Prince of Phoceus, and not Bomilcar. Cleonisbe hearing this, was ſo ſurprized that ſhe bluſht; but ſince ſhe was not ſorry to hear the Prince her Brother to ſpeak ſo, and would have been glad to have him perſwade her unto it by ſome convincing reaſons and arguments, ſhe ſeemed to reſiſt him: She told him then that truly the Prince of Phoceus was a Prince of great merits; but ſince it was not the pleaſure of the King to chooſe him, ſhe thought it her duty to ſubmit.

She had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Carimantes told her that it was fitter for her to ſubmit unto the Laws, than to make her choice by obedience: That he thought that her choice of a Grecian to be better than a Carthaginian; that the cauſe of the Prince of Phoceus his exile was glorious; that he had more Subjects, than Bomilcar had Vaſſals; and that his merits did excel him every way. And above all other conſiderations, dear Siſter, ſaid he, the Prince of Phoceus is Brother unto the Princeſs Oneſicrite, unto whom he hath promiſed to be my Mediator, and hath put me in hopes to exclude Menedorus from her heart: Oh Sir, ſaid ſhe, I am afraid that all your arguments which you think ſo full of reaſon, would not appear ſo unto you, but becauſe you are intereſted; for I beſeech you, what reaſons ſhould I give unto the King for not ſubmitting to his commands? You may tell him (replied Carimantes) that I adviſed you: That anſwer might produce a dangerous conſequence, replied ſhe; and I had rather (ſaid ſhe and bluſhed) make him believe that I love the Prince of Phoceus, than to make him ſuſpect any defects of duty in you. But truly (ſaid ſhe, and ſighed) the Kings words unto me will not give me leave to hearken unto you; for as he did aggravate the matter unto me, if I did not make choice of him, I ſhould cauſe him to break off the Peace which he made for us with the Carthaginians, and ſo renew a War: Alſo he told me, I ſhould ruin my Country, if I did not follow his advice. Oh Siſter, replied this violent Prince, I muſt tell you, there is leſs danger in a Forraign War, than in a Civil; and as the King told you, that you ſhould cauſe a War with the Carthaginians, if you did not chooſe Bomilcar, ſo I muſt tell you, that if you do not chooſe the Prince of Phoceus, you will cauſe War in your own Country; for I ſhall the very next day quit the Court, and fortifie tiſie Marſeilles, and with a body both of Greeks and Segoregians, ſhall carve out juſtice unto the Prince of Phoceus by giving you a legal,voluntary,and not a forced choice; for I am not ſo blind, but I can ſee, that you eſteem the Prince of Phoceus enough to chooſe him, if the King did not hinder you, and to hate Bomilcar ſo much, that you would never chooſe him, if you had the freedom of your own inclination: And therefore Siſter, ſatisfie your ſelf and me, ſince you may very well do it without any offence unto the Law of the Land. I know very well Sir, replied ſhe, that I may; but I know not whether I ought, and therefore I conjure you to attempt no ſuch violent courſes as I perceive you fancy: But to let you ſee,that the reaſon why I will not make you any ſuch promiſe as you deſire,is, becauſe I conceive honour will not permit me. I will ingeniouſly confeſs, that if I did follow the motions of my own heart, I ſhould prefer the virtue of the Prince of Phoceus before any: And this I do confeſs, Sir, to the end you may know, that ſince I value not my own intereſt, you ought not to think it ſtrange, if I do not ſacrifice my honour for your ſatisfaction: And the rather, becauſe I am confident that though the Prince of Phoceus be not choſen, yet he will not fail to be your mediator unto Oneſicrite, ſince he is obliged unto it, for his own ſake, and for hers as well as for yours.

But Siſter, replied Carimantes, if you had loved Bomilcar, what could you do more for him? I aſſure you Sir, replied ſhe, that my thoughts of him are very far from deſerving the name of Love. But Sir, ſince I am a Lover of glory above all things, I beſeech you let me take the advice of my Pillow, and conſider both of the Kings reaſons and yours. But firſt tell me, ſaid he,whether you have made him any poſitive promiſe to obey his deſires? I had not ſo much power, replied ſhe; but ſince my anſwer was only by a reſpective and humble ſilence, I believe he thought that I would obey him If you do obey him, replied Carimantes, you force me to become a Rebel and to do all that the paſſion of the Phocean Prince ſhall deſire me, to the end he may favour mine. Therefore Siſter, ſince by obeying the Law, you will prevent a dangerous War, you will do juſtice unto a Prince who adores you; you will contribute unto my happineſs, and keep your ſelf from being miſerable, obey it rather than the King. After this Carimantes being gone, Cleonisbe called for Glacidia, unto whom ſhe imparted all her Brother had ſaid: And that ſhe might not be ignorant of any cauſes of her inquietude, ſhe told her further, how two of great quality in the Country had told her, that if ſhe did not make choice of Britomartes (who was only of all the Pretenders, that Country man) all the Nobility of the Kingdom would take his part; adding, that Hipomenes did advertiſe him how Galathes had plotted ſome great deſign with Menedorus in caſe he were not choſen: So as, ſaid ſhe unto Glacidia, which way ſoever I look, I find my ſelf in the moſt pitiful condition in the world: For truly, if I obey the King, I ſhall chooſe Bomilcar whom I hate, I ſhall not chooſe the Prince of Phoceus whom I love, I ſhall incenſe the Prince my Brother, I ſhall diſoblige all the Nobility, diſobliging Britomartes: Alſo I do expoſe my ſelf unto the violence and ſubtlety of Galathes, who is the craftieſt man alive. But there cannot be the leaſt thought of chooſing either Britomartes or Galathes; for though my natural averſion be ſtronger againſt Bomilcar than againſt them, yet I know, that if I muſt be unjuſt unto Bomilcar, it muſt be in favour of the Phocean Prince: For by chooſing one of them, I ſhould equally incenſe the King and the Prince my Brother, yet they are both of them much to be feared; for the one may raiſe a party in the State, and the other being very powerful with the King of the Celtes, may cauſe a vexatious War.

On the other ſide, if I ſhould do as the Prince my Brother would have me, and perhaps as my ſelf would as much as he, I ſhould more incenſe Britomartes and Galathes, than if I ſhould chooſe Bomilcar. But the great Conſideration of all is, that I ſhall incenſe the King, and I doubt diſhonour my ſelf by it: And after all this Glacidia (added Cleonisbe) can you be ſo inhumane as to deny me your Counſel in ſo perplexing a conjuncture? No Madam, replied ſhe, and ſince you command me, I will take ſo much liberty as to tell you, that to rid your ſelf of half your trouble, you muſt never think either of Galathes or Britomartes: but without any fears either of the Celtes or Segoregians, never trouble you mind with any thing but your choice either of Bomilcar or the Prince of Phoceus.

Alas Glacidia, ſaid Cleoniſbe, by leaving me in doubt of that choice, you leave me in doubt of all. Truly Madam, replied ſhe, this is all I either can or ought to do: For being fully perſwaded you cannot chooſe amiſs between them two which I named, I thought I might well ſay what I did, but ought not to ſay any more, ſince I cannot prejudice either Bomilcar or the Prince of Phoceus: Therefore Madam, it is your ſelf only who muſt examine the reaſons both of the King and the Prince Carimantes, and to do what you ſhall find moſt expedient. If I ſhould hearken unto reaſon, replied ſhe, I ſhould chooſe Bomilcar; and if I ſhould humour the motions of my own heart, I ſhould chooſe the Phocean Prince. But for all this (added ſhe and ſighed) ſince I cannot think my reaſon will be ſtrong enough to overcome this powerful inclination which prompts me to chooſe the Prince of Phoceus; and ſince I do not think this inclination, as powerful as it is, came overcome my Reaſon, I could find in my heart a diſpoſition, neither to chooſe Bomilcar nor the Prince of Phoceus, nor Britomartes, nor Galathes, but to name the firſt man of Quality that I ſhall ſee in the Temple: So that incenſing all at once, both the King, the Prince Carimantes, the Prince of Phoceus, Bomilcar, Galathes, and Britomartes, they may overwhelm me with reproaches, and make me dye with ſorrow and ſhame, before I go out of the Temple. Cleoniſbe did pronounce theſe words with ſuch agony of ſpirit, that they made Glacidia extreamly ſad; yet ſhe kept her ſelf cloſe unto her reſolved limits, and did as much ever ſhe could to calm the heart of Cleoniſbe, without byaſſing her ſelf more on Bomilcars ſide, than of the Prince of Phoceus, or favouring the Prince of Phoceus more than Bomilcar. Yet was ſhe put to a Dilemma after this; for after Cleoniſbe had ſeriouſly pondered upon it, and had ſtood ſilent a while, ſhe turned ſuddenly towards Glacidia: 'Tis done, ſaid ſhe, I am reſolved upon it, and reſolved to overcome two moſt violent paſſions at once, I mean hatred and its contrary paſſion: But that I may be the better able to do it, you muſt encourage my weakneſs by your Commendations, and tell me I have done well in chooſing Bomilcar, and ſhould do ill if I ſhould chooſe the Prince of Phoceus: Under your favour Madam, replied Glacidia, I will neither commend nor blame you in this buſineſs, but ſhall tell you as heretofore I have done, that you cannot chooſe ill between the Prince of Phoceus and Bomilcar; yet ſince you cannot be juſt unto the one, without being unjuſt to the other, you cannot too well conſider upon a matter of ſuch an importance.

Since you leave me to my ſenſe, replied Cleonisbe; not to deceive my ſelf, I will take the moſt difficult part, and by conſequence the moſt glorious: I know very well, that I ought not to build too much upon the counſel of the Prince my Brother; for ſince the intereſt of his own paſſion makes him ſpeak, I ought to ſuſpect all he ſaith, and rather believe the King than him.

Moreover, ſince my heart hath been ſo weak as to engage it ſelf more than I would, 'tis fit I puniſh it for its unjuſt hatred unto Bomilcar, that I deprive it of what it loves, and ſubmit unto what it hates. Theſe Glacidia are my thoughts now, and I know not whether you will find me in the ſame mind to morrow. However, though you have denied me your Counſel, yet I pray you do not alſo deny me your Prayers unto the Gods, that thy will be pleaſed to give me ſo much force as to execute what I now reſolve upon. After this, and a hundred tender expreſſions, Glacidia left her, and went home, being exceedingly perplexed to ſee her ſelf driven unto ſuch a cruel neceſſity, as the next day to grieve with the Prince of Phoceus, for the ſame thing which obliged her to rejoyce with Bomilcar, for ſhe ſaw Cleonisbe was fully reſolved to chooſe him. Yet ſhe did not think it expedient to ſpeak of it: and indeed ſhe ſaid not a ſyllable of it either unto Bomilcar or the Prince of Phoceus, who came both unto her. But on the contrary, was ſo firm to her reſolutions, and did compoſe her countenance ſo well, that their deſign of getting the knowledge of their Deſtinies from her, were fruſtrated; for they knowing that ſhe had been late with Cleonisbe, they hoped to get ſome light out of her; but being miſtaken in their hopes, each of them departed. Bomilcar went to the King, and the Prince of Phoceus unto Carimantes.

As for Britomartes, he had abundance of Men of Quality with him, to follow him unto the Temple: Galathes was as buſie in hindering others from being choſen, as he was to be choſen himſelf.

Alſo Carimantes and Menedorus tranſacting according to their intereſts, it might very well be ſaid they were all extreamly buſie: yet Cleonisbe was moſt to be lamented, and the condition wherein ſhe was, was ſo very pitiful, that a worſe cannot be imagined: For it being only permitted her to go into her chamber until the time of going to the Temple, ſhe received a hundered ſeveral meſſages either from the King, or from Carimantes, or from the Prince of Phoceus, or from his three Rivals Yet ſhe had ſo ſad an aſpect, as it was eaſie to ſee her heart was in extream ſorrow, and the Prince of Phoceus, as well as Bomilcar, did obſerve it. For accompanying the Prince Carimantes, who went to ſee her a little before ſhe went to the Temple, unto which the King was to lead her, they came to Glacidia in their turns, and expounded her ſadneſs according to their own reſentments. Alas Glacidia (ſaid the Prince of Phoceus unto her) what a ſtrange melancholy do I diſcover in the eyes of the Princeſs? Have I not abundance of reaſon to fear, tho I love her, that I ſhall be unfortunate, if ſhe ſhould chooſe me, ſince there is ſuch a ſtrange repugnancy in her, rather then wiſh a happineſs which hath cauſed ſuch a ſad melancholy in her?

On the other ſide, Bomilcar reaſoning after the ſame manner of mode he uſed, and drawing a good preſage from this weakneſs, he told Glacidia, that knowing the Prince of Phoceus was more in Cleonisbe's favour than he was, that he could not chuſe but be very glad to ſee ſo much melancholy in the countenance of the Princeſs, becauſe it argued that the choice which ſhe was to make did not fully pleaſe her, and therefore he had reaſon to hope, that ſince the Prince of Phoceus was not likely to be choſen, he himſelf was: But Madam, a chance hapned a little after, which made it apparent that they reaſoned more according to their fears, or according to their deſires and hopes, then according unto right reaſon: For as the Prince Carimantes went out, and the Prince of Phoceus and Bomilcar following him, the laſt of theſe obſerved that Cleonisbe bluſhed as ſhe looked upon his Rival; and immediately after the Prince of Phoceus obſerved that ſhe changed colour as ſhe looked upon Bomilcar. So as one of them apprehending fear, and the other hope, one and the ſame thing cauſed two very different effects in their hearts. For Bomilcar thought ſhe bluſhed as ſhe looked upon the Prince of Phoceus, only becauſe ſhe ſhould not chooſe him: And the Prince of Phoceus thought ſhe bluſhed as ſhe looked upon Bomilcar, becauſe being to chooſe him, a ſpark of modeſty broke out that colour in her cheeks: ſo neither the one or other knowing the true reaſon of her changing colour, both of them did conclude upon falſe conjectures, for the Princeſs afterwards confeſſed unto Glacidia that when ſhe bluſhed as ſhe looked upon Bomilcar, it was only out of a reſentment of hatred mixed with anger, to ſee her ſelf forced to chooſe him. And when ſhe changed colour in ſeeing the Prince of Phoceus, it was out of ſhame, at the injuſtice ſhe was going to do unto her Love, and the violence ſhe was to offer unto her natural inclination.

In the mean time, according to the cuſtome, Carimantes followed by theſe four Rivals, and all the Men of Quality in the Court, went unto the Temple, where all the Sarronides of the Kingdom were preſent that day. I ſhall not trouble you Madam, with any deſcription of that crowd of people in the ſtreets and in the Temple, nor mention the magnificence of the four Rivals, nor of Cleonisbe's dreſs, nor of all the reſt of the Ladies, for it would but abuſe your patience. Give me leave only to tell you, that the Prince of Phoceus and Bomilcar were the two, whoſe habits were moſt admired, and of them two, the Prince of Phoceus had the advantage: As for Cleonisbe, as melancholy as ſhe was, yet ſhe appeared admirably fair, and next the Princeſs, Amathilde was the moſt glittering in her dreſs, and was the ſuperlative both in beauty and youth: And ſhe knew it ſo well, that ſhe told Glacidia in railary, remembring their diſpute, that upon condition ſhe were ſure to be ſix years older than ſhe was that day, ſhe would moſt willingly reſign her life, and never ask more in this world.

But in concluſion, Madam, the Princeſs being ready, the King came to take her, and leading her into a Chariot of Triumph wherein they two did ſit alone, they went unto the Temple, and all the Ladies followed in other Chariots. Since order is much obſerved in that Country in all theſe Feaſts, as ſoon as the King and the Princeſs Cleonisbe were ſet in the midſt of the Temple upon a Throne, all the Ladies did ſit round about on Scaffolds where they might have beſt ſight; and on the right and left hand of the Throne ſtood all the Men of Quality, amongſt which were the four Rivals: As for the Prince Carimantes, he ſate upon a Scaffold with Oneſicrite, placing himſelf ſo that Cleonisbe might ſee him, and that he might make ſigns unto her, and ſhew unto her, that his happineſs depended upon her choice, as well as her own. But, Madam, I had forgot to tell you, that at the entrance into the Temple, a knot of Jewels which tied a ſcarf of Tiffany about Cleonisbe's neck being broke, Glacidia who was next her, advanced to reach them up unto her, whilſt the King was hearkning unto what the Prince of the Sarronides did ſay, who was come to receive him at the Gate of the Temple: So as whilſt Glacidia was doing her this piece of ſervice, Cleonisbe ſpake low unto her: There is yet time enough to give me Counſel, my dear Glacidia, ſaid ſhe unto her, but within this quarter of an hour it will be too late: And if I do not repent of the reſolution which I have taken, I ſhall prefer him whom I hate, before him whom I love: You have not then changed the reſolution of yeſterday (replied Glacidia, and ſpake as low as ſhe could) No (anſwered Cleonisbe and ſighed) but I have ſo much ado to remain firm, that I dare hardly brag of conquering my ſelf, ſince at this very minute I have a combate with my ſelf, and ſtrive with more force than I am able to expreſs. As the Princeſs ſaid ſo, the knot of Diamonds being faſtned, and the King beginning to walk, Glacidia could not anſwer, but went up to the Scaffold of Oneſicrite, where ſhe might ſee Cleonisbe, the Prince of Phoceus, and Bomilcar; for the two other Rivals were on the oppoſite ſide to that where Glacidia was. She ſaw Britomartes and Galathes alſo, but it was only their faces; yet intereſting her ſelf only in Bomilcar and the Prince of Phoceus, ſhe cared not for obſerving the reſt, nor cared what they thought: But at laſt, Madam, as ſoon as the King and the Princeſs his Daughter were ſet upon the Throne in the midſt of the Temple, the Prince of the Sarronides began to read the Law, which required that this choice ſhould be made, and gave an abſolute free liberty of choice unto the perſon who was to chooſe, provided that there was no diſproportion in the quality of that party which was choſen. After which, Muſick, half Grecian, half Gaule, did make the roof of the Temple to Eccho, whilſt all the Sarronides were praying unto the Gods to inſpire the Princeſs with ſuch a choice as might be happy for her ſelf and the State. But Madam, whilſt the Prayers were making, what different Devotions were in the heart of Cleonisbe, of the four Pretenders, of Carimantes, of Menedorus, and of Glacidia? But amongſt the reſt, what may one imagine to be the apprehenſions of the Phocean Prince, and of Bomilcar? For my part, who can only gueſs by ſeeing them, I profeſs I pitied them; for ſometimes they would look upon the Princeſs as if they begged her favour ſometimes they again would look upon her with ſome ſparks of fury in their Eyes, and ſometimes they would caſt a moſt extream melancholy look upon Glacidia.

In the mean while, Cleonisbe ſuffered as much as they; for being at the very point of pronouncing ſentence, and condemning her ſelf, to paſs all her life with a man whom ſhe could not chooſe but hate, and to part for ever from a Prince whom ſhe could not chooſe but love, ſhe was ſenſible of more than ever ſhe could expreſs unto Glacidia, and though ſhe employed the moſt apt and ſignificant words in the world for it. At firſt her reaſon would act with her heart as a Rebel which it had tamed: But this Rebel having broken thoſe chains which her reaſon had put upon it, the War which ſhe thought ended, did but begin, and begun more violently than before. So as whilſt they were praying unto the Gods to inſpire her, ſhe was in ſo great a combuſtion of ſpirit, that ſhe knew not what to ask them: She had no ſooner entertained a thought of that prayer which ſhe framed in her reſolution of chooſing Bomilcar, but ſhe perceived her ſelf unreſolved whether ſhe ſhould chooſe him or no. However, ſhe had not ſo much power as to pray that the Gods would give her ſo much boldneſs as to prefer the Prince of Phoceus: And as ſhe afterwards told Glacidia ſhe had not power to pray that they would inſpire her according to their own wills. But at laſt, her piety being ſtronger, ſhe forced her heart to ſubmit unto their conduct, and prayed zealouſly that ſhe might make ſuch a choice, as might more conduce unto her glory than unto her ſatisfaction. But the more ſhe prayed, the leſs quiet was in her ſoul, and more ravelled in her reſolutions of chooſing. Moreover, her natural averſeneſs to Bomilcar, and her affection to the Prince of Phoceus, aſſuming freſh forces to torment her, there was a new hot combate in her mind.

Furthermore, the menaces of civil and forreign War which the King and Carimantes had by their talk made known unto her, filled her imagination with ſuch ſad conſequences, that they raiſed a moſt terrible combuſtion in her heart.

Again, her fears to incenſe the King, or to force Carimantes unto ſome violent courſe, did extreamly perplex her, but the ſight of the Phocean Prince went neareſt her heart: And truly, Madam, there appeared ſuch lively ſorrow in the face of the Prince, that it being eaſie for Cleoniſbe to conclude there was as much love in her heart, as melancholy in his eyes; ſhe was fuller of irreſolution and deſpair than ever. So as when the Prince of the Sarronides had made a learned diſcourſe upon the importance of that choice which Cleoniſbe was to make, ſhe knew not in the earth what ſhe would, or what ſhe would not have.

In the mean time, according to the cuſtom, the King gave a Ring of ineſtimable value unto the Princeſs his Daughter, who after ſhe had taken it, deſcended from the Throne, and was to put it into the hands of the

Sarronides;

Sarronides; who after he had received it from her, began to ſpeak with ſuch authority, as if ſhe had not been Daughter unto that King unto whom he was a Subject. After I have received this Ring which is here in my hand (ſaid he unto her) it is your part, Madam, to name unto me the Man whom you think worthy of your choice, to the end I may give it unto him: But firſt, remember that this choice ought to be free, it ought to be reaſonable, and it ought to be worthy of your ſelf. In order unto theſe, conſult only with your own reaſon, and let neither fear or any humane reſpect whatſoever move you to infringe the Law, which requires that you ſhould be equitable in your choice. Be pleaſed Madam, then to tell me whom you think worthy of your choice: At theſe words, according to the cuſtome, the Princeſs would have named him whom ſhe would chooſe, and would have ſaid Bomilcar. But her tongue having no power to pronounce ſo much as the firſt ſyllable of that name, though ſhe did ſtrive to do it; in lieu of anſwering, ſhe ſtood ſilent, and preſently growing pale, then bluſhing immediately after, her ſoul was in ſuch amaze, as ſhe knew not what ſhe ſaw, or where ſhe was: Inſomuch as not being able to be Miſtreſs of her ſelf, nor calm ſo great ſtorm in ſo ſhort a time, ſhe laid her hands upon her eyes, ſhe ſeemed to be ſo ſick and weak, that ſhe was not able to finiſh the Ceremony: Inſomuch as the Prince of the Sarronides being a man of an admirable ſpirit, and knowing that certainly this accident proceeded from the irreſolution of her ſoul, he went unto her, and ſaid that it were expedient to adjourn the Ceremony until another time: And then Cleonisbe accepting of that motion, did gladly conſent it ſhould be ſo. You may eaſily imagine, Madam, what a rumour this made in the Temple, and what amazement it cauſed in the minds of the four Rivals.

When the Prince Carimantes ſaw how the caſe ſtood, he came from his Scaffold, and going ſtrait unto Cleonisbe, he began to talk with her in a low voice: Oh Siſter, ſaid he unto her, I beſeech you defer not your happineſs and mine, one word is quickly pronounced, perhaps too quickly for you this day (replied ſhe, and ſighed) ed) and therefore i'ts better to defer it until another time.

In the mean while, theſe four Rivals knew not what to think, yet Bomilcar concluded that he had reaſon to grieve that he was not choſen. And the Prince of Phoceus had ſo much comfort to think, that ſince Cleonisbe had not pronounced Bomilcar, it was almoſt a certain ſign ſhe did not love him, for he knew the King would have her chooſe him. As for Britomartes and Galathes, ſince their hopes were more in their factions than any thing elſe, they were not ſo angry as Bomilcar, that Cleonisbe's choice was deferred. But whilſt they were every one reaſoning with themſelves, the Princeſs did carry her ſelf as one who was ſick, and was carried back unto the Palace, where ſhe was ſo extreamly aſhamed, that ſhe could not vanquiſh her ſelf as from a feigned ſickneſs, ſhe fell ſick in earneſt. To tell you, Madam, all the expreſſions of this Princeſs when ſhe was alone with Glacidia, is a task not eaſie: Well cruel Woman, ſaid this ſick Princeſs, did I not tell you I ſtood in need of your reaſon to ſtrengthen mine? Now you ſee what a ſhame I have brought upon my ſelf; I would have named Bomilcar, but my heart turned Rebel, and would not ſuffer me to pronounce him: and I was in ſuch a condition, that if I had not ſtopped my mouth, I had named his Rival in lieu of him. But Glacidia, make me ſo aſhamed of my weakneſs, that I may repent; for I muſt confeſs it to be ſo very great, that maugre all my ſhame, I am in ſome ſort glad that I am yet free, and that I did not name Bomilcar; for if I had overcome my ſelf, my victory had already coſt me more tears, than my defeat hath ſighs. However, I beſeech you, chide me for being ſo little Miſtreſs of my own heart: If I ſhould take ſo much liberty as to chide you for any thing, Madam, replied ſhe, it ſhould be for commanding me to condemn any of your actions; for truly, Madam, I think it to be juſt that you ſhould chooſe the Prince of Phoceus; I think it juſt you ſhould chooſe Bomilcar, and I thing it juſt you ſhould hardly reſolve which to chooſe. Thus finding reaſon in all you do, I cannot condemn you Madam: All I am able to do, is to pity her who cannot chooſe, as well as thoſe who cannot be choſen. However, the Princeſs was not in a condition to renew the Ceremony, for a Feaver for above twelve days did ſeize upon her, during which time ſhe would not ſee either the Prince of Phoceus, or Bomilcar, or Britomartes, or Galathes: Yet ſince ſhe could not chooſe but admit of Carimantes to ſee her, the Prince of Phoceus had a powerful Mediator unto her. Yet Bomilcar did more prejudice himſelf, than Carimantes could ſerve the Prince of Phoceus: For thinking he had ſome injuſtice done him if he were not choſen, he did not only complain againſt the Princeſs, but againſt the King alſo, imagining that he had not ſolicited Cleonisbe enough in his behalf.

Now, Galathes fearing Bomilcar more than he did the Prince of Phoceus, he carried it ſo, that the Princeſs knew how Bomilcar complained againſt her, and let the King alſo know what he ſaid againſt him. As for Britomartes, he went another way to work; for he ſpake aloud, that if Juſtice were not done him, he would unite all his friends, and the friends of all his Rivals, who were no happier than himſelf, to moleſt the happineſs of him that ſhould be choſen: So as there was none but the Prince of Phoceus, which did not openly complain, though his ſoul was as ſad as any of the reſt: But when he was alone with Glacidia, what did he not ſay to ſcrue the thoughts of Cleonisbe out of her, which ſhe had upon that day of ſolemnity; which at the beginning had all appearances of a jollity, but at the end was all melancholy. It ſeems alſo, it was a day deſigned by fate to be univerſally ſad, for three extraordinary accidents did fall out upon it: And amongſt the reſt, nothing was more talked of, than that the fair and young Amathilde ſhould that day fall ſick, and of a ſickneſs ſo ſtrange and terrible, that all Phyſitians ſaid, that though ſhe her ſelf eſcaped, yet her beauty could not: Yet they did not at firſt tell her as much, but on the contrary, knowing her humour, they aſſured her that ſhe would recover her beauty with her health.

In the mean time, the violence of Bomilcar having diſpleaſed the King, the Prince Carimantes cloſed with that opportunity, and went unto him one morning without acquainting Cleonisbe: And the King lending him a willing ear; with much boldneſs and eloquence, he hinted unto him that he ſhould not ſuffer Cleoniſbe to marry a man who was ſo inſolent as to pretend unto that honour as a due unto him, inſomuch as the King did agree Bomilcar was too blame: After this, driving the nail to the head, he intimated many inconveniences which were to be feared, if he ſuffered her to marry either Britomartes or Galathes, and that much leſs danger would enſue, if he preferred the Prince of Phoceus before any of the reſt: At firſt Carimantes found ſome repugnancy in the Kings mind, not but that he had a high eſteem of the Phocean Prince, and loved him extreamly: But being an Exile from his Country, this ſtuck much in his mind. Yet Carimantes would not be repulſed ſo; but he preſſed the matter ſo home, that he obliged the King to think well of him: So as going to carry this welcome news unto the Prince of Phoceus, he made him extreamly joyed, and obtained from him a confirmation of his promiſe, to oblige Oneſicrite to receive the honour he did her very favourably.

The truth is, Madam, the Prince Carimantes being joyned, nothing could oppoſe them, and their power was ſtronger than Bomilcars, Britomartes, and Galathes all together. I ſhall not inſiſt, Madam, upon a relation of this important Negotiation; but only tell you that whilſt this feaver which the Princeſs had, was the pretence of ſeeing no body; Carimantes carried the Prince of Phoceus unto her, and made her confeſs unto him that ſhe was glad the King would permit her to do juſtice unto his merit. It is an eaſie matter, Madam, to relate his raptures of joy: And yet it was greater, when he underſtood that Carimantes had negotiated ſo well with the King, that he gave his conſent they ſhould be happy, and likewiſe did permit the Prince his Son to marry Oneſicrite. However theſe things were carried ſo cloſely, that they made no noiſe in the Court: For ſince the meetings of the King, and the Prince of Phoceus, of Cleoniſbe and Carimantes, were always with much caution, nothing was divulged. Moreover, Ariſtonice writing almoſt every day unto Oneſicrite, to exhort her unto the publick good before her own private ſatisfaction, ſhe reſolved to ſacrifice her paſſion unto the good of her Country; try, and did ſo affirmatively promiſe it unto this illuſtrious Virgin of Diana, as there was no cauſe of any doubt but that ſhe would overcome her ſelf. So that when the Prince of Phoceus was advertiſed by Ariſtonice how the caſe ſtood,and wiſhed his Siſter to break off with Menedorus,ſince Sfurius would not let her marry him;and when afterwards he deſired her to receive the affection of the Prince Carimantes,ſhe told him that ſhe would obey him: 'Tis true, ſhe told him ſo with a ſigh, yet it was after ſuch a manner, as one might ſee ſhe intended to keep her promiſe: And indeed, from that day forward, ſhe deſired Menedorus to withdraw his affection from her, giving all her reaſons which might induce him to hearken unto her deſires.

But though ſhe gave him as ſweet language as is imaginable, yet he was ſo full of ſorrow and anger that he could not diſſemble his reſentments, but accuſed her of inconſtancy and ambition. Alſo he did menace both the Prince Carimantes, and the Prince of Phoceus ſo highly,that Onesicrite, as ſweet a temper as hers was, ſhe began to be angry againſt him for giving ſuch irreverent language. Inſomuch as ſmothering all that tenderneſs of heart which ſhe had towards Menedorus, ſhe abſolutely charged him never to ſee her again: ſo as this incenſed Lover beginning his obedience by leaving her, he went to Galathes, and imparted all his ſorrows unto him, as Galathes did the like to him again.

In the mean time, ſince Cleoniſbe began to recover, the King and the Prince Carimantes reſolved, that to hinder any commotion in the State, Cleoniſbe ſhould temper the ſpirits of theſe three Rivals which were to be rejected, and to tell them handſomely her intentions before the day of ſolemnity, to the end they ſhould not be ſurprized, and be abſent.

The Princeſs was hardly perſwaded unto this; but the King abſolutely commanding her, ſhe reſolved to be obedient,and indeed ſhe was ſo: For the Fever having quite left her, and they permitted to ſee her, theſe three unfortunate Lovers came to preſent their Complements of joy for her recovery: So that ſhe taking this opportunity, did declare their dooms unto them one after another.

But though ſhe employed all her wit and eloquence to make them receive it patiently, yet all would not do.

As ſor Britomartes, he being high and proud, told her in a high manner (after ſhe had deſired him to pretend no longer unto her choice for ſeveral reaſons) that ſhe was unjuſt unto his quality and vertue. For as ſhe told him, to qualifie his mind that it was not but that ſhe eſteemed him very much, he interrupted her: Since it is ſo, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) it is enough to authorize all my attempts; for ſince you do not think me unworthy of you, I muſt tell you, that I do not think I ſhall do any thing againſt thoſe reſpects I owe you, when I ſhall do all I am able to poſſeſs in honour that which you confeſs I may enjoy without injuſtice: And ſo, Madam, I ſhall endeavour all ways poſſible to keep you from an ill choice. Thus, Madam, did Britomartes receive his ſentence.

As for Galathes, ſince he had the art of diſſimulation, he ſeemed to receive all that Cleonisbe ſaid with all humble reſpect, and with a thouſand ſigns of love, not one of any anger, he only told her, that he would do all he was able to obey her, but yet feared that he could not. Afterwards Bomilcar being come to Cleonisbe, whoſe mind was incenſed againſt him, by the complaints he had made againſt her and the King her Father, ſhe would not pronounce his doom with any words of ſweetneſs: But on the contrary, ſhe ſpoke ſo ſharply, that ſhe was out of all patience. Fie, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, after ſhe had abſolutely charged him not to pretend unto her choice.) Can you remember my moſt violent and conſtant paſſion, and treat me thus? 'Tis true, (purſued he) I complained both againſt you and the King: But, Madam, how could I do leſs, ſeeing the injuſtice which was done me? Might it not well be ſaid, that my paſſion was not worthy of you, if my reſentments had been leſs violent, or I had been more wiſe in my anger? For the very truth is, what have I not done to deſerve you? and in how great hopes hath the King put me, to be preferred before all my Rivals.

Moreover, Madam, can you think I am able to endure that an exile Prince ſhould take a happineſs from me which I have purchaſed by a million of ſervices? And becauſe he hath been weather-beaten, and found ſafety under the ſhelter of your favour, therefore it muſt be I who muſt ſuffer ſhipwrack? Think upon it, Madam, conſider it ſeriouſly, and do not force me to deſpair: Cleonisbe then thinking her ſelf too blame for incenſing a man who had ſome reaſon to complain, tho he was much to be blam'd for complaining ſo violently after the Ceremony, ſhe reſolv'd to accord a misfortune which might happen, and perſwade him more mildly to receive his misfortune. To teſtifie unto you (ſaid ſhe unto him) that you have no reaſon to accuſe the Prince of Phoceus for your being no better in my thoughts, I will open my very heart unto you, and confeſs my whole weakneſs and injuſtice. I will tell you then, that I am not ſo very ſtupid, but I know very well your worth: I know your original is great, and that your Anceſtors have been illuſtrious Citizens of Carthage, and alſo Kings of Numidia: Moreover, I know you to be a man of much ſpirit, and courage, and generoſity: Alſo I know how I am obliged unto you by a thouſand ſervices you have done me; but I know alſo, and I muſt tell it, that there hath ever been ſuch a kind of conceit in my heart as I am not able to expreſs, and which would never allow me to love you. Yet notwithſtanding this natural antipathy which I have in vain ſtriven againſt, I was reſolved to chooſe you, and had named you upon the day of ſolemnity, if my heart could have ſubmitted unto my reaſon, and my tongue have pronounced the word Bomilcar.

How ſad a fate ſoever it be (replied he and ſighed) to be hated: yet I think my ſelf in ſome ſort obliged to hear you ſay, that you did not chooſe me becauſe you hated me, rather than becauſe you loved the Prince of Phocens: And I wiſh unto the Gods, Madam, (ſaid he, lifting up his eyes to Heaven) that you hated me half as much more, ſo you could love him half leſs: For truly, Madam, I am ſure that if he were no happier than my ſelf, I ſhould not be ſo unhappy as I am. Yet, Madam, as hated as I am, ſince you would have choſen me, why did you not? or why will you not? I will not, replied ſhe, becauſe I conceive that I ſhould wrong you; and very ill requite the affection you have unto me if I ſhould inſeparably tye you and your fortunes unto one who can never love you; ſo that without charging either the King, or the Prince of Phoceus, or my ſelf of any injuſtice, attribute it unto a ſoveraign power, againſt which nothing can reſiſt, and which causeth that I cannot be Maſter of my own deſtiny. You have a friend, added ſhe, who can witneſs that I lie not, and who can aſſure you that I have done all I can for you againſt my ſelf: How, Madam, replied he, did Glacidia know that you have hated me? I did conceal it long from her, replied ſhe, but I muſt confeſs at laſt I told her I could not love you, and I asked her pardon, leſt ſhe ſhould hate me for it. Then, Madam, replied he, I have no more to ſay, unleſs this, that as you cannot chuſe but continue your hate, ſo I beg that I may have leave to continue loving you.

After theſe words Bomilcar roſe up, and went away ſo ſad and angry, as no mortal man could be more. As ſoon as he was gone, the Prince of Phoceus came in, and finding her alone, he began to diſcourſe of his paſſion with abundance of delight; for ſince it was approved of both by the King and Carimantes, Cleonisbe did freely permit him. So that paſſing inſenſibly from one thing to another, the Princeſs did let him know that Glacidia did know what advantageous thoughts ſhe ever had of him, and told him what diſcourſe ſhe had with her concerning Bomilcar. Then both theſe two friends of Glacidia did in one day make ſeveral and different Complaints againſt her: For Bomilcar complained extreamly that ſhe never told him how the Princeſs hated him: and the Prince of Phoceus murmured very much, that ſhe ſhould ſo long conceal the affection of Cleonisbe: But this wiſe and diſcreet perſon did ſo well ſatisfie them, that it was not fit for her to do otherwiſe than ſhe did, as they ceaſed all Complaints, and held her in high admiration: For truly ſaid ſhe unto Bomilcar, as much hated as you were, you were very near your deſired happineſs: And as much loved as you were (ſaid ſhe unto the Prince of Phoceus) you were very near to be diſcarded for ever: So as deſiring neither to hurt nor help you, I would never impart ſuch things as you could not know, without drawing ſome advantage one upon another, which I neither would, nor ought to do.

But, Madam, not to inſiſt any longer upon things of trivial conſequence, it was reſolved that the firſt day on which the Princeſs was able to ſtir abroad, the ſolemnity ſhould be accompliſhed. The worſt was, it could not be done in private, becauſe the Law required that the doors of the Temple ſhould be open that day, unto all Men of Quality in the Kingdom, either ſtrangers or others: and it was much feared leſt ſome tumult ſhould ariſe. Yet all poſſible order was taken to prevent it; for beſides the pretenders unto Cleonisbe, the deſpair of Menedorus was much feared. Yet ſince the cuſtom was, that the marriage ſhould be ſolemnized within fifteen days after the firſt Ceremony, there was hopes all might be paſſed over without any diſorder: and that if any of theſe Lovers would make any attempts, it would be in this interval. But there was a miſtake; for the imperious humour of Britomartes looking at the ſhame which would reflect upon him if he were not choſen, did endeavour to diſcover who it was whom Cleonisbe intended to chooſe, to the end he might ſend him a Challenge. But being not well informed, and becauſe in common prudence, ſhe ſhould rather chooſe Bomilcar than either of his two Rivals, he believed Bomilcar to be the man who hindered him from his happineſs: So as without more delay, he ſought for an occaſion of meeting with him, and found it. But, Madam, the ſtrangeſt paſſage was, at the very ſame time that Britomartes intended to fight with Bomilcar, Bomilcar intended to fight with the Prince of Phoceus. 'Tis true, he concealed his deſign, and Glacidia, as foreſeeing as ſhe was, did not ſuſpect it: But Britomartes and Bomilcar meeting in a place where none were but themſelves: Since doubtleſs you are not ignorant (ſaid Britomartes unto him) what juſt pretences I have unto the Princeſs, ſo I muſt tell you I am not ignorant of yours: But ſince I believe neither you nor I do know which of us ſhall be choſen, I come to make ſuch a propoſition unto you, as honour will not permit you to deny me; If ſo as you ſay, anſwered Bomilcar, you may aſſure your ſelf I ſhall moſt willingly embrace it. Then promiſe me (replied Britomartes) that if the Princeſs chooſe you, you will fight with me the next morning, and I will promiſe you that if I be choſen I will fight with you if you pleaſe. I promiſe it, replied Bomilcar; but Britomartes (ſaid he) in promiſing this I promiſe nothing, for neither you nor I ſhall be choſen: Oh that it would pleaſe the Gods you were put unto the neceſſity of ſeeing me with a ſword in my hand. Bomilcar ſpoke this with ſuch an air as perſwaded Britomartes that his heart and his tongue went together: And the proud Gaul having got a promiſe of fighting with Bomilcar, in caſe it was his fate to be happy, reſolved upon a revenge on him that ſhould be ſo, who e're it was, and went to tell the ſame unto Galathes, and the Prince of Phoceus. Thus he challenged his three Rivals all in one day.

But, Madam, the day of Solemnity being come, Cleoniſbe was not ſo unreſolved as ſhe was before; and her own inclination being authorized by the King and Carimantes, ſhe pronounced the name of the Phocean Prince aloud, when the Prince of the Sarronides asked her whom ſhe thought worthy of her choice, ſo as this ſage Sarronides cauſing him to draw nigh, and having given this Ring unto him which he received from Cleoniſbe, this Prince accepted of it with all reverence, and returned a Complement ſuitable unto his ſpirit and affection: After which, the King approved of this choice, and the Temple did ring with ſhouts of joy. But at laſt, the Muſick cauſing the tumultuous noiſe to ceaſe, they thanked the Gods for ſo good a choice.

In the mean while, Bomilcar, Galathes, and Britomartes retired without any ſhare in theſe publick joyes, each of them ruminating upon their ſeveral deſigns. As for the Prince of Phoceus, his Joys were ſo high, that he valued not the Combate which he was to have with Britomartes, and appeared as pleaſant all that day as it was poſſible for any man to be. In the mean time, Glacidia according to her reſolutions, grieved for Bomilcar, and rejoyced for the Prince of Phoceus, but it was not in any way of diſſimulation, for ſhe was really glad, and really ſad? And both her generoſity and ſincerity was ſuch, that ſhe confeſſed unto Bomilcar though ſhe was extreamly ſorry that he was miſerable, yet ſhe was extreamly glad that the Prince of Phoceus was happy. Alſo ſhe told the Prince of Phoceus, that though ſhe was well ſatisfied with his good fortune, yet ſhe could not chooſe but be much troubled to ſee Bomilcar miſerable: and ſhe did ſo well divide her heart between theſe two friends, that ſhe did not any injuſtice unto either of them.

Since honour and love are moſt conſiſtent together in one heart, the Prince of Phoceus would not ſtay until Britomartes ſhould hint him unto the performance of his promiſe; for he ſent him a Letter which intimated that he was ready to keep his word: And the next morning they fought, where the Prince of Phoceus diſarmed Britomartes, though he was one of the ſtrongeſt and moſt valiant men in the world. But as he returned from this fight, he met Bomilcar in a very ſolitary place, who knowing how ſquares went, came unto him. Since I will not conſtrain you to give me ſatisfaction (ſaid he unto him) as you have done Britomartes, until you be recovered of your wearineſs, which conquering ſo brave an Enemy hath cauſed, I will not at this time deſire you to draw your ſword: But ſince you are a gallant man, I do conceive you will be ready to morrow about this time to give me this ſatisfaction.

The Prince of Phoceus ſeeing a fit occaſion to ſhew his ſecret hatred of Bomilcar, without any offence either unto Cleonisbe or Glacidia, ſince he did aſſault him the firſt; he anſwered him in ſuch a manner as did let him ſee he did not love him. To teſtifie unto you (ſaid he unto him) that my victory hath not put me to a neceſſity of any reſting to vanquiſh you, we will without more delay end all differences betwixt us.

In ſaying ſo, the Prince of Phoceus drew his ſword, and Bomilcar his; For ſince they had with them only one Page a piece, and were in a place of privacy, it was eaſie for them to ſatisfie both their hatred and their love. And certainly, Madam, they began to fight with ſo much fury, that if the gods had not ſent Hipomenes and my ſelf in the very nick of time to part them, their Combate had been fatal unto both. For from the place where we firſt diſcovered them until we came up to them, I perceived they fought as if they had reſolutions either to vanquiſh or die: Do what we could, they were both wounded when we came unto them: 'Tis true, the Prince of Phoceus was leſs hurt than Bomilcar; for he had only a ſlight hurt in his left hand,but Bomilcar a very conſiderable one on his right ſide.

In the mean time, Hipomenes and my ſelf were extreamly ſurprized; for we hearing that Britomartes had challenged him, you may imagin we wondered to ſee him in hand with Bomilcar: Alſo you may imagin, Madam, that theſe two Combates made a great noiſe in the Court, and added much unto the glory of the Phocean Prince. The truth is, there fell out ſeveral accidents that day, which made all diſcourſe ſad: For, Madam, be pleaſed to know that Britomartes who had a proud ſoul, was ſo grieved at the loſs of his Miſtreſs, and to be vanquiſhed by his Rival, that he would needs kill himſelf with the ſame Sword which his enemy had reſtored unto him: and if his friends had not kept vigilant eyes upon him all the while he was in his raptures of fury, he had not lived two hours after his defeat.

Again, there was in Marſeilles an old man, who having paſſed all his life for one that was wiſe would needs throw himſelf down a Precipice to deliver himſelf from his ſorrows, that he could not die in the place where he was born.

Again, Amathilde being much recovered, did call for a Glaſs; and finding that ſhe was never like to be fair again, ſhe fell into ſuch horrid deſpair, that feigning ſome had taught her a medicine for her face, wherein was an ingredient of dangerous poyſon, ſhe cauſed one of her women to bring it unto her; and in lieu of putting it to the uſe ſhe ſaid ſhe would, ſhe poyſoned her ſelf. But ſhe only knowing the vertue of this ingredient, but not the quantity to kill one, ſhe took not ſo much as did execute her intentions: And ſo, the thing being diſcovered, they gave her remedy and Antidotes againſt her will.

You may well conceive, Madam, that three ſuch accidents as theſe chancing in one day, did ſeem very ſtrange: But the greateſt diſaſter of all was, and to ſhew there was ſome malignant conſtellation which did ſhew its influence by inſpiring violent thoughts; there was a man of Liguria, and of good quality, who intending to dwell amongſt the Segoregians, had ordered all his goods to come by Sea: but his misfortune was, the Ship which was to bring them, periſhed, yet we underſtood that he took his loſs very patiently and conſtantly for a whole year, but now would needs throw himſelf into the Sea.

Thus, Madam, theſe four accidents chancing from different cauſes, and hapning in one day, cauſed all the Sarronides to aſſemble, and the Councel of ſix hundred alſo: For ſince the ſpirits of the people were much diſpoſed to applaud the courages of ſuch as had recourſe unto death to deliver themſelves from any misfortune, it was feared that this would produce very ill conſequences: and if ſome order were not taken, theſe examples might be followed by other unfortunate people.

As for the Sarronides, their advice was, that to prevent the like diſaſters, the glory of the Action muſt be taken away, and to ſet ſome marks of ignominious imbecility upon it. But the Councel of ſix hundred which aſſembled by the permiſſion of the Phocean Prince, they argued after another manner, and ſaid, that ſince the action might either be baſe or generous, according to the ſeveral motives which cauſed it, ſo they muſt not be condemned all in general, and to prevent the frequency, it was not requiſite abſolutely to forbid it: So that not to deprive men of that liberty of dying, which the Gods hath left unto them, and to prevent alſo that they ſhall not ſlightly throw away their lives, it were expedient a Law were made, by which every perſon who would come unto the Aſſembly and propound the cauſes which moves them to die, they ſhou'd be received, and may boldly demand poyſon of the Judges, which ſhall be granted or denied according as they ſhall think fit: Concluding, that ſince it is not juſt a man ſhould be a Judg and party in his own cauſe, ſo he ought not to judg and diſpoſe of his own life as he would.

In concluſion, Madam, this Law was eſtabliſhed, and two Men of the Aſſembly were choſen to keep Poyſon in a Golden Cup, to give unto them whom they thought fit to receive this laſt remedy. You may imagine, Madam, that theſe accidents and this new Law did furniſh all Tongues with talk enough: but I aſſure you, the Prince of Phoceus was more like to dye with joy than poyſon: He had the ſatisfaction alſo to underſtand that Glacidia was much incenſed againſt Bomilcar for fighting: for ſhe told him, That if he were leſs miſerable than he was, ſhe would withdraw her friendſhip from him, adding, with much generoſity, that ſhe was a Petitioner unto the Prince of Phoceus, that he would give her leave to pardon Bomilcar the injury he had offered in aſſaulting him: But to make the ſatisfaction of the Phocean Prince more full, Cleonisbe would go unto Marſeilles to ſee Ariſtonice, with intentions to ſtay there ſome days; the King thinking it convenient ſhe ſhould remain there until the Nuptials, to the end Bomilcar and the Prince of Phoceus might not be together in one place. Alſo the Prince Carimantes was very glad that Oneſicrite was to be ſo near Ariſtonice, becauſe ſhe would confirm her in her new reſolution.

But that the preſence of Menedorus might not prejudice the deſign, Sfurius commanded him to ſtay with the King, ſo as this journey was all pleaſure. Yet the heart of Oneſicrite was full of ſorrow; for ſhe had much ado to entertain the Affection of Carimantes, and forget Menedorus: and I am confident there are few perſons who have done things more difficult for the good of their Countries, than Oneſicrite did for hers. However ſhe ſet as good a face upon it as ſhe could, leſt the Prince Carimantes ſhould perceive the troubles of her mind, and indeed ſhe went unto Marſeilles with ſome ſhew of joy in her countenance. You may well imagine, Madam, that the Prince of Phoceus would entertain Cleonisbe with all imaginable honours: And that Ariſtonice alſo was full of acknowledgments unto the Princeſs for the honour ſhe did her.

Since Glacidia was one amongſt the reſt in this Voyage, ſhe did much contribute unto the pleaſure of it: And for three days together. I aſſure you there was not one in all this illuſtrious company except Oneſicrite, who did not think every minute to be very well ſpent: And though we had ſeveral informations, that Bomilcar and Galathes were plotting ſome great deſign, and that the firſt was almoſt cured of his wound: Yet ſince the Prince of Phoceus was to marry Cleonisbe as ſoon as all things were in readineſs for the ſolemnity, we did not fear that any thing could hinder his happineſs.

As we were thus without any cares but how to find out freſh pleaſures for every day, it was told the Princeſs Cleonisbe, that there was a Lady which had ſent unto the Councel of ſix hundred, to ask of them the poyſon according to the new eſtabliſhed Law. This adventure being extraordinary enough to move curioſity, ſince it was never heard of before, that there ſhould be Judges to arbitrate upon the life and death of ſuch as would not live, Cleonisbe was very deſirous to be at this ſad Ceremony: 'Tis true, that it was with an intention worthy of her generoſity; for her deſign was, to ſee if ſhe who deſired death had any ſuch misfortune which ſhe could help, to the end ſhe might infuſe deſires of life into her. Oneſicrite was likewiſe of the ſame Curioſity; and as for Glacidia, ſhe moſt of all deſired to know what reaſons could move any to renounce life, ſo as ſhe was very earneſt with both theſe Princeſſes to be preſent when this Lady demanded poyſon of the ſix hundred.

So as Cleonisbe making their deſires known unto the Prince of Phoceus, he found out an expedient for it; for ſince a place was to be built purpoſely for this Councel, it was ſo contrived, that the Prince of Phoceus could look into it out of his Chamber: ſo as this being the place reſolved upon for the Princeſs, the Prince Carimantes, and thoſe of their Retinue, it was concluded that the Council of ſix hundred ſhould the next morning aſſemble to hear the reaſons of the Lady, and to put in practice this Law which themſelves had made. But we were much ſurprized to hear that there were two more who demanded audience for the like buſineſs: So as all Curioſities being redoubled, they expected the hour of this ſad Ceremony with much impatience.

I ſhall not trouble you, Madam, with any deſcription of the order which this Aſſembly held, but only tell you, that after the Judges had taken their places; after the Prince of Phoceus, as chief of the Council had taken his place; and after the Prince Carimantes, Cleonisbe, Oneſicrite, Glacidia, ſome other Ladies, and my ſelf were in the Chamber, where we could ſee and hear all paſſages. We ſaw a Page of a handſome preſence enter, and who by his handſome deportment before the Aſſembly, ſeemed to be ſomething above his condition; Our greateſt ſurprize was to ſee, that he held the picture of a Lady in his hand: But though this picture was drawn at large, ſince it was not turned directly towards us, we ſaw it but by halves, and yet we knew it to be a very fair one; For ſince the youngeſt men of this Council did ſit next the Page who held it, we perceived by their actions that they admired the beauty of this Picture. But after this handſome Page had obtained leave to ſpeak, he made it known unto the Council, that the fair perſon whoſe Picture they ſaw, having the misfortune to loſe that excellent beauty which they admired in her Picture, which was in her Perſon much above all repreſentations, ſhe had ſent by him to beſeech them they would be pleaſed to grant her the poyſon, as the only remedy which ſhe could imagine to comfort her after her loſs: And, Sirs, to teſtifie unto you, that if this remedy be fit to be granted unto any, it is unto the perſon who ſent me, I need only to tell you, Sirs, that though ſhe deſires death more than ever any deſired life, yet ſhe could not find a heart to come her ſelf and demand it; for ſhe cannot do it, unleſs ſhe ſhew her ſelf in the ſame condition wherein ſhe is, which would be a greater torment to her than you can imagine.

Sirs, ſhe hath commanded me to tell you, that ſince ſhe hath loſt all ſhe loved, and all which ſhe thinks could render her amiable, you cannot without injuſtice deny her the only remedy for ſuch misfortunes. She hath further commanded me to let you know, that it is inhumanity to let her live, becauſe ſince ſhe will neither ſee nor be ſeen, and can neither quit her ſolitude nor ſtay in it, it were incredible torment to force life upon her:

her : And if your authority do not releaſe her, ſhe will ſuffer more then ever any did ; For indeed, Sirs, whenſoever ſhe looks upon her Picture, ſhe ſwims in Tears: and if ſhe look in a Glaſs, ſhe is mad, and is not Miſtreſs of her ſelf : It is you, Sirs, who muſt judge of the life and death of this perſon, who demands the Poyſon.

But before you pronounce ſentence, and after I have obeyed her whoſe ſlave I am, I beſeech you give me leave to tell you, that I ſhould never have done this for her, unleſs ſhe had promiſed me my liberty in recompence of this ſervice, for I was her ſlave. But to the end this ſervice I have done her may not prove fatally ſad unto her, I dare be ſo bold as to tell you, that not being what I appear to be ; but having been brought up in another condition then this into which War hath brought me, I can aſſure you, that ſhe who here deſires to dye, becauſe ſhe hath loſt her beauty, hath ſo many beauties in her mind, that ſhe deſerves you ſhould deny what ſhe asks, and what I ask for her, to the end I may enjoy the greateſt of all goods which is my liberty, and to teſtifie hereafter, that ſhe may be loved and not be fair.

As this generous ſlave did ſay ſo, he turned the Picture, ſo as we plainly knew it to be the portraicture of Amathilde, and conſequently interreſting our ſelves the more in the judgment which was to be given, we expected with much impatience, the opinion of the Judges. But after the examination of the buſineſs they told this ſlave that when the gods do take away from men thoſe goods which they were ſure to loſe: This is no lawful cauſe to deſire death ; for as ſoon as they began to live, they ought to expect the loſs of them: yet to have ſome regard unto the great affection which Amathilde had unto her beauty ; they ordained, that if after the ſpace of ſix Years, ſhe came unto the Council of ſix hundred, and declared unto them, that in all that time ſhe received no conſolation for the loſs of her beauty, they would then grant what they now deny. This ſentence was thought ſo juſt, both by him that was to receive it and thoſe who heard it, that they did as much commend the Councel of ſix hundred, as they blamed the deſpair of Amathilde.

After this, Madam, we ſaw enter an old Man, who I told you deſired to die, becauſe he could not live out of his own Country: but he entered with ſo much gravity, that never Man had an aſpect of leſs deſpair than he: Alſo he ſpoke with ſo much eloquence and force againſt baniſhment, and had ſuch excellent expreſſions of love to his Country, that he even melted the hearts of his hearers: But being very old, the weakneſs of his voyce forced ſilence upon him. Yet the Judges not blinded by his eloquence, told him, that the reaſons which would move them to grant Poyſon, was, when an unfortunate Man, whoſe miſeries had laſted long, and could not meet with any cure.

But his age was ſuch, as he might well think the the remedy which he demanded was very nigh unto him: and therefore it was not fit for them to alter the Decree of the gods. Thus ſending him away after good exhortations to overcome himſelf, we ſaw appear the Ligurian Man of Quality, who as I have told you having loſt all his goods above a Year ſince, would now die: But, Madam, I never in my life ſaw a Man with a more melancholy look than he, yet he had a good preſence with him, and as melancholy as his Phyſiognomy ſeemed, yet he had a ſprightly kind of a look.

As ſoon as he came unto the place where he was to ſpeak, and after he had done reverence to the Judges, Sirs (ſaid he unto them) though I am to ſpeak unto Men of moſt deep judgments, yet I have need to mention all my reaſons which invite me unto a deſire of death: For, Sirs, ſince you muſt be poor, before you can know what poverty is, the greateſt of all evils: and ſince I both hope and know this miſery will never befal you, I muſt beſeech you to let me deſcribe my misfortune: Do not think, Sirs, that I rank in the number of my reaſons which move me to die, thoſe of a covetous or a voluptuous Man grown poor: For truly it is not abundance of riches which I regreet, nor all the pleaſures which follow them: I know how to live in a Cottage as well as a Pallace: I can eaſily perſwade my ſelf, that the fewer Domeſticks I have, the fewer Enemies I have. I can live well enough without a full ſpread Table: I can find out good diverſions which will coſt me nothing: the murmur of a River, or the chanting of Birds, pleaſe me as well as all thoſe which are ſo dear and rare: But, Sirs, that I can eaſily live without all thoſe, yet, alas, I cannot live without Friends, and yet I have loſt them all, ſince I am brought unto that low condition as makes them think they can expect no profitable turns from me. I once thought that I had more than ever any had: but now I find by woful experience that none ever had fewer than my ſelf: I am now quite another Man unto them, ſince fortune hath forſaken me: as pleaſing as I was wont to be unto them, I am now but an impertinent fellow, and trouble them: and now I perceive ſo well that they never loved me but only my fortunes, as I cannot chuſe but hate in them a thought ſo baſe as to ceaſe loving vertue, becauſe it is grown poor: and to teſtifie unto you, Sirs, that it is meerly the loſs of my Friends which makes me deſperate, or to ſay better that it is meerly their baſeneſs which drives me into a fury againſt my ſelf, you may only be pleaſed to conſider, that I have lived a year after all my loſſes: yet I was as poor the very firſt day after my loſſes as I am now: but becauſe I was ſtill in hopes to be rich in the greateſt riches of all riches, my Friends, therefore I conſtantly ſuſtained my misfortune. But now after a whole Years ſad experience, finding that unfortunate Men can never have any Friends, and that I am not able to live without them; therefore, Sirs, I conjure you to grant me leave to die: And I conjure you unto it with the more earneſtneſs, becauſe it concerns all civil ſociety, and my own glory that I live no longer. For truly, Sirs, I apprehend ſuch horrour againſt thoſe who have forſaken me, becauſe I am not rich, that I am become a hater of all Men in general, and begin to be unjuſt unto others, as others are unto me.

As ſoon as this generous unfortunate Man had done ſpeaking, Cleonisbe being much touched with his diſcourſe, ſent to deſire the Aſſembly not to pronounce ſentence, until ſhe had let them know ſomething what ſhe thought. So the Councel appointing ſix of themſelves to go and receive Cleoniſbe's pleaſure, that Princeſs told them, how ſhe held him who ſpoke to be ſo brave a Man, as to make him happy, and to oblige him unto a deſire of life. She offered to give him more goods than he had loſt, and to comfort him for the loſs of his falſhearted Friends which forſook him, ſhe offered to become his Friend, and a Friend that would be more generous than they. You may eaſily judge, Madam, how much this great act of Cleoniſbe's did move admiration in all the Aſſembly: and how the Prince of Phoceus, who was chief, extolled her. So as in lieu of giving ſentence, they made Elogies unto the vertue of this Princeſs. And yet they did pronounce one, and told this generous Ligurian, that if the Princeſs Cleoniſbe had not found a remedy unto his miſery, greater than the miſery it ſelf, they would have granted the Poyſon which he demanded, ſince they were conſtrained to confeſs, that poverty without friends, is the greateſt miſery in the World.

But ſince the amity of the Princeſs was a recompence a thouſand times above his loſſes, they ordained that he ſhould live to ſerve her, ſince he could not deſire death without ingratitude. The Man who was at firſt diſpoſed to leave life, could hardly leave his thoughts of death: But having a generous Soul, he was extreamly moved at the generoſity of Cleoniſbe: and he acknowledged, that ſince there was one ſuch perſon in the World as ſhe, it was not juſt to leave it: So as being carried where ſhe was, he gave her thanks for the honour ſhe had done him. But, Madam, (added he) to teſtifie my deſign of dying, I will accept but half of that you are pleaſed to offer: And receiving upon my humble and thankful Knee, the honour of your good will, I will refuſe that abundance of riches which you offer me, which perhaps will ſerve me to no other uſe, but to get new friends as unworthy as my firſt: ſo as, Madam, eſteeming my ſelf very rich in your friendſhip, leave me in ſuch a condition, as I may ſhew that I merit it, by making it appear, that Vertue can ſurmount Poverty, and patiently endure it, provided it be not waited upon with ſcorn, which commonly attends upon it: I ſhall not tell you, Madam, how Cleonisbe anſwered, for I ſhould wrong her in changing ſome of her words: But let me only tell you, that ſhe would have him accept of both her offers: and indeed ſhe kept her word: and by the means of the King, the Prince her brother, and the Prince of Phoceus, gave him much more than he loſt; Alſo giving it unto him with her own hands, though ſhe had much ado to make him take it.

But, Madam, to return from whence I digreſſed, and to relate all that paſſed in the Councel of Six hundred, be pleaſed to know, that after this Ligurian had done his Complement unto Cleonisbe, we ſaw appear in the Aſſembly a Man whoſe perſon we knew not, who preſenting Letters unto the chief of the Councel, and beſeeched him that they might be read aloud, for they were the reaſons of a miſerable Lover who demanded the Poyſon. Then one of the Aſſembly opening the Letters, began to read them: And if I were able to repeat what I heard, doubtleſs you would ſay, that he who wrote that Letter, deſerved that death which he demanded: For I am confident, never was ſorrow ſet out in more ſad colours, nor deſcribed with more moveing aggravations. And Cleonisbe, Oneſicrite, and Carimantes were extream attentive at the reading of it: I ſhall only tell you, Madam, that this ſad Lover began the recital of his miſery, with an Elogy of the beauty and merit of the perſon he loved. Afterwards he ſaid, that he had loved her from her Cradle; adding that he had the happineſs not to be hated: After this, he aggravated all the proofs of that love which he bore unto her, and did make it ſo well appear that he had great hopes of being loved, and of being loved conſtantly, that the minds of all his Auditors were diſpoſed to blame her, if ſhe became perfidious.

Thus Madam, having prepared the hearts of his Judges, he ſhewed, that without giving her the leaſt cauſe of complaint, ſome thoughts of inconſtancy or ambition had moved this perſon to caſt him off, and to overwhelm him with miſery, ſhe favoured a Rival unto whom he was extreamly obliged: So as honour not ſuffering him to ſeek revenge, and Love not giving him leave to live, he asked leave to dye. And he asks it the rather, becauſe he finds ſuch tumultuous thoughts in his heart, that rather than let his Rival enjoy his Miſtreſs, he ſhall undertake ſuch a buſineſs as will cauſe the death of an infinite number of innocent perſons, which he ſhall engage in his intereſts.

Indeed he made it appear he was capable of any undertaking which Love, Ambition, and Jealouſie could inſpire into him: And he intimated by ſome ambiguous words, that his death would prevent very great misfortunes, and deliver him from great torments, ſo as he had all the reaſon in the world to deſire death, and they to grant it. And indeed the major part of the Judges did ſay, that ſince the death of this unfortunate Lover would be advantagious both unto him and others, they could not find out a fitter example to ſhew, that the Law which they had made was not uſeleſs, and ſo they ought not to deny death unto a man, who by dying would ſave the lives of many others.

Sfurius, for his part, was one of the forwardeſt to grant poyſon unto him who demanded it, and preſſed it on: But upon this condition, that this deſperate Lover ſhould the ſame hour preſent himſelf before the Aſſembly; for the Law required a ſight of him who was to dye, that they might know whether his reaſon was free, and whether he knew what he asked. Then the man who ſpoke, telling the Judges that he would immediately carry their anſwer unto the party who would dye. The Cup of Gold which held the Poyſon was brought in: And it was no ſooner ſet upon the Table, but we ſaw Menedorus enter, who boldly preſenting himſelf before the Judges, told them that it was he who demanded Poyſon, thanking them, with an admirable reſolution, for the Juſtice which they had done him.

I leave you to judge Madam, how Carimantes was ſurprized at the ſight of his Rival: How Sfurius was aſtoniſhed that he ſhould doom Poyſon to his Son: And how Oneſicrite was amazed to ſee her Lover deſire to dye for her. Alſo I leave it to your imagination, Madam, how great the tumult was amongſt the Aſſembly who were not ignorant of Menedorus his love unto Oneſicrite: But give me leave to tell you one very remarkable thing; Sfurius, who was a high lover of his Country, after he had appeaſed the firſt motion which nature cauſed in his heart, he was ſo angry to ſee that Menedorus could not ſurmount himſelf, that he ſurmounted his paternal tenderneſs, and told the Aſſembly that his Son did not only deſerve the Poyſon, as an unfortunate man, but as a Delinquent, ſince he would not ſacrifice his perticuliar ſatisfaction unto the good of the publick intereſt, and therefore he deſired that the ſentence, which could not be revoked, might be ſpeedily executed.

Whilſt Sfurius was ſpeaking, Menedorus turning his head towards Oneſicrite, he ſaw her eyes ſwim in tears: And preſently after, ſhe not being able to endure the exceſs of her ſorrows, ſhe leaned towards Glacidia, who ſtood behind her, and ſwounded in her arms: So as whilſt all means were uſing to bring her unto her ſelf again, Carimantes ſeeing her in that condition, he knew not what to think or do. The ſorrows of Oneſicrite did ſo plainly let him ſee, that ſhe loved Menedorus, and not himſelf, that his reaſon told him he ought not to love her any longer: And the deſpair of his Rival did ſo convince him of the greatneſs of his paſſion, that he was perſwaded it was injuſtice to oppoſe him. But on the other ſide, his love checking his reaſon, it would not give him the liberty to follow it. Furthermore, the Prince of Phoceus, though he was very much vexed at the violent reſolution of Menedorus, yet he durſt not make ſhew of all his pity, for fear of incenſing Carimantes.

In the mean time, Menedorus ſeeing the Cup which contained the Remedy againſt his torment, he went towards the Table, on which it ſtood, to finiſh his doom, but one of the Judges told him that it was not yet time: And for his particular, he conceived that it was not fit the Poyſon ſhould be granted unto him, but that the Judgement which had been pronounced was null and void; For, ſaid he, ſince it appears by the ſorrows of the Princeſs Oneſicrite, that you are more than indifferent unto her, you are not ſo unhappy as to have any recourſe unto death; and ſo much the leſs, becauſe you informed the Aſſembly that you were not loved, whereas it ſeems you know not the true ſtate of your fortune: And ſo having pronounced a ſentence upon a falſe ground, the Sentence it ſelf muſt conſequently be falſe, and fall.

This Opinion being liked by all the Aſſembly, every one adhered to it, except Sfurius, who could not bely the generoſity of his Soul. As for Menedorus, he extreamly oppoſed that pity in the Judges, and ſhould have oppoſed it more, if the Prince Carimantes had not ſent to tell him, that he had found out a more noble way to terminate his pain: So as all the Aſſembly believing that the Prince had overcome himſelf, they put Menedorus into the cuſtody of ſome Friends, they carryed Oneſicrite unto her Chamber, where Carimantes followed her, and all the Aſſembly broke up.

As ſoon as Oneſicrite opened her eyes, and began to ſpeak, ſhe deſired Carimantes, not knowing to whom ſhe ſpoke, that they would give her the Poyſon as well as Menedorus: So as this Prince not being able to endure this object, he went out of her Chamber; and not imparting the violent deſign which he had in his mind, he ſent ſecretly to tell Menedorus, that to teſtifie he had right to diſpute with him for the poſſeſſion of Oneſicrite, he engaged his word to fight with him, if he could not ſurmount himſelf; and indeed Madam, without any more delay, it was reſolved that in the morning they ſhould fight by the Sea-ſide.

But Carimantes being very generous, and knowing that if Menedorus ſhould kill him, he could not be in any ſafety, he cauſed a Boat to be near the place where they were to fight, to the end if it ſhould ſo happen, he might ſave himſelf by it. Without any long circumſtances of what paſſed between Carimantes and Menedorus before the fight, I will only tell you Madam, that the laſt of theſe ſtealing from thoſe who kept him, did come unto the place where Carimantes waited for him; that they fought, that Carimantes was ſlightly wounded in his left Arm, and that Menedorus was diſarmed. So as this unfortunate Lover taking the Boat which was prepared for him, in caſe he were Conqueror, did uſe it to carry him from Marſeilles after he was conquered.

But the Sea growing turbulent whilſt they fought; and as he would needs embark in ſuch deſpair as would not ſuffer him to conſult with the winds, nor hearken unto the Counſel of the Pilot, who would have diſſwaded him from departing: The waves were ſo rough, and the winds ſo furious, that they daſhed this Bark againſt the point of a Rock on the left hand of Marſeilles, and broke it all to pieces, ſo as the unfortunate Menedorus was drowned almoſt in the very Port, into which the waves brought his Body, and as if the Gods had a deſire to force Oneſicrite to water it with her tears, they permitted the Corps of this unfortunate Lover to be caſt, by the Sea, juſt under the Window of that Princeſs, who ſaw it with her own eyes, and reſented his death with unconceivable ſorrow.

In the mean time Oneſicrite, having, as I told you before, a ſweet and eaſie ſoul, ſhe could not reſiſt Ariſtonice, who knew ſo well how to perſwade her, that it did not conſiſt with her glory to alter that reſolution which ſhe had taken, that ſhe reſolved to ſmother part of her melancholy, and to be rul'd by thoſe who had moſt right to adviſe her, provided they would not force her to marry Carimantes over-haſtily.

On the other ſide, Carimantes making a thouſand excuſes unto Sfurius, for being the cauſe of his Sons death, Sfurius anſwered him according to his wonted generoſity: After which they returned to the King, in thoughts that the marriage of the Phocean Prince with Cleoniſbe ſhould with all ſpeed be celebrated. But Madam, at our return we underſtood that the ſtate of things were not ſo diſpoſed: For be pleaſed to know, that Galathes, whom Menedorus had made acquainted with many Grecians, had ſuborned ſome to them to tell the Segoregians, that the Prince of Phoceus was not the ſame he gave himſelf out to be: So as this falſhood paſſing from mouth to mouth, it made ſo great a noiſe amongſt the People, that nothing elſe was talked of: For Galathes having ſuborned the Segoregians as well as Phocenſians, there went an hundred ſeveral tales concerning the quality of the Phocean

Prince. And ſince the Law which permitted Cleonisbe to chooſe her Husband, was conditional, that ſhe ſhould chooſe a man whoſe Quality was ſuitable to her own: The caſe was ſuch, that if the Prince of Phoceus was not the ſame he ſaid himſelf to be, then the choice of the Princeſs was null: And to make it ſo, Galathes had cauſed this lye to be divulged amongſt the people: And Madam, he had done it with ſo much art, that thoſe whom he employed in the buſineſs, were never ſuſpected to have any hand in the impoſture. And to the end none ſhould think him to be the Author, he would not be the firſt that ſhould forbid the Banes between Cleonisbe and that Prince; not doubting but Bomilcar and Britomartes would take hold of that occaſion, which he had given, to defer it, he hoping all the while to find an opportunity of carrying away Cleonisbe, as afterwards we came to underſtand.

And indeed Madam, Britomartes and Bomilcar hearing of theſe great reports, did ſay, that for their parts they did believe the Prince of Phoceus to be the ſame he ſaid he was; but ſince it was made a doubt by a great People, they could not ſuffer that the Princeſs ſhould marry him. The Teſtimonies which all the Friends of the Phocean Prince did give, were all in vain, and likewiſe what all the men in Marſeilles did ſay: For the People of that Country being of a mutinous inclination, and ſince many were ſuborned to raiſe ſedition, they took up Arms, and ſided with Britomartes, Bomilcar, and Galathes.

Neither the King, nor Carimantes, who were fully perſwaded of the Prince of Phoceus his quality, were not able to act according to their inclinations; and the leſs able, becauſe at the ſame time the friends of Menedorus had cauſed a commotion in Marſeilles, upbraiding Sfurius with his cruelty to his Son; accuſing alſo the Prince of Phoceus for conſenting unto the marriage of Carimantes with Oneſicrite. Mean while Glacidia endeavoured to perſwade Bomilcar that it was in vain for him to hinder the marriage of Cleonisbe, ſince he might aſſure himſelf ſhe would never love him. But he anſwered her, that ſince he could receive no other conſolation, but in the ruine of his Rival, ſhe muſt pardon him if he did it; maintaining that he might very well do it, without giving him any cauſe of complaint, ſince he did no more than what Britomartes and Galathes did alſo.

In the mean time, as great a care was taken in obſerving the ſe Rivals as well as the Prince of Phoceus: Bomilcar and he fought the ſecond time, and were both wounded; but with this difference, that when they parted them, the Prince of Phoceus, who was cloſed with his Enemy, was the uppermoſt. But Madam, this Combat more and more incenſing the people, things grew to a great height. For Galathes being exceeding ſubtle and witty, had inſinuated into the minds of many Segoregians, that our Town was much to be feared; and that if we made the Country better, it would be only for our ſelves; and that after they had received us as their friends, we would become their Tyrants, and they our Slaves. But diſorder and confuſion being in every place, it was adviſed to appeaſe the People to talk of a Negotiation, knowing it to be much better to ſtop their firſt fury. So they asked this incenſed People, and the three Rivals who were their heads, what proofs they required to teſtifie the condition of the Phocean Prince.

But they found themſelves much gravelled for an anſwer; for ſince there remained none in Phoceus, it was in vain to ſend thither: But after they had well thought upon it, they agreed that the Conqueror of Phoceus ſhould decide the buſineſs; and that if the illuſtrious Cyrus would ſay unto thoſe they would ſend unto him, that Peranius was of the Family of the Phocean Princes, and that it was he who commanded the Fleet in departing from that Town, which his Armies had conquered, then they would yield up their Pretentions, and agree that Cleonisbe's choice was lawful. Though this Propoſition might ſeem ſtrange unto the Prince of Phoceus, ſince his deſtiny muſt depend upon the teſtimony of a Prince, unto whom he had not the honour to be known, and who might hold him for his Enemy, yet he did not refuſe it: For ſince he knew that the Prince Thraſibulus did know, and that his actions had been extraordinary, and might be judged worthy to be related unto his invincible Conqueror, he believed that the Illuſtrious Cyrus would be ſo generous as to give a ſincere Teſtimony in his favour: And ſo Madam, it was agreed, that I ſhould come unto Cyrus; That the King ſhould ſend me with a Perſon of Quality, and that the three Rivals ſhould alſo ſend a Perſon of Credance, to hear what the Conqueror of Aſia would ſay unto my demands.

But before we came away, they made all the parties intereſted to ſwear ſolemnly to agree unto what we ſhould report: That they ſhould not trouble the publick Peace; and that during our Voyage, they ſhould attempt nothing againſt one another. After all this, they prepared us a Ship; and the King, the three Rivals, and the Prince of Phoceus having made choice of thoſe they would ſend unto the Illuſtrious Cyrus, we made our ſelves ready for departure: And yet we did not depart, until we underſtood that the Slave who demanded Poyſon for Amathilde, and who had been taken in the Wars by the Father of the fair Lady, was known to be a man of great Quality amongſt the Tectoſages: And moreover, that he had declared unto Amathilde, he had been in love with her ever ſince he knew her; and that though ſhe had loſt her beauty, yet ſhe had not loſt his love; adding, that if ſhe would receive him favourably, ſhe was yet amiable enough to make him happy. So as Madam, ſince Amathilde had not a deſire to dye after the loſs of her beauty, but only becauſe ſhe thought it impoſſible any could love her in the ſtate ſhe was, ſhe changed her mind when ſhe ſaw ſhe was deceived: Alſo ſhe reſolved to live, and love him who loved her, when ſhe thought ſhe was not able to love her ſelf.

After this Madam, we departed; and with orders from the Prince of Phoceus to bring the Prince his Father unto Marſeilles if we could: So Madam, ſince the Illuſtrious Cyrus hath himſelf done as much as I could deſire, I found my ſelf in a condition able to confound all the Rivals of the Phocean Prince, and to make him happy: Alſo to contribute unto the happineſs of Carimantes: For the mutinous people would not permit him to marry Oneſicrite, unleſs ſhe were ſutable to his Quality. So Madam, if the Prince Meneſteus, at your perſwaſions, will pleaſe to go whether I ſhall conduct him, by orders from the Phocean Prince, I have no more to wiſh.

Thrymetes having ended his Narration, he left Cyrus and Mandana exceedingly ſatisfied; and they promiſed him to forget nothing which might conduce unto the felicity of the Phocean Prince: And indeed the next day he ſpoke unto the two Segoregians who came with Thrymetes in a manner moſt advantagious for that Prince, and anſwered them with exceeding civility. Alſo he gave an authentick Declaration of his Quality, and mixed it with ſo many Commendations of his valour and vertue, that a more advantagious Elogy could not be made of him.

But as he was ready to ſend Chryſantes unto Meneſteus to move him to quit the Tomb wherein he dwelt, this ſad and ſolitary Prince came to thank him and Mandana for the honour they had done him, and to give thanks unto Cyrus for the juſtice he had done unto the Prince his Son. But uſe what arguments and perſwaſions they could to remove him unto Marſeilles, he would not hearken unto them, but they were conſtrained to let him return unto his mournful Tomb again: So Thrymetes and the two Segoregians which were with him, reſolved to return as ſoon as Cyrus was departed.

In the mean time, the Princeſs Mandana, after ſhe had given thanks unto Eucrates, ſhe continued on her journey with the greateſt diſpoſition in the world to divert her ſelf, and ſo ſhe did moſt pleaſantly for many days. It ſeemed as if every day did produce freſh joys: And when ſhe conſidered that ſhe was going further from the King of Aſſiria, and drew nearer the King her Father, who would entertain Cyrus as her deliverer, ſhe thought ſhe could not give her heart enough unto the enjoyment of pleaſures, after ſhe had ſuffered ſo many miſeries.

Alſo ſhe came unto the frontiers of Cappadocia towards Cicily, without the leaſt diſaſter in her Voyage, and ſhe had the ſatisfaction to ſee Cyrus do an act worthy of his great ſoul. There came in the Evening a Poſt from Babylon, which brought news that there had been a great commotion in the Town, and that in the Tumult the people had plundered the Veſſels of the Temple of Jeruſalem, which were brought thither when the Aſſirians took it: And that if the Hebrew people, who were Captives in Babylon this ſeventy years, had not oppoſed them, they had been Maſters of it. This Poſt told Cyrus afterwards, that the Governour of Babylon being afraid leſt the like ſhould happen again, and that he was not able to keep the Town, he reſolved to ſend unto him all thoſe precious Veſſels which had been poſſeſſed by Solomon: And that the captive people not being able to endure that they ſhould profane thoſe things which had been conſecrated unto ſacred uſes in their Sacrifices, did follow thoſe who drove the Camels which carried all theſe riches. This Poſt adding, that falling ſick by the way, he could come no ſooner; and that he believed, thoſe of whom he ſpake would be here in the morning.

And indeed the Sun no ſooner began to appear, but Cyrus, who was alwaies up very early to give out all neceſſary orders, eſpecially for the march of his Troops, did underſtand thoſe whom he expected were come: Thus there might be ſeen that great captive people who had been conquered by the King of Aſſiria's Grandfather, do now make their addreſſes unto him, who is the Conqueror of that Prince unto whom they were Slaves. But in coming unto Cyrus, two of the Camels ruſhing one againſt another, did overturn their loads, and made it appear how precious their loads were, inſomuch as Cyrus commanded them to ſhew all the reſt: For ſince he did not find Mandana in Babylon when he took it, he never thought of looking upon all this rich booty. So the Officers obeying his commands, they let him ſee the moſt magnificent object in the world: For he ſaw threeſcore great Veſſels of Gold, of an ineſtimable price: A thouſand Veſſels of Silver of a wonderful bigneſs: Abundance of coſtly Inſtruments uſed in their Sacrifices, whoſe garniſhing were both rich and rare: Four hundred other veſſels of a leſſer ſize, and a thouſand other veſſels of the ſame metal of a leſs ſize than they. So that ſeeing altogether five thouſand Veſſels of precious metal and excellent Form, this ſight was the goodlieſt object in the world. Yet Cyrus was not a whit dazled with the luſtre of all theſe riches, but looked upon them as he ought.

Then the chief amongſt this Hebrew People, who followed thoſe who carryed theſe Ornaments of the moſt famous Temple in the world, preſenting himſelf unto Cyrus, he hearkned unto him with a very willing ear; ſo as this generous Captive, ſeeing that Cyrus lent him a favourable ear, he began to ſpeak unto him with much boldneſs and zeal. He aggravated unto him the greatneſs of the God of his Fathers, the Wiſdom of one of their Kings, and the Vertue of others. He deſcribed unto him the magnificence of the Temple in Jeruſalem before it was deſtroyed: He repreſented unto him the enormous ſacriledge of thoſe who pulled it down: He deſcribed the miſeries of their captivity: He asked of him, as of the moſt generous Prince in the world, liberty for his Nation, and liberty to rebuild their Temple. Alſo that theſe Veſſels which were conſecrated unto the only God of the whole Univerſe, might not be prophaned by other uſes. This Prince of the Hebrews did ſpeak with ſo much zeal, that Cyrus being moſt ſenſibly moved by his language, did grant him his demands, and much more; for he aſſigned a very conſiderable ſum of mony to rebuild the Temple of Jeruſalem: So as this Prince of the Hebrews divulging amongſt the multitude the greatneſs of the favour granted to them, upon a ſudden they gave ſuch ſhouts of joy as awaked Mandana from her ſleep.

But Cyrus, to rejoyce fully in his great act of Charity, deſired this Princeſs ſhe would be pleaſed to ſtay a day longer in that place, to ſee this multitude of Captive People, whom he had delivered, paſs by; and accordingly, Mandana, being in a Belcony, and Cyrus with her, accompanied with all the Princeſſes, they ſaw paſs above forty thouſand perſons of all ſorts, who from rank to rank did by their geſtures render millions of thanks unto Cyrus for the liberty which he had given them: So that joyning this vaſt number of People, their Horſes, their Camels, and all their other Beaſts which carried their Baggage, and the Children of the People delivered, they took up a vaſt extent of ground; ſo that it muſt of neceſſity be concluded, that a Prince who was ſo great as was able to give away ſo much riches, and grant liberty unto ſo many Captives, muſt needs be the greateſt Prince in the world: And ſo much the rather, becauſe the good which he did, he alwaies did it with joy and alacrity: And truly he was ſo ſenſibly pleaſed, that he had an occaſion of breaking ſo many chains at one blow, and comforting ſo many ſad ſouls, that finding a ſubject out of which to frame a Complement unto Mandana, he asked her pardon for the ſatisfaction which this adventure did afford him: For Madam, ſaid he unto her, as you have been the cauſe of all my ſorrows, ſo you only are the cauſe of my Joyes: And as it is a failing in my duty, ſo alſo an offence unto my love, to be capable of any other Joyes than that of ſeeing you, and ſeeing you at liberty.

ARTAMENES,

OR THE

GRAND CYRUS.

PART VIII. Book III.

THE Heroick joy which the Illuſtrious Cyrus had, in the reſtoring liberty unto ſo many Captives, was not the only one which he had: For the Meſſenger, being come from the Prince Seſoſtris, and the Princeſs Timareta; he was exceedingly joyed to hear by him, that Amaſis had very well received them, and conſented unto their Marriage, which was celebrated with magnificence worthy of the Ægyptian King, in the ſtately City of Memphis. The only cauſe of the Ægyptians coming was, to thank Cyrus for the felicity which Seſoſtris and Timareta enjoyed: And in the name of Amaſis, to offer him all the Forces in his Kingdom, if he pleaſed to command them out. But ſince Cyrus did not think he ſhould need to give any more Battles, he did not accept of the offer: But aſſured the Meſſenger that he did much participate in the joys and happineſs of the Princeſs Timareta, and of the Prince Seſoſtris. And to teſtifie that the news he brought him of their Marriage was moſt welcome unto him, he rewarded him with a moſt rich Preſent at parting. 'Tis true, Cyrus was not the only one, who was joyed at the happineſs of Seſoſtris; for all thoſe that knew him in the Army, ſhared with him, eſpecially the Ægyptians which he had left. But as the news of this Princes happineſs was very welcome unto all them that ever ſaw him, or which ever heard ſpeak of him; ſo the reports which were publiſhed of the augmentation of the Aſſirian Kings ſickneſs, did not produce the like effects in the minds of thoſe who knew him: but many varied in their reſentments of it: For many men deploring the misfortune of ſo great a Prince, did pity him: Others were joyed, and Anaxaris was ſorry though he hated him But the predominate paſſion of his heart ſwaying him more then all other conſiderations, he could not chuſe but fear the death of a hated Rival, becauſe he might have diſturbed the felicity of a Rival loved. However, the noiſe of the King of Aſſiria's ſickneſs was ſo great, that none doubted the truth of it; and the leſs, becauſe Cyrus (unto whom thoſe he had left with that Prince had given him an account) himſelf ſaid that he was very ill, and gave cauſe to think, that the firſt news we heard would be of his death; yet he ſpoke it with ſo much reſervedneſs, that every one wondered at his moderation, in not rejoycing at the loſs of ſuch an Enemy as he. As for Mandana, her Soul was ſo high and generous, as ſhe was not capable of any joy at the death of a Prince who was not able to hurt her; and indeed, her diſpoſition was more unto pity than any joy. Yet it was ſuch a compaſſion as did not diſturb the diverſions of the voyage, which had all the pleaſures and delights of a tranquil Court. For as the days journies were ordered, none were more weary at night, than if they had been only out to take the air. Alſo the great abundance of rarely accompliſhed men, which the familiarity of the journey had united, did make ſuch a delectable miſcellany of men, of all ſorts of Conditions, Humours, and Nations, that one muſt needs be very ſtupid, or melancholly, if they were weary in a place where there were ſo many pleaſing perſons, who for moſt part, had no other deſign but to divert: yet thoſe whom Love had damped muſt be alwayes excepted. For truly, the Prince Intaphernes had the Princeſs of Bithynia alwayes in his mind: Artamas was angry to be ſo long from the Princeſs Palmis: Mazares had much ado to accuſtome himſelf to be only the friend of Mandana, and not her Lover. Myrſiles was not a little troubled that he could make no progreſs in the mind of Doraliſa: And Andramites deſpaired to ſee there was no likelihood of ever bending her heart. As for Aglatidas, he was too much in love with Ameſtris, not to be impatient of ſeeing her, and he fretted at the longneſs of the voyages, though he drew nearer unto her every day. Thus every Lover in the Army had their diſcontents. But as they were all careful to hide their frettings, ſo they did contribute much to the pleaſure of converſation, eſpecially at nights, when all the company aſſembled in Mandana's Chamber. Anaxaris alſo, as unquiet as he was, he was ſtill ſtriving to maſter his mind, leſt he ſhould ſhew his unquietudes: for his deſign being to pleaſe Mandana, he thought it not fit that the melancholy of his ſoul ſhould appear in his face, ſo as he concealed it ſo handſomly, and arrived ſo perfectly unto that end he aimed at, that there were few men in the world whom Mandana eſteemed more than Anaxaris: Alſo ſhe gave him a thouſand obliging teſtimonies of it; either in ſpeaking a thouſand good things of him unto Cyrus; or in aſſuring him ſhe would oblige the King her Father, to acknowledg the ſervices he had done her, or in her way of carriage towards him. For indeed ſhe commanded him with ſuch mild, ſweet, and civil authority, that her Commands were more obliging than the prayers of many others. But as Anaxaris had a great care of inſinuating himſelf into the love of Mandana, ſo he had a great care to make himſelf both loved and feared of all thoſe under his command. And the truth is, he was both ſo loved and feared, as there were very few things which he was not able to make them do.

In the mean time, this Illuſtrious Troop, ſtill advancing, Cyrus and Mandana came one Evening unto a little Town ſcituated upon the banks of that great and famous River Halys: which hath its original and ſource amongſt the Armenian Mountains: and after it hath twined it ſelf through ſeveral Countries, It divides Cappadocia from Paphlagonia, in this place, not being diſtant from the Euxine Sea above three hundred furlongs. Since the journey had been ſomething long, and ſince Mandana found ſome delight to think ſhe was in Cappadocia, where all the people received her with unexpreſſible joys, and continual acclamations, ſhe intended to reſt there a day; whereof Marteſia was very glad, becauſe ſhe remembred her ſelf of an Aunt which commonly dwelt at Themiſcyra, who had a very noble houſe within forty furlongs of it: Remembring moreover, that ſhe was ever uſed to dwell there about that ſeaſon: ſo ſending preſently to enquire, to the end ſhe might find her at home, ſhe asked Mandana leave to make a viſit in the morning, ſince ſhe did not travel; ſo as in this hope ſhe paſſed away the evening in a very merry diſpoſition. Since Feraulus was the man who took upon him to enquire whether her Aunt was at home, he made ſuch haſte, that as ſoon as Marteſia awaked in the morning, ſhe knew that her Aunt was where ſhe thought her; and had much good company with her. Marteſia no ſooner knew this welcome news, but riſing in all haſte ſhe went unto Mandana, and beſeeched her to let her give this viſit. The Princeſs at firſt, could not remember who this Couſin of Marteſia's was; but calling to mind preſently after, that ſhe was ſiſter unto her whom Artucas married, who delivered up a Port of Sinope unto Cyrus, when he came thither to releaſe her, but did releaſe only the King of Aſſiria; Then ſhe told Marteſia very obligingly, that not to deprive her of that pleaſure, nor to deprive her ſelf of that ſatisfaction which ſhe hoped to receive in ſeeing her, ſince ſhe was ſo near, ſhe would ſend her upon a complement unto her Aunt, and ſend her own Coach for her, that ſhe might oblige her to come and ſee her. Marteſia not daring to refuſe ſuch an obliging Propoſition, thanking Mandana for the favour, and would be careful to ſend and acquaint her kinſwoman, who was called Amaldea; but the Princeſs would needs ſend one of her own ſervants; and ſo ſhe did. Then Marteſia went out to write a letter unto Amaldea, by him that was to go for her, which done, ſhe returned again unto Mandana's Chamber, where Doraliſa, and Pherenice were. Marteſia (ſaid the Princeſs unto her, as ſoon as ſhe entered) I know not whether my memory fail me, but I think that when we were at Themiſcyra, your Aunt who is one of the moſt accompliſhed perſons in the world had a friend with her, who in my mind was one of the moſt inſupportable women that ere I ſaw, though ſhe was one of the moſt vertuous, in point of gallantry. 'Tis very true Madam, replied ſhe, and I never in all my life knew any unto whom I had a greater averſion then unto her you mention. But how was it poſſible, ſaid Doraliſa, that ſuch a one ſhould be the friend of Amaldea? for in my mind, it is very extraordinary that any perſon of merit, ſhould have a friend who is not of the ſame mould. It cannot be ſaid, (replied Mandana) but that ſhe of whom I ſpeak hath many good qualities; ſince ſhe had been very fair, and was ſo ſtill when I went from Themiſcyra: Moreover, ſhe is very vertuous, and hath wit and ſpirit enough, but withal, if Marteſia would deſcribe her unto us, I am confident, you would agree that ſhe is not very amiable. Ah Madam, ſaid Marteſia, you ſpeak too favourably of a perſon who deſerves not the attribute of vertuous, ſince her vertues do ſo ill become her: And truely (ſaid ſhe, turning towards Doraliſa) ſince the Princeſs is pleaſed I ſhould deſcribe this friend of Amaldea's, whoſe name is Iſalonide: be pleaſed to imagine her as ſhe hath deſcribed her, that is, fair and vertuous, and alſo full of wit and ſpirit; but a ſpirit ſo full of fooliſh pride, that I know not how I ſhould deſcribe it unto you. Indeed, becauſe ſhe knows ſhe hath the vertue of modeſty, ſhe thinks ſhe needs not the vertue of humility; and becauſe ſhe cannot be upbraided with any lightneſs, or gallantry, therefore ſhe thinks ſhe hath a peculiar priviledge, to be peeviſh, fantaſtical, cholerick, and imperious; and indeed, ſhe thinks that becauſe ſhe hath one vertue, ſhe may be permitted to have all the vices: And for my part, were I her husband, I had rather ſhe were a little too gallant, and had a little of all thoſe vertues ſhe wants, than to have but one vertue, and have a little of all the ill habites that one can have. For my particular, replied Doraliſa, I think nothing can be more unreaſonable, than for a woman to value what ſhe ought to be at as high a rate, as if ſhe were ſo. Iſalonide doth ſo value her ſelf, replied Marteſia, and as there are ſome inſolent fools, who think that valour is enough to make up a compleat man; ſo Iſalonide thinks, that becauſe ſhe is not a light houſewife, ſhe is the moſt vertuous woman of the age. In the mean time, the reſult of this fine opinion is, that ſhe makes her husband even mad with her fantaſtical humours: ſhe diſorders the whole Family by her ſeverity and pride; ſhe ſharply checks all her kindred that are young; ſhe cenſures all the women in the Town where ſhe lives; ſhe ſcorns all that come near her; ſhe gives a hundred unjuſt judgements; ſhe puts no difference between a little too much Gallantry, and a great crime; and ſhe condemns all that ſhe ſees, and ſees not, thinking that ſhe her ſelf only can brag of being vertuous. And indeed ſhe is of ſuch a preſumptuous ſpirit, that ſhe is moſt intollerable. The truth is, replied Mandana, that this vanity hath a very ill foundation, ſince if it be at all excuſable it muſt be when one hath ſome good quality which one is not obliged to have: and it is not enough to be proud, becauſe one hath ſome one vertue without which one ſhould de infamous. For example; If a woman who hath beauty, wit, and vertue, do take ſo much pains as to cultivate thoſe excellencies which nature gave her: And to get ſome extraordinary knowledg in the Arts and Sciences, which ſhe knows how to uſe with all the diſcretion fitting for her Sex, doubtleſs ſhe hath good reaſon to pretend unto more commendations then another; Moreover I muſt agree, that thoſe vertues which Iſalonide hath not may in ſome ſort be a juſt cauſe of boaſting unto thoſe who enjoy them: But to draw a vanity out of vertue, is a thing ſo ſhameful unto all the Sex in general, that I am aſhamed to think of it: For truly it may be thought, that this kind of vertue out of which Iſalonide draws a vanity, is eſſential unto all women. So in my opinion, the pride of Iſalonide is very ill grounded; and I am perſwaded that a man who looks for commendations, becauſe he never poyſoned, or aſſaſſinated any one, hath as good a reaſon for it as ſhe hath, who makes her glory to conſiſt only in that ſhe is not too much addicted unto Gallantry. Doubtleſs ſhe does not know, replied Doraliſa, that not to be vitious, is not enough to make one vertuous; and that there is a great interval between Avarice and Liberality: The ſame may be ſaid of all the vertues and all the vices, replied Mandana, betwixt which this interval may be found, in which if any one reſt, they neither merit blame nor commendations. For my part, replied Doraliſa, and ſmiled, I am willing to think that Iſalonide does not merit the Attribute of that vertue whereof ſhe boaſts; for if ſhe be ſo peeviſh, ſo angry, ſo ſcornful, and ſo proud as you diſcribe her, I cannot believe ſhe hath many Adorers. For my part, replied Marteſia, I think you are in the right; at leaſt I know that none are more inſufferable to me then ſuch women, as have ſouls ſo baſe as to content themſelves with one vertue, and yet are ſo proud as to ſcorn all thoſe vertues which they want: And the worſt is, her example, of this inſolent and ſavage vertue, does no good at all unto any young perſons; but on the contrary, all the apprehenſions of ſuch ſecure and arrogant women, does incenſe their ſpirits, and makes them ſo afraid of their reſemblance, as that often-times they will not reſemble thoſe who are good. However it be, replied Mandana, we ſhall know by Amaldea whether Iſalonide be ſtill of the ſame humour: and whether a young ſiſter ſhe hath, be of the ſame. If ſhe be, replied Marteſia, I muſt confeſs, I could not know it by her Phyſiognomy; for I aſſure you Madam, this young ſiſter, whoſe name is Cloreliſa, had ſuch a look with her eyes, as moved me to think ſhe had a very gallant inclination; though it be true, that Iſalonide has ſuch an obſervant eye over her, as ſhe cannot follow her own inclination. If this Perſon, replied Doraliſa, be as pleaſing as her name is, ſhe is more amiable than her ſiſter: Since I never had any experience of her, replied Marteſia, I only know ſhe has a promiſing and gallant Air with her, that ſhe is fair, and that ſhe hath much ſpirit; yet I cannot ſay ſhe is amiable. But in exchange (added Mandana) you may aſſure her that ſhe has a brother named Belemis, who is as well perſwaded of his own valour, as his ſiſter is of her vertue; or at leaſt they accuſe him (methinks) for making too much of his bravery. The truth Madam is, replied Marteſia, that Belemis who is a man qualified well enough, hath a little too much affected to appear what he is, and that they have rightly accuſed him for making all the crabbed faces of a ſouldier: For indeed, his walk is too warlike, his action is too haughty; and when he comes into any company, he has the Air of a man that is ready to give battle, rather then for a converſation of Gallantry: his cloaths alſo, has always ſomething unlike peace: and his tone is ſo ſhrill, as one would think his intreaties were commands, military commands; all he does, and all he ſays, would perſwade one that he affects to be reputed brave: yet certainly all this is his natural way. If ſo, replied Doraliſa, then he hath great cauſe to chide Nature: for I aſſure you, ſuch men in times of peace are no leſs ridiculous, then ſuch women as are of Iſalonide's humour.

After Doraliſa had ſaid ſo, Mandana, being dreſt, ſhe prepared to go unto the Temple with Cyrus, and all thoſe of this Court Errant, if I may phraſe it ſo. But ſince the ſacrifice continued very long, when Mandana returned to her lodging ſhe found Marteſia's Aunt, already come, and found with her the moſt pleaſing company in the world: For indeed, ſhe had with her ten or twelve handſome women, and as many men of exceeding good quality; ſo that Mandana being pleaſingly ſurprized at this good company, ſhe received them with all poſſible Civility, and the better becauſe they were all known unto her, for they were all of Themiſcyra. Cyrus for his particular was exceedingly ſatisfied that all this good company ſhould come ſo fitly to make the day more delightſome unto Mandana. And all thoſe who were with him were very glad to ſee ſo many Ladies in a place ſo unlikely to meet with any ſo amiable. As for Marteſia, ſhe was ſo glad to ſee ſo many of her acquaintance, that her joys ſparkled in her eyes; but ſhe was extreamly over-joyed to ſee with her Aunt the daughter of Artucas, whoſe name was Erenice, with whom ſhe had a particular friendſhip at Sinope, when ſhe lodged with her Uncle, whilſt Artamenes was priſoner. She was no ſooner at liberty to talk with her, whilſt Amaldea was talking with Mandana, but ſhe remembred that ſhe was preſent when thoſe four Lovers which pretended each of them to be the moſt unfortunate Lover in the world, were judged by her in the preſence of Cyrus: Alas my dear Erenice, ſaid ſhe unto her, what ſtrange accidents have hapned ſince that day I was ſo buſie in examining whether Indifferency, Death, Abſence, or Jealouſie was the moſt Rigorous: and how much time would it take up, if I ſhould examine which hath more perplexed me, abſence from you, or my fears you ſhould forget me. But whilſt Marteſia was talking thus, and whilſt Erenice was anſwering with as much ingenuity and tenderneſs; Mandana did with admiration look upon a perſon whom ſhe ſaw amongſt the Ladies; for though they were all very handſome, yet there was no compariſon betwixt her and the reſt. And indeed, this Lady, whoſe name was Telamire, had ſuch rare and extraordinary charms in her beauty, that they will hardly admit of a deſcription. For ſince ſhe was neither Great, nor Little; Pale, nor Red; Black, nor Fair; but held a juſt and even proportion betwixt all theſe, as one would ſay, Nature did diſtinguiſh her from all others, to the end there might not be confuſion in the ſeveral Orders of Beauties, which ſometimes breeds conteſts between the Black, and between the Fair Beauties. Moreover, Telamire was not only Fair, but of an admirable Behaviour; and had an Air which was not at all Proud, yet Majeſtical. Again, ſince Telamire was neither Black nor Fair, her Aſpect was neither melancholy nor merry, but had ſuch a juſt mixture of both as made her diſcreetly Pleaſant. But as Telamire did charm the eyes of all the company; ſo likewiſe there was a man with her that did attract their eyes as much as ſhe; ſince certainly his Behaviour was as good as ſhe was Fair; his Phyſiognomy ſpoke him to be a man of much ſpirit. And he hearkned unto what was ſpoke, with ſuch an Aire, as it was eaſie to perceive that he underſtood things aright. But that which rendred him moſt conſiderable unto Mandana, was his being Son unto Amaldea, and Marteſia's Couſin: for ſince he was not at Themiſcyra when ſhe was there ſhe knew him not. She remembred very well that Amaldea had a Son whoſe name was Artaxander, but ſhe knew not it was him ſhe ſaw. And ſhe did no ſooner know it, but ſhe made him a moſt obliging Complement, and he anſwered her in a moſt elegant ſtile. So that diſcourſes beginning by degrees, between ſo much excellent company, time paſſed away ſo pleaſingly, that Mandana thought it not a minuit ſince ſhe returned from the Temple, when ſhe was advertiſed that it was dinner time. So that Cyrus carried all the Men with him, and Mandana retained all the Ladies to dine with her; but ſhe declared unto them, that it was not for dinner ſhe retained them, but they ſhould not return home at night. But to anſwer the Civility of the Princeſs, Amaldea told her, ſhe would do more than that, becauſe ſhe was reſolved to wait upon her two days journey farther. Thus all this good company being together, the time paſſed away with much delight: one chance fell out which cauſed that Mandana could not depart ſo ſoon as ſhe intended, becauſe in the night time, that great River on which this little Town did ſtand, did ſo overflow, that the Countrey all about was water; and for twelve hours together it rained ſo faſt, that it was one cauſe of the Rivers riſing, though the main reaſon of it was, the falling of waters from the Armenian Mountains, which running into this River, did cauſe it to ſwell above its ordinary Banks, and over-flow the Plains. However, Mandana muſt croſs it before ſhe could continue her journey, and therefore of neceſſity ſhe muſt ſtay until the waters were aſſwaged: and alſo this good Company muſt needs ſtay with her, becauſe Amaldea's houſe was on the other ſide of the River. And though there was a Bridge, and this Bridge not broken, yet there was no getting within twelve furlongs of it, ſo as all this good Company ſtaying together, their deſign was only to paſs the time without wearineſs unto Mandana, who for her part did contribute all her endeavours to divert the Company.

But Marteſia (ſaid ſhe one morning unto her) how came all theſe Ladies to aſſemble together at your Aunts? I aſſure you Madam, (replied ſhe) I do not know; but ſince they came hither, I have done nothing elſe but talk of you, and ſatisfie their curioſities concerning your adventures: And though fame had partly told them, yet it told them falſe, and I was glad to let them know the truth. But now I have told them all they deſire to know, I muſt move them in their turns, to tell me all I deſire to know; for all I know yet is, that there is a notable adventure between this Beauty you ſee here, whoſe name is Telamire and Artaxander; and that it ſeems love makes happy and unhappy every where. Telamire, replied Mandana, is very likely to produce thoſe two different effects, for I never in my life ſaw any that pleaſed me more; And therefore Marteſia inform your ſelf a little better of her fortune, and let me know it. I ſhall be very glad to obey you Madam, replied ſhe ſince I have ſuch an inclination my ſelf: and indeed that Evening Erenice being with Marteſia, without any company but Doraliſa, ſhe obeyed Mandana's commands. Dear Couſin, (ſaid ſhe unto her) ſince I have related the Adventures of our Princeſs, and of the Illuſtrious Cyrus, I hope you will not be ſilent in your own, and thoſe of your acquaintance. When I have told you, replied ſhe, that after your departure from Sinope, my Father ſent me unto Themiſcyra, to Amaldea; and that I was often ſorry never to hear from you, doubtleſs I have told you the moſt important paſſages of my life. Tell me at leaſt, replied Marteſia, how it comes to paſs that ſo many amiable Perſons, who heretofore had no ſociety together, ſhould now make a journey together. To ſatisfie your knowledge in this (replied ſhe) it is requiſite I relate the whole lives of Artaxander and Telamire. Though Artaxander be my Couſin as he is yours (replied Marteſia) yet fortune hath ſo often parted us that we hardly know each other: But ſince he ſeems to be a very well accompliſhed man, I ſhould be very glad to know him from you. Therefore my dear Erenice, I beſeech you acquaint me with his life, and let Doraliſa have her ſhare in the diverſion. The adventures of perſons unto whom others have no relation, replied Erenice, are ſo far from diverting them, that I conceive it beſt to ſtay until you and I be alone; for though what I ſhall tell you have ſomething that is extraordinary in it, yet as I ſaid before, thoſe who have no intereſt in the fortune of them, whoſe Hiſtory is related cannot take any delight in hearing it. I am ſo much intereſted in the happineſs of Artaxander and Talemire, replied Doraliſa, that I ſhould he extreamly glad to hear their Adventures. For the truth is, it is impoſſible to ſee them, and not deſire their happineſs. And to teſtifie unto you, that they are not indifferent to me, I aſſure you, that I wiſh with all my heart, if Artaxander have any Rivals, that they may be ill treated; and if Telamire love any, that it may be Artaxander. But perhaps you have ſome ſecrets to impart unto Marteſia, which you would not have me to know, and therefore is is better to leave you at liberty. Oh Doraliſa! (ſaid Erenice, and would not let her go) I beſeech you do not offer to go away; for I am perſwaded, if I ſhould deprive Marteſia of your ſight, mine would not give her any ſatisfaction. Moreover as ſweet as ſhe ſeems to be, I aſſure you ſhe is one of the moſt revengful perſons in the world; and to prove it, I remember, that having one day the misfortune to take her out of very good Company, ſhe was never at reſt until ſhe was revenged, by putting me upon the company of one of the moſt weariſome perſons that ever was; and therefore I beſeech you do not go away. Then ſatisfie me, replied Marteſia, ſince I am ſo revengeful, for I declare unto you, that if you will not relate unto me the whole life of Artaxander and Telamire, I ſhall relate unto Doraliſa all I know of yours. And you know I am not ignorant, that you have made more miſerable than one, ſince we were acquainted. Since that relation (replied Erenice and and bluſht) would have leſs diverſion in it, than that which I ſhould relate, though you ſpeak much leſs then I, yet I had rather obey than reſiſt you. Then do obey, replied Marteſia, but that the word obey may be rightly placed, obey Doraliſa, and addreſs your ſpeech unto her: For ſhe being a ſtranger at Themiſcyra, you muſt explain many things unto her, which you would not unto me. After this Doraliſa anſwered ſomething, and Erenice replied: But at laſt, Marteſia having impoſed ſilence upon them both, and giving order that nothing ſhou'd diſturb them, Erenice began her Relation in theſe Terms.

The Hiſtory of ARTAXANDER and TELAMIRE.

SInce thoſe whoſe lives I am to relate are ſcarcely known unto you, 'tis requiſite I begin my Relation with their Elogie, that ſo engaging you unto their intereſts, by ſome reſentments of eſteem, you may with more attention hearken unto what I ſay. But ſince the merits of theſe two Perſons are high enough to have got that eſteem already, I have reaſon to fear that I cannot commend them enough. However, I muſt tell you, that Telamire is one of the moſt charming Perſons in the Univerſe unto ſuch as particularly know her: and though ſhe be moſt amiable unto all in general, yet ſhe is infinitely more unto ſuch as have any intimacy with her. And it may be ſaid, that ſhe is as much above her ſelf, when ſhe is with her intimate friends, as ſhe is above many others, when ſhe is in a general converſation: Alſo ſhe is ſo univerſally known, that when any one ſees a dull perſon in Themiſcyra, they uſe to ſay, ſend him to Telamire, for ſhe hath as much as the other hath little. Moreover, Telamire is exceedingly ſweet and generous; and her beauty is certainly the leaſt good quality ſhe hath. As for Artaxander, it is enough I tell you, that Marteſia can boldly acknowledg in her Couſins behalf, that he hath all thoſe excellent qualities which are requiſite to make up moſt perfectly accompliſht man. After this, I muſt tell you, that Telamire is a Lady of Quality; whoſe father was called Algaſtus; and her mother was a moſt vertuous woman, who tenderly loved Amaldea the mother of Artaxander, under the governance of whom he hath ever been, becauſe his father died when he was but in his Cradle. And the better to let you underſtand what I muſt tell you in the ſequel of my diſcourſe, be pleaſed to know, that Algaſtus never had more than one daughter, which was Telamire: and that from her very infancy, her mother, whoſe name was Cleoſſinte, did always tell Amaldea, that ſhe would marry her daughter unto the young Artaxander her ſon, who was then about five or ſix years elder than Telamire,who at that time was not above twelve. But though this deſign was known unto very few, and though Algaſius himſelf knew it not, yet it was not ſo ſecretly carried, but the young Telamire knew ſomething of the buſineſs, by the women which waited upon her: ſo as from that time, ſhe diſpoſed her heart to be obedient unto Cleoſſonte. And I cannot tell, whether one ſhould not attribute ſome part of Telamire's merits unto the innocent deſign which ſhe had in her infancy, to be e're long in a condition of meriting Artaxander's eſteem. The truth is, I cannot think one could be more amiable, being an Infant, than Telamire was; for her perſon was not ononly exceeding handſome, but ſhe had one of the beſt Complexions in the world, and ſtruck all her Maſters into admiration: either he who taught her to dance, or him who taught her the Aſſyrian Language, which ſhe ſpoke excellently well. And moſt certainly none could dance better than ſhe did at that time,nor ſpeak a ſtrange Language more politely. Moreover, her ſtature was already ſo well proportioned,and her Phyſiognomy ſo compoſed, that all men of any ingenuity, who came unto Cleoſſonte, did not treat her as a child any longer, though yet ſhe was one; but on the contrary, extolled her as a compleat woman, and talked to her as if ſhe were eighteen years of age; alſo ſhe anſwered them ſo ingenuouſly, and with ſuch ſparks of wit and ſpirit in her countenance, as one would think, that if ſhe was not very forward to talk, it was only becauſe ſhe knew, that ſhe was not twelve years of age, and that decency would not allow her yet to ſhew all her wit, though ſhe ſhewed enough to make them admire her: ſo as having all the graces of Infancy, without any of the Toys, I aſſure you, ſhe was then infinitely amiable and charming. I tell you this (amiable Doraliſa) to let you know the firſt ground of Telamires and Artaxanders affection: 'Tis true, it could not well be called affection at that time: for ſince Amaldea ſent Artaxander to travel as ſoon as he was ſeventeen years of age, and ſince his travel was long, he ſcarcely remembred that ever he heard his mother ſay, ſhe deſired he ſhould marry Telamire: and Telamire her ſelf though ſhe remembred bred the intention of Cleoſſonte, yet ſhe thought it would never come to paſs: for you muſt know, that this vertuous perſon died when Telamire was but fourteen years of age: ſo as being under the governance of her father, who ſet a wiſe and vertuous woman over her, ſhe thought upon nothing but better accompliſhing her ſelf without any thoughts of Artaxander, conſidering that Cleoſſontes deſign being grounded upon her friendſhip to Amaldea, it would now fall, ſince ſhe was dead: And ſince Algaſtus her father was ſo far from any thoughts of marrying her, that his mind was all upon another wife; for ſince he was very rich, he did not deſpair to find one, though he was old, and though he would have one that was young, fair, and of good quality: Amaldea alſo for her part, ſhe never thought more upon this marriage: for ſhe knew that Algaſtus never thought of marrying his daughter; and ſince ſhe ſaw him in a poſſibility of having other children by another wife, ſhe thought the match not ſo advantagious as in Cleoſſontes days; ſo this buſineſs was laid aſide, as if it had never been thought upon. In the interim, time paſſing on, and Artaxander being improved as much by his Travels, as Telamire grew fair in his abſence: he returned to Themiſcyra: But ſince he had never been in a place, where they ſaid, that heretofore did dwell the ſecond Queen of the Amazons, called Orithea, at that time when ſhe reigned in Cappadocia, therefore he had a great Curioſity to go and ſee it: and indeed it was one of the goodlieſt places in the world; and ſo famous, that it was a kind of ſhame for a man of any ſpirit, not to have been there, and to be ignorant of what was there to be ſeen. In the mean time, as chance would have it, you muſt know, that Artaxander found in that place a company of Themiſcyrian Ladies, who came thither upon the ſame occaſion he did, to wit, only out of Curioſity: Amongſt the reſt, there was a Lady, whoſe name was Clorelisa, who was very pleaſant, and ſo is ſtill, tho ſince ſhe hath much been vexed This Clorelisa had neither father nor mother living, and therefore dwelt with a brother, named Belemis; having no mind to dwell with a ſiſter which ſhe had, who was called Iſalonide, becauſe ſhe was one of the moſt imperious perſons in the world

To ſpare you the labour of deſcribing her, (ſaid Marteſia and interrupted her) I muſt tell you, that I have acquainted Doraliſa what ſhe is, to wit, fooliſhly proud that ſhe cannot be accuſed of too much Gallantry. Nor is it neceſſary that you tell us what Belemis is, ſince I have told her he might well repreſent the God of War. But as for Cloreliſa you would do me a pleaſure in telling me of what humour ſhe is at this preſent.

Cloreliſa, replied Erenice, is oppoſite unto Iſalonide in many things, and reſembles her in only one. For the truth is, her inclination is unto Gallantry: But though ſhe ſeem to be very Civil, and when ſhe pleaſeth is Complaiſant enough, ſo her Complaiſance may ſerve her own intereſts; yet ſhe is as imperious in her Gallantry, as her Siſter is in her way. Moreover, ſhe is as full of revenge as one can be: for ſhe will attempt any thing to ſatisfie that humour, being none of thoſe who ſay that they ought never to be revenged upon themſelves: for ſhe is of ſuch an humour, that ſhe had rather do her ſelf harm, than not hurt to them ſhe hates: However, ſince Cloreliſa is fair and wity: and ſince her imperious humour never appears unto thoſe who jar not with her, it is very hard to look upon her and not love her: ſo that Artaxander meeting her at this Town, in which are the ruines of Orithea's Caſtle, he was as civil to her as any well qualified Man ought to be unto a Beauty; and a Beauty who being but a Child when he went from Themiſcyra, had now all the graces of novelty: Alſo he applied himſelf more to talk unto her than unto all the reſt of her Company. But as theſe kind of meetings do often cauſe others, ſo after they had viewed all that was to be ſeen at the Caſtle of this great Queen of the Amazons, they deſigned to go unto another place, where it was ſaid that Hercules and Theſeus arrived, when they defeated thoſe valiant Warriors: and where might be ſeen the place where thoſe two Siſters of that Queen, the one named Hippolite, and the other Menalippe, were taken Priſoners by thoſe two Heroes: So that Artaxander, and Cloreliſa being many days together, and uſing much familiarity and talk, there grew betwixt them a kind of League, which I know not what to call. For I underſtood ſince from Artaxander, that his heart was never really touched with any love, and that the affection he had unto Clorelisa was only in his mind: and truly (ſaid he unto me, one day when I preſſed him to tell me his thoughts of her) to teſtifie that my heart is free. I love Clorelisa, becauſe I would love her, and I love her without any diſtemper. But for all that (amiable Doraliſa) Artaxander during this journey was as full of his Gallantry as his wit could furniſh out. If he talked unto her of Hippolite, with whom Theſeus fell in love, after he took her Priſoner, it was to let her underſtand, that he ſhould have had the ſame diſtance, if Hippolite had reſembled her: And if he talked to her of Hercules, when they ſhewed him how he overcame the Amazons; it was alſo to tell her, that ſhe was more valiant than ever they, ſince ſhe could get victories, and make priſoners without any Arms. To be ſhort, though Artaxander did only eſteem Cloreliſa, yet he carried the matter as if he were in love with her: inſomuch as Cloreliſa, who had opinion good enough of her ſelf, believed that he thought as he ſaid, and looked upon him as her Slave. So as returning unto Themiſcyra, with the glory of her Conqueſt, there was none who at her return did not think her much embelliſht; ſo well did her joys become her beauty. But (amiable Doraliſa) before I tell you how Artaxander was eſteemed at Themiſcyra: I muſt tell you that our Town being much divided into Factions, there was a Family which was Enemy unto that of Artaxander, whoſe eldeſt Son, named Tyſemenes, was of the ſame age with him: ſo as chance ſo ordering it, that his Parents ſent him unto the ſame places where Artaxander was. So it happened, that both of them being young, both well born, and never had any jars one with another, meeting both in a ſtrange Country, engaging themſelves in the ſame buſineſs, in the ſame pleaſures, and being far from thoſe who bore all the hatred, they came at length to love one another; and fortune ſent them many occaſions wherein they had need of each other, and accordingly they were ſerviceable unto each other with equal Generoſity. Inſomuch as theſe two reconciled Enemies did promiſe an inviolable Affection, and went unto the Wars together againſt Polycrates.

I ſhall not inſiſt, how they ſignalized themſelves: but ſhall tell you, that ſince this War, Artaxander was called home by Amaldea, and ſo Tyſimenes and he parted: But at parting, they agreed, that they would not publiſh their Reconciliation until they met at Themiſcyra: for ſince the Father of Tyſimenes was violent and fantaſtical, he feared leſt it ſhould incenſe him, and leſſen the exhibition for his ſubſiſtence. Thus this friendſhip being as myſterious as love, it was as violent and tender. In the mean time, this Reconciliation made no noiſe in the Court, and at the return of Artaxander, the talk was that he fell in love with Cloreliſa, at the Caſtle of Orithia: but not a word that he was become the Friend of Tyſimenes during his Travels. Then, to return unto the joys which Cloreliſa had, to think ſhe had ſubdued the heart of Artaxander, I muſt tell you, ſhe talked of nothing elſe. 'Tis true, this joy was a little qualified by the ſharp reprehenſions of Iſalonide, for going that Voyage: for though ſhe went with the permiſſion of her Brother, and with excellent Company, yet ſhe muſt needs make a ſtrange hurley burley about it: upbraiding her, that there was a hundred famous Temples in Cappadocia, unto which ſhe never had any curioſity to go: and yet upon a buſineſs of Gallantry, ſhe muſt go to a place where nothing was remarkale, unleſs an old Story of Amazons: However, Cloreliſa being accuſtomed unto her ſeverity, ſhe cheered up her ſelf preſently againſt her Siſters anger; And ſince Telamire was not well and kept her Chamber, ſhe went to viſit her: for there being a great amity between them, and being equal in quality and age, they uſed to ſee each other very often: Alſo Cloreliſa, in the mind ſhe was, had a mind to ſeek out new Acquaintance, to the end ſhe might have occaſions of relating her Voyage, and talk of Artaxander. There was alſo another reaſon which moved Cloreliſa to ſee Telamire very oft; for you muſt know, that Belenis her Brother was much in love with her, and preſſed her every day, to knit acquaintance with her, to the end ſhe might be able to do him a good office. After that ſhe had quieted Iſalonide, ſhe went unto Telamire, not knowing that the Mother of this Lady had a deſign to marry her unto Artaxander, for there had been no reports of it out of the Family. So that after the firſt Complements, and Cloreliſa had told Telamire, that her ſickneſs had not altered her: and that Telamire alſo had told Cloreliſa, that the Sun had not burned her, Cloreliſa asked her the News of the Town, and Telamire asked her concerning her Voyage. So that having a way ſo eaſie to humour her own inclination, ſhe made her an exact Relation of it, aggravating with extream delight, her meeting with Artaxander. Since I have not ſtirred out of my Chamber of late, (ſaid Telamire unto her) I knew not that Artaxander was returned: but I beſeech you, did you find him handſome enough to render your Voyage the more delightſome. I aſſure you, replied Cloreliſa, I found him to be ſo excellently accompliſhed, as I do not think any one in Themiſcary is more. When one is in an humour to divert ones ſelf, (replied Telamire) one ſhall be pleaſed at any thing, and thoſe who are but meanly accompliſhed, will pleaſe ſometimes better than thoſe who are more can, when that humour is off. No, no, Telamire, (replied Cloreliſa) the eſteem I have of Artaxander, is not grounded upon my pleaſant humour, but upon his own merits, which are ſuch, as to juſtifie the judgment which I have given of him, I will bring him to you: and I will take upon me to chuſe his acquaintance, and his friends for him: for as you know, he parted from Themiſcyra very young, he is now almoſt a ſtranger in his own Country. Certainly, replied Telamire, Artaxander hath found you to be as fair, as he finds you to be accompliſhed, ſince in ſo ſhort a time, he eſteems you ſo much as to let you chuſe his friends and acquaintance for him. However it be, replied ſhe, have not you an ill opinion of Artaxander, becauſe I confeſs unto you, that he hath a good one of me: For the truth is, your compleateſt men are capable of an error once in their lives; and it may be that I am in the ſame of Artaxander. Oh Cloreliſa, replied Telamire, I ſhall rather believe the error is in Artaxander than in you, ſince I am well acquainted with your merits, but with his, not enough to anſwer for him. That you may judge juſtly, replied Clorelisa, I will bring him unto you to morrow: for (added ſhe and ſmiled) ſince it is I who brings him unto you, I muſt not ſtay till you be perfectly well, leſt I ſhould expoſe this friend whom I eſteem ſo much, unto a great danger, if you ſhould ſee him, when you are perfectly recovered. Since he hath ſeen you already, replied Telamire, you have no reaſon to fear any in Themiſcyra, ſince certainly there are none ſo taking as your ſelf: you are diſpoſed to flatter me, replied Clorelisa, but all the ſweet language you can give me this day, will not blot out the wrong you have done me, in telling me I do not know compleat Men, ſince you ſuppoſe I am miſtaken: But to puniſh you, if the fancy take me, I will tell Artaxander that you cannot believe what I ſay of him. Oh, Clorelisa, (cried out Telamire) take heed what you do, for if you ſhould do ſo, I ſhould never pardon you as long as I live. As Clorelisa was ready to anſwer, there came in ſome Ladies, who cauſed the Diſcourſe to change, and moved her to go away, for they were ſuch as did not pleaſe her fancy. In the mean time, ſince Artaxander had a particular intimacy with her, and with all the Ladies with whom ſhe was in their Voyage, he ſaw them every day, and came acquainted with Belemis: ſo that it was an eaſie matter for Clorelisa to keep her word with Telamire. But ſince her deſigns was to be very careful in keeping that conqueſt which ſhe thought ſhe had made, ſhe told Artaxander, when ſhe carried him unto Telamire, that ſhe was carrying him unto a Miſtreſs of her Brothers. But I believe ſhe told him ſo, to the end that he looking upon her, as a perſon who was already engaged unto another, he might have no thoughts of her, in caſe the Charms of Telamire ſhould move his heart more than her own. But that he might not be ſurprized at the beauty of Telamire, ſhe extolled her to the Skie, knowing well, that it was a good way to leſſen the admiration which any great beauty may cauſe at the firſt ſight. At leaſt I do imagine that this was her aim, and my reaſon is, becauſe when ſhe ſpoke of Telamire's beauty unto other Men, ſhe was nothing earneſt in her Elogies. However it was, they came unto this fair ſick one, who doubtleſs deſerved that Epethite; for ſince it was my chance to ſee her that day, I never ſaw her look better in her health. 'Tis true, her diſeaſe was not great, and ſhe was handſomely dreſt; alſo in ſuch a negligent and taking manner, that it was impoſſible to look upon her, and not to love, at leaſt, like her. Alſo Clorelisa, who ſince the return of Artaxander, had much more care of her ſelf than ordinary, was alſo handſomely dreſt that day: but for all that, the negligent and free Garb of Telamire exceeded her; and ſhe appear'd a thouſand times more fair than Clorelisa, though Clorelisa was alſo exceeding well.

Since I had a great ſhare in Telamire's friendſhip, ſhe ſent unto me that morning, to paſs away the afternoon with her: and indeed I came ſo timely, that I was with her, before Clorelisa: but I was no ſooner ſet down, then ſhe asked me, upon what terms I was with Artaxander? for, ſaid ſhe, as we may ſometimes have friends who are not Couſins, ſo alſo we may have Couſins who are not friends. All I can tell you, replied ſhe, is, that Artaxander is certainly an excellent well qualified man, enough both to be my Couſin and my Friend: But being it was not long ſince his return; and ſince his return he hath been continually with Clorelisa, or with thoſe Ladies with whom ſhe was at the Caſtle of Orithea, I know not yet, whether he hold me as his Friend, or will look upon me only as his Couſin. As ſoon as I had ſaid ſo, Artaxander leading Clorelisa, entred: ſo that Clorelisa preſenting him unto Telamire, ſhe received him with much civility, and he ſaluted her with much reſpect. I obſerved, that at the firſt he was ſurprized at the ſight of Telamire, and maugre the the Elogies of Clorelisa, he did not imagine her half ſo fair as he found her. But ſince Clorelisa did doubtleſs obſerve him as well as I, ſhe bluſht for envy, and the more, for caſting her eyes upon a great Glaſs, which was oppoſite to her, wherein ſhe ſaw Telamire, and her ſelf alſo, and maugre the good opinion which ſhe had of her own beauty, ſhe knew that Artaxander had good reaſon to think Telamire fairer than her ſelf: at leaſt there appeared unto me, ſuch a kind of fretting in her countenance, as moved me to make that Interpretation. Alſo I obſerve, that after ſhe had ſeen her ſelf in the Glaſs with Telamire, ſhe changed places, ſaying, that the heat of the day had made her eyes look ill: but doubtleſs the reaſon why ſhe changed places was, becauſe Artaxander ſhould not ſee them both at once, as he might before, and ſo he might not ſo eaſily diſcern the difference between Telamire and her. And indeed, as ſoon as ſhe was removed, and ſtood where ſhe deſired, the vexing feature in her face, me-thought did vaniſh: And deſiring her excellent wit might repair her diſadvantage of beauty, ſhe began to break out into a hundred witty and pleaſing fancies. But though Telamire did not reply with the ſame earneſtneſs that Cloreliſa ſpoke, yet ſhe replied ſo pertinently, and in ſuch an ingenious manner, as made it apparent her Wit was as excellent as her Beauty. At firſt, the diſcourſe was of Cloreliſa's voyage, afterwards of her unexpected meeting with Artaxander, and of the friendſhip ſhe had with him. For my part, ſaid I, I am perſwaded that one may ſee in another enough in ſix daies to eſteem and love them, more than thoſe who know only after anothers information can in ſix months: For when they know them by a third perſon, who prepares the mind with high Elogies, their imaginations are ſo poſſeſſed with ideas of their own, that when they come to ſee, they will not find their fancies and ideas anſwered. Doubtleſs it often happens as you ſay, (replied Artaxander) but not alwaies: And for example, I only need to tell you, that though Cloreliſa told me, Telamire was one of the faireſt perſons in the world, and though I fancied an Idea of all I could think admirable, yet I muſt confeſs unto you, that if I could let you ſee my fancy, you ſhould ſee I had drawn but a very bad Picture of her. That which we uſe to call a bad Picture, replied Telamire, is one, which reſembles not the Perſon for whom it was made, and a Picture which flatters, is as bad a Picture, as that which makes ugly; and ſo I think I may without any vanity, ſay of yours; becauſe perhaps, you found the Idea which you fancied of me, much fairer than I am. Oh Telamire, ſaid Cloreliſa, I am not of your opinion in this, for I can never agree, that a Picture which flatters is a bad Picture; ſince Telamire (replied Artaxander) never had hers which did flatter, becauſe it is impoſſible to be made fairer than her ſelf. I do not wonder ſhe ſhould not know the difference: But I wonder (ſaid he and reprehended himſelf, ſeeing he extolled Telamire ſo much, and Clorelisa ſo little) that you Clorelisa ſhould know it, ſince certainly there can be no Picture taken from you, which does not injure you very much: I pray Axtaxander (ſaid ſhe, and both laughed, and bluſht) do not undertake too many things at once: Either commend Telamire, and not me; or elſe commend me, and not her; for this divided Elogy doth never oblige any. But not to puzzle you in making a choice, which perhaps would not be advantagious unto me, it is better, that ſince you have told what you think of Telamire, Telamire alſo tell what ſhe thinks of you, and whether the Idea which ſhe fancied, be better than what ſhe finds: For to tell you truly, I ſpoke as well of you unto her yeſterday, as I did of her unto you: But I believe ſhe will not admire you ſo much as you do her, becauſe ſince ſhe hath not ſo good an opinion of me as you have, ſhe did not give ſo much credit unto my words, when I commended you, as you did when I commended her. Fie Clorelisa, (ſaid Telamire) you are the moſt cruel woman in the world. Since I ſpeak nothing (replied ſhe) but what I menaced before, me-thinks you ſhould not be ſurprized at it. Telamire then fearing that Artaxander ſhould believe ſhe had ſpoke ſome ſtrange thing concerning him, began to relate the whole diſcourſe which ſhe had with Clorelisa the day before: Confeſſing ingeniouſly, that ſhe did not believe him to be ſo compleat a man, as Clorelisa had repreſented him. Yet I hope (added ſhe) that you will be ſo reaſonable, as not to be offended at what I thought of you, before I knew you; and that you will be ſatisfied with the juſtice I render, now I do know you better. Certainly I ſhall not be offended, Madam, replied Artaxander, at any thoughts you had of me before you knew me; but I am afraid I ſhall have ſome cauſe to be ſorry for your thoughts of me after you know me. Oh heavens (ſaid Clorelisa, not giving Telamire time to anſwer) that ſhe could ſo far miſtake her ſelf; then ſhould I be the beſt pleaſed in the world, if I could upbraid her with want of judgement in compleat men. But I am afraid that I ſhall never have that ſatisfaction; and that on the contrary, you will become ſo much her friend, that I ſhall become yours leſs: And truly I ſhall not take it well, if ſhe ſhould be more yours than mine. Provided that Artaxander be no more my friend than he is yours, replied Telamire and ſmiled, what will it concern you, if I be more his than you are? What will it concern me? (replied Clorelisa!) ah Telamire, it will extreamly concern me; for I am ſure you can never be Artaxanders friend more than I am, unleſs he be more yours than mine. But amiable Clorelisa (ſaid Artaxander, and ſmiled as well as they) ſince you have done me the favour to accept of the Commiſſion which I gave you, to chooſe my friends for me, and ſince you have brought me hither, I hope you had no deſign that I ſhould become the enemy of Telamire. No, replied ſhe, but I had no intention you ſhould be ſo much in her favour, as that I ſhould be out, and yet I am the moſt miſtaken in the world, if this come not to paſs. Though Clorelisa ſpoke this in laughter, yet I aſſure you ſhe feared it in earneſt.

But after this viſit had laſted a long while, ſhe went away: But went away, not knowing what to think upon the matter; ſince Artaxander was ſo charmed with the beauty of Telamire, that his memory ſtood in need of all its helps, to remember whether he had not commended her too highly in ſpeaking unto Clorelisa. Yet ſince he had much ado to talk of any thing elſe, becauſe his imagination was wholly taken up with her, he talked leſs than uſual all that day: Which Clorelisa obſerved well enough, as ſhe told me afterwards, to her grief. But that which vexed her more the next day was, that ſhe underſtood by me of the Ladies, whom Artaxander ſaw with her the firſt time he ever met her, that he had ſo extolled the beauty of Telamire, as ſhe never heard a higher commendation in all her life. So as conſidering that he hardly ſpake unto her, ſhe conjectured, that his thoughts were wholly upon Telamire, and not upon her. Yet ſince ſhe had a good opinion of her ſelf, and ſhe never had any ſlave who brake her chains, ſhe could not believe that Artaxander could break thoſe fetters which ſhe had (as ſhe thought) laid upon him. So as not ſeeming to be troubled at it, ſhe lived with him as ſhe begun, gun, to wit, in much friendſhip. But a little while after, underſtanding that Artaxander had been ſeveral times with Telamire and never told her, ſhe was in a ſtrange fume, for then ſhe thought that he loved Telamire better than her. Yet to excuſe her credulity, I muſt ſay, that Artaxander being inſenſible, engaged to complement with her, as if he were in love, he knew not how to make a Retreat. So as, though his heart was full of violent paſſion unto Telamire, yet he talked unto Clorelisſa as he uſed, and the rather, becauſe he did really intend to ſtifle that growing affection which he had unto Telamire, and to lock up his heart both againſt the one and the other; conceiting that ſimple Gallantry without any ingredient of Love, was much more pleaſing and agreeable than a violent paſſion could be. Thus he continued to talk unto Clorelisſa, as thoſe who uſe to talk of Love, but never mean it. 'Tis true, he continued not long at eaſe.

In the mean time Clorelisſa, whoſe heart was really engaged, diſcanting upon the ſtate wherein ſhe was, conſidered which way ſhe might prevent Artaxander from ſeeing Telamire, or at leaſt from contracting any friendſhip with her. At firſt, ſhe thought it expedient to fall out with Telamire, and oblige Artaxander to the like, in taking her part; but conſidering upon a ſudden, that perhaps ſhe was not able to win him unto ſuch a thing, ſhe feared, that if ſhe ſhould ſee her no more, yet he would, and ſo ſhe ſhould not be able to interrupt their converſation by her preſence; ſo as reſentment of jealouſie cauſing her to take up a contrary deſign, ſhe reſolved to make a ſhew of moſt tender friendſhip unto Telamire, and to ſee her ſo oft, that Artaxander ſhould never ſee her, without her: And to puzzle him the more, ſhe obliged Belemis her Brother, to diſcover unto Artaxander, the love he bore unto Telamire, and to deſire his aſſiſtance, telling him, that he knew Telamire did infinitely eſteem him, and that he was the fitteſt man he could chooſe for a Confident: And indeed Belemis uſed all his endeavours to get the friendſhip of Artaxander: and following the adviſe of Clorelisſa, he truſted him with the very ſecrets of his heart, and diſcovered his paſſion unto him, conjuring him to aſſiſt him as far as he could. You may imagine, that Artaxander was put to great puzzle. For it was not likely he ſhould tell him that he was his Rival, conſidering how his caſe ſtood with his Siſter; and it was alſo impoſſible to do for him, as he deſired. However Belemis deſiring this favour from him in a blunt ſouldierlike way, which was natural unto him, he hardly knew what to ſay unto him; yet Artaxander having an excellent wit, he excuſed himſelf as well as he could. Sir, ſaid he unto him, I am much obliged unto you for the Confidence you are pleaſed to put in me: But Belemis, if you will give me leave to ſpeak freely what I think, I muſt ingeniouſly confeſs unto you, that I am the worſt Agent upon earth in any ſuch matters; and the only reaſon why I will never undertake to ſerve my friends in any ſuch waies of Love, is, becauſe I am fully perſwaded that I ſhould do them more hurt than good; and that in ſuch caſes as theſe one ought to imploy none but themſelves; for truly a friend in ſuch caſes, doth often more harm than a Rival. And indeed, can you imagine that if Telamire ſhould know that you impart all ſhe tells you unto me, and all that you tell her, ſhe will not be rigorous towards you? No, no Belemis, deceive not your ſelf: But be aſſured a Miſtreſs will ever be ſevere, if ſhe know that her Lover hath any Confident, for ſhe will truſt her Lover with many more ſecrets than ſhe will his friend: Therefore all I can promiſe you is, to ſpeak of you unto Telamire, according to my own reſentments, when any occaſion offers it ſelf; for otherwiſe I ſhould prejudice you more than you imagine. Since Belemis had not the leaſt ſuſpition that Artaxander was his Rival: but on the contrary, thought him to be in love with Clorelisa, he only deſired him at the leaſt to give him his beſt adviſe. And ſince Artaxander had no pretence to refuſe that, he conſented unto it, and the rather, becauſe it was ſome ſweetneſs unto him, to hear all the complaints which he made of Telamire. And this ſweetneſs he often taſted, for ſince there was ſcarce a day on which he did not receive ſome new piece of Cruelty from that fair One, he was continually condoling with Artaxander.

On the other ſide, Clorelisa according to her deſign, was ſo full of complaiſance unto Telamire, and was ſo very officiouſly ſerviceable, that Telamire did really believe ſhe loved her very tenderly: And ſhe had one advantage by ſeeing her every day: For ſince Telamire had the reputation of extraordinary vertue, the ſevere Iſalonide could find no fault with her Siſter. And indeed ſhe was ſo very frequently with her, that ſhe was almoſt no where elſe. You may well think, that it was a cruel torment unto Artaxander, to be continually talking unto one whom he loved not, and not to be able to talk unto her whom he did love. In the mean time, he was extreamly perplexed to ceaſe the telling Clorelisa that he loved her, and to begin the telling Telamire that he adored her: Moreover, the confidence of Belemis became very troubleſome unto him; and he grew at laſt ſo deep in Love, and vexed, that all were intollerable to him. And indeed, his paſſion became ſo ſtrong in a few daies, that he cared not much what Clorelisa, or Belemis ſhould think, though they did know he loved Telamire: But the great trouble of his ſpirits was, to let the fair Telamire know what thoughts he had of her. Since Clorelisa and Belemis were continually with Telamire, it was a very hard matter for him to find her alone: And he was a long time in hopes of Clorelisa's being ſick, that ſhe might keep her Chamber, and when that occaſion did offer it ſelf, he was as much troubled to find Telamire with her: For Clorelisa's eyes were no ſooner open the morning, but the jealouſies of her ſoul, moved her to ſend unto Telamire, and to entreat her, ſhe would be pleaſed to have ſome pity upon her in her ſickneſs, and to ſee her as ſoon as ſhe had dined, for if ſhe did not, it would be a great addition of inquietude in her ſickneſs. So that Telamire thinking that Clorelisa loved her very dearly, ſhe went betimes unto her; and forcing her inclination, which did not naturally love Clorelisa, ſhe anſwered her ſeeming friendſhip by a thouſand expreſſions of her ſervice and care; and particularly in her diligence and aſſiduity in this her ſickneſs. Thus for the firſt daies of her ſickneſs, it was impoſſible for Artaxander to find her any where but with Cleorisa: And by reaſon of Algaſtus the father of Telamire, he would not offer to make any viſits at ſuch times as decency did not permit. But at laſt, hitting his time in the nick, he came one morning into Telamire's Chamber, as ſhe was looking her ſelf in a Glaſs, and putting on her Hood to go unto Clorelisa: And ſince ſhe was already very familiar with him, ſhe continued putting it on, after ſhe had ſaluted him, ſuppoſing that he would go with her to ſee Clorelisa, and making the propoſition very civily unto him. Did I not know (ſaid ſhe unto him) that Clorelisa was your friend before I was yours, and that you cannot take it ill I ſhould pay what I owe unto her merits, in lieu of putting on my Hood, I would take it off, and regularly receive your viſit. But ſince I do imagine you would have us go together to comfort this fair ſick Perſon, I am as free with you as Clorelisa her ſelf would be. I ſhould think my ſelf very unhappy, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) if you ſhould think I would croſs any of your intentions: But, Madam, (ſaid he cunningly unto her, to hinder her from going ſo ſoon.) As I was coming hither, I ſent to know how ſhe did, and I underſtood ſhe was not awake, and therefore if you will not diſturb her, you will not go ſo ſoon. But if you pleaſe, Madam, I will ſend one of my men to wait until ſhe be awake, and then bring us word: For in my opinion it is better ſtaying here than in her outer Chamber. Telamire believing this, ſent one of her women, to bid one of Artaxander's ſervants go unto Clorelisa: But Artaxander ſeeming as if he had ſome other buſineſs with him, went haſtily to Telamire's Chamber door, and commanded the man to be two hours before he returned; and if any of Telamire's ſervants came to know whether Clorelisa were awake, not to let him ſpeak unto any of the houſe, but to tell him, that ſhe was not. This order being given, Axtaxander returned to Telamire, who cauſed a Stool to be ſet for him, and ſhe began to talk of Clorelisa, thinking no diſcourſe could be more pleaſing to him: For ſhe could not imagine that Clorelisa ſhould love him, unleſs he had loved her. In the mean time, though his deſign was to diſcover his paſſion unto her, yet it was long before he durſt tell her his thoughts. But ſince he could not ſo well hide his inquietudes, but Telamire obſerved him, ſhe imagined that the reaſon was becauſe he was troubled at Clorelisa: But, Artaxander, (ſaid ſhe unto him) me thinks you are very melancholy, is not the reaſon of it becauſe you fear Clorelisa's ſhould be ſick this morning? No, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, tranſported by his paſſion) but it is, becauſe Artaxander is much worſe to day, than he was yeſterday; and I believe will every day be worſe and worſe. If Artaxander be ſick (replied ſhe and laughed) appearances are very fallacious: So they are, replied he, and to give you an example; Does not all in Themiſcyra believe that I am in love Clorelisa? Yet it is moſt certainly true that I am not: And if I were no more in love with an admirable Lady, whom I dare not name, than I am with her, I ſhould be much more happy than I am. Telamire hearing Artaxander ſpeak ſo, ſhe began to ſuſpect the truth: And to ſtop his mouth from any more of that diſcourſe, ſhe turned the talk to ſome thing elſe. No, no, Artaxander, (ſaid ſhe unto him) never take ſo much pains to deceive me, for I am more complaiſant unto my friends than you imagine me, and as ſoon as I perceive they have a deſign to make me believe a thing, I ſeem as if I were perſwaded of it; and ſo I will tell you, if you pleaſe, that I do believe you love not Clorelisa, but that you love ſome other: Yet for your own tranquility, I ſhould be ſorry it were ſo, for I am confident you will have much ado to perſwade that other to believe that you do not love Clorelisa: However, I pray give me leave to ſend one of my ſervants, and know whether ſhe be yet awake, for I believe that he whom you ſent, is as faſt aſleep as ſhe is: and ſhe ſent one accordingly. But the prudence of Artaxander foreſeeing the impatience of Telamire, the man whom he ſent to Clorelisa's, meeting the other, and asking him whither he went, and being anſwered to ſee whether Clorelisa were awake, he told him, that he could ſave him that labour, for he was newly come from thence, and one of her women ſaid, ſhe was not yet awake: So as Telamire's ſervant without any further enquiry, returned to tell Telamire, that Clorelisa was ſtill aſleep. It is very ſtrange, (ſaid Telamire, and looked upon Artaxander) for I have heard her ſay, ſhe ſeldom ſleeps, but dreams; and I am confident that at this very hour, ſhe is with me,though I am not with her. If ſo, Madam, replied Artaxander, then ſhe is with one, who may if ſhe pleaſe, plainly perceive whether I love Cloreliſa, or no. I have already told you, replied Telamire, that I am ſo complaiſant, as to believe, or at leaſt, ſeem to believe, whatſoever my friends would have me. Then Madam, believe that I do not love Cloreliſa, nor ever did: and if I had boldneſs enough, I would conjure you to believe alſo, that I am extremely in love with the faireſt Lady in the world, a Lady over whom you have more power than I wiſh you had. As Telamire was ready to anſwer, a ſervant of Cloreliſa's entred, who ſaid, That his Miſtreſs extremely wondering ſhe came not to ſee her, had ſent him to know how ſhe did, and what the reaſon was which debarred her from that ſatisfaction. Telamire ſurprized at this, did look upon Artaxander, who without any amazement told the ſervant, that it was himſelf, who kept Telamire from Cloreliſa, becauſe one of her men told him ſhe was not awake. That which made Telamire moſt to wonder, was that ſhe had ſent a ſervant of her own, and this ſervant being not in the houſe, ſhe conceived that it was only ſome miſtake between Cloreliſa's ſervants and hers: So as making her ſelf ready to go preſently unto her, ſhe gave her hand unto Artaxander, ſuppoſing he would go with her. And to let him ſee, ſhe made no application of what he had ſpoken, unto her ſelf. Though I do believe, ſaid ſhe unto him, that you are not in love with Cloreliſa, yet I cannot chooſe but think you will viſit her, ſince you cannot deny her the advantage of being the firſt friend you had in Themiſcyra: and I will be the more earneſt in maintaining her right in that, becauſe I pretend to be in the ſecond place your friend. Oh, Madam, (ſaid he) whether I be in love with Cloreliſa, or no, I am ſure ſhe hath not ſo high a rank in my heart as you have, though ſhe be a perſon whom I much honour and eſteem. Since Telamire's houſe was very nigh unto Cloreliſa's, they had not leiſure to ſay any more. And ſince one of Telamire's women might hear them, Artaxander was forced to talk of ſomething elſe. However, as ſoon as they were come into Cloreliſa's Chamber, ſhe chid Tela- mire a thouſand times, and that with a ſtrange agitation of heart: for ſince ſhe ſaw Artaxander with her, ſhe imagined him to be the cauſe of her ſtay; but ſhe was much worſe, when Telamire to juſtifie her ſelf did tell her all the paſſages: yet Artaxander did ſtill affirm very confidently, that they aſſured him ſhe was aſleep: But ſince the heart of Clorelisa was too much engaged to be deluded, ſhe would needs look into the matter a little nearer; and calling all her women one after another, they all ſaid, that they ſaw none, either from Artaxander, or Clorelisa. Artaxander then told her, that certainly ſome of the ſervants unto Belemis to ſave themſelves the labour of coming to her, had told this lie. But ſay what he would or could, Clorelisa was not ſatisfied, and ſhe was fully perſwaded, that this was a trick of Artaxander's, and ſhe thought alſo that Telamire was an acceſſary unto it: for ſince ſhe aſſured her very earneſtly that ſhe had ſent unto her houſe, and ſince all her women on the contrary aſſured her, that none came from her, ſhe did not only think Artaxander to be in love with Telamire, but ſhe thought that Telamire held a greater correſpondency with Artaxander than ever ſhe imagined: ſo as jealouſie having poſſeſſion in her mind, ſhe was tormented beyond expreſſion: and ſhe who was ſo earneſt in ſending for Telamire, knew not now what to ſay unto her. Since I came in a little after this confuſed examination of the matter, I could plainly perceive the turbulency of Clorelisa's mind: all I could obſerve was, the confuſion of Artaxander, and the prudence of Telamire. For truly this wiſe Lady, taking no notice of Artaxander's love, nor of Clorelisa's jealouſie, did ſpeak unto every thing with a marvellous moderation, and tranquility: and certainly I came in very opportunately to help out with diſcourſe. However, I made her ſince confeſs, that ſhe could not chuſe but find ſome ſweetneſs in thinking that though Clorelisa loved Artaxander, yet he did not love her; and that the glory to be preferred before ſuch an amiable Perſon was ſome delight unto her. For my part, I was exceedingly delighted with the paſſages of that day; for beſides the pleaſure of ſeeing how Clorelisa and Artaxander, were put to a Non-plus, I was extremely taken with ſeeing Belemis in his fierce Garb, who knowing that Telamire was in his Siſters Chamber, came thither to ſee her. But he came (amiable Doraliſa) more like a Conquerour than a Captive: not but that all he ſaid unto her was very civil and reſpective; yet his Air and Garb did alter the very ſenſe of his words, and made him ſeem as if he intended to fetter her, whoſe chains he wore. Moreover, ſince he could not chooſe but be talking as much of matters of war as love, he was ſo full of his Martial phraſes, as that day I learned as many Military Terms as might ſerve for the Relation of all ſorts of Combats, for he uſed them all in his diſcourſe: ſo as before 'twas night, I knew what Incampment and Quarters were: I knew what the firſt, ſecond and third Diviſions did mean; I learned all the Poſtures, to the Right hand; to the Left; As you were; Double your Ranks and Files. And I knew from him that day, at leaſt enough to loſe a Battel, if I had commanded an Army. And to be ſerious with you, he was ſo full of words peculiar unto War, that all I could do, was to remember them, though as yet I did not know the ſignifications of them: But to compleat my diverſion, The ſevere Iſalonide entred, who commonly finding fault with every thing, did not like that Cloreliſa ſhould be ſo dreſſed, ſince ſhe was ſick; ſaying openly, That thoſe ſickneſſes which only draw company about One, and will let one be dreſſed better than when they are well, were of a moſt dangerous conſequence. For indeed, ſaid ſhe, If one were really ſick, they ſhould ſee none but ſuch as could cure them, or their very intimate friends; and not do as moſt women now adays, who are more careful in conſulting with their Glaſs, before company come, then with their Phyſician: And are more diligent in advertiſing all their acquaintance that they keep their Chamber than thoſe that can cure them. And to tell you truly, they have a greater deſire to have them come who can tell them a thouſand tittle tattles, than ſuch as uſe to cure diſeaſes. But (ſaid I unto her, to do Cloreliſa a pleaſure) if you did but know how much melancholy doth augment all manner of diſeaſes, you would ſay, that pleaſant company may be put in the rank of the moſt infallible ble Remedies. If you ſhould ask the advice of my ſiſter (anſwered ſhe in a moſt Imperious Tone) I am ſure ſhe will be of your opinion, and maintain that all manner of Simples uſed in Phyſick are not comparable to the company of five or ſix ſuch tittle tattles as are glad to hear of any ſick Gallant, who are ſick only becauſe they ſhould come and ſee them. I muſt confeſs unto you (ſaid Clorelisa, and bluſht for anger) that I have been ſuch a one as you ſpeak of, but at this time I am ſo ill, that much Company are very troubleſome unto me: Telamire hearing Clorelisa ſay ſo, did riſe up, and offered to go away: but Clorelisa out of jealouſie, as well as friendſhip, took hold of her and ſaid, that ſhe was neither weary of her nor me. Then it is of me, replied Artaxander: But if ſo, I beſeech you ſpeak unto Telamire to command me away, for ſince I had the honour to wait upon her hither, I expect that command from her. You may eaſily judg how Clorelisa reſented Artaxander's diſcourſe; yet ſhe could make no anſwer unto it: for her ſiſter being very glad to ſee that once in her life ſhe was weary of company, deſired Telamire that ſhe would move Artaxander to go away: And Belemis alſo, thinking that Clorelisa was really ſick, he went out, and Artaxander alſo: Yet it was not before Telamire had diſpenced with him, from the Civility which he offered But Clorelisa's ſpight did ſo encreaſe, that her ſpirits were ſo turbulent all the reſt of the day, as Telamire and I did not think it fit to ſtay any longer: And ſo we left her with Iſalonide, who I do believe was troubleſome enough unto her. However, ſince I went home with Telamire, and could not chooſe but talk of Clorelisa I told her how I feared that Artaxander was in love with her: So as in the confidence ſhe had in my friendſhip, though I was Artaxander's Couſin, ſhe told me all paſſages betwixt her ſelf and him: adding, how infinitely ſorry ſhe ſhould be, if Artaxander ſhould be in love with her, and Clorelisa jealous. For the firſt of theſe, repli'd I, you need not doubt it: and for the laſt, you may be moſt certainly ſure of it. And indeed the event made it evident, I was not miſtaken, for the truth is, Clorelisa was as jealous, as Artaxander was in love with Telamire. There was a hundred trivial paſſages, which ſerved to augment this paſſion of jealouſie in the heart of Clorelisa; Inſomuch as not being able to live in ſuch uncertainties, ſhe did drive Artaxander to the neceſſity either of ſeeing Telamire no more, or of ſeeing her no more: but he making choice of the laſt, Clorelisa added unto her jealouſie and love, a moſt terrible deſire of revenge. And in order hereunto, ſhe would not ceaſe ſeeing Telamire, though ſhe hated her as much as ſhe loved Artaxander: for it is the cuſtome of ſuch as are jealous, to hate the lovers who forſake them, almoſt as much as thoſe for whom they are forſaken. However, to ſpight Artaxander, ſhe continued her aſſiduous ſeeing of Telamire. 'Tis true, Telamire did not think her ſelf at all obliged unto her for her viſits, for ſhe underſtood by many with whom ſhe converſed, that Clorelisa did ſpeak very diſadvantagiouſly of her: yet ſince ſhe was always very wiſe, ſhe would not make a buſineſs of it, but contented her ſelf to diſſemble it out, as well as the other: And I am perſwaded, that her ſpight againſt Clorelisa did contribute ſomething unto her allowance of Artaxander's paſſion, whom ſhe did eſteem very highly: Inſomuch, as taking to heart the intention which her late Mother had of marrying her unto him, ſhe was perſwaded that ſhe might innocently permit him to love her: ſo as accuſtoming her ſelf by degrees to let him talk more freely of his love, than formerly ſhe had, they came at laſt to be ſo kind, as ſhe permitted him to believe that ſhe did not hate him, and ſo both their Parents would conſent, that he might hope to be happy. Yet ſhe had much ado to make him ſuch a favourable Declaration: for you muſt know, that Artaxander did not find ſo much difficulty in perſwading that he loved her, as to make her believe that he was never in love with Clorelisa: for ſhe always told him, That if he were inconſtant, ſhe would not accept of his Affection. Thus Artaxander for a long time did nothing elſe but proteſt, that he never loved Clorelisa further than the degree of a Friend: and that though ſhe did interpret his thoughts otherwiſe than ſhe ought, yet he was not to blame. But Artaxander having wit enough, which was alſo whetted by a moſt violent paſſion, he uſed ſo many elegant, amorous, and perſwaſive arguments, that at laſt (as I told you) he overcame her. In the mean time Artaxander did by degrees deſert Belemis, and ceaſe being his Confident. And ſince he reſolved to love Telamire as long as life was in him, he thought it not handſome to delude him. Thus being diſobliged, both from the Brother and the Siſter, he applied himſelf ſo wholly to love Telamire, as he could hardly live out of her ſight. Yet one thing did moſt ſenſibly afflict him: which was, that Amaldea (who knew that Algaſtus, Telamire's Father, intended to marry again) did not approve of that which before ſhe ſo much wiſhed: but ſince he hoped to perſwade Telamire, not to value her conſent, he enjoyed many pleaſing hours, maugre all the jealouſie of Cloreliſa: meeting almoſt every day, with an opportunity of talking with Telamire, and not over-heard by Cloreliſa. Things being upon theſe terms, and Cloreliſa foreſeeing that unleſs ſhe undermined Artaxander, he would ere long marry Telamire, ſhe took the oddeſt Reſolution in the World: for her deſign of revenge was ſo high, that ſhe cared not to ſacrifice even her very life unto it: And this was her invention. I already told you, that Algaſtus though very old, yet had a mind to marry again, and to marry both a young and a fair Perſon, not valuing Riches, ſo her Quality was good: but ſince he was very far on in years, he could not meet with ſuch a one as would marry him. Yet in his Queſt of ſuch a Wife, he imployed a ſort of ſuch People, whoſe trade is to make Matches: And Cloreliſa underſtanding this, reſolved to carry the matter ſo, that ſhe would marry Algaſtus; That ſo being a Mother in law unto her Rival, ſhe might baniſh Artaxander her Houſe, and imploy all the favour ſhe had with her Husband, to hinder his conſent unto Artaxander's marriage. So that meeting wherewith both to ſatisfie her Revenge, and her Ambition, for Algaſtus was very rich, ſhe reſolved to paſs away her life with a Man whom ſhe could not poſſibly love. And when ſhe conſidered how joyed ſhe ſhould be to hinder Artaxander both from marrying Telamire, and coming to her Houſe, the crazy age of Algaſtus was no obſtacle to hinder the execution of her deſign.

And indeed, Cloreliſa perceiving how her Brother grieved that he could not move the heart of Telamire, ſhe put the whole buſineſs upon his ſcore, and ſeemed as if ſhe only aimed at his happineſs by it: Inſomuch, as making the Propoſition unto him, he gave her a thouſand thanks: But as fierce as he was, he ſeemed unwilling ſhe ſhould make her ſelf miſerable for his ſake. Yet notwithſtanding, ſeeing that if ſhe married Algaſtus, ſhe would get ſo much power over him to procure his marriage with Telamire, or at leaſt ſtave off his Rival, he reſolved to further her deſign. Moreover, ſince Iſalonide, was eternally upbraiding Cloreliſa with her too much Galantry, ſhe told her, that to teſtifie ſhe was able to leave it off when ſhe pleaſed, ſhe would marry Algaſtus, which if ever ſhe did, ſhe muſt wholly alter the manner of her life. And that ſhe might think there was ſome poſſibility in the deſign, ſhe told her, that a Perſon of her acquaintance aſſured her, that if ſhe managed the mind of Algaſtus handſomely, and kept the buſineſs ſecret, it would produce a happy effect: So ſhe imployed all her wits to bring it about. And ſince ſhe was acquainted with all the Women in Themiſcyra, which were of her own humour, and who thought as ſhe did, that if one be vertuous, one muſt be auſtere in all their Actions, ſhe made choice of one, whoſe age, behaviour, and dreſs, did ſpeak her a Piece of moſt ſevere prudence: whoſe voice was all gravity, whoſe words were weighed, and whoſe walk was ſo compoſed, as if ſhe counted every ſtep. So that after ſhe had choſen this perſon to propound Cloreliſa unto Algaſtus; ſhe reaſoned upon the matter with her, and they both concluded, that an action of greater vertue could not be, than making up this marriage: ſince it would be an infallible cure of Cloreliſa's Galantry. So as theſe two Women negotiating together, and engaging the whole Crew of this Vertue in Themiſcyra to be in the Plot, they propoſed the Match unto Algaſtus, who not uſing to communicate his deſigns of marriage unto his Daughter, did keep it ſecret from her, as he had done all the reſt. At firſt he gave no favourable anſwer unto the motion, becauſe he was afraid that Cloreliſa would be too great a Gallant for him. But in concluſion, all theſe Ladies of a ſevere Garb, which interreſted themſelves in this marriage, did ſo aſſure him that Clorelisa had quite forſaken the World, and that ſhe would ſo well conform her ſelf unto him, that he reſolved to ſee her, at one of theſe Ladies Houſes. Not but that he had ſeen her a hundred times before; but yet he would talk with her, before he concluded any thing: and accordingly this meeting was the next day. You may well imagine, that the mind of Clorelisa was far from any tranquility; But for all that, not caring to be revenged upon her ſelf, ſo ſhe could be revenged upon Artaxander, ſhe ſaw Algaſtus, and knew ſo well how to fit her Diſcourſe, that he thought himſelf to be in love with her. I ſay he thought ſo, (amiable Doraliſa) becauſe I make ſome ſcruple, whether I can call this doting fancy in the mind of an old Man, Love , when he would marry a young and fair Woman: and me-thinks that paſſion and old age are ſo unſuitable, that without any injuſtice it may rather be called folly: making a doubt, whether it be poſſible that love ſhould be in their hearts, as they think it is. But to return unto Algaſtus; whether he thought that he loved Cloreliſa, or whether he did really love her, it was a buſineſs concluded upon in a few days : and it was carried ſo cloſely, that neither Telamire, nor Artaxander knew of it, until the Eve before the marriage of Algaſtus: And they knew it in ſuch an amazing manner, as did much augment their ſorrows. For ſince that Cloreliſa would not have married but only for revenge ſhe would undertake to make it known unto Telamire: aſſuring Algaſtus, that ſhe was ſo confident of her friendſhip, as ſhe did not doubt but ſhe would be very glad of it: and indeed Cloreliſa told it unto Telamire, as if ſhe had thought ſo. But to the end, ſhe might better guſt the ſweetneſs of Revenge, ſhe ſent unto Telamire in the morning, to tell her, ſhe deſired to ſpeak with her after Dinner, for ſhe had a buſineſs of great joy to impart unto her. Though any thing which came from Cloreliſa was always held in ſuſpition by Telamire, yet now ſhe imagined that ſhe had ſomething to tell which would pleaſe her: ſo that ſhe expected her at her own Chamber, giving orders that none ſhould enter, no not Artaxander himſelf. So that Clorelisa being come, with her Eyes full of joy, as if it had proceeded from her heart, ſhe gave Telamire abundance of flattering language: After which, affecting a modeſt kind of ſhame, which would not let her ſpeak out: I profeſs Telamire, ſaid ſhe unto her, I am much more troubled than you can imagine, to tell you a thing which is fit you ſhould know. Then it is not ſuch pleaſing buſineſs as you ſent me word, replied Telamire: Pardon me, replied Clorelisa, for I am confident loving me as you do, you will be as much joyed as I am: and I aſſure you, I am upon a Reſolution, which, but for your ſake I ſhould never undertake. That I may acknowledge my obligations, replied Telamire, I beſeech you let me me know what they are. I will, (replied Clorelisa) provided I have power ſo to do. After this, ſhe told her, That it was true, Algaſtus had a long time courted her for his Wife, but ſhe refuſing him, he was upon marriage with another, which was the oddeſt and moſt fantaſtical perſon in the World, and that this marriage was almoſt concluded: Alſo ſince he always did me the favour, to prefer me before any other, and being reſolved to marry my Siſter, if I did not change my mind, I conſidered that it would have been the greateſt grief in the World unto you, if he had married ſuch a fantaſtical Woman, and on the contrary, the greateſt joy, to know he would marry me: So I aſſure you, I did not ſo much inſiſt upon obedience unto my Parents, or ſatisfaction unto my ſelf, as to hinder you from having a Mother in law, who would never have been ſo kind unto you as I do intend to be. Therefore ſince you were ever to expect a Mother in law, I conceive you would be glad that I was ſhe; and I muſt further tell you, that to morrow my marriage is to be. But let me once more tell you, my dear Temalire, that it is you only that makes the marriage, and it is only for your ſake, I do intend to venture upon all thoſe bitters, which are unſeparable from that condition. As long as Clorelisa talked, Telamira lookt moſt attentively upon her, to ſee by her Eyes whether ſhe ſpake ſeriouſly: and finding nothing which might make her ſuſpect the contrary, ſhe grew extreamly ſad: not that ſhe cared for her Fathers marriage, but that Cloreliſa ſhould be one whom to morrow ſhe muſt obey; this was an unſpeakable torment: However, ſince ſhe was ever very wiſe, ſhe did what ſhe could to conceal her ſorrows, and look joyfully with her Eyes: but her hardeſt task was to keep her Tongue from betraying the thoughts of her Heart, when ſhe told Clorelisa, ſhe was very glad of her choice. But her looks were ſo full of melancholy, that ſhe gave Clorelisa an excellent occaſion of Revenge: But ſhe ſtood upon Thorns, until Artaxander did partake of Telamire's ſorrows, and therefore ſhe left her, knowing very well ſhe would impart it unto him, as ſoon as ſhe was at liberty: And ſo it was, for Clorelisa was no ſooner gone out of Telamire's Chamber, but he entred, and received with a ſad heart this unwelcome news. How, (cried he out) is Clorelisa to marry Algaſtus? Yes, replied Telamire, and to morrow muſt begin her commands upon me; nor can I diſobey her without going againſt the Rules of Decency, though ſhe is my moſt mortal Enemy; and though I certainly foreſee ſhe will make me the moſt miſerable Woman in the World. Alas, alas, (cried out Artaxander) I am afraid ſhe will make me as miſerable as you: and that you being continually with one who hates me, ſhe will cauſe you and Algaſtus both to hate me alſo. Did Clorelisa hate you, replied Telamire, I ſhould not fear ſo much as I do. But Artaxander, Cloraliſa doth not hate you; and I am moſt confident, ſhe does not marry my Father, but only to be revenged upon me, becauſe ſhe loves you whether you will or no, and I wiſh you would deliver me once from this Perſecution which is coming upon me. I wiſh to the gods, Madam, with all my heart (ſaid he) that I could imagine which way I could deliver you from falling into the power of my Enemy, and Siſter of my Rival, but I muſt confeſs, I know not how. And yet you eaſily may (replied Telamire) for I am confident, if you would marry Clorelisa, ſhe would not marry Algaſtus, though ſhe were in the Church with him, and tho ſhe were ready to pronounce that terrible word, which ties as long as one lives. Oh, Madam, (cried Artaxander) what a moſt terrible motion is this? Is it poſſible you ſhould wiſh me ſo much miſery? For to tell me you would have me marry Cloreliſa, is to tell me you will never marry Artaxander; to aſſure me you love him not, that you have an ill opinion of him, and that you wiſh him all imaginable ill, ſince you wiſh him to marry one whom you hate, and who hates you: Oh Telamire, did I underſtand you right? Is it poſſible your heart and your tongue ſhould agree? Yes, Artaxander, replied ſhe, they do; but I aſſure you at the ſame time, that I find my ſelf to be in a moſt lamentable condition; for I do foreſee, ſuch dangeorus conſequences of this marriage, that I am in one moment ſenſible of many years torments. I do not only foreſee Cloreliſa commanding me, but Iſalonide upbraiding me at every turn; and alſo I ſee Belemis, looking upon me as the ſubject rather of his valour than his love: and yet all this without any remedy, but poor uncomfortable complaints: yet I muſt ſeem to be all joy, for that very thing which cauſeth my greateſt ſorrows: I muſt obey one who hates me, one whom I hate. You need not, Madam, unleſs you will, replied Artaxander: and your only way to prevent it, is to make me happy. For I am perſwaded that a Father who marries again, doth loſe ſomething of that lawful Authority which he had over his Children: and ſince Algaſtus looks only to his own ſatiſfaction, and never thinks of yours, you may very well ſeek out ways to accord the tyranny of Cloreliſa. No, no, Artaxander, (ſaid ſhe unto him) I cannot do as you propound, ſince it is more juſt to obey Cloreliſa, than diſobey reaſon. After this, Artaxander uſed all his winning arguments to move her unto marriage without the conſent of Algaſtus. But ſtill Telamire anſwered, that ſhe would never do any thing againſt the Rules of obedience: and that ſhe ſhould be leſs miſerable by doing what duty required, than by not doing it. In the mean time, the more ſhe made her vertue appear, the more love and ſorrow appeared in his Eyes: for when he conſidered that he was a cauſe of the affections in Telamire's Soul, his did infinitely augment. On the other ſide, Algaſtus being returned home, after he underſtood that Cloreliſa had acquainted Telamire with his marrige, Artaxander was forced to go away, becauſe Algaſtus ſent for his Daughter: Thus theſe two Lovers parted with extream ſorrow. Yet Telamire was careful to conceal hers, leaſt her father ſhould think that ſome intereſt of her own moved her to grieve at his marriage. And ſhe conſtrained her ſelf ſo well, that he did not perceive the ſadneſs of her heart; but on the contrary, believed that ſhe was glad (ſince he would marry again) he would marry Clorelisa: and he was ſo fully perſwaded of it, that he deſired her to have a care the Feaſt for his marriage ſhould be Magnificent. And indeed Telamire ſo ordered every thing as if ſhe were the moſt joyed perſon in the world at this marriage; at which were preſent none but the Family of Algaſtus, and that of Clorelisa. For beſides the age of Algaſtus, which did not require a great aſſembly, Iſalonide would not allow it. As for Artaxander, he ſighed away all that day with me, and lamented his misfortune, thinking it to be the greater, becauſe Belemis was to dwell with Algaſtus; ſo that though until then, he was never jealous of him, yet now he began, and feared leſt Clorelisa ſhould move Algaſtus to command Telamire to marry Belemis. But ſaid I unto him, though I do allow you to lament that Telamire ſhould come under the power of Clorelisa, who is both her Rival, and her enemy, yet I cannot endure you ſhould be jealous of Belemis. You know very well, (added I) that he is more like to make her fear him, than love him: and that Telamire ever had a ſtrange averſion unto all ſuch men whoſe Aſpects were always as if they were ready to fight. Ah Erenice, (ſaid he unto me) I did not fear that Telamire would ever love Belemis until now, nor did I ever ſuſpect her Conſtancy: But now, I muſt ſadly confeſs, I am extremely afraid of her vertue. For I am ſure, that if ſhe hold the opinion that ſhe ought not to diſobey Algaſtus, ſhe will marry Belemis for all his grim Martial looks, though ſhe were ſure it would kill her. And who knows (Erenice) whether ſhe will accuſtom her ſelf unto the ſight of Belemis, and diſaccuſtome her ſelf to the ſight of me? But whilſt

Artaxander was lamenting with me the misfortunes of Telamire and himſelf, Telamire was in a ſtrange conſtraint: yet ſhe thought no leſs of Artaxander than he did of her: for ſhe told me the day after, that when ſhe looked upon either Belemis, or Clorelisa, ſhe thought of nothing but him. On the other ſide, this new married Lady had her angry minutes; and her joys to ſee her ſelf in a condition to be revenged upon Artaxander, was not ſo tranquil as it was the day before: And a friend of hers told me ſince, that ſhe confeſſed, ſhe never looked upon Algaſtus whom ſhe had married, without a remembrance of Artaxander, nor ever remembered Artaxander without unconceivable grief. And ſhe had another addition of ſorrow: for Iſalonide drawing her aſide, did read her a Lecture of the life ſhe was to live, the moſt harſh, and ſevere that ever was: ſhe regulated all her actions one after another: ſhe did limit her to her ordinary viſits, when ſhe went to ſee her ſick kindred: and indeed never to make any other, unleſs either unto Funerals and marriages. She told her, that now ſhe was to lay aſide all richneſs and ſuperfluity in her dreſſes: ſhe forbad her to frequent Walks, Balls, Muſicks, and every thing elſe: ſhe made choice of thoſe Temples, which ſhe thought moſt fit for her to frequent: and ſhe taught her how to compoſe her countenance,and turn up the whites of her eyes: Yet this ſevere Lecture was needleſs, for her reſentments of revenge induced her to all theſe rigors, purpoſely to win upon Algaſtus, and move him unto what ſhe deſired, both againſt Artaxander and Telamire: ſo as ſhe promiſed Iſalonide to follow her counſel; and indeed, did put on ſuch an auſtere and reſerved Garb, that Algaſtus loved her extremely. Moreover, for the firſt days ſhe carried it civily enough towards Telamire, though ſhe did take upon her the Authority of a Mother-in-Law: for not ſeeming to know that there was any particular intimacy 'twixt her and Artaxander, ſhe gave her a hundred reaſons, which induced her not to deſire to ſee him any more; no,nor ſuffer him to come into the houſe where ſhe was: Not that I will take upon me,(ſaid this revenging woman) to regulate you in your acquaintances: but you know when one of my age marries ſuch a man as Algaſtus,one is ob-obliged to live very reſervedly; and therefore I beſeech you, think it not ſtrange, if I rob you of that diverſion, becauſe it would reflect upon my ſelf. Since what Clorelisa ſaid, had a fair pretence of vertue, Telamire durſt not oppoſe it; though ſhe knew very well that Clorelisa had a ſecret cauſe for it, wherein vertue had no ſhare. Furthermore, Clorelisa the better to execute her deſign, told Algaſtus in a moſt crafty manner, that Artaxander, having had heretofore ſome thoughts of her,ſhe beſeeched him to command Telamire to hold no converſe with him. For (ſaid ſhe unto him) a ſmall thing may ſtain the reputation of a woman of my age, and therefore I deſire all occaſions may be removed. You may well imagin that Algaſtus did not deny Clorelisa in that which ſeemed to proceed from a principle of vertue: So as ſending for Telamire betimes in the morning, he expreſly commanded her to ſee Artaxander no more. You may alſo imagin, conſidering my deſcription of Telamire, that ſhe made no reſiſtance againſt Algaſtus: yet for all that ſhe was extremely grieved in her heart. In the mean time, ſince ſhe thought it expedient that Artaxander ſhould know how the caſe ſtood,ſhe made choice of me to make him acquainted with it: And to tell him, that ſhe conjured him to come no more at her, but to wait until chance gave them an opportunity of meeting, which was not a thing very eaſie, conſidering the cloſe way Clorelisa obſerved, and her vigilant eye over her actions. And truly ſhe ſpoke this with ſo much ſadneſs in her eyes, that if Artaxander had but ſeen her, he would have comforted himſelf. But ſince he received his miſery by the relation of a perſon who could not comfort him, he reſented it with more violence than I am able to expreſs. Alas (ſaid he unto me) did the Revenge of Clorelisa reach ſo high, as not to marry Algaſtus, but only to be revenged upon me, and perſecute Telamire? And can Telamire obey her enemy, and baniſh me, whileſt ſhe is continually in ſight of Belemis? For now, he will not ſtir out of her ſight, ſince he dwells with Algaſtus. This man who was wont to be perpetually walking from Street to Street, from Temple to Temple, and from Houſe to Houſe, to ſhew his Martial poſtures to all the Town, will not now ſtir one foot out of Clorelisa's, or Telamire's Chamber: yet for all this Telamire obeys my enemy, though ſhe hazard my life by it. However, I beſeech you, ſaid he unto me, refuſe me not the favour to give a Letter unto Telamire: for if I be denied all, I ſhall be forced unto ſuch courſes as will anger Telamire, and cauſe repentance unto my ſelf. Since I ſaw the mind of Artaxander was much exaſperated, I durſt not incenſe him more by my refuſal; ſo as I was ſo complaiſant as to tell him, That provided his Letter was open, I would let Telamire ſee it. Thus without more delay he writ a Letter in my Chamber, and a very long one, to move her unto ſome way or other, how he might ſee her in ſome other place, ſince he could not ſee her at home. Afterwards he was very bitter both againſt Belemis and Clorelisa, and hinted upon ſo many things, that I muſt confeſs, my memory will not ſerve to repeat them: All I remember of it was, that it was excellently well penned, though writ in much haſt. And it did much move the heart of Telamire: but as much as ſhe was grieved, ſhe anſwered only in theſe words, unto the favour which he begged of ſeeing her.

The friendſhip and eſteem I have of you is enough, not to forbid you finding out ſome handſome occaſion of meeting with me, and I ſhould be very glad if you could find it. But be not offended, if I tell you, that I cannot contribute any thing unto it, ſince I cannot do it, unleſs I do more than I ought.

Though this anſwer was not ſo fully favourable as Artaxander could have wiſhed, it did for a while give him ſome comfort: but ſince his paſſion was moſt violent, he quickly returned unto his former deſpair. However, ſince he was not able to live without the ſight of Telamire, he invented all manner of ways to bring it about: and at laſt he underſtood that there was a private ſolitary Garden, where Clorelisa went often to take the Air, without any company but Belemis, Iſalonide, and Telamire: and enquiring perpetually concerning the thing which moſt took up his mind, he underſtood that Belemis was gone into the Country for ſome certain days: So as reſolving to go into that place, where he knew Clorelisa and Telamire would be, he carried one of his friends with him, and deſired him, that if they met with Clorelisa and Telamire, that he would take Clore- liſa aſide, and talk with her, while he talked with the other: For, ſaid he, Cloreliſa dares not inſult over Telamire, before him whom I ſhall bring with me, nor dare Telamire deny to talk with me. And indeed, without further examination, whether this deſign was well or ill grounded he advertiſed his friend: he craftily enquired the time when theſe Ladies uſed to walk, and he went unto the place where they were, and he came but one half quarter of an hour after them, for he would not be firſt in the Garden, leſt Clorelisa ſhould not enter, if ſhe knew he was there. But amiable Doraliſa, this meeting was in a very pleaſant manner. For imagin that when Artaxander and his friend entred into the Garden, Clorelisa and Telamire were at the end of a walk, oppoſite to the door, coming as they were going towards them: ſo as all of them having time to conſider what they ſhould ſay at meeting, they were leſs ſurprized when they met. At firſt, Clorelisa intended to turn back, but ſince there was no other Garden-door to go out at but that behind Artaxander, ſhe thought that in vain, therefore never offering to avoid the meeting, ſhe only thought how to prevent him from ſpeaking unto Telamire. On the other ſide, Artaxander deſired his friend to go ſtraight unto Clorelisa, as himſelf intended to go ſtraight unto Telamire: but ſince there is a notable difference between one that acts for the ſatisfaction of a friend, and one that acts for their own ſatisfaction: this friend of Artaxander's was not ſo ready in accoſting Clorelisa, as Clorelisa was to accoſt Artaxander: who as wity and amorous as he was, could not meet with Telamire, before Clorelisa met with him, becauſe ſhe ſtay'd two or three ſteps behind, ſpeaking ſomething unto one of Clorelisa's women: So tho Clorelisa did extremely hate Artaxander, and tho it was long ſince ſhe had ſpoke unto him, yet ſhe accoſted him the firſt, as I told you before, not being very ſorry that ſhe had met with an occaſion of ſpeaking her thoughts unto him: ſo as ſoon as ſhe was near enough to be underſtood. Since there is now no ſociety betwen us, ſaid ſhe unto him, I ſhould not have thought it any happineſs at all, to meet with an occaſion of telling you ſomething which concerns you to know: but ſince the occaſion doth preſent it ſelf without any Queſt of it, I will not let it ſlip; and in ſaying ſo, Clorelisa ſtepping betwixt

Telamire and Artaxander, he could not avoid talking with her, nor could he talk with Telamire. Alſo he had a conceit that perhaps Clorelisſa would repent of what ſhe had done, and hoped that by carrying himſelf civilly unto her, he might obtain liberty of ſeeing Telamire again. Then Artaxander, after he had ſaluted Telamire, in a moſt paſſionate and reſpective manner, he began to hearken unto what Clorelisſa ſaid unto him, whilſt his friend talked with Telamire. But he was much ſurprized, when he heard Clorelisſa talk in ſuch a Tone as ſhe did, after ſhe had cunningly ſtepped three or four paces farther from Telamire. I do imagin, ſaid ſhe unto him, that it is not neceſſary to tell you the reaſon why I accoſted you, for your apprehenſion is quick enough to know, that it was to hinder you from talking unto Telamire. But to ſave you the labour of ſeeking any further occaſions, let me acquaint you that all your endeavours will be in vain: For the truth is Artaxander, I did not marry Algaſtus, to let you marry Telamire. But on the contrary I muſt declare unto you, that I married him only to make you miſerable. Alas, Madam, ſaid he, your Revenge goes much too far if it reach Telamire, who never wronged you. Since it hath reached ſo far as my ſelf, replied ſhe, it ſhall reach as far as her: And therefore if you value her tranquillity, never think of ſeeing her again: for if you do, I profeſs you will but blow the bellows of my anger againſt her and you both. And ſince It is in my power to hurt her, I aſſure you it ſhall fall heavy upon her, unleſs you take up a firm reſolution abſolutely to forget her: or at leaſt to carry your ſelf as if you did. Yet never think that I ſpeak this out of any other intereſt, but Revenge: for I do proteſt ſeriouſly, I have no other end in it, but to hinder you from being happy. I will not pump for any excuſe Madam, ſaid he unto her: I will but only ask you, why you joyn and confound Telamire with Artaxander? Becauſe, replied ſhe, Artaxander lives more in Telamire, than in himſelf, and my Revenge will reach him no other way but this. Yet notwithſtanding (added ſhe with a ſmile full of tartneſs) to teſtifie that I will keep ſome meaſure in my Revenge, I promiſe you, that as ſoon as ever Telamire is married, or that you be married unto ſome other; I will then give her more liberty, than until that time

I will. And in the mean time, let me tell you once more, that you have no ſuch ſure way to make Telamire miſerable as to ſeek out opportunities of ſpeaking with her: And to teſtifie the truth of my words, this which you have done at this time, ſhall coſt Telamire eight daies ſolitude: For let me tell you, I have as much power with Algaſtus as that comes unto: He will have Telamire obey me; and Telamire dare not diſobey me: So as I ſee my deſign of revenge upon you is proſperous. But, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) is it poſſible you ſhould be capable of ſuch an unjuſt deſign? I know that I have merited ſome part of your hatred; but I can never think it allowable that you ſhould revenge your ſelf upon Artaxander through Telamire. I cannot tell whether or no it be allowable (replied ſhe) but I am ſure it is much delight to have command over a perſon whom one loves not: And in the mind I am now in, I proteſt, I had rather command Telamire, than a Kingdom. But, Madam (ſaid he then unto her, being tranſported with anger) ſince you think it juſt to revenge your ſelf upon Artaxander through Telamire, I hope you will not think it unjuſt, that I ſhould revenge my ſelf of Cloreliſa through Belemis. I have ſuch a conſiderable Hoſtage in my power, by having Telamire, replied ſhe, that I fear not what you dare do againſt Belemis. And to remove all thoughts of any attempts againſt him, I will only wiſh you conſider what that perſon is capable to attempt, who could find a heart to marry Algaſtus only to hinder you from marrying Telamire: And I am confident, that if you make a ſerious reflection upon what I ſay, you will never expoſe Telamire unto the vengeance of a woman who hath recourſe unto ſuch extraordinary waies of revenge, and who makes no difficulty to be revenged upon her ſelf, rather than not be revenged upon others. After this Clorcliſa left Artaxander, and call'ed Telamire with all the authority of a moſt inſulting Step-mother, and with all the fury of a moſt incenſed Rival; not that ſhe uſed ſo to do when Artaxander was not preſent; but ſhe found it ſo ſweet to vex Artaxander, that ſhe could not deny her ſelf that ſatisfaction. However, Telamire not ſeeming to take ſuch a rude command in any ill manner, ſhe followed Clorcliſa after ſhe had quitted the man who talked with her, and had ſaluted Artaxander: She was alſo ſo wiſe, as to forbid him by a ſign with her hand, and by her looks, to accoſt her, as it ſeemed by his action he intended: But in recompence of this angry adventure, ſhe ſhewed him ſomething ſo ſweet and tender in her fair eyes when ſhe parted from him, that he became more in love with her, and more afflicted. However, ſince that day, Clorelisa was more hot upon her revenge; and did not only endeavour to hinder Artaxander from ſeeing Telamire, but ſhe brake off with all thoſe who had any particular intimacy with him, and obliged Telamire to ſee him no more, upon ſuch a poor pretence as is not worth a mention: But the wonder was, that all Clorelisa did out of jealouſie, did get her greater credit in the opinion of Algaſtus, and paſſed in the world for her vertue. For Iſalonide, and all the faction of preciſe Ladies, who were her friends, did ſo trumpet up the reformation of Clorelisa, that they propoſed her as an example unto all youths who were too much addicted unto diverſions. In the mean time, Artaxander had no other comfort but to relate all his miſeries unto me: And to write unto his new reconciled enemy, called Tyſimenes, who became his friend during his travels: But it was an abſolute impoſſibility for him to ſee Telamire, unleſs ſometimes at the Temple, but then he could not ſpeak unto her, and conſequently it was ſmall ſatisfaction: Nor had he ſo much happineſs as to ſee any who did ſee her, becauſe, as I told you before, Clorelisa had baniſhed all his friends whatſoever; inſomuch as he lived the moſt miſerable life in the world. And to make him the more miſerable, he could not chooſe but quarrel with Belemis, and they fought, with ſuch ſad ſucceſs, as they were both of them dangerouſly wounded: and had they not been parted, in all probability it had coſt them both their lives. After this, you may eaſily conceive how ſad Telamire was, to hear in what a pitiful condition Artaxander was: However, ſhe muſt go with Clorelisa unto the Chamber of him who was wounded; and ſeem as if ſhe grieved for the wounds of Belemis, though her grief was only for the wounds of Artaxander. And this conſtraint was not only for a day: For as long as Belemis was ill, he would have her every day to come with Clorelifa, who never ſtirred out of her Brothers Chamber: And Clorelifa upbraided her a hundred times a day, accuſing her of all her Brothers wounds. But all this was nothing in compariſon of her griefs a while after: For you muſt know, that ſince Artaxander had gained one of Telamire's ſervants, unknown unto her, to acquaint him with all her actions, this ſervant told him how aſſiduous Telamire was with Belemis: So as he grieved in ſuch exceſs, as his wounds grew worſe, and for ſome daies, the Phyſicians deſpaired of his life. In the mean time, ſince Belemis mended, Telamire had the grief to ſee him recover, who ſhe thought was the death of Artaxander. So that not being able to conſtrain her ſelf any longer, nor hide her tears, ſhe feigned her ſelf to be ſick, to the end ſhe might not ſtir out of her Chamber, nor go any more unto Belemis: Yet this invention did not deliver her from that trouble; for ſince Belemis began to mend, Clorelifa brought him to Telamire's Chamber, who having not ſo much liberty as to lament in the day, did imploy all the night in tears: And yet her tears did double, for the ſervant, whom Artaxander had ſuborned, did bring her a Letter, wherein ſhe found theſe words:

Madam,

I Cannot deny my ſelf ſo much ſatisfaction as to tell you, that the cares you have of reviving Belemis, have killed me, and it is leſs by his hand, than yours, that you have loſt the moſt Paſſionate, and moſt Faithful Lover that ever was.

Artaxander.

This Letter did ſo touch Telamire's heart, that though ſhe did not love to hazard Letters, yet ſhe anſwered him in theſe words, if my memory fail not.

SIR,

YOU have accuſed me with much injuſtice: and if you ſaw into my heart, you would find, that if I could revive any one, it ſhould be Artaxander, and not Belemis: Do not judge of me by appearance, and if it be be poſſible, get into ſuch a condition, as I may chide you for no better knowing

Telamire.

Though this Letter did not contain all the tenderneſs that was in Telamire's heart, becauſe ſhe durſt not truſt it unto the thinneſs of a piece of Paper ; yet it wrought ſo great an effect upon the mind of Artaxander, that after it had calmed the turbulency of his ſoul, the violence of his Fever diminiſhed, and in a few daies he recovered as well as his Rival. Yet he was more perplexed than before his Combat, becauſe Cloreliſa had a better pretence for keeping a ſevere eye upon Telamire. Things being upon theſe terms, Artaxander had a new diſpleaſure. For Cloreliſa did put away that ſervant by whom he received intelligence concerning Telamire. But at the ſame time, he received much conſolation, by a Letter from Tyſimenes, which intimating unto him that he was returning unto Themiſcyra, deſired him to come ſecretly a daies journey to meet him, that they might conſult together how to make their reconcilement known unto their Parents, with leaſt offence unto them. And as ſoon as Artaxander had received this Letter, he prepared himſelf to meet his friend, who he found to be much more accompliſhed than when they parted; and the friendſhip between them was inviolably confirmed : But in lieu of publiſhing it, as Tyſimenes deſigned, Artaxander conjured him to the contrary, and to conceal it carefully. But to the end this prayer might not ſurprize him, or offend him, he acquainted him with his love of Telamire, and his miſery in not ſeeing her, no nor ſeeing any who did ſee her, becauſe Cloreliſa had baniſhed from her houſe all his friends. So that my Dear Tyſimenes, (ſaid he unto him after a full relation of all paſſages) I am perſwaded that if you paſs ſtill for my enemy, you may eaſily inſinuate your ſelf into the favour of Cloreliſa ; and have that liberty of ſeeing Telamire, which is denied unto all thoſe whom ſhe thinks have any converſe with me ? So as by this means, I may know how Telamire does, and you may much oblige me, in ſpeaking in my behalf unto her. Since I ſhall give a greater teſtimony of my friendſhip (replied Tyſimenes) by concealing ing it, than by publiſhing it, I ſhall accompliſh your deſires. And accordingly Artaxander and he, reſolved to keep very cloſe the affection which they had unto each other, to ſee whether Clorelisa, who baniſhed all the friends of Artaxander, would admit of a man whom ſhe thought to be his enemy: They alſo agreed upon the place, where they were to meet each other ſecretly: And for that purpoſe, they made choice of a houſe belonging unto one of Tyſimene's friends, which had two doors, opening into two ſeveral ſtreets; agreeing which of theſe doors either ſhould enter, ſo as none ſhould ever ſee them enter together into one place; and for the more ſecurity, they never met but in the nights, at the houſe of this friend unto Tyſimenes, for whoſe fidelity he would undertake. Thus after all things were agreed upon, theſe two friends parted, and came ſeveral waies unto Themiſcyra, where nothing was known of their Reconciliation: For Artaxander carried but one ſervant with him, when he went to meet Tyſimenes, and of that ſervants fidelity he was aſſured. And Tyſimenes, had none but ſtrangers unto his ſervants, for all thoſe he carried out of Cappadocia were all dead, ſo as thoſe he now had, could not reveal the ſecrets of their Maſter if they would, ſince they knew not the language of the Country. Since Tyſimenes was of the Prime Quality in all the Town, and was very handſome, his return was no leſs talked of than that of Artaxanders. And all the Town feared, that ſome ruffle would fall out between them two, whom all the world thought to be enemies: For being of the ſame age, pretending unto the ſame things, and had good right both of them to diſpute in point of merit, there was great reaſon to fear they would fall foul upon one another. And when they met together in any place, they behaved themſelves with ſuch coldneſs unto each other, as was very probable would beget a Quarrel between them. Thus their innocent Impoſture did thrive ſo well as all the world was deceived by it. But as it did thrive well in general, ſo it did thrive better in particular unto Artaxander: For you muſt know, that ſince Clorelisa did naturally love company, and hated ſolitude, ſhe was very glad ſhe had found one out who was not a friend unto Artaxander; and ſhe fancied ſome delight light in contracting friendſhip with a man who paſſed for his enemy, thinking this would ſpight him to the heart: So as when Tyſimenes went upon his firſt viſit, ſhe did not entertain him with ſuch ſeverity and preciſeneſs as ſhe uſed ſince her marriage: But as he was well received by Cloreliſa, becauſe ſhe thought him the enemy of Artaxander, ſo he was very ill treated by Telamire upon the very ſame reaſon: For ſince it vexed her to ſee every day thoſe whom ſhe hated, and never thoſe ſhe loved, ſhe could not chooſe but be angry at the heart, to ſee a man ſo civilly treated, whom ſhe thought Artaxander hated. She hath confeſſed ſince unto him, that ſhe could not this firſt time know him to be the man of much ſpirit, but told him that ſhe was vexed at him: Yet ſhe continued not long in this error; and you ſhall ſee how ſhe was undeceived. Since then the aims of Tyſimenes was only to ſatisfie his friend, he tempered the ſpirits of Belemis, and Algaſtus ſo well, as they both of them deſired Cloreliſa, to give him leave to ſee her often. For as almoſt all old men do love to hear talk of travel, that they may have a pretence to talk of their own, Tyſimenes ſo fitted his humour, and hearkned ſo attentively to what would pleaſe him, that he doted upon him: As for Belemis, Tyſimenes talked unto him of Battles and Combats, and ſo much commended his valour, that he loved him tenderly, ſo as in three or four viſits, he had the freedom of the whole houſe. Cloreliſa having wit enough, ſhe eaſily obſerved how Telamire was vexed to ſee an enemy of Artaxanders ſo often: And to vex her the more, ſhe affected to place him alwaies next her. But ſince he never ſaw her, unleſs Cloreliſa was preſent, becauſe Telamire ſhunned him as much as ſhe could, he was at firſt much puzled to make it known unto her that he was not the enemy of Artaxander, but on the contrary, was the confident of his paſſion. But at laſt, ſhe underſtanding the Aſſirian Language, which Cloreliſa did not, and which Artaxander and himſelf underſtood very perfectly: he cauſed his friend to write a Letter in that Language, directed unto Telamire: ſo as carrying it about him, he went to Cloreliſa, who according to her cuſtom, did place him next Telamire to ſpight her, and indeed ſhe was not deceived.

In the mean time, as thoſe who are witty can turn diſcourſe, as they pleaſe, Tyſimenes that day fell into diſcourſe amongſt the Ladies, of ſome excellent pieces of Proſe and Verſes: And after he had repeated ſome in their own Language, and promiſed others, he told Cloreliſa that he was extreamly ſorry that ſhe did not underſtand the Aſſirian Language, for he had one of the moſt pleaſant Love-Letters in the world, written in that Language, which he ſeemed as if he would interpret, but upon a ſudden ſeeming to remember that Telamire underſtood that Language, he gave her the Letter, and forced her to look upon it, whilſt he made a ſhew as if he would tell the ſenſe of it unto Cloreliſa: So that though Telamire had no great curioſity to ſee any thing that came from the hand of Artaxander's enemy, yet ſhe took this Letter, not daring to offer any incivility unto Tyſimenes openly: But ſhe was much ſurprized when ſhe ſaw it written by the hand of Artaxander; and much more when ſhe read the words.

ARTAXANDER unto TELAMIRE.

Madam,

Give me leave to tell you, that he who gives you this Letter, is not what he ſeems to be; ſince he is ſo far from being my enemy, that he is the only Confident of my Paſſion to you: Look upon him as the deareſt of my Friends: Tell you him, all you are pleaſed I ſhould know, as I will, what I deſire you ſhould know: For it is only in favour of my Love that he ſeems to hate me, knowing that none but ſuch as do hate me are admitted unto the place where you are. Receive all his ſervices, as from my ſelf; Believe all his words, as if I ſpake them: And if it be poſſible, tell him ſomething that may preſerve me from dying for ſorrow I cannot ſee you. I beg your pardon, for truſting him before I asked your permiſſion, as I would if I could: But ſince I could not, I had rather he knew I loved you, than not to know whether you loved or hated me, or then you ſhould not know that I love you ſtill, more than I did when I ſwore moſt truly, that I loved you more than ever any yet loved.

whilſt Telamire was reading this Letter with a ſtrange agitation of heart, Tyſimenes did ſo court Cloreliſa, that ſhe could not obſerve her: But ſtriving to invent a Letter upon that ſubject which he ſaid Telamire's Letter was, he took up the mind of Cloreliſa as much as he could. But ſince it was impoſſible he ſhould ex tempore invent ſuch a piece, as could merit thoſe Commends which he gave unto it, Cloreliſa told him, that certainly the excellency of that Letter conſiſted in the grace of that Language in which it was written; ſince, as ſhe appehended, the conceits of it were no more than ordinary. Oh, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) you have good reaſon to ſay ſo, for I aſſure you, there is no compariſon between what I ſay, and the Letter it ſelf: And believe it (ſaid he and took it again, ſeeing Telamire had read it) there are ſome paſſages in this Letter would raviſh you with wonder, if I could relate it in it ſelf as it is: Alſo I am confident that Telamire, which underſtands that Language, will concur with me. 'Tis very true, replied Telamire, this Letter is very rare, and the interpretation which is made of it is very ſurprizing alſo. You commend this Letter ſo highly, replied Cloreliſa, that you make me deſirous to learn the Language wherein it is written, and Aglaſtus who underſtands the Language very well, will be a great help unto me: As ſhe ſaid ſo, Aglaſtus came into the Chamber; ſo that Tyſimenes fearing leſt ſhe ſhould tell her Husband of this Letter, and move him to ſhew it, he went out very haſtily, as if he had remembred ſome buſineſs which he had before forgotten. Yet I think he had no ſuch great cauſe of fear: For ſince this Letter was ſaid to be a Letter of Love, Cloreliſa, in her affected humour of preciſeneſs, would not have ſhewed it unto her Husband. But a Couſin of hers who underſtood the Aſſirian tongue very well coming in accidentally that day, ſhe ſent for Tyſimenes purpoſely to borrow that Letter of him: For, ſaid ſhe, I cannot believe it to be ſo excellent a Piece as Telamire, and Tyſimenes do ſay it is, conſidering the Interpretation which they made of it unto me: You may well imagine that Tyſimenes would not ſend her the Letter, but to get out of this Labyrinth, into which he had involved himſelf, he ſeemed to look for it, and at laſt, ſaid he had loſt it, affirming unto him whom Cloreliſa ſent, that certainly he had left it in her Chamber. In the mean while, Telamire was ſo ſurprized at this Letter, as ſhe hardly knew whether ſhe ſhould believe her own eyes: But the day following, ſeeing Artaxander in the Temple, ſhe knew the Letter was his; for he made ſome certain ſigns unto Tyſimenes, who did ſit next her, which induced her to believe ſhe was not deceived. So that no longer ſhunning occaſions of talking with Tyſimenes, he quickly found an opportunity to let her know, how Artaxander and himſelf were reconciled during their travels. And indeed, though Artaxander had ſeen Telamire a hundred times in private, before he fell out with Cloreliſa, yet he never had revealed this ſecret unto her; for beſides that, a Lover, when he is alone with his Miſtreſs, doth ſeldome or never talk of any thing but his Paſſion: ſo likewiſe, ſince his friendſhip with Tyſimenes was made a ſecret only for the love of Tyſimenes, he would mot impart it unto Telamire, though he had opportunity for it. However, after this, the lives of Artaxander and Telamire were much more pleaſing; and the wonder was, that the life of Cloreliſa was alſo much more agreeable; for ſhe found ſuch delight, to imagine that ſhe ſpighted Artaxander by ſeeing Tyſimenes, that ſhe made it almoſt all her whole buſineſs to contrive new occaſions of ſeeing him. Moreover, tho ſhe obſerved Telamire had no great averſion againſt diſcourſe with Tyſimenes, yet ſhe ſuſpected nothing; but on the contrary, ſince ſhe thought that Artaxander would be more angry if ſhe ſhould marry Tyſimenes, then if ſhe ſhould marry Belemis: And ſince again, ſhe did not much care for having her to be her Siſter in Law, ſhe wiſhed that Tyſimenes were in love with her: And ſhe her ſelf ſaid one day unto him, ſpeaking of her hatred unto Artaxander, that if ſhe were in his room, ſhe would endeavour to poſſeſs the ſame which his Enemy ſaid he did in the heart of Telamire. And when he anſwered that he honoured Belemis more then to become his Rival, ſhe ſaid laughing, that Belemis was ſo much devoted to the Wars, that in her opinion, one ſhould do him a great pleaſure if they could cure him of his Love; adding afterwards (in a more ſerious tone) that ſhe really believed Telamire and Belemis would never be happy together: and therefore ſhe could wiſh with all her heart, that he could love Telamire, and that Belemis could forget her. On the other ſide, Artaxander underſtanding by Tyſimenes, all that Telamire did, and almoſt all ſhe thought, he perceived that ſhe ſtill hated Belemis, and that ſhe did not hate him. Telamire for her part, ſhe was ſo glad that Artaxander continued conſtant, though he never ſpoke unto her, nor hardly ever ſaw her, that ſhe thought upon nothing but him. And indeed, he never viſited any but whom ſhe was pleaſed to permit him; nor ever attempted any thing before Tyſimenes had firſt conſulted with her: And this faithful Friend for a long time did ſo unite the hearts of theſe two perſons, that their own merits could not tie them faſter unto each other, then the ſolicitations of Tyſimenes did. For, when he reported the words of Artaxander unto Telamire, he did moſt emphatically expreſs the amorous affections of his heart; and when he reported the words of Telamire unto Artaxander, he omitted not one obliging accent. Thus Tyſimenes at firſt, finding his own content in the ſatisfaction of theſe two perſons, had next, the delight to delude Clorelisa, Algaſtus, and Belemis. Then would the demure Iſalonide needs be buſie, and break off the frequent viſits of Tyſimenes and Clorelisa, telling her it was more dangerous to ſee one gallant often, than to ſee a thouſand, and ſee them but ſeldom. But Clorelisa telling her, that Tyſimenes was more her husbands gueſt than hers, her pure preciſeneſs was ſilenced; for indeed Clorelisa had carried the matter ſo cunningly, that Algaſtus did verily believe, ſhe ſuffered Tyſimenes only out of complaiſance unto him. However, this ſolitary ſociety became more pleaſant; becauſe Artaxander under the Umbrage and Name of Tyſimenes, did give all imaginable diverſions unto Telamire; For ſince Algaſlus in his youth was a great lover of pleaſures, Tyſimenes would propound unto him, ſometimes, that they may go out and take the Air; ſometimes he would bring Muſick unto him, and ſometimes make him a Banquet: So as many delicate pieces of Gallantry did paſs, under the notion of being preſented unto the whole family; though the truth was, it was always Artaxander who was at the charge of the Muſick, and Banquets which paſſed under the name of Tyſimenes. Thus did Artaxander every day preſent Telamire with a thouſand diverſions, and as many expreſſions of his love without giving the leaſt jealouſie unto Belemis or Cloreliſa. And if it be true, as I have heard ſay it is, that deluſion is one of the delights of this Paſſion, I am confident they had as much as they could be capable of; ſince they had the full delight to know that they loved one another, and alſo to delude Cloreliſa and Belemis. Tis true, they ſpake not unto each other; but ſince they writ, and ſome times ſaw one another, this was the mitigation of their grief. Thus Cloreliſa, intending revenge upon Artaxander did moſt agreeably ſerve him, and gave him a way to be revenged upon her ſelf; yet did ſhe reliſh all the ſweets of her Revenge with a full guſt: For ſhe had the command over her Rival, ſhe hindred her from ſpeaking unto her Lover, it was in her power to forbid the Banes of their Marriage; ſhe thought ſhe kept ſuch a ſevere eye upon her, as that ſhe could not hold any Intelligence: ſhe thought alſo, that ſhe began to love the Enemy of Artaxander; and that he was ready to die for grief and anger. In the mean time, Telamire being full of modeſty, though ſhe had all imaginable tenderneſs towards Artaxander, though ſhe received his Letters, and though ſhe anſwered them; yet ſhe never ſpake nor writ any thing which might perſwade Tyſimenes, that ſhe had any violent affection unto Artaxander. And conſidering how ſhe carried the matter, it might more properly be termed friendſhip, or acquaintance, then love; as for the ſecreſie of buſineſs, ſhe did attribute it more unto the neceſſity of ſatisfying the odd humours of Cloreliſa, than to the ſatisfaction of the nature of that affection. Again, as Cloreliſa did heartily wiſh that Tyſimenes would marry Telamire, to ſpight Artaxander; ſo likewiſe ſhe Cajoled with Belemis, that ſhe perſwaded him Tyſimenes ſolicited for him, when he talked unto Telamire: Thus Tyſimenes had opportunity enough to talk with her; Cloreliſa alſo diſpoſed Algaſtus to give his daughter unto him, if he could obtain her conſent: And to bring it about, ſhe made uſe of all her Authority over Telamire, to dreſs her ſelf better then uſual though ſhe was to ſee none but Tyſimenes: For (ſaid ſhe, as we underſtood ſince) Tyſimenes ſees none but Telamire. Telamire is fair; Tyſimenes is young and of a paſſionate temper, and by conſequence it muſt be concluded, that he loves Telamire: And certainly, amiable Doraliſa, the Arguments of this jealous and revenging Perſon were not ſlight: For inſenſibly, before ever Tyſimenes perceived it, love ſeized upon his heart, and as changed from hatred unto amity and friendſhip with Artaxander; ſo he changed from indifferency unto eſteem, and from eſteem unto Love with Telamire. The firſt mark of it which he had, was that he found a great alteration in himſelf. For at the beginning of this Negotiation he was wont to be extreamly joyed, when he received any favourable expreſſion from Telamire, to report unto Artaxander: or any rapture of Paſſion in Artaxander, to report unto Telamire: but as ſoon as his heart became a little engaged, he found a ſecret melancholy at the joys of his Friend, when he told him any thing which conduced to his ſatisfaction. He weakned as much as he could the obling ſenſe of every word which theſe two perſons ſpoke. And if Artaxander deſired him to tell Telamire, that he was the moſt ſincerely Faithful, and Paſſionate Lover that ever lived: he would ſeek out for words leſs tender, and ſignificant; and ſo leſſen and extenuate the life of his expreſſions. Again, he took ſuch extream delight in ſeeing Telamire, that he could not long doubt of the paſſion which lay lurking in his ſoul; yet truely, he oppreſſeed it with incredible Generoſity, and he oppoſed it as much, becauſe he had been the enemy of Artaxander, as becauſe he was now his friend. For truely, (ſaid he to himſelf, as we underſtood afterwards) Artaxander as thy friend is obliged to have ſome compaſſion upon thy ſufferings, as thou art of his; but if he take thee as one that hath been his enemy, he hath cauſe to ſuſpect thee of baſeneſs, perfidiouſneſs, and treachery: for if thou beeſt his friend, thou ougheſt not to be his Rival: and if thou beeſt his enemy, thou oughtſt not to be his Agent unto his Miſtreſs. Make then thy choice Tyſimenes, (ſaid he) if thou wilt be Artaxander's Enemy, keep it not ſecret from him; and if thou wilt be his Friend, ſtifle thy Paſſion, and hide it from him, and Telamire both, If it be poſſible: But alas, I perceive thou wilt be neither the one nor the other, and that thou canſt neither be friend, nor enemy unto Artaxander; yet one of theſe thou muſt be, Indifferency is not in thy Choice. To be his Friend and his Rival both, are two things impoſſible: To be his Enemy and his Confident, are two qualities incompatible: And to be the Lover of Telamire, and Friend, or Enemy of Artaxander, is a condition moſt deplorable. For if ſhe look upon thee as his Friend, it is as a moſt perfidious Friend; as a man unworthy of her eſteem, ſince he betraies a truſt, which ought to be moſt inviolable: And if ſhe look upon thee as Artaxander's enemy, 'twill be only to hate thee, and to enter into all his Intereſts againſt thee: Thou doſt but flatter thy ſelf, in hopes that Telamires affections to Artaxander is not violent: for if it be not violent unto him, How can it be unto thee, who can never diſcover thy Paſſion to her, unleſs thou doſt diſcover thy Treaſon unto Artaxander alſo? Oh moſt lamentable Deſtiny! The Perſon thou loveſt muſt either never know thou loveſt her; or if ſhe do, ſhe muſt know thee to be an Impoſtor, and a perfidious Friend. How doſt thou think ſhe can ever believe thy words, ſince ſhe will convince thee out of the very ſame words thou uſeſt to diſcover thy Paſſion unto her? For what haſt thou not ſaid in behalf of Artaxander, of his violent Paſſion, of his Fedility unto her, and of her obligements unto him? Wilt thou go and tell her, that thou didſt tell her lies? Wilt thou give thy ſelf the lie? And though thou ſhouldeſt be ſo baſe, doſt thou think Telamire will believe thee? And though ſhe ſhould believe, that thou didſt diſſemble with her in ſpeaking for Artaxander, thou wilt not be one jot the happier, ſince ſhe hath cauſe to think, that whoſoever will lie for another, will lie for himſelf. Moreover, conſider Tyſimenes, conſider the hatred that hath been betweem the houſe of Artaxander and thine. Remember that thy Anceſtours and his, have ever ſtriven which ſhould excell in glory and vertue: And wilt thou give ſuch an advantage unto the Family which hates thee, as to upbraid thee that Artaxander is more vituous then thy ſelf? Conſider Tyſimenes, that if thou doſt betray tray thy friend, he will divulge unto all the world, that thou waſt reconciled unto him, purpoſely to be perfidious and baſe. Conſider that Glory will not ſuffer thee to give ſuch advantage unto thy Enemies; and that Friendſhip will not endure thou ſhouldeſt be a Rival unto thy Friend, eſpecially a Friend, who did overcome the old hatred of his heart unto thee. Conſider that Love is not a more violent Paſſion than Hatred; thou mayeſt be as well able to ceaſe loving Telamire, as thou wert to ceaſe hating Artaxander. But art thou able to ceaſe loving Telamire? (ſaid he) Oh, if thou be'ſt, thou art the moſt vile man of the whole earth if thou doeſt not; but yet if it be not in thy power, thou art not culpable. What ſhall I do then, (ſaid he) love, or not love? Ah doubtleſs, I ſhall love, (ſaid this tormented Lover) But if thou wilt be loving, and love with reaſon, thou muſt love Artaxander and Telamire both The task is difficult, and yet thou muſt do it, at leaſt carry thy ſelf in the ſecret of thy heart as a lover of Telamire, and publickly as the friend of Artaxander: And ſo betraying only thy ſelf, thou only canſt upbraid thy ſelf: And thou wilt preſerve the eſteem of thy Miſtreſs, of thy Friend, of thy Rival, and of thy Enemy, for Telamire and Artaxander are all theſe four unto thee. Theſe, amiable Doraliſa, were the thoughts of Tyſimenes, preſently after he perceived himſelf in love with Telamire; for afterwards we knew from himſelf all his moſt ſecret thoughts. However, after he had moſt ſeriouſly pondered what reſolution to fix upon, he was ſo generous as to reſolve upon death, rather then be perfidious unto Artaxander; ſo as I am confident, that never was vertue put upon a more difficult Teſt than his: For he knew that Cloreliſa did heartily wiſh his marriage with Telamire, and he knew alſo that Algaſtus wou'd joyfully conſent unto it. Again, as the ſtate of things ſtood, there was no probability that Artaxander ſhould ever marry her; ſo as though he could not ſee any hopes of happineſs for his friend, yet he reſolved to be the moſt miſerable of any man alive. 'Tis true, he could not eaſily bring himſelf unto this Reſolve, but ſuffered as much torment as ever man endured. He was in a hundred minds, either to abſent himſelf, or elſe to deſire Artaxander that he would excuſe him, from being any longer his Solicitour to Telamire; but when he began to compare the miſeries which he endured by his ſervice, unto what he ſhould ſuffer by abſence from the fair Telamire, he found it better for him to be ſtill an Agent between Telamire and Artaxander, then to deprive himſelf of her ſight, whom he loved and adored. Thus, not ceaſing to be the Lover of Telamire, he continued to be the Confident of Artaxander. But to tell you truly, it was with abundance of ſorrow; and the more becauſe Telamire having a high eſteem of him, did leſs conceal her real thoughts from him; ſo as the more he was in love with her, the more he knew ſhe loved his Rival. One days converſe did ſtrangely perplex him; for whilſt Iſalonide took Cloreliſa out, upon ſome viſit or other, which ſhe was obliged unto; and whilſt Belemis was gone to viſit a man whom he heard had been fighting, Tyſimenes remained alone with Telamire; who falling inſenſibly to talk of the general errour wherein all Themiſcyra was, concerning Artaxander and himſelf, ſhe aggravated the great danger there was, in judging of things according to appearance. For truly, ſaid ſhe, all the Town takes you to be the enemy of Artaxander; Cloreliſa her ſelf thinks it; and ſo doth Algaſtus and Belemis: Moreover, they begin to think that Artaxander hath forgotten me, and that I have forgotten him. The world alſo believes, that it is vertue only which is Cloreliſa's motive to ſee no body: Iſalonide her ſelf doth not doubt it; yet nothing is more falſe than their opinions in all theſe things, though they appear to be moſt true unto all thoſe who believe them. Therefore, in my opinion, there is no ſafety in ſpeaking affirmitively of any thing, but what one knows to be of a moſt infallible certainty. 'Tis very true, replied Tyſimenes, that appearances are very deceitful: And I am ſo ſtrongly perſwaded of this truth (added he, and changed colour) as perhaps, I am able to ſay, that the thing which you think you are moſt certain of, is not as you do imagine it. Nay, nay, replied Telamire, I am very confident, that I am not miſtaken as others are; and when I think that Artaxander is your Friend, and that you are his, I think nothing but truth. Alſo I an confident, that in thinking Clorelisa to be full both of Love, Hatred, and Jealouſie, I think as I ought to do. And in perſwading my ſelf that you do much eſteem me, I am perſwaded of nothing but what you have induced me to believe, by a thouſand ſweet expreſſions, and as many obliging offices which I have received from you. And therefore Tyſimenes, though I grant that appearances are very fallacious, yet I am moſt confident, I am not miſtaken, in believing theſe things I have mentioned unto you. Certainly, Madam, replied he, you are not miſtaken in thinking I do much eſteem you; but perhaps you are miſtaken in imagining that this eſteem is ſo great, or ſo little as it is. I muſt needs think, replied ſhe, that you have a very good opinion of me, and that your Civility will not ſuffer you to undeceive me in ſuch a pleaſing errour; for truly (ſaid ſhe and ſmiled) when I conſidered of it with application, I have ſome reaſon to fear, that a man who knows ſo well how to hide his real thoughts, is not very ſincere. And truly, would not any one ſay, who ſee how you carry it, and hears how you talk before people, that you had no affection unto Artaxander? but that you were ſtill ready to quarrel with him? For my part (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled again) I muſt needs conclude, that if you know how to conceal Love as well as Friendſhip, you were very fit for the moſt miſterious Intelligence. Had I a Paſſion which I would conceal (replied he) I ſhould conceal it much better than I do the Friendſhip I hold with Artaxander. And yet I have heard ſay, (anſwered ſhe) that Love cannot long lie hid. I have heard it ſaid, as well as you Madam, replied he, but I am ſufficiently undeceived of that errour: for I know a Lover, who is little ſuſpected to be ſo, and who is thought he never will be. Since you do know it, replied ſhe, his Paſſion is not ſo concealed as you ſay it is. I do know it indeed (ſaid he) but the reaſon is, becauſe it is impoſſible I ſhould not know it; yet it is moſt undoubtedly true, that I only do know the Paſſion of his Soul. She who is the cauſe of it (replied ſhe) doth not ſhe know of that Paſſion which ſhe her ſelf hath created? She knows it no more than you do (replied he) and which is more ſtrange, this Lover hath Rivals, who dream not that he is theirs. This doth ſo much ſurpriſe me (replied Telamire) and I am ſo deſirous to know who this Lover is, who can ſo well conceal his paſſion, both from his Miſtreſs and his Rivals, that if ever I ſee Artaxander I will deſire him to make you name him, that he may let me know it. Of the two, replied Tyſimenes, I had rather tell you than Artaxander who it is; but truly unleſs I be forced Madam, I beſeech you give me leave neither to tell it unto you nor him; and I ſhall not reveal a ſecret which is the moſt concealed that ever any was. As I am perſwaded (replied ſhe) there never was any ſecret, but will out one time or other: ſo I believe, this which you now conceal from me, will one day be the common talk of the Town. I aſſure you Madam, replied he, if ever it be revealed, it ſhall be ſooner unto your ſelf than any one I know; but to tell you truly, I do not think that day will ever come. Be not too poſitive (replied ſhe) for all things that are within the compaſs of poſſibility may happen. For truly, when you and Artaxander went from Themiſcyra, there was no likelihood, that ever you ſhould be upon ſuch good termes, and yet I ſee you are become his friend, and he yours. 'Tis true, ſaid he, the change was great and unexpected: and one cannot make a quicker paſs from indifferency unto love, then I paſſed from hatred to the friendſhip of Artaxander. As for matter of friendſhip, (ſaid Telamire) I know very well it may grow a long time after one is acquainted with a perſon: But as for love, I cannot think it can be ſo; for I believe that when any one falls in love, it is at the very firſt ſight of the party loved. I ſhould be very ſorry Madam, ſaid he unto her, to contradict you in any thing; yet truly I cannot agree with you in this; for I muſt tell you again, that I know a Lover, who was only a bare friend unto the perſon with whom he is now in love, a long time before he was ſo; yet now he is ſo deſperately in love, as he cannot conceive it poſſible, that he ſhould then be only a friend unto her whom he now adores. If this Lover (replied ſhe, and laughed) have no name, no more than your firſt you talked of, I will never as long as I live diſpute with you again: for truly, I had rather have reaſons than examples, when the Men, whoſe adventures are alledged, are nameleſs unto me. But to tell you truely, it would be hard to make me believe, that any Man, who hath long ſeen a Woman without loving her, ſhould afterwards upon a ſudden fall in love: And for my particular, I ſhould ſooner believe that a Man, who never ſaw me above a quarter of an hour, ſhould fall in love with me, than that antoher, who hath ſeen me a whole year together with Eyes of indifferency, ſhould afterwards be capable of Love. Yet moſt certainly it is poſſible, replied he. And it is not more certainly true that I am Tyſimenes, than it is, that I know a Lover, who after only eſteem, admiration, and liking of a perſon, whom you know, is now become extreamly in love with her. If I were to talk with him you mean (replied ſhe) I ſhould certainly either make him confeſs, that his friendſhip and liking was only a little higher than it was before: or that his affection, which is now Love, did begin as ſoon as he ſaw her, though perhaps it was then only a luke-warm Love, and he hardly knew what it was: but I hold it abſolutely impoſſible that any one ſhould begin to be in love with a Woman, two Years after he firſt knew her. Then, Madam, ſaid he unto her, it ſeems that it would be a very difficult matter for a friend who knew you, to perſwade you that he is in love, unleſs he tells you, he was ſo the very firſt minute he ever looked upon you? 'Tis very true, ſaid ſhe, that he would not eaſily perſwade me; But thanks be to the gods and Clorelisa, (ſaid ſhe and laughed) I am not expoſed unto the danger, in the ſolitude wherein I live. But, Madam, (replied Tyſimenes and ſmiled, though he was much non-pluſt) one that hears you talk, would think that I have not a heart capable of being moved: and that I have not Eyes by which love may enter into my Soul: But ſince it hath hapned a hundred times, that friends have become Rivals unto their friends, how know you but I ſhall become ſo unto Artaxander, or am ſo already? In good earneſt (ſaid he to ſound her thoughts) I think I ſhould extreamly ſurprize you, if in lieu of telling you, according to my cuſtome, that Artaxander is ready to die for the love of you, I ſhould tell you, that I love you more than he doth. 'Tis moſt true, replied ſhe, you would moſt terribly afright me. But yet, (ſaid he unto her) what would you anſwer me, and what would you do, if you ſhould ſee me at your feet, proteſting with a thouſand Oaths, that I have done all that ever was in my power, to keep my ſelf from being Artaxander's Rival? And if I ſhould vow further, that I love you infinitely more than ever he did? Firſt, (ſaid ſhe) I would not believe you: and ſecondly, I would carry the matter as if I did believe you, becauſe I would treat you as a perfidious friend, a cheat, a man without judgment. For ſince I have ſo freely opened my heart unto you concerning Artaxander: you would be out of your wits if you ſhould offer to talk ſo unto me, though it were ſo that you did love me very much: But (ſaid ſhe) I am unwiſe to trouble my ſelf in a buſineſs, which I hope in the gods will never be. And yet (replied he very coldly) you are fair enough to make an unfaithful Friend, a faithful Lover: and perhaps I have a heart ſo ſenſible, and a Soul ſo tender, that I can neither reſiſt you, nor overcome my ſelf. After this, Tyſimenes fearing he had been a little too laviſh in his tongue, did ſtrive to rouſe up ſome merrineſs into his Eyes, purpoſely to weaken the ſence of his words. And indeed, he did it ſo well, that Telamire did not ſo much as ſuſpect any reallity in the matter, but thought it to be only a ſport of his wit: So that beginning to talk more ſeriouſly unto Tyſimenes, ſhe talked of Artaxander, charging him to tell him ſome obliging matter, which ſhe deſired he ſhould know: In ſo much as Tyſimenes, as much a lover as he was, yet he did negotiate as the Agent of his Rival, and promiſed Telamire to tell him whatſoever ſhe pleaſed: and indeed as he went from Telamire, he intended to go unto that Friends Houſe where he was to meet Artaxander every night. But for that night, he went another way, thinking ing it ſome ſweetneſs to defer thoſe joys which Artaxander would have, when he heard Telamire's meſſage. And to tell you truely, his Soul wavered whether he ſhould be the Friend or the Enemy of Artaxander, but ſtill was conſtant in loving Telamire. But yet his vertue getting the maſtery in his mind, he reſolved to continue faithful to his friend; and to hide his love from his Miſtreſs as well as from his Rival: After which, he went to acquit himſelf of his Commiſſion. 'Tis true, he did it with abundance of pain: he never named Telamire, but his heart trembled: he could not hear ſo much as the name of his Rival pronounced, without a chilneſs of heart. However, ſince Artaxander could talk of nothing elſe but Telamire, and ſince he was that night more earneſt than ordinary in talking with Tyſimenes, he retained him as long as he could: for ſince he had opened the door of his heart only unto him, it was only from him he could have any conſolation I beſeech you my dear Tiſimenes, (ſaid he unto him) ſooth me up a little in my Paſſion, to eaſe me in my ſufferings: Tell me that Telamire is worthy of all thoſe miſeries I have endured for her ſake; for truly though you be not in love, yet it is impoſſible but you ſhould know that I have great reaſon to love her in that degree I do: for if you have but Eyes and any Soul, you muſt needs know and ſee that ſhe is all admirable. 'Tis true, replied Tyſimenes, that Telamire is much accompliſhed, and if I would contradict your Paſſion, it ſhould not be for want of merit in her, ſince none can have more than ſhe hath. Ah Tyſimenes, replied Artaxander, to ſee the difference betwixt love and friendſhip: for becauſe you are only the friend of Telamire, you can content your ſelf to ſay, that none can have more merit than ſhe hath; but I that am her Lover muſt needs ſay, that it is impoſſible to find any who hath ſo much. If we never differ in any thing but that, replied Tyſimenes, we ſhall always agree, ſince I confeſs as well as you, that Telamire is incomparable, and that I never knew any ſo lovely as ſhe is. Did I know you were in love, replied Artaxander, I ſhould take good heed of obliging you unto any ſuch high applaud of Telamire; and ſhould ſo much reſpect our friendſhip and your love, as not to wiſh you ſhould prefer the perſon whom I love, before her whom you adore: but ſince I know you are only in love with honour, and your friends, I conceive, I may well move you to do juſtice unto the merits of Telamire, by acknowledging you never knew her equal. But alſo I am forc'd to confeſs, that I am as miſerable as ſhe is fair, eſpecially of late: for me thinks you have not ſpoke unto me from her as you were wont: And I ſee ſomething in your mind, which makes me fear, you ſee ſome thoughts in her which are not advantagious to me. Tyſimenes, hearing Artaxander ſpeak thus, was afraid that he had diſcovered his weakneſs. So as recollecting all his ſtrength of vertue, he forced his tongue to tell his Rival, that he was miſtaken, and that he was never in his life upon better terms with Telamire, then at this time. But he had no ſooner pronounced theſe words, then he was angry with himſelf; and found ſuch a diſorder in his heart, that his eyes had betrayed him, if he had ſtayed any longer with Artaxander: and ſo he left him as ſoon as ever he could. In the mean time, Belemis beginning to perceive that Clorelisa was not ſo zealous for his marriage with Telamire, as ſhe was wont; he looked more narrowly unto Telamire: and growing jealous of the long converſation which Tyſimenes held with her, he quarrelled with him; and if their Friends, indifferent unto both, had not prevented them, ſome misfortune had hapned between them. Clorelisa ſeeing how ſquares went, but not ſeeing the thoughts of Tyſimenes unto Telamire, ſhe reſolved to debar her ſelf of ſo much ſatisfaction in marrying her unto Artaxander's Enemy, but contented her ſelf, by taking her from him, in marrying her unto her Brother. Then did ſhe begin to uſe all the power ſhe had with Algaſtus, to favour the deſigns of Belemis; and indeed ſhe wrought ſo much upon him, as abſolutely to command Telamire, to prepare her ſelf for being Wife unto Belemis within eight days. On the other ſide, Clorelisa deſired Tyſimenes, that ſince he himſelf pretended nothing unto Telamire, that he would perſwade her to obey her Father: In the mean time, Telamire after ſhe had ſeen Algaſtus and Tyſimenes, ſhe was a moſt ſad Soul: and the more, becauſe what deſires ſoever ſhe had to diſobey Algaſtus, yet ſhe had not power. Again, ſhe told Tyſimenes, that ſhe would not have Artaxander fight with Belemis upon any terms, but declared, that if he made any hurly-burly for the love of her, ſhe would never ſee him again: So that when Artaxander knew this, he was extreamly ſorry for it. Tyſimenes alſo was exceeding full of grief, yet not ſo full as Artaxander, though he was no leſs in love than he, yet was a very faithful Agent in the buſineſs: for ſince he had nothing but bad news always to tell Artaxander, he told it him without any trouble, though yet he was his friend. 'Tis true, when Artaxander gave him in Commiſſion to perſwade Telamire unto diſobedience of Algaſtus, he did not imploy all the eloquence he had. But doubtleſs he ſpake more earneſtly, and much more juſtly, when he negotiated to comfort Artaxander for the loſs of Telamire, than when he undertook to perſwade Telamire to beſtow her ſelf upon Artaxander. But Telamire did inſiſt ſo much upon Points of Glory, that ſhe would never do any thing for which ſhe might be condemned. On the other ſide, it was a harſh adventure for her to think ſhe ſhould never ſee Artaxander again, that ſhe ſhould be Wiſe unto Belemis, Belemis, Cloraliſa's Brother. She was not able to refrain from Tears when he talked with Tyſimenes; and alas, theſe Tears went to his very heart; but he made a ſecret of them unto Artaxander, and told him only that ſhe was ſad, or ſo, but never told him that ſhe wept. In the mean time Artaxander, out of the violence of his Paſſion, told Tyſimenes, that of two things, he muſt needs do one: either he muſt fight with Belemis, mauger Telamire's charge to the contrary; or elſe he muſt carry Telamire away: Conjuring him to aſſiſt him in one, or both theſe things, ſo that Tyſimenes being put to notable quandaries, he told Artaxander, that he would adviſe him never to think of carrying Telamire away; giving him ſuch Reaſons to the contrary, that if the mind of Artaxander had been ſettled, he might have ſeen that Tyſimenes took more intereſt in Telamire than he ought: for Tyſimenes himſelf perceived he ſpake over zealouſly. But after he had diſſwaded him from carrying away Telamire, and that Artaxander had repented of ſuch thoughts, he offered him in point of honour, to be his Second againſt Belemis, who never went without his friend. But as they were ready to fix upon this Reſolution, one of Tyſimenes ſervants entred, and gave his Maſter a Letter, which he ſaid one of Telamire's Women gave unto him with Tears in her Eyes. Do you not know, ſaid Tyſimenes, why ſhe cried? All I know, ſaid he, is, that Algaſtus, Clorelisa, Iſalonide, Telamire, and Belemis went out of Themiſcyra preſently after the Sun was ſet: and I ſaw Telamire go into Cloraliſa's Coach, with ſo much ſorrow in her countenance, that, I believe, the journey doth not pleaſe her. Ah Tyſimenes (ſaid Artaxander) I fear this journey which begins in the night, will prove fatal unto me: After this, reading the Letter which he took from Tyſimenes, he found theſe words.

TELAMIRE unto TYSIMENES.

Hough Sir, I have but one minute to ſtay in Themiſcyra, yet, go I muſt, and not know when I ſhall return: All I know of my journey is, that my Father told me, that he would carry me into the Country, to the end my marriage with Belemis might make leſs noiſe. I pray impart this cruel news unto Artaxander, in ſuch a manner as may make him the leaſt ſad. Aſſure him, I will reſiſt as far as handſomely I can, and prepare him for a miſery, in caſe I cannot hinder it. Adieu, I have more ſorrow in my Soul than I would have him know of: but how great ſoever it be, yet I do freely conſent he ſhould complain againſt my weakneſs, if my affection do yield unto what decency requires, ſo he complain in ſecret. Let me tell you once again, that my melancholy is without any equal, unleſs the the joys of Clorelisa, which appears as viſible in her eyes, as deſpair doth in the eyes of

TELAMIRE.

You may eaſily imagine, Amiable Dorelisa, how ſad Artaxander was, after the reading this Letter : Yet he was more ſad, when upon enquiry of the place whither Algaſtus was gone unto, he underſtood that it was unto a Caſtle which belonged unto Iſalonide, againſt which nothing could be attempted, neither to releaſe Telamire, nor againſt Belemis, for it was extraordinary ſtrong : Alſo, as for Belermis, though he knew how to find out a way, to ſend him a challenge, yet he would anſwer, that he would fight, after he had married Telamire. Yet Artaxander reſolved to do whatſoever he could, to twit him with point of honour, though he did not hap to make him alter his purpoſe : So as going out of Themiſcyra, with one Page only, becauſe he would not engage Tyſimenes in a buſineſs wherein he had no intereſt, he took his way towards this Caſtle, in a moſt melancholy mood. For when he thought, that perhaps before he came there, Belemis would enjoy Telamire, his reſentment was beyond all imagination : He told me ſince, that he was not maſter of his own mind, and but for his Page, he had loſt his way a hundred times, ſo troubled was his ſoul. As he was in this turbulency of ſpirit, he ſpied afar off two Coaches coming towards him, which came a very ſlow pace, and he thought he knew the Page of Belemis, who rode on horſeback ſome thirty paces before : So as commanding his own Page, to go and ask unto whom thoſe Coaches belonged, he underſtood that Algaſtus going in the night to avoid the heat of the day, the Coach wherein he was did overturn ſo as he was very dangerouſly hurt in the head ; and that Algaſtus would not continue his journey, but would return unto Themiſcyra, after he had reſted a little, at the Town next the place where this accident hapned. So that Artaxander underſtanding this, he took the way upon his right hand, that he might not paſs too near the Coaches ; yet he went not ſo far off, but he ſaw Telamire, and ſhe him :

him: But ſince ſhe was then in as ſad a condition to ſee her Father in that caſe, as ſhe was in parting from Themiſcyra, ſhe only made a ſign with her head, unperceived by Cloreliſa, becauſe ſhe was turned the other way, to talk unto Belemis. But not to trouble you with any impertinencies, Aglaſtus was carried home to his houſe, and got into bed: Chyrurgions were ſent for, and they found his hurt to be very dangerous; ſo that when Artaxander came back to Themiſcyra, every one believed Algaſtus would die. Artaxander then conſidering the ſtate of things, did not think it good to hazard the incenſing of Telamire by fighting with Belemis: But contented himſelf with deſiring Tyſimenes to ſee Telamire: And the ſtrangeſt thing was, Tyſimenes was moſt ſenſibly grieved at the diſaſter of Algaſtus. As for Cloreliſa, ſhe was uncapable of any comfort: But I am very confident, that it was more, becauſe the death of Algaſtus would take away her power over Telamire, than out of any tenderneſs of affection unto him. However, Iſalonide, and Cloreliſa were all in tears about Algaſtus, and never did Husband think himſelf more tenderly loved by a Wife, than he by his, though ſhe wept more out of jealouſie and ſpight, than any real ſorrow for her loſs. As for Telamire, ſhe was of another mind: For ſhe lamented with all the real ſorrow of a Daughter for a Father in ſuch a condition, ſo that ſhe ſtood in need of conſolation. In the mean time, Algaſtus after four daies was at his laſt gaſp: And that which is very obſervable was, that Cloreliſa had ſo much power of him, as to make him give his whole eſtate unto her, if ſhe had thought upon it: Yet it was the very leaſt of her thoughts: But ſtill ſhe conjured him with eyes full of tears, (as if out of meer tenderneſs) that he would abſolutely command Telamire to marry Belemis, to the end that both Lovers might be united. But whether it was that the tears of Cloreliſa did trouble Algaſtus, or that this deſire did mollifie his heart, he ſeemed to be aſtoniſhed; and when he offered to ſpeak, he could not: So as he loſt his knowledg, and died; leaving it unknown whether he conſented, or denied the demands of Cloreliſa. So by this means Cloreliſa was out of any power over Telamire, and Telamire was abſolutely free: Artaxander had ground of hopes; and Tyſimenes was in ſuch amaze, as he knew not what to think; yet ſtill he continued generous. But ſince it was not impoſſible he ſhould long continue the Agent of Artaxander, and the Lover of Telamire both; he told his friend, that now there was no need of deluding Cloreliſa any longer, and therefore he deſired him not to imploy him in viſiting Telamire any longer, pretending the averſion which he ſaid he had unto Belemis, and Cloreliſa. However, he took upon him to carry a Complement from Artaxander unto Telamire upon the death of her Father. But Telamire being too wiſe to make any ſudden alteration in her way of living, ſhe would not admit of his viſit. 'Tis true, this conſtraint of hers did not continue long: For having intelligence that Cloreliſa did intend to carry her away for her Brother, ſhe ſecretly aſſembled all her kindred, who came all together immediately, and demanded her of Cloreliſa, who mourned much more to ſee Telamire carried out of her power, than ſhe did to ſee Algaſtus carried to his Grave: And that high reputation of vertue which ſhe had gotten by the ſolitude and reſervedneſs which her jealouſie had cauſed, began to leſſen; for ſhe behaved her ſelf ſo, as ſhe made it evidently appear, that ſhe grieved not for the death of Algaſius. The truth is, her ſorrows that ſhe could not now be revenged upon Artaxander, did ſo diſorder all the faculties of her ſoul, as it was moſt viſible unto all that looked upon her, that ſhe had a moſt violent paſſion reigning in her ſoul. She was not able to pronounce the Name of Telamire, but ſhe changed colour: She complained and could not tell why: The very Name of Artaxander made her mad; but the name of Aglaſtus was pronounced a hundred times, and ſhe made not the leaſt ſtartle at it: So as as all the Town began to be undeceived in their opinions of Cloreliſa's great vertue: Yet Iſalonide ſaid, that the exceſs of her grief for the death of Algaſtus had a little diſtracted her: but this excuſe deluded only the ſimple. On the other ſide, Amaldea wiſhing the marriage of Artaxander with Telamire, after the death of Algaſtus, as ſhe did in the life of Cleoſſonte, ſhe negotiated the buſineſs ſo well, with the kindred of that Excellent Lady, as ſhe concluded the matter in few daies. But ſince they feared that Belemis would be ſome obſtacle, they did carry it very ſecretly. In the mean time, ſince the reconciliation of Tyſimenes and Artaxander was known, Amaldea deſired this friend of her Sons, not to forſake him untill he had married Telamire, leſt Belemis ſhould oblige him to fight the ſecond time, acquainting him to what a paſs ſhe had brought the buſineſs, and let him know that the marriage would be celebrated very ſhortly. And indeed, Amaldea acquainting Artaxander what ſhe had done for him; and the friends of Telamire having told her what was reſolved upon, they both of them did think themſelves as happy now, as they were miſerable before: But Tyſimenes was the ſaddeſt man that ever lived. Not but that he did ſtrive againſt himſelf with admirable Generoſity: But yet the Paſſion in his Soul was ſo ſtrong, that he was not able to overcome it. As ſoon as Artaxander knew of his happineſs, he went to tell it unto Tyſimenes: But he was much ſurprized to find him ſo melancholy; and more ſurprized to find that he would not tell him the cauſe of his ſadneſs, as he had told him the cauſe of his joyes: Yet Tyſimenes coloured his ſorrows with ſome Domeſtick buſineſs, which he ſaid, did not go ſo well as he wiſhed: So that ſince the ſoul of Artaxander was all joy, he never examined the ſadneſs of Tyſimenes any further. However, it was ſo extream, that as ſoon as his friend was gone, he thought he ſhould have died: And he was ſo near it, that (as he confeſſed ſince) that he reſolved upon twenty violent courſes in a quarter of an hour. Is it ſo (ſaid he unto himſelf, as he related afterwards) that Telamire is going to be married unto Artaxander, and he as ready to be happy as thou Tyſimenes art ready to be miſerable? And yet it is thy ſelf who hath contributed unto his happineſs, and it is thy ſelf who cannot ſee it without ſorrow. But thanks be unto the Gods (added he, and ſighed) that I can hope for nothing from Telamire, for in ſpight of all my vertue, if I had any hopes from her, I ſhould have much more ado to overcome my ſelf. But I have not ſo much Conſolation, as that I can complain, either againſt my Miſtreſs, or my Rival: And I can only lay the blame upon my own weakneſs. Yet though Artaxander be my friend; and though I am reſolved to carry my ſelf as if I were not his Rival: I am not able to be a ſpectator of his felicity: And when I conſider that within four daies he ſhall enjoy Telamire, I find ſuch a turbulency in my heart, that if I ſhould ſee him happy, I ſhould hazard the doing of things which would be far from either Reaſon or Vertue. Let then Artaxander alone in peace, Tyſimenes, ſince thou canſt never be ſo thy ſelf: But in order to that, thou muſt never ſee Telamire: Thou muſt quit thy Country; baniſh thy ſelf from that place where thou wilt leave Artaxander happy; and ſeek out thy death in ſome Deſart, where thou canſt never hear of their felicity, who have cauſed thy miſery. And the truth is, Tyſimenes was ſo fully reſolved, to depart from Themiſcyra, and never to ſee either Telamire, and Artaxander any more, as nothing could ſtagger this Generous determination: he ſeemed therefore as if he had ſome earneſt buſineſs which called him away: And without unfolding the cauſe of his journey, he told Artaxander, that he would depart the day before his Nuptials, of which Clorelifa, and Belemis were ignorant. At the firſt, Artaxander uſed all his perſwaſions to make Tyſimenes ſtay until after he had compleated his happineſs: And he perſwaded him in ſuch ſweet expreſſions, and tender words, as Tyſimenes was ſo aſhamed, that his reſolution of going away was the ſtronger, ſince he was not able to ſee Artaxander enjoy Telamire, without envy at his happineſs, and grief to himſelf. However, ſince he could not depart before he had ſeen Telamire, he reſolved upon a viſit: But it may be very well ſaid, he

he went to ſee her, but to ſpeak he hardly was able: And had not ſome company been there, which helped out with diſcourſe, he had been put to a pitiful Non-plus: But at laſt he left her, and bid her adieu, without telling her whether he went, nor why he departed. At his going out from her, he went unto Artaxander, with whom he was not able to ſtay above a quarter of an hour, ſo violent were the raptures of his grief, which his paſſion cauſed. Artaxander uſed all his Arguments to make him ſtay only two daies: For ſince he was ignorant of the cauſe, he could not chooſe but preſs him to be a witneſs of his happineſs. But at laſt, ſeeing he would not be perſwaded, and thinking that the buſineſs he pretended was ſome ſecret of the Family, which was not to be imparted, he preſſed him no further, but bad him adieu, with a thouſand expreſſions of friendſhip: Telling him, that he was much beholding unto him for Telamire, and that he would acknowledge his obligements for it eternally. But, amiable Doraliſa, after that Tyſimenes had left Artaxander, and returned home, he thought himſelf more miſerable than before: For he found Telamire ſo early fair, and Artaxander ſo full of tender expreſſions, that Love and Friendſhip beginning to renew in his ſoul, his ſufferings were beyond all expreſſion, or toleration. Yet he ſtood firm unto his reſolution: But ſince love is a Paſſion which naturally would make it ſelf known, he could not reſolve upon his departure before he had made known unto her who cauſed his miſery, what courſe he took againſt himſelf, purpoſely to keep him from any attempts againſt Artaxander. So as being reſolved to write unto her, he did ſo: And when he was juſt ready to depart, he gave it unto a truſty ſervant, with orders to carry it unto Telamire, an hour after his departure, and to chooſe ſuch a time as when Artaxander was not with her. After which, taking Horſe, he departed without any with him but one Page only, and went to a friends houſe ſome thirty Furlongs off, to conſult what courſe he ſhould take, and whither he ſhould wander, to make choice of his exile.

In the mean time, he with whom he left the Letter which he writ unto Telamire, having punctually obeyed him, and given it unto her, ſhe was extreamly amazed to find it ſuch as I ſhall afterwards read unto you: For ſince ſhe afterwards gave me a Copy, I think it is about me.

In ſaying ſo ſhe looked for this Copy and found it, ſo ſhe ſhewed it unto Dorelisa, and Marteſia: But before ſhe read it, ſhe told them that Telamire after ſhe had read it with much wonder, and being in doubt whether ſhe ſhould ſhew it unto Artaxander or no, ſhe put it in her Pocket, becauſe ſhe ſaw him enter: And a while after, forgetting ſhe had a Letter which ſhe would not have him to ſee, ſhe unknowingly dropt it, and he took it up whilſt ſhe went to talk with one in the outer Chamber, who deſired to ſpeak with her: So that knowing it to be the hand of Tyſimenes, and not being able to forbear opening it, he read theſe words:

TYSIMENES unto TELAMIRE.

Madam,

I Make no queſtion but you will wonder, that a man who hath ſo long ſpoke unto you of Artaxanders love, and hath been ſo faithful a Confident of his Paſſion, ſhould dare to tell you, that he is his Rival, and yet at the ſame time tell you that Artaxander loves you as well as any heart can. In the mean time, it is moſt true Madam, that I began to love and adore you within a few daies after I began to tell you that Artaxander did the ſame; and it's as certainly true that I love you now with as much violence, as ever heart did. Yet you know Madam, that I have done for Artaxander all that I promiſed unto him: and that in all my diſcourſes with you, I betrayed only my ſelf. Yet do not think that I vanquiſhed my ſelf without abundance of pain: but in recompence of my reſpective paſſion, I conjure you to do me ſo much favour, as believe, that I never ſpake one Syllable in advantage of Artaxander, but it ſtruck more ſorrow to my heart than my tongue is able to expreſs. But whatſoever I have done for him againſt my ſelf, I ſhall be very glad that he never know his obligations to me: and that you may be the only Perſon in the world who ſhall know my weakneſs and misfortune. Were I to ſee you ever again, perhaps you would be offended at what I ſay: but ſince I do not declare, that I love you until the very day before you are to marry Artaxander, and that then I depart from Themiſcyra, with reſolution never to return again, you would be pitileſs Madam, if you ſhould be offended at me for not denying my ſelf ſo much conſolation, as to think, when I am dying, that it's fit you ſhould know the cauſe of my death; and to think, that haply you will confeſs, that except Artaxander, there is not a man in the world who deſerves your affection better than my ſelf, if Fate had either not made him your Lover, or made me his Enemy. Moreover Madam, ſince I require no anſwer, becauſe I cannot in any reaſon expect it to be favourable; give me leave to conjure you unto a memory of all I have ſpoken in behalf of Artaxander: and to beſeech you, that you would believe, that if I had ſpoken my heart, I ſhould have ſpoken much more for my ſelf than for him. Again I am forced to confeſs, becauſe it is moſt certainly true, that friendſhip, vertue, and glory, were not the only motives which induced me to be faithful unto Artaxander: And that had I known how to have thwarted his happineſs, and not yours, I ſhould hardly have kept my ſelf within the limits of Generoſity.

Thus Madam, ſince I for the love of you, fight againſt my ſelf, me thinks, I merit your compaſſion upon a moſt miſerable Lover, who is going to find an end of his miſeries in the end of his life; and ſince he will not diſturb the felicity of his Rival contents himſelf to make the cauſe of his death known only unto her, who gave it unto TYSIMENES.

You may imagine, amiable Doreliſa, how extreamly Artaxander was ſurprized at the reading of this Letter from Tyſimenes: And ſince he really loved him, he was infinitely ſorry, that he was in love with Telamire, but yet he reſented it, without any jealouſie, hatred, or anger. 'Tis true, he was ſo aſtoniſhed ſhed at what he ſaw, that ſcarcely believing himſelf, he began to read the Letter again, as if he would be better ſatisfied: So as Telamire entring before he ended, ſhe was almoſt as much ſurprized, that ſhe ſhould find him reading it, as ſhe was at what the Letter contained: alſo ſhe changed colour: for ſince ſhe had concealed it from Artaxander, ſhe knew not how he might take it. Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, I intended to hide that Letter from you, leaſt you ſhould blame me for the loſs of a friend, who certainly was owner of a thouſand admirable parts: but I ſee my Intentions are prevented, ſince you have found it. Your Intentions, Madam, replied Artaxander, had been moſt juſt, if they were only to ſpare me my ſorrows for my being the cauſe of my friends misfortune. And it cannot be imagined I ſhould ever complain againſt you, for it were moſt unjuſt to think you leſs amiable than you are. So, Madam, I do not accuſe you, nor Tyſimenes, but think my ſelf more obliged unto him for being my Rival, then for being my Friend. But the truth is, I extreamely condemn my ſelf, for obliging Tyſimenes to viſit you ſo often; and for doing ſo much wrong unto your merit, as to think it poſſible, he ſhould ſee you ſo oft, and not love you. I muſt to my ſhame confeſs, that Tyſimenes is more Generous than I could have been: for my Paſſion is ſo ſtrong, that had I been his Rival upon the ſame terms as he was mine, I ſhould certainly have been his enemy, and ſhould have ſpoken more for my ſelf than him. Therefore, Madam, in acknowledgment of his vertue, I ask your leave to pity him, and that you would perſwade him to live. Moreover, I ask you pardon for his boldneſs in diſcovering his Paſſion unto you, and beg your amity for him, with as much zeal, as heretofore he begged your affection for me. And, I beſeech you, Madam, Let my Negotiation be as proſperous as his: and I ask leſs for Tyſimenes, than he did for Artaxander, do not deny me, Madam, I conjure you: and let me preſerve my friend, though a Rival, from being the moſt miſerable of all Lovers. Your Demands are ſo juſt, and eaſie to be conſented unto, replied ſhe, that you may be ſure I ſhall not deny them: Yet I do conſent unto you upon condition, that you will not invite Tyſimenes to ſee me, until he be fully cured of his folly. If I may judg of his Paſſion by my own, replied Artaxander, I ſhould think you will never ſee him again: for truly I cannot think it poſſible he ſhould ceaſe loving: eſpecially Tyſimenes, who hath a paſſionate ſoul, and knows no medium in his love, or hatred.

As Artaxander was ſaying ſo, an Aunt of Telamires, with whom ſhe then lived, came into her Chamber, to tell her, that Clorelisa, and Belemis, had diſcovered their intentions of marriage, and made ſuch a noiſe about it, that ſhe thought it expedient to defer it for a while, to let all the world ſee, that Clorelisa lied, in giving it out, that Algaſtus charged Telamire not to marry Artaxander, ſince it is moſt certainly true, he had never forbidden him to ſee her, but only at the inſtance of Clorelisa, who told her husband, that Artaxander was in love with her. At firſt, Artaxander did extremely diſlike this Propoſition: But Telamire's Aunt, telling him that the whole Family did conclude it to be ſo, and that Telamire was of the ſame opinion, he conſented that his happineſs ſhould be deferred only for eight days. As ſoon as he came home, he diligently enquired where Tyſimenes was, and underſtood that he was not above thirty furlongs from Themiſcyra, but that he went away from thence by break of day. So that without more delay, though it was almoſt night he took horſe, and went to the place where Tyſimenes was, whom he found alone in his Chamber, condoling his misfortunes: he was ſo intent upon his ſorrows, that Artaxander was within a pace of him before he either ſaw or heard him, but when he turned himſelf, lifting up his eyes to heaven, as if he would accuſe it of his misfortunes, that when he ſaw Artaxander he was ſo ſurprized, that he went a ſtep or two backward, to look better upon him, and to ſee whether or no he was miſtaken: But Artaxander advancing faſter than he recoiled, he embraced braced him, and ſighed for company. I come, my Dear Tyſimenes, (ſaid he unto him) to beg your pardon for being the cauſe of your exile: I come to hinder you from baniſhing your ſelf: and to aſſure you that Telamire after ſhe had read your Letter, did give greater commendations unto your Generoſity, than unto my Conſtancy; and that if ſhe do love me more than ſhe doth you, yet ſhe eſteems you more than ſhe doth me. If Telamire had really eſteemed me (replied Tyſimenes much ſurprized) ſhe would never have denied me the favour which I asked, to conceal my weakneſs from you: but I perceive ſhe has a mind to be revenged upon me for my boldneſs, by making me loſe a friend; and by depriving me of ſo much Conſolation, as to think that you ſhould never know my infidelity. For truly Artaxander, I fancied ſome ſweetneſs in my miſery, in carrying it ſo, that Telamire might know of my love, and that you ſhould never hear of it, leſt you ſhould withdraw your friendſhip from me: but ſince ſhe is pleaſed to croſs this my deſire. I muſt reſolve to be hated both by my Miſtreſs and my Rival. Ah Dear Tyſimenes (replied Artaxander) if I hated you, I ſhould never have told you that Telamire does eſteem you. If you do not hate me, replied Tyſimenes, it is becauſe you know Telamire will never love me; and though I am your Rival, yet you value it not, becauſe you know I cannot hurt you any more than if I were not. But however it be, you have done more than you ought, and I ſhould not do what I ought, if I do not ſpeedily depart from a place in which I cannot ſtay without envy at your happineſs. For if I ſhould, how is it poſſible I ſhould preſerve both my love to Telamire, and my friendſhip to Artaxander? for I profeſs, I have ſtriven as much to keep in one as the other: And to conceal nothing from you, know Artaxander, that I find in my ſelf ſuch ſtrange ſuggeſtions, and tumultuous imaginations in my heart, as I will not promiſe but I may become your enemy, if I once ſee you the poſſeſſor of Telamire. But ſince I am yet as I ought to be unto you, I conjure you to be a little indulgent towards me; and by proſecuting my intentions of never returning unto Themiſcyra, let me ſtrive againſt the affection which I bear unto her, who is going to make you happy: for truly my Dear Artaxander, if I may yet call you ſo, A Rival that is abſent, and not loved, is not to be feared: and by conſenting unto this, you will give me ſo much ſatisfaction as to love Telamire without any wrong unto you. I will conſent, Sir, unto much more than you ask, replied Artaxander: for I conſent that you ſhall ſee her, and love her: And I know the vertue of Telamire ſo well, that I am able to continue your friend, though you ſhould continue to love her. No, no, replied Tyſimenes, I will not accept your offer, becauſe I dare not truſt my ſelf; nor think I am able to ſee you compleatly happy, but I muſt either die, or ceaſe being your friend: And therefore to preſerve my love unto Telamire, and my friendſhip to you, I muſt proſecute my deſign, and baniſh my ſelf for ever.

I ſhould never make an end, if I ſhould relate the whole buſineſs of theſe two friendly Rivals: for they talked together a whole night. But as they were ſtriving to perſwade each other, one came in and told Tyſimenes aloud, that a man, who would not impart his name, deſired to ſpeak with Artaxander: So as imagining that it might perhaps be one from Belemis, he was commanded to be brought in: and he no ſooner entred, but he was indeed known to be the friend of Belemis: ſo as Artaxander imagining his buſineſs, went towards him to give him the better opportunity of ſpeaking out of the hearing of Tyſimenes, but Tyſimenes following, and the friend of Belemis (who was one of thoſe Bravadoes by profeſſion, who ſpent their whole lives in Quarrels, Duels, and Punctilioes of honour) ſeeing that he could not ſpeak unto Artaxander but in the hearing of Tyſimenes, reſolved rather than fail in his friends ſatisfaction, to engage him as well as Artaxander in the buſineſs. And therefore without more ado, he told Artaxander, that he knew him to be a man ſo well able to chooſe his friend, as he would dare to tell him in the preſence of Tyſimenes, that Belemis knowing that he was gone out of the Town, came out alſo, and waited for him within a hundred paces of this houſe, in hopes to ſee him with a ſword in his hand to diſpute with him for the poſſeſſion of Telamire: Adding, that if Tyſimenes would be more than a bare ſpectatour of the Combat, he would fight with him. You may well conceive, that Artaxander was very ready to give all deſired ſatisfaction unto Belemis: and that Tyſimenes, who wiſhed for death, would not fear a danger. But Artaxander was very much againſt Tyſimenes his fighting: yet when he heard him ſay that he would fight with Belemis, if he would not let him follow his fortune, out of a point of honour he conſented; and ſo they went to the place where Belemis was. I will not inſiſt upon any relation of their thoughts, for they are eaſie to be imagined: nor will I deſcribe the Combat, the ſucceſs whereof was very fatal: for Tyſimenes kill'd the friend of Belemis: but it was after himſelf was mortally wounded. Yet Tyſimenes had ſo much ſtrength, after he had vanquiſhed his Antagoniſt, to go towards his friend, who after he had wounded Belemis, had the misfortune to break his ſword, ſo as Belemis making a Paſs upon him, was ready to kill him, when Tyſimenes, as wounded as he was, came nearer and cried out, It was not generous to kill a man who had no weapon. Belemis turning his head aſide, and ſeeing him come with a ſword in his hand, and ſeeing the ſword of Artaxander broken, he was aſhamed of his action, and confeſſed that he was very ſorry, that he did not ſee his ſword to be broken. Thus Tyſimenes ſaved the life of his Friend and Rival: for though Artaxarder was not wounded, but Belemis was, yet ſince he had the misfortune to break his ſword, Belemis had certainly killed him, but for Tyſimenes. But afterwards company came in: Belemis retired, and the body of him whom Tyſimenes killed was carried away. Tyſimenes was ſo weak that he fell; and they were forced to carry him back unto Themiſcyra in a moſt lamentable condition, ſince there was no place nearer where he could be dreſſed. I beſeech you, amiable Doralſa, diſpenſe with me from relating all the expreſſions from Tyſimenes to Artaxander, and from Artaxander unto Tyſimenes, for if I ſhould offer it, I ſhould drown all my words in tears: And to ſave you the ſorrow of hearing it, I will only in ſhort tell you, That Tyſimenes lived but five days after: that whileſt he lived he talked of nothing but Telamire, that Artaxander was ſadly with him all the while, that Telamire was very ſenſible of this ſad accident, and that the very day deſigned for Artaxander's Marriage, was the Funeral of Tyſimenes. But that Solemnity was deferred, and for ſome days, the whole diſcourſe of Artaxander and Telamire was only of Tyſimenes. In the mean time, Artaxander taking it to heart, that he had not vanquiſhed Belemis: and ſince he thought he was obliged in point of honour to revenge the death of Tyſimenes his friend, as well as to fight for love of Telamire; therefore he reſolved to fight with Belemis again, as ſoon as he was cured of his wounds. But in this ſecond Combat, which was one to one, he had the advantage clearly: for he wounded Belemis in two places, and diſarmed him: Inſomuch as Clorelisa was even mad to ſee that nothing could hinder the happineſs of Artaxander. Yet ſhe found out a device to defer it: for ſhe divulged ſuch reports about the Town, that never was ſuch a clamor againſt Telamire, not only that ſhe ſhould marry Artaxander, but that ſhe ſhould think of marrying him whileſt ſhe was in mourning, and before her father was well cold in his grave. Inſomuch as Telamire, being ſtrangely moved at thoſe clamorous reports, how falſe ſoever, did take a fancy not to marry till her time of mourning was over: So that to paſs away that time more ſafely, which was not to be very long, the two Families joyned: And ſince the Aunt of Telamire had a houſe very near unto Amaldea's, it was concluded that all this company ſhould come thither: ſo as for this month, we have been always together, ſometimes at one houſe, and ſometimes at another. But ſince the time of Telamire's mourning ended yeſterday, doubtleſs ſhe will be married unto Artaxander as ſoon as this flux of waters will give us leave to return. And that which will the more haſten the conſummation of it is, we have received Intelligence, that Belemis was cured of his Wounds, and that Cloreliſa is more incenſed than ever againſt Artaxander and Telamire.

As Erenice had ended her Relation, and Doraliſa began to thank her for the delight ſhe had in hearing it, Amaldea entred, and told Erenice, that the body of Belemis was found upon the banks of the River: and that his Page (whoſe Horſe had ſaved him by ſwimming) told her, that his Maſter being come out of Themiſcyra with intentions to hinder the Marriage of Artaxander, had been at Amaldea's houſe; where hearing, that ſhe was on the other ſide of the River; and that Artaxander was there alſo, he would needs croſs it, maugre its overflowing, and ſtrive to get unto the end of the Bridge, out of his fears leaſt Telamire ſhould be married before he could come to her; who told her alſo, that parting from his Horſe, he was drowned. Though Belemis was no friend unto any of thoſe Ladies who were with Amaldea; but on the contrary, was an inveterate enemy of Artaxander's, which was both kinſman and friend unto them all; yet this accident did ſtrike ſome ſadneſs into all the Company. As for Artaxander, as much an enemy as he was, he took care for his Funerals, which were as well performed, as if he had died in the time when he was Cloreliſa's Friend. However, ſince this Accident was it which brought Cyrus and Mandana to the knowledg of Artaxander's Adventure: And ſeeing that the floods would not permit them to depart theſe four or five days, Cyrus and Mandana deſired Telamire's Aunt, and Artaxander's Mother to conſent unto the Marriage of theſe two Lovers, and that it might be conſummated in their preſence: And they having no power to deny the requeſt, both Cyrus and Mandana did honour the Feaſt with their preſence, which though in haſte, yet was very Magnificent, both becoming the perſons preſent, and thoſe for whom it was principally made. 'Tis very true, there was more men at the Balls than Ladies: but thoſe few there were ſo amiable that the ſhew was glorious. And though there was no other Ornaments but Mandana and Cyrus, the ſight was worthy of Admiration: eſpecially when they danced together; ſince it was a thing moſt impoſſible to ſee two perſons of a finer compoſure, or that danced better, and with a more noble Air. Mandana dazled the eyes of all beholders: There appeared a moſt extraordinary blitheneſs in the countenance of Cyrus: and one would have believed, that he had received ſome high news, which had given him ſome raviſhing ſatisfaction. But the next morning's news did moſt ſurprize the world: for the common vogue was, that the King of Aſſiria was dead of his Wounds: and Cyrus him ſelf ſaid, he believed it: So as all thoſe whom his death made melancholly, or merry, were either in tears of ſorrow, or tears of joy, according to their ſeveral intereſts. Anaxaris grieved: Mazares was all compaſſion: Mandana had ſome pity: Chriſantes, Marteſia, and Feraula were all glad of it: And every one now did look upon Cyrus as at the end of all his miſeries, ſince he now had not one Rival which he had not vanquiſhed, or which was in the leaſt reſpect to be feared: as for Anaxaris, the reſentments of his paſſionate ſoul were beyond all expreſſions when he ſaw that nothing was likely to thwart his Rival's happineſs. For conſidering the condition in which the King of Pontus was ſaid to go in from the Tomb of Mereſleus, he had not the leaſt ſhadow of any hopes that he could be any obſtacle unto the felicity of his Rival. However, he could not endure the very thoughts of it; and though he knew well enough the injuſtice of his thoughts, yet he was not able to regulate them, but he ſtill was deſiring what he ought not to deſire. But after he had concluded, that nothing could either make him happy, or Cyrus miſerable; May I not hope (ſaid he unto himſelf) that the gods who have ruined all the Rivals of Cyrus, or changed their hearts, will either ruin or change me as they have all the reſt? Yes ye juſt gods (purſued he) you will either give me the Fate of the Aſſyrian King, or elſe the Fate of Mazares: Doubtleſs e're long, I ſhall either be in my grave, as the firſt: or elſe, become as vertuous as the ſecond. But truly, in the choice of theſe two, I had rather have the King of Aſſiria's Deſtiny than that of Mazares: and I had much rather die the Lover of Mandana, than live without her Love. But whileſt Anaxaris was reaſoning in this manner upon the King of Aſſiria's death, and upon his own Paſſion, one came to tell him that Cyrus asked for him: ſo as feeling ſome extraordinary turbulency in his ſoul, he had much ado to obey him: but at laſt, ſtriving extremely with himſelf, he went unto his Chamber, into which he was no ſooner entred, but Cyrus carrying him into a Cloſet, which was within his Chamber, he ſpoke unto him with abundance of Confidence, and Tenderneſs.

You know, my Dear Anaxaris (ſaid he unto him) that I have already truſted you with my honour, and all that can make me live with felicity, or die with Conſolation: And to teſtifie that I have not altered my opinion of you, I will reveal a ſecret unto you, which I will never impart unto any but you only: and which Feraulas himſelf, that Dear Confident of my Paſſion, ſhall never know: for ſince he is in love with Marteſia, I will not let him know, that the King of Aſſiria is alive. Is the King of Aſſiria alive? (replied Anaxaris and wondred) Yes replied Cyrus, and when you heard it reported that he was very ill of his Wounds, and thought him dead, then did he mend, or was perfectly recovered: for ſince I intended to keep my word and fight with him, before we come to Ecbatane, I thought it moſt expedient to let this lie paſs for a truth: for I obſerved, that as long as that Prince was well, all my friends were ſo watchful over me, that it was impoſſible for me to give ſatisfaction unto my enemy: ſo as to be revenged upon him for all thoſe miſeries which he had cauſed the Princeſs and me to endure, I thought it beſt to deceive the world, and publiſh the King of Aſſiria's death, to the end I might turn my Fable into a Hiſtory, and fight him, without fear of being hindred. The King of Aſſiria himſelf deſires it; ſo as when he ſent me word, that within this three daies he would be within fifty furlongs of this place, near unto an old ruined Caſtle, which he very preciſely marked unto me, I cauſed it to be publiſhed that he was dead And I ſee all the world is ſo fully perſwaded of it, that two reaſons induced me to diſcover my deſign unto you; though one of them is now invalid: For indeed I thought I ſhould have ſtood in need of your help to diſingage me from ſo many eyes as were over me, by a device which I had imagined. But now I ſhall only ſtand in need of your help to hinder my Rival from getting Mardana into his power, if I ſhould chance to fall in the Combat with him: For though I made him a promiſe to fight with him before I enjoyed her, yet I never promiſed him to render her into his power. And therefore my Dear Anaxaris, I conjure you, that if I be overcome, to ſhew this Order (which I have writ with my own hand, and which I will leave in yours) unto all the Princes, and all the Commanders in the Army; to the end, that when they ſhall ſee, that I have put into the hands of Mandana, all the Authority which I received from Ciaxares, they may the more readily obey her, and oppoſe the King of Aſſiria: For truly there is cauſe of fear, that ſo many new ſubdued Princes, will be ready to joyn with the King of Aſſiria, to get out of ſervitude, unleſs prevented by your fidelity. I know very well your rare valour hath got you much credit in the opinion of the Souldiers. I know the Princeſs would be glad you ſhould be the ſecond time her deliverer. I know your fidelity cannot be ſuſpected: And you have heretofore promiſed me, rather to dye, than leave Mandana in the King of Aſſiria's power. I did promiſe it Sir, anſwered Anaxaris, and I promiſe it again, aſſuring that I am inclinable unto nothing more than to oppoſe his deſign. Cyrus being extreamly ſatisfied, to ſee with what zeal Anaxaris anſwered his deſires, did expreſs himſelf in moſt obliging Language: And afterwards gave him ſeveral Orders, both what he ſhould ſay unto the Princeſs Mandana, and what he ſhould do to keep her ſafe, in caſe he were overcome. Not but that I hope very confidently, my Dear Anaxaris, that all theſe Orders are to no purpoſe, and that I ſhall conquer the King of Aſſiria: But my affection unto Mandana is ſo violent, and my hatred of my Rival ſo great, that I am reſolved to fight him to his grave, and therefore I ought not to forget any thing which may conduce unto the ſafety of my Princeſs. And therefore once more, I conjure you, to make ſure of all your Companions; to prepare the ſpirits of all your friends; and to flatter the Souldiers as much as you can. Cyrus added unto all theſe one conſiderable piece of Prudence: For he put into the hands of Anaxaris more mony than he needed, to appeaſe all manner of mutinies amongſt the Souldiers: So that neglecting nothing which might prevent the King of Aſſiria from having Mandana in his power, he ſpent his three days before the Combat in continual cares: Yet they were cares as appeared unto none but Anaxaris: And Cyrus was ſuch a perfect Maſter of his own mind, that whether he talked unto Marteſia, Doraliſa, Mandana, or any of thoſe Ladies which the River ſtaid in that place, there did not appear any ſign, either in his eyes or diſcourſe, that any thing troubled the calmneſs of his ſoul. On the contrary, ſince the River began to confine it ſelf within its own limits: And ſince it was likely that within a few days, the Bridge in the place might be paſſed over, and ſince nothing hindred their journey but this inundation of waters, they would all remove preſently from that place. On the other ſide, Anaxaris ſeemed to be very buſie: But ſince Cyrus knew the cauſe of it, he was ſo far from being diſquieted, that he was extreamly glad, he had found out a Protector of Mandana, ſo diligent, ſo zealous, and ſo faithful. In the mean time, ſince Cyrus had in-

Intelligence every day from the King of Aſſiria, he underſtood that he was not far from the place where they were to fight, which was to be the next morning: So that renewing all his Orders, and all his Prayers unto Anaxaris; alſo Anaxaris confirming all his Promiſes, Cyrus took thought for nothing, but how to ſteal away in the night, a little before day; to the end his fight might be finiſhed before he could be miſſed: Yet he went late in the Evening to Mandana, where the Converſation was very pleaſant. Yet ſometimes, when Cyrus thought, that perhaps, the next day before this time, the King of Aſſiria ſhould ſee the Princeſs and not himſelf, he was extreamly ſad, though not outwardly: But ſometimes again, when he thought, that perhaps, the day following he ſhould be the Conqueror of his Rival, and ſo return unto his Princeſs, he was extreamly pleaſant. And ſo leaving her with that agreeable hope, he returned home, and truſting none but Ortalques only, he got a Horſe and a Sword fit for Combat. But to the end, that thoſe who waited upon him in his Chamber, ſhould not wonder at his going out before day, and with ſo ſmall a Retinue, he ſpake openly as he went to Bed, that he intended to go very timely in the morning unto the Quarters of the Prince Artamas, where he was told he might meet with a Ford which was paſſible, ſeeming to be very impatient to be Marching. So that thoſe who waited upon him, being accuſtomed to ſee Cyrus play the part of a Common Souldier, as well as the General of an Army: they did not wonder he ſhould be ſo early up; that he ſhould take none but Ortalques with him; or that he ſhould command them to tell all ſuch as aſked for him, that he was ſtill aſleep. Thus this Illuſtrious Prince, after he had gained ſo many Battles, ſubjected ſo many Provinces, ſubdued ſo many Kingdoms, yet hung his whole felicity upon Fortune, and his own Valour: So that a King whom he had conquered, and a King without a Kingdom, was ſtill in a condition to vanquiſh him; to ſend him to his Grave; and to enjoy the Princeſs, for whom Cyrus had done ſuch great things. Alſo, all the way as he went, his Soul was ſo full of different thoughts, as he could hardly repeat them in any order. Then did he call into memory, his old hatred to the King of Aſſiria, at that time when he paſſed under the name of Phylidaſpes, and all the buſtles he had with him, under the name of Artamenes: He remembred the bloody fight they had at the Temple of Mars, cloſe by Synope: And his imagination repreſented unto him the place where he ſaved his life, as he returned from the Maſſagettes: So that forgetting none of the obligations which that Prince had unto him, though he was uſed alwaies to forget his own benefits, he made uſe of them to incenſe his hatred, as well as the remembrance of all the miſeries he brought upon Mandana, by firſt carrying her away. But at laſt, coming juſt at Sun riſe, unto the place where the King of Aſſiria waited for him, with one Page only: Theſe two Rivals accoſted each other, with a haughty civility, as was evident they intended the ruine of one another: Yet ſince they reſolved to fight on foot, to make quicker diſpatch, they left thoſe that came with them, to ſtay under ſome Trees with their Horſes; and they went themſelves under an old ruined Caſtle, where the ground was very even, to end this great difference, which had put all Aſia into Arms. As they went, they talked together; and the King of Aſſiria told Cyrus, that he ever thought him more nobly devoted unto Glory, than to break his word, and he thought himſelf as much obliged unto him for it, as poſſibly an enemy could be. Deſire of revenge (replied Cyrus ſharply) is ſo ſweet, as I believe it is that, which moves me to give both you and my ſelf this ſatisfaction, as much as my devotion unto Glory. Whatever it be, (ſaid the King of Aſſiria) I muſt highly commend you for it: And confeſs I owe you both my Life and my Liberty: But I am forced to confeſs alſo, that it is much conſolation to me, to ſee you from the Head of an Army of two hundred thouſand men, over which I had no power, and to ſee you here upon equal terms with me. At theſe words, both being come to the place where they were to fight, they parted, and without any meaſuring of Swords, they began the Combat. And they began with more fury than others uſe to end: They fell upon each other with ſuch impetuoſity, as if they both intended to end all differences at one blow. 'Tis juſt now (ſaid Cyrus, and fell furiouſly upon the King of Aſſiria) that I will either vanquiſh, or die for Mandana. This very blow (replied the other valiant Prince, and furiouſly made at Cyrus) ſhall let thee ſee which of the two will happen. Yet the work was not ſo quickly done: for Cyrus having warded the blow, which the King of Aſſiria made at him, as the King of Aſſiria warded the blow which Cyrus made, they did not touch one another: ſo as theſe two fierce Enemies, employing all their valour, and all their skill againſt each other, they aſſaulted and defended themſelves ſo valiantly, that their own valours was an obſtacle unto their Victory. For they diſputed the matter a long time with ſuch equality, that neither of them could get the advantage of the other: ſince Cyrus uſed more judgement in this Combat, than the King of Aſſiria did, who was of a more impetuous temper. Doubtleſs, he made better choice of the places where he aimed his blows: But on the other ſide, the King of Aſſiria did ſtrike with ſuch fury, that none but Cyrus in the World was able to defend himſelf from the weight of ſuch blows. Sometimes Cyrus would lie open, and put all to hazard, to the end he might ſooner vaniſh: Preſently after, he would lie cloſe upon his Guard, and manage his advantages a little better, alſo would profit by the King of Aſſiria's deſpair, who ſometimes mocking at the precepts of that Art, would employ only his ſtrength. But 'twas ſtrange, that theſe two valiant Princes, who had both of them wonderful agility, if they would have uſed it, yet diſpatched this Combat in a very little ſpace: For neither of them being willing to give one foot of ground unto his Enemy, they were always ſo near each other, as within reach, and every minute in danger to be both killed. But at laſt, Cyrus had not only the advantage to ſee the Blood of his Enemy, by reaſon of a ſlight touch in his left arm: but alſo it hapned, that the King of Aſſiria, fell upon his knee: ſo that Cyrus making a paſs upon him, the Sword of that unfortunate Prince fell out of his hands; yet he recovered himſelf ſo readily, Cyrus could not paſs upon him as he intended, but yet he could not recover his Sword, becauſe that Cyrus had ſeized upon it: Inſomuch, as ſeeing himſelf at the mercy of his Rival and his Conquerour, his deſpair was without equal. Yet it laſted not long: for ſince Cyrus was not capable of killing a diſarmed Man: and ſince their Combat could not end, but by the death of one, he took his Rivals Sword by the point, and preſented the Hilt unto him. Since I will not own my victory unto your misfortune, (ſaid he unto him) but only unto my ſelf: And ſince I cannot fight againſt thoſe who are not in a condition to reſiſt me; Take your Sword, Sir, and make better uſe of it than you have done, if you can. Alas, Sir, (ſaid this violent Prince, and took it) this is too too much: and though you do me no other hurt but over-load me with your Generoſities, yet I cannot endure your ſight. And yet I am aſhamed (added he, and took breath) to employ the Sword which you have given me, againſt the giver, but yet the love of Mandana will allow it: And ſince ſhe can be but for one of us, but one of us muſt live. After this, theſe two inveterate Enemies began their Combat afreſh, more fiercely than at firſt: but as they were both ready to vanquiſh one another, and perhaps, both ready to periſh, though Cyrus ſeemed to have the advantage, becauſe fury had diſtracted the King of Aſſiria's reaſon, Feraulas appeared; who riding as faſt as his Horſe could gallop up to them, cried out, as ſoon as he was within diſtance of hearing, Oh, Sir, what are you doing here, whilſt the Princeſs Mandana is carrying away? At theſe words, the two valiant Princes ſuſpended their fury, and ſtepped ſome paces back, to hear whether they rightly underſtood him: So that Feraulas being come nearer, he told them once again, that Mandana was carried away, and carried away by Anaxaris: And that unleſs they made extream haſte, they would not deliver her. How, (cried out theſe two Rivals) hath Anaxaris carried away Mandana? Yes, Sir, replied Feraulas, (addreſſing his Speech unto Cyrus) and there is ſuch diſorder amongſt the Souldiers, by reaſon of this Accident, and by reaſon of a report, that the King of Aſſiria is alive, and hath killed you, that if your preſence do not calm this Storm, and give orders to make them follow the Princeſs, you will never find her. Theſe two Rivals hearing what Feraulas ſaid, looked fiercely upon him: and as if they had been inſpired with the ſame Spirit, both ſaid, that their Combat muſt be deferred, untill they had delivered Mandana. So, renewing their conditions in two words, they went haſtily to their Horſes, and went immediately away together: for ſince the King of Aſſiria's Wound was very ſlight, he only bound it up with a Scarf, he went with Cyrus unto the place from whence Mandana was carried away, for that was the way to follow her, to ſhew himſelf unto the Souldiers, and to take ſome Troops along with him. But in his way thither, he met abundance of Men of high Quality, who were looking for him: Amongſt the reſt, he wondred to ſee the Prince Indathirſis, that illuſtrious Scythian, who came out of the Dominions of Thomiris with him. As grieved as he was, he received him very Civilly, and told him his misfortune in the Language which he underſtood, and asked his pardon, that he could not receive him, with ſo much joy, as another time he ſhould. But, (ſaid he unto him) if you conſider, how the Princeſs Mandana is carried away from me, and carried away by a Stranger, whoſe Country I do not ſo much as know, I hope you will excuſe my incivilities: and will not take it ill, that (having a mind filled with the infidelity of the Traytor Anaxaris) I do not render theſe reſpects I owe unto the Generous Indathirſis. Oh, Sir, (replied that Illuſtrious Scythian) you will wonder much more, when you ſhall know that Anaxaris is not Anaxaris: and much more than that, when I have told you who he is. How, (ſaid Cyrus) do you know him? Yes, Sir, replied he, and I ſhall tell you more in private. Then Cyrus ſeparating from the reſt of the Company, and ſtill riding on, to loſe no time, he hearkned unto what Indathirſis told him, with ſo many ſigns of wonder in his Countenance, as it was eaſie to know that he was both much ſurpriſed and much grieved.

AND Moſt Perfectly Noble
THE LADY
ANNE LUCAS.

MADAM,

AFter many Addreſſes, Your Great CYRUS comes to take his leave. His Story runs full of ſuch hazardous Attempts, as bad us expect this laſt Volumn would prove his Tragedy. But Your HONOUR knows how the Ancients differ about the Death of CYRUS. And thoſe who refuſe him for the Lover of MANDANA, may equally deny MANDANA to be his Mother, ſince that Name (as well as CYRUS) belong'd to more than one. Our

Author hath not ſhew'd more ſtrength of Brain in the admirable Turns and Mazes of this Work (which makes it reputed ſecond to none) than he hath at laſt in tying all up; wherein yet he ſwerves not from the Authority of two of the beſt Greek Hiſtorians. Did Annaliſts and Chroniclers draw up Battels with that accurate Skill this Author does here, Hiſtory would prove leſs tedious, more uſeful, and freer from Contradictions. But our Author is a Souldier, and ſpent (one would think) all his Thoughts on Sieges and Battels, 'till we read his Letters and Scenes of Love, and then we admire how (to both thoſe former) he is able to afford us ſuch Politick Diſcourſes. There are Men of no vulgar Genius, and ſuch as are no Strangers to the Author, can lend a Clavis to moſt of this Story; can tell where 'tis Perſonal,and where Moral: They know what Prince the Author means by CYRUS fighting in midd'ſt of a Wood (ſet on Fire round about him) where after Conqueſt of his Enemies he muſt aſſault that Element: And while He and the King of Aſſyria are duelling for MANDANA, She (the great Booty) is taken from them both, by a perfidious Perſon to whom ſhe was entruſted; where MANDANA is no Woman, but the Empire it ſelf; and ſo (I am told) the Word ſignifies in the Language of that Country. But without any Key, an ordinary Eye may behold in TOMYRIS the bottomleſs Wrath of a revengeful Princeſs; what miſchief that Sex can do in a Kingdom when tempted by Power, almoſt (if Precedents had not taught us otherwiſe) as deſtructive as a Man. But herein Your LADYSHIP will pardon the Author, as one born and living under the Salique Law. Yet nothing is more legible in his Chieftains and Commanders, than that the Luſt after Thrones and Scepters is as boyling mad as Fond Love, and infinitely more fatal, ſince the violence of Lovers ſtrikes but at a Couple, when the Thirſt after a Crown drinks the Blood of Millions, who all muſt be ſlaughter'd for that Perſon who aſpires to it. Our Author was ſo watchful over his CYRUS and MANDANA, that neither have their Lapſes, ſave in ſome Doubt (Jealouſy I cannot call it) of their mutual Affections, which yet was begotten on rational Grounds, and ſuch overflowings are tolerable in Love, tho in no other Paſſion. How He hath embelliſh'd his

Queens and Princeſſes with diſtinct Graces, Your LADISHIP is beſt able to pronounce. For the Author (with all his Art and Abilities) cannot feign more Vertues than Your HONOUR is poſſeſs'd of; and might ſafely uſe no other Compellations for thoſe eminent Perſonages he ſtrives to magnify, than the Names of Your ſeveral Vertues. And this (MADAM) is the great Inducement made me humbly offer theſe Volumns to Your LADYSHIP; for if they have ought that is Excellent and Tranſcendent, they are Yours in Juſtice, and may find their Examplers at all Capacities: For whoſe accompliſhment in all Degrees of Happineſs, for your moſt Learned and Noble LORD, and that Confluence of Hopes in that matchleſs young LADY, You have the conſtant Devotions of ARTAMENES, OR THE GRAND CYRUS.

Part IX. Book I.

CAn it poſſibly be true, ſaid Cyrus (and cried out, after he knew from Indatherſes the true name of Anaxaris) that Anaxaris ſhould be the Prince Ariantes, Brother unto Thomiris, who was gone unto the Kingdom of Iſſedons, with the young Spargapiſes, when Ciaxares ſent me unto that Princeſs? Yes, Sir, replied Indatherſes, Anaxaris is really Ariantes, Brother unto the Queen of Maſſagettes; and the Voyage which he made when you were with that Princeſs, cauſed him to paſs unknown in your Army, for ſince you never ſaw him, he might paſs for whom he pleaſed. But I beſeech you (ſaid Cyrus) what could his deſign be in concealing himſelf ſo long, and in rendring me Services ſo great, as will for ever after make me the moſt miſerable Man alive? Did he only wait for an opportunity of revenging Thomiris, by carrying away the Princeſs whom I adore? And muſt I look upon this Act of his, an effect of that Revenge which lurks in the Soul of that incenſed Qeeen? or, as his love unto Mandana? Sir, replied Indatherſes, I cannot tell you what the Intentions of the Prince Ariantes were; but I am ſure he has been too long

out of the ſavour of Thomiris, to be the Executioner of her revenge. I beſeech you (ſaid Cyrus) how do you know that Anaxaris is Ariantes? for I muſt ingenuouſly confeſs, what you tell me does ſo much ſurprize me, that I muſt needs enquire of all Circumſtances concerning a matter, which would ſeem abſolutely incredible, if any but you had told it. Sir, replied Indatherſes, I know ſo very well, that Anaxaris is Ariantes, as none can be ſurer of any thing; for a Servant of mine, in whom I have extraordinary Confidence, and who hath ſeen him whole Years together, did ſee him with Mandana; and ſince I deſired to be ſure of the place where you were, I ſent him to enquire, with orders to return unto me at a place where I ſtayed a Day to put my ſelf in a fit Equipage to appear before the Princeſs Mandana, whom I knew you conducted: So as this Servant who has Wit and Spirit enough, ſaw Anaxaris yeſterday do the Office of the Captain of the Guard unto the Princeſs Mandana: But ſince he ſaw him, and was not ſeen by him again, by reaſon of the preſs of People which crowded to ſee that Princeſs as ſhe went unto the Temple, his wonder at the ſight of him was not perceived, and knowing none about him, he had no reaſon to expreſs his admiration, yet he made a ſhift to be underſtood, and to ask the name of him whom he looked upon ſo ſeriouſly; and being anſwered that his name was Anaxaris, but none being able to tell him either what he was, or from whence, he eaſily apprehended, that the Prince Ariantes would not be known; ſo that ſaying no more, he returned in all haſte towards me, not only to aſſure me that I ſhould find you upon the Banks of the River Halis, but alſo to tell me that he had ſeen the Prince Ariantes, paſſing by the name of Anaxaris, and as Captain of the Guard unto the Princeſs Mandana. At the firſt I told him, that certainly he was miſtaken by ſome that reſembled him; yet he was ſo extreamly confident of it, that I contended no longer with him, but made a doubt of it in my own Mind, and ſaid no more unto him. But Sir, when I came unto the place where I imagined to find you, then I underſtood that this Anaxaris had carried away Mandana, and then I made no queſtion but that he was the Prince Ariantes; and truly I am now as fully perſwaded of it, as if I had ſeen him my ſelf. Alas my dear Indatherſes (ſaid Cyrus) I am no leſs perſwaded of it than you; for truly were Anaxaris of a more inferiour Quality, certainly he durſt never have been ſo bold as to carry away the Princeſs; and now methinks you have opened my Eyes, and I find ſome imperfect reſemblance betwixt Thomiris and him: Alſo he hath an accent, and ſound in his Voice, as might at leaſt have induced me to know him for a Scythian: But aſſuredly the Gods, being reſolved upon my ruine, did blind me, and deprived me of my Reaſon, to the end that I my ſelf might contribute unto Mandana's and my own Deſtruction.

After this, Cyrus was ſilent, and continued a while ſighing and walking, then upon a ſudden calling Feraulas, unto whom the King of Aſſyria was talking, he asked him how it was known that Anaxaris had carried away Mandana? Sir, ſaid Feraulas, Anaxaris hath carried the matter ſo ſubtilly, that none ever knew until within four hours after his Departure; for Sir, he went away with the Princeſs above an hour before it was Day, yet it was not known that ſhe was not in her Chamber, until an hour before I departed, with intention to come hither; and which is ſtrangeſt, Arianita whom ſhe left behind her, had orders to conceal her Departure as well as Pherenice, and all the reſt of the Women: But Doraliſa and Marteſia are with her. O Feraulas (ſaid Cyrus) this cannot be, I can never believe that Mandana would let her ſelf be carried away, and carried away by Anaxaris. Sir, replied Feraulas, it is as far from my belief as yours, but it is a certain Truth, that neither the Princeſs, nor either of the Ladies who are with her, did call any unto their Aid; that all Mandana's Guard followed her, and that Andramites and his Friends are gone with her: The greateſt Wonder is, Arianita ſaid, that Anaxaris came and cauſed Marteſia to be waked, to the end ſhe might awake Mandana, which after ſhe had accordingly done, he ſpoke unto the Princeſs; that he read ſomething unto her out of a Letter which he had; and that he ſhewed unto her a Scarf, which ſhe looked upon with a torrent of Tears in her Eyes, and with extream bitterneſs of Heart.

Arianita ſaid farther, that after Mandana had cauſed Marteſia to come unto her, and had ſent to waken Doraliſa, they both of them wept a while with her; and afterwards the Princeſs riſing in haſte, whilſt Anaxaris went to take orders for her Departure, ſhe did nothing elſe but ſhed Tears whilſt ſhe was a dreſſing: She alſo ſaid, that as the Princeſs was ready to depart, and to take Coach at a pair of Stairs in a back Court, Marteſia commanded her from the Princeſs to cauſe her Women not to open the Door of her Chamber until it was very late. Then Arianita preſſing Marteſia to tell her whither the Princeſs went? why ſhe grieved? and why ſhe carried not all her Women with her? You ſhall e're long have Orders to come unto her (replied Marteſia.) But in the mean time my dear Arianita (ſaid She) repent of your ſerving the King of Aſſyria, ſince perhaps you were the cauſe of his killing the illuſtrious Cyrus, and of the Princeſſes Death for very grief of his loſs. You may well conceive, Sir, that a Woman who thought the King of Aſſyria dead, was extreamly ſurprized to hear that he lived, and that he had killed you; yet ſhe could not expreſs her Wonder, for Marteſia and Doraliſa followed Mandana with as much Haſte as Sorrow. However, ſince this News did touch Arianita very much, ſhe imparted it unto the reſt of the Princeſſes Women, and alſo awaked Pherenice to tell her. So that having paſſed away the reſt of the Night, and part of the Morning in reaſoning upon this ſtrange Adventure, ſhe ſent to ſeek out Chriſantes, yet it was long before her Servant could get out, becauſe the fore-Guards which Anaxaris had placed at the Gate of the Caſtle, would not ſuffer any to paſs out, becauſe their Orders were to the contrary; but at laſt obtaining their leave, this Servant got out and went unto Chriſantes, who underſtood before that you (Sir) were not at your own Lodging: And hearing at the ſame time, by Arianita, that the Princeſs was alſo gone out, he thought it not fit to conceal her Aſtoniſhment: So that acquainting the Prince Artamas, Mazares, Intaphernes, Myrſiles and others with it, there was preſently raiſed ſo great a Report of your Death, Sir, and of the Princeſs her Departure, that I am not able to repreſent unto you the Diſorder which this ſad News cauſed, both amongſt all your Friends, and amongſt the Souldiers: The greateſt Wonder was, that none knew what courſe to take, nor from whom to receive Orders. Some ſaid the beſt way was, to go unto the King of Hircania; others unto Cræſus; and every one voting to revenge your Death, and going after Mandana; yet all their Spirits were in ſuch Diſorder, that neither of thoſe Courſes were taken: Some ſaid that happily Anaxaris had not carried away the Princeſs, conſidering the manner of her Departure. But the Prince Myrſiles underſtanding from ſome of his Servants, that Andramites, many Days ſince, had prepared ſome of his Friends for ſome great Deſign, which he ſaid he had in Hand; he made no queſtion but his Deſign was, that knowing Anaxaris would carry away Mandana, he would alſo carry away his adored Doraliſa: So that ſuppoſing them to be carried away by Fallacies, this Prince making no reckoning of theſe Reports which went of the King of Aſſyria's being alive, and that he had killed you; he aſſembled together ſome of his Friends, and went in all haſte to ſee if he could diſcover which way Anaxaris took. The Prince Mazares alſo took up the ſame Deſign, but took another way: As for the Prince Artamas, Intaphernes, Chriſantes, Aglatidas, and my ſelf, we divided our ſelves with Intentions to find you out; ſo that being guided, doubtleſs by the Gods, unto the place where you were, I have good reaſon to believe that they will alſo guide you, Sir, very ſhortly unto the place where Mandana is. No, no, replied this grieved Prince, there are no Hopes, but on the contrary all is to be feared. After this, the Sybils Anſwer which was brought him by Ortalques coming into his Mind, he aſſured himſelf that he was deſtined unto a ſad Fate, and that Thomiris would deſtroy him. Then alſo he believed that the Oracle of the Aſſyrian King would be fully compleated, and prove to his Rival's Advantage; nor durſt he ſo much as hope, that the Oracle which the Princeſs of Salamis had received, could be interpreted unto his Advantage: So that his Spirits being wholly poſſeſſed with Sorrow, he talked no more of what happened in the place where Arianita was, from whoſe own Mouth he intended to be preciſely ſatisfied of all that Feraulas told him.

He found her with Pherenice, Amalde, Telamire, and all the reſt of the Ladies which uſed to accompany her, but he found them all in Tears; yet his ſight was a great comfort unto them, ſuppoſing that ſince he was living, they needed not to fear Mandana. However, their aſtoniſhment was not a little unto them that believed the King of Aſſyria dead, and had heard ſay afterwards, that he had killed Cyrus, when they ſaw them both living, and did carry themſelves to each other as formerly. And after they were informed of all that Arianita knew, after they had examined the four Guards whom Anaxaris had left, and who knew nothing but that Anaxaris had commanded them to let none go out of the Caſtle until it was late, and that the King of Aſſyria had been dreſſed of a ſlight Wound which he had in his left Arm, they adviſed together upon the beſt Expedients in ſuch a diſaſterous Occaſion. 'Tis true, their Counſels were often interrupted, for Men come from all Quarters of the Army to be ſatisfied concerning this great Report which was ſo ſuddenly ſpread abroad, both concerning the King of Aſſyria's Life, and the Death of Cyrus, and alſo the carrying away of Mandana.

But at the laſt, ſince the Neceſſity of the Buſineſs did extreamly urge it, Cyrus, with the Advice of all his Friends, and of his Rival, and when they underſtood that Anaxaris had not above an hundred Men with him, reſolved that the King of Aſſyria, the Prince Artamas, the Prince Intaphernes and himſelf, ſhould each of them take two hundred Horſe, and divide themſelves, to try if any of them could find out the way which Anaxaris took, of which they had no light at all. But ſince Cyrus was glad that ſome of his Friends would be with the Aſſyrian King, in caſe he ſhould find Mandana, and recover her out of Anaxaris his Hands: And ſo he had no Means to break his Promiſe and carry her away for himſelf; therefore Cyrus tranſacted with abundance of Diſcretion, maugre all his Sorrows, and cauſed many of his Friends to follow his Rival, as Araſpes, Aglatidas, and ſome others. Thus theſe four Princes, taking with them ſuch Men as they ſtood in need of, they parted, after they had agreed upon the ſeveral Ways which they were to take, and of the Place unto which they would ſend Intelligence in caſe they heard any News of Mandana: But when theſe four Troops had taken their ſeveral ways, and that Cyrus marched and enquired all the way he went; alſo when he conſidered, how after he had taken Sinope, Artaxates, Babylon, Sardis, and Cumes; and how after he had ſubdued ſo many Kingdoms, and delivered Mandana when ſhe was carried away by the King of Aſſyria, by the Prince Mazares, and by the King of Pontus, now to ſee her carried away again, by the Prince Ariantes, he fell into a moſt extream Deſpair; for he ſaw himſelf in as miſerable a Condition, as he was when he went under the Name of Artamenes; when upon his return from Maſſagettes, as he approached Themiſcyra, he underſtood, that the King of Aſſyria, under the Name of Philidaſpes, had carried away Mandana; yet ſometimes he imagined that Ariantes perhaps had not carried her away: but this Imagination was very weak in him, for having confidence in his Secrecy, he had told him the Hour when he was to fight with the King of Aſſyria: So as ſeeing he had carried away Mandana, before he had ſo much as fought with his Enemy, he could not find any Foundation of Hope: And not knowing well what to think of this croſs Adventure, he very well ſaw it to be full of Cruelty to him. In the mean time, all his Vigilancy and Care to enlighten his Knowledg, was in vain. The Prince Artamas was no more happy than he was in his way, no more was Itaphernes. But though theſe three Princes, with Merſyles, ſought Ariantes in vain, it was otherwiſe with the King of Aſſyria, for Fortune ſeem'd to conduct him unto Mandana; and he found the Way ſhe went, within forty Furlongs of the place where he parted from Cyrus; ſo as making all haſte after, and continually enquiring, he underſtood that the Coach in which the Princeſs was, being broken, it would be a long while before it could be mended; ſo as then hoping to overtake them quickly, he marched ſo faſt, that he came at laſt upon a little Hill, within thirty Furlongs of the Euxine Bridg; from whence he ſaw Horſemen coming out of a little Wood; he ſaw a Coach ſtay, alſo he ſaw a Lady ſitting under ſome Trees, whoſe Head leaned upon the Knees of another, and who by her action ſeemed to wipe away her Tears, there being another Woman upon her Knees before him, who alſo behaved her ſelf as if ſhe wept: So as knowing that Mandana had none with her but Doraliſa and Marteſia, he doubted not but it was ſhe whom he ſaw. Then without the delay of one Minute, he encouraged his Men unto Valour. He commanded them to have a principal care not to fight over-near Mandana, leſt they ſhould unawares hurt her: After which he commanded them to march, and at the very firſt to cut all the Reighs of that Chariot in which the Princeſs was, to the end Ariantes might be diſabled from carrying her away: yet ſince he was not near enough to know their Faces, he only conjectured who they were; but his Conjecture and Appearances deceived him, for Ariantes having left Mandana under that Shade, was gone himſelf to enquire whether the Coach could paſs a certain way, which would ſhorten that way at leaſt two Hours, in going unto the Port where he had provided a Ship, as ſoon as he underſtood that Cyrus was to fight with the King of Aſſyria. So that Andramites ſtaying to command Mandana's Guard, no ſooner ſaw this Body of Cavalry appear, in the Head of which was the King of Aſſyria, but he expected an Aſſault. Yet to the end he might know who it was tha aſſaulted him, he ſent out one of his Men to know who thoſe were which he ſaw: And commanding all the reſt to prepare themſelves for a ſtout Defence, he ſet one Party about Mandana, and placed ſome other at the Entry into the little Wood, which was eaſily defended, becauſe they could not be ſurrounded. Since all this coul not be done but in Mandana's ſight, and ſince her Imag nation was filled with a Fancy that the King of Aſſyria ha killed Cyrus, ſhe ſtarted up in great haſte, conjuring Andramitis, that if it were the King of Aſſyria which appeared, to defend her againſt him; and obliged alſ Doraliſa to imploy all her Power over Andramites, to mak him loſe his Life, rather than ſuffer her to fall into th Hands of a Man whom ſhe thought had killed Cyrus. Sh had no ſooner ſaid this, but thoſe whom Andramites had ſent to diſcover whether or no it was the King of Aſſyria, returned with all ſpeed, and aſſured him that it was the King of Aſſyria. So that Mandana aggravating her Prayers unto Andramites, and her Commands upon her Guards, ſhe her ſelf was an Obſtacle unto thoſe who came to deliver her; not imagining that there could be more danger in being carried away by Anaxaris, whom ſhe did not know to be Ariantes, than by the King of Aſſyria, by Mazares, or by the King of Pontus.

Andramites, after he had aſſured her, that he would die in her Service, and after he had ſent to acquaint Ariantes with the Adventure, he advanced toward the King of Aſſyria, as the King of Aſſyria advanced towards him, ſo that a moſt fatal and terrible Combate began betwixt them. Since the King of Aſſyria in his March had divided his Men into many ſmall Parties, leſt he ſhould be miſtaken; and ſince his Intelligence of Mandana's March was various, he was no more numerous than his Adverſary; ſo that the Combat being upon equal Terms, it was both ſharp and bloody. But whilſt they were at handy-blows, and whilſt Andramites endeavoured to hinder the King of Aſſyria from coming at Mandana, that Princeſs would needs go unto her Coach, whilſt Andramites kept his Ground. But ſince the King of Aſſyria had been exactly obeyed, ſhe found that ſome of his Men had cut the Reins of his Horſes; ſo that returning unto the foot of a Tree, environed with thoſe whom Andramites had left to guard her, her Imaginations were beyond all Expreſſions, eſpecially when ſhe knew the King of Aſſyria, and ſaw him fight with incredible fury; for ſeeing him, with the ſame Sword wherewith ſhe thought he had killed Cyrus, her Sorrows were ſuch as words cannot repreſent. Alas (ſaid ſhe, lifting up her Eyes to Heaven, and ſighing) muſt I come under the Power of him who hath taken away the Life of the moſt Illuſtrious Prince that ever breathed, and unto whom I was moſt obliged of all Men living? O ye juſt Gods, (cried ſhe, and bathed her Eyes in Tears) ſince the Death of Cyrus muſt infallibly be the cauſe of mine, I beſeech you defer it no longer, but let me even now expire with Sorrow: And if you will be ſavourable unto me, let thoſe who fight in my Defence, revenge the Death of Cyrus upon the King of Aſſyria; or at the leaſt, let not that unjuſt Prince triumph over my Tomb, much leſs over my Perſon.

Whilſt Mandana was thus breathing up her Prayers to Heaven, a great noiſe of ſtrange Voices, of Arms, and of Horſes was heard, one Man no ſooner fell of each ſide, but another ſtep'd into his place; and their Fury, both in aſſaulting and defending, was as hot as at the firſt. The King of Aſſyria, for his part, did things beyond a Man; and he killed almoſt as many with his own hand, as all the reſt of his Followers did. On the other ſide, Andramites, as well in point of Love as Honour, did what a Man of Courage could do; but ſince the King of Aſſyria was ſtoutly ſeconded by Aglatidas and Araſpes, he preſſed ſo hard upon thoſe he aſſaulted, that they were forced to give Ground; ſo that Mandana, Doraliſa, and Marteſia, then thinking they ſhould fall under the King of Aſſyria's Power, they all breathed out ſuch ſcrieks of Sorrow, as reached the Ears of Andramites.

This Lover no ſooner heard the Voice of the Perſon whom he adored, but recollecting new Vigour, and encouraging his Men, both by his Example and Language, he repulſed thoſe who had repulſed him: Then ſeeking for the King of Aſſyria, maugre the confuſion of the Combat, he fell upon him with extream Fury, and environed him, with four of his Men: So that the King of Aſſyria being weary with the Combat which he had in the Morning with Cyrus, who had wounded him ſlightly in the left Arm, and not having his uſual Strength, he could not reſiſt ſo many upon him at once. Alſo his Deſign being to ſquander thoſe who aſſaulted him at the very firſt, he weakned himſelf at the very beginning of the Combat, and loſt part of his Forces: So that being now overmatched, he was wounded in ſeveral places. 'Tis true, his Wounds coſt others of his Enemies very dear; and if his Horſe had not been killed under him, he had not been ſo eaſily vanquiſhed; yet after he was diſmounted, he did not render himſelf, but on the contrary, redoubling his Fury, he did things above Imagination, for maugre the Valour of them who were upon him, on all ſides, he made his way through in deſpight of them; and perhaps finding his ſtrength to fail, he put his whole ſtrength he had left upon it, and made his way with ſuch vigour, that he broke through them, and went ſtraight unto thoſe who guarded Mandana: But in lieu of being able to aſſault, as he deſigned by his Action, he fell down after he had received a Blow upon his Thigh, which hindred him from ſuſtaining himſelf; ſo that the Guards had diſpatched him, if Andramites, who ſaw him fall, had not forbidden them, after they had ſeized upon his Sword, which dropt out of his Hand as he fell.

In the mean while Aglatidas and Araſpes, who fought for Cyrus, and not for the King of Aſſyria, continued the Combat with incredible Valour. But whilſt Andramites reſiſted them, the King of Aſſyria ſtriving to get up, he ſaw Mandana turning away her Head from the ſight of him, and ſtepping ſome paces further from him; but Love ſtrengthning his Deſires, he got up, and paſſing through thoſe who guarded the Princeſs, he came to her, and fell at her feet; and leſt ſhe ſhould get further off, he took hold of her Gown: The Princeſs imagining that he held it with the ſame Hand that killed Cyrus, did ſtrive to get away; and ſpeaking with as much Anger as Sorrow, Away, away, (ſaid ſhe unto him) how dare you touch me after you have ſent Cyrus to his Grave? Cyrus, I ſay, unto whom you owed both your Life and Liberty, and for whom only I deſire to live, yet I ſee you ſo impudently bold, as to appear before me with a Sword ſtained with his Blood, and to ſtay me with that Hand which gave him his Death. The King of Aſſyria ſurprized at Mandana's Speech, and deſiring to die unhated: O, I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) do not put new Torments of Hatred upon me, I have not killed Cyrus: and I am ſo far from being his Conqueror, that certainly he had been mine, if the News of your carrying away had not taken up our Combat; and to teſtify that I am as full of Sincerity as Love, I muſt ingenuouſly confeſs that he hath once more given me my Life, though I was not able to yield you unto him. How how (cried out Mandana) is not Cyrus dead; No, Ma dam, replied he, but the unfortunate Prince whom yo ſee at your feet is going to die, and to die deſperat unleſs you will pardon his Crimes, and unleſs you wi promiſe him ſome Sighs for the Blood he has loſt i endeavouring to ſet you at liberty.

Mandana then judging by the manner of the King o Aſſyria's Speech, that Cyrus was not dead, and believin that Anaxaris, whom ſhe knew not to be Ariantes, ha deceived her, commanded her Guards to cry unto A dramites that Cyrus was living, to the end he migh give over the Combat; but the King of Aſſyria in terrupting her: No, no, Madam, ſaid he, do no deceive your ſelf, but believe, that if thoſe wh fight for me be overcome, Cyrus perhaps will for e ver loſe you, for Anaxaris is Brother unto the Quee of the Maſſagettes, and he carries you away out o revenge to her, or out of the Love of himſelf: All thi while you have incited Andramites to fight againſt you Deliverers; and your Orders, Madam, have brought m into this deplorable condition, yet I do not murmu but know, too too late, that ſince Cyrus doth love you I ought not to love you, but muſt reſolve upon m Death, ſince I am forced to ſay, (as much my Ri val as he is) that he deſerves you better than an elſe. As the King of Aſſyria was ſaying ſo, and as Ma dana was in extream Aſtoniſhment, and unconceiveabl Sorrow, though ſhe was much joyed to hear that Cyru was living, the Prince Ariantes (whom Andramites ha ſent to come up, and went ſtraight unto the place wher Mandana was, whilſt Andramites with his remnant) wa fighting with Aglatidas, Araſpes, and their reſidue: Bu his intention was to carry away Mandana, Doraliſa, an Marteſia by force, upon Horſes, unto the Port where hi Ship ſtaid, whilſt Andramites held the reſt in play, an hindred them from purſuing. But Ariantes no ſoone appeared, than the King of Aſſyria, wounded as h was, and though he was not able to get on his Knee he ſhewed ſuch a piece of Courage as tranſcends a belief, for ſnatching a Sword from one of the Guards, and kneeling upon one Knee, as I ſaid before, he held Mandana by the Gown with his left Hand, and the Sword in his right: Then looking upon Ariantes, as he came to him, with the menacing Action, though I have but a ſmall pittance of Life to live (ſaid he unto him, in a Tone which ſpoke both Fury and Faintneſs) yet I have enough to defend the Liberty of this Princeſs, and to keep her for my Rival: If you be wiſe, purſued he, learn, by my lamentable Deſtiny, not to perſecute this Princeſs, for if you do, I profeſs you muſt firſt kill me before I will let her go. The King of Aſſyria pronounced theſe words with ſuch a generous Fury, that he imprinted ſome Reſpects in the Souls of all that heard him, even in Ariantes himſelf: Alſo the King of Aſſyria, holding Mandana by the Gown, Ariantes had much ado to part them, out of his Fears to hurt the Princeſs, in forcing the King of Aſſyria to let her go.

In the mean time Mandana deſirous to be ſatisfied from his own Mouth whether or no he was her Protector, and whether he thought Cyrus to be dead, ſhe began to command him to ceaſe fighting, but ſhe perceived by his Anſwer that the King of Aſſyria had ſpoken truth, and better by his Action, for he fearing leſt more Company ſhould come in, and leſt Andramites ſhould be vanquiſhed, he commanded that they ſhould ſeparate Mandana from the King of Aſſyria. But this unfortunate Prince no ſooner ſaw them advancing towards him to that intent, but without quitting Mandana's Gown, he gave him who firſt advanced ſuch a furious Blow, that the Man fell half dead at the Feet of the Princeſs: So that Ariantes being incenſed at his Reſiſtance, went himſelf to make him quit Mandana, when he ſaw Aglatidas, who having left Araſpes to command thoſe who were ſtill fighting, came with five or ſix of his Men to aſſault him: So as being forced unto a defence, he recoiled ſome paces from the King of Aſſyria, whom two of the Guard which were left with him, whereof the one of them was Brother unto him whom that unfortunate Prince had laſt wounded, both of them fell upon him behind, and took his Sword from him, ſay what Mandana could to the contrary; for this Princeſs ſeeing how things ſtood, did what ſhe could to defend him, who now defending her, conſidering the pittiful condition wherein he was; and ſhe was now as careful of preſerving his Life, as ſhe was of cauſing his Death, when ſhe thought he had killed Cyrus: 'Tis true, all her cares were fruitleſs, becauſe the laſt Blows which this unfortunate Prince had received, did ſo upon a ſuddain enfeeble him, as not being able to ſuſtain himſelf upon one Knee, he fell upon that Arm which held Mandana's Gown, and ſo weakly ſupported himſelf: So that the Princeſs ſeeing him ready to expire, and being moved with extream Compaſſion, ſhe ſat down upon the Graſs, whilſt the Fight continued ſome fifteen or twenty Paces from her; and this miſerable Prince, whoſe ſtrength more and more failed, reſted his drooping Head upon Mandana's Knee; and this generous and pittiful Princeſs ſeeing him ready to expire, did not draw back from him as ſhe did a quarter of an hour before, and would not deny him the Conſolation of taking his laſt Breath upon her Knee. Since his great loſs of Blood had taken away from him ſome part of his fierceneſs, by taking away his Strength, and ſince he had his reaſon very perfect, becauſe he feared not Death, he uttered nothing concerning Mandana, but yet what was very tender and moving: 'Tis true, he ſpoke but little, yet that little wrought great effect upon the Heart of that Princeſs: And to make the freedom of his Soul appear, he remembred the Oracle which he received at Babylon in the Temple of Jupiter-Belus, which ſaid thus unto him.

Well mayeſt thou hope to make her Mourn,
For all her Cruelty and Scorn,
Becauſe hereafter in her Armes,
Thou there ſhalt find ſuch pleaſing Charms,
As quite ſhall terminate thy Pain,
And never ſhalt complain again.

This Prince very probably remembring this Oracle, lifting up his Eyes in a languiſhing manner, and looking upon the Princeſs; I beſeech you, Madam (ſaid he unto her in a dying Tone) let me have ſome ſhare in thoſe Sighs which I hear you breath, to the end that dying in your Arms, I may meet with that reſt which the Gods have promiſed me by their Oracles: I aſſure you, Sir, (ſaid ſhe and ſighed again) that what you have now done for me, makes me extreamly ſad to ſee you in this Condition, and if I were able to preſerve your Life, as you would my Liberty, I would do it with all my Heart: It is enough, divine Madam (ſaid he unto her in a very low Voice) and I ſhall die much more happy than I lived, ſince I ſhall die unhated by the divine Mandana. As this unfortunate Prince ſaid ſo, he offered reſpectively to take the Hand of the Princeſs, but at the very firſt touch of it he loſt his Speech, and in a hollow whiſper did let her underſtand that which his Tongue could not pronounce: So as this deplorable Prince dying immediately after, he had the Glory to make Mandana ſigh, and really to pity his Death, who had been the greateſt torment of his Life. In the mean while the Combate continued ſtill, but ſince the preſence of Ariantes had given freſh Hearts unto his Men, the Face of things changed, and both Aglatidas and Araſpes who were met, could not with all their Valour prevent almoſt an abſolute Defeat; for ſince the Horſe of Aglatidas was killed, and himſelf wounded in the Arm, Araſpes alſo being hurt in his right Hand, Ariantes and Andramites left a Party of their Men to keep in work thoſe few Men which reſiſted them, and went with the reſt unto the place where Mandana was; and ſay what ſhe would or could, ſhe muſt ſubmit unto force, and be carried away againſt her Will, not but that it grieved Ariantes to the Soul, that his Paſſion ſhould tranſport him beyond his due Reſpects. But though he asked pardon for the violence he offered, yet he behaved himſelf as a Man who would execute his Deſign; and indeed he carried Mandana, Doraliſa, and Marteſia, unto the Port where the Ship waited; and as he remembred how Mazares in his carrying away Mandana from Sinope, did ſet fire upon all the Ships in the Port, he reſolved upon the like, leſt he ſhould be followed, which thing was eaſily done, becauſe there was not above three or four there; and becauſe the Port was ſeparated from the Town which was near,and ſince there were not above two or three Men in each of thoſe Ships. Thus Mandana, Doraliſa, and Marteſia being put into the Ship, and Ariantes, Andramites, and their retinue alſo entred, they began to hoiſe ſail, not tarrying for thoſe they left in hand with the King of Aſſyria's Men; for though Ariantes had left one of his deareſt Friends amongſt thoſe which fought, yet he would not hazard the loſs of Mandana to preſerve him, ſo violent was his Paſſion. Thus parting from the Port a little after Sun-ſet, Mandana was in as ſad a Condition as ever. But whilſt this Princeſs (and with reaſon) was grieving, Cyrus was as ſad as his Sorrow was juſt, for after he had in vain ſought Mandana, chance brought him at laſt unto the place from whence ſhe was carried away: So as finding the place covered with dead and dying Men, he ſaw Mandana's Coach, and the Horſes grazing looſe; he ſaw Aglatidas wounded, as well as Araſpes, and he ſaw the King of Aſſyria dead. So that not finding Mandana there, and thoſe who fought for her Liberty, vanquiſhed, his Sorrow was moſt extream; but it was at a higher pitch,when he underſtood from Aglatidas and Araſpes how the caſe ſtood, and when he underſtood from one of Mandana's Guard, who lay wounded near the place where the King of Aſſyria's Corps did lie, ſome of that Prince's dying Expreſſions, and all that he had done for her Liberty: So as this generous Rival in imitation of that Compaſſion which they ſaid Mandana expreſſed at the loſs of ſo valiant a Prince, he alſo pitied the lamentable deſtiny of ſo great a King, though he had been his moſt mortal Enemy. But to ſpend no time in fruitleſs Complaints, he commanded ſome of his Followers to put the Corps of this renowned Rival into Mandana's Coach, to catch the Horſes, and to drive to the place from whence he came, there to ſtay till he had reſolved what Funeral-Honours to do unto it. After which, viſiting the wounded, to ſee if any could tell

as with Cyrus, did know one of his Country who was good Quality called Adonacris: So as going to him, d making himſelf known, they were both ſurprized
the ſight of each other. But after the firſt paſſages Civility, Indatherſes asked him ſuch queſtions as Cy- s deſired to be ſatisfied in, and he anſwered that he ought it in vain to follow Ariantes, for certainly he ould be Shipped before any could be at the Port where e had provided a Ship, though it was not far from the lace where they were. However Cyrus haſted thither ter, at the requeſt of Indatherſes, he had commanded at a ſpecial care ſhould be had of Adonacris, who as ounded as he was, had the Air of a brave accompliſhed an, and of good Quality. But as much haſte as Cyrus ade, it was dark when he came unto the Port from hence Ariantes departed a little after Sun-ſet, ſo as he und none but thoſe Ships which his Rival had ſet on re; nor had he ſo much Conſolation as to underſtand hich way the Ship ſteered which carried away his inceſs, for the Night being dark, one could not diſco-r any thing towards the Sea, nor could he learn any ing from the Men which had their Ships burning, for eir Amazement at the Accident, did ſo wholly take up eir Minds, that they thought upon nothing elſe but uenching the Fire, and never heeded which way he eered who had done them the hurt.

Thus the illuſtrious Cyrus could not that Day learn hether Ariantes went towards his own Country, or wheher he ſteered towards Thrace, or towards the Meotidan ake, or towards Colchis, ſo as he was in the moſt miſe-able Condition in the World; for ſince there was no ort within a days ſail of the place where he was, e thought it in vain to ſend after Ariantes, ſince he new not which courſe he ſteered; yet he ſent Feraulas ith fifty Men, and commanded him to take as many hips as he could find, and to divide his Men into all the hips, to enquire news of Ariantes, and to know into hat place of the World he might go and ſeek Mandana.
e had a mind to go himſelf in Perſon, but his Friends diverted

diverted him, by deſiring him to conſider, that ſince all he could do was to enquire of the place unto which Ariantes went, ſince he was not in a condition to aſſault him, he had better ſtay and expect Intelligence, than to wander upon the Seas with ſo much uncertainty of the way which he took; but the greateſt Inducements of his ſtay was, becauſe Indatherſes told him that happily Adonacris knew more of Ariantes's Mind, than he would tell in his preſence: So that Cyrus being perſwaded by him, returned to the place where the King of Aſſyria's Corps was carried, and whither they had alſo carried Adonacris after he was dreſſed. But in his return thither, he went through a Village where he reſted himſelf two or three Hours, and found a Servant unto Andramites, who being wounded ſtayed there, and who knew all the Secrets of his Maſter: So as Chriſantes knowing him very well, acquainted Cyrus with it, and told him, that happily he might get many things out of this Man, if he did force him unto it; and accordingly Cyrus uſed Prayers, Menaces, and Promiſes of recompence, if he would tell all he knew, both concerning Ariantes and Andramites: Sir, (ſaid the Man again) If what I ſhall tell you would bring my Maſter under your Power, though I know the deſign of the Prince Ariantes to be very unjuſt, yet I would not tell you any thing, for all your Menaces or Promiſes of Recompence. But, Sir, ſince it cannot, if you will promiſe me to pardon my Maſter hereafter, if his Paſſion to Doraliſa engaged him in a Deſign as unjuſt as that of the Prince Ariantes, upon this condition, I will tell you all the paſſages betwixt them.

Since Generoſity appeared in the diſcourſe of this Servant, and ſince he asked nothing in the behalf of Ariantes, Cyrus promiſed what he deſired, upon condition he would tell him all he knew concerning the deſign of Ariantes, and upon condition he would tell him how he had deceived Mandana, and carried her away. Sir, (ſaid he then, after thanks for his promiſe) ſince I have been happy in the favour of my Maſter, and have been ſerviceable to him in this laſt buſineſs, I know all the paſſages which you can deſire to get out of me: Therefore I ſhall tell you, that the Prince Ariantes having contracted an intimate Friendſhip with Andramites, did at the laſt diſcover unto him, who he was, and how he loved and adored the Princeſs Mandana; alſo he told him how the King of Aſſyria was then alive, that within three days he would meet you, Sir, near the Ruins of an old Caſtle, and that you were to fight with him; and how you gave Ariantes your Orders to ſhew unto all the Officers, in caſe you fell in the Combate, to the end they ſhould obey the Princeſs Mandana. But, Sir, after the Prince Ariantes had acquainted my Maſter with all theſe things, and told him how you had furniſhed him wherewith to make ſure of all his Companions, he expreſſed himſelf the moſt paſſionately in the World; and if I could excuſe him without offending you, I would aſſure you that he had much ado to betray you, and that his Generoſity did much ſtruggle with his Paſſion; but in concluſion his Paſſion being too ſtrong for him, he deſired Andramites to aſſiſt him in his Deſign of carrying away Mandana, the ſame Night that you were to fight with the King of Aſſyria; and the more to engage him in his Intereſt, he told him that in carrying away Mandana, he would alſo carry away Doraliſa: So that my Maſter, who till then had reſiſted Ariantes's Deſign, could not now reſiſt his own Paſſion; for conſidering what a Rival he had of the Prince Myrſiles, he ſaw he could not pretend any thing unto Doraliſa; and if ſhe ever loved, it would be rather that Prince than himſelf: So that finding the Deſign of Ariantes unjuſt, when his own Love had no Intereſt, it was not enough to engage him in his Intereſt; but afterwards both of them thought of nothing elſe but how to execute it. In order unto that, I was made choice of by theſe two Lovers to find out truſty Men for ſo great a Deſign; and accordingly I provided twenty Souldiers, of good Reſolution, to be added unto the Guard of the Princeſs. Thus, Sir, carrying the Matter very ſecretly, there were above an hundred Men reſolved to obey Ariantes in all things whatſoever. But the Day being come, and Ariantes knowing that you were to depart an Hour after the Moon was up, they reſolved to delude Mandana, and carry her away: To that end Ariantes went to awaken Marteſia, that ſhe might awaken the Princeſs; telling her that it was a Buſineſs of ſuch high Concernment, as would not admit of one Minute's Delay: Accordingly Marteſia being riſen and gone to awake the Princeſs, ſhe cauſed Ariantes to enter; he addreſſed himſelf in a melancholly Aſpect, ſuitable to the ſad News he had to tell her, and which he would have her credit. But, Sir, without any relation of what he ſaid unto the Princeſs to deceive her, I ſhall only tell you, how according to his Reſolution with my Maſter, he told her that the King of Aſſyria was alive; he told her what you promiſed that Prince at Sinope: And he ſhewed her the Order which you left him to execute, in caſe he fell in the Combate with the King of Aſſyria; ſo that the Princeſs ſeeing an Order written with your own Hand, Sir, and perceiving it was not to be read until after your Death; ſhe drew as ſad a Concluſion from it, as Ariantes wiſhed; and ſhe aſſured her ſelf that the King of Aſſyria had killed you; and the more becauſe the Prince Ariantes, by the means of a witty Fellow who was his Servant, had cauſed him to get out of your Chamber that Scarf which you wore the Day before, being the ſame (as I have heard ſay) which that Princeſs denyed you in Cappadocia, and which you took from the Prince Mazares, when he was almoſt dead by reaſon of the Shipwrack with the Princeſs; ſo as when ſhe asked Ariantes how he knew you (Sir) were dead? He told her that Ortalques, who followed you, brought back the News, and likewiſe brought back the Scarf which formerly had been hers; adding that he had brought Ortalques himſelf unto her, had not that faithful Servant been reſolved to revenge your Death, Sir, upon the King of Aſſyria's Second; and fighting with him he was ſo wounded, that all he was able to do was to come and advertiſe him of the ſad Accident, according to the Order which he received from his Maſter before the Fight. Ariantes added further, that, as wounded as he was, he would have brought him, had he not feared that if the Guards of the Caſtle had ſeen him, the Accident would have been too much divulged, before ſhe had well conſidered upon her own Safety. After this, Mandana asked him with a ſad Sigh, what Ortalques had done with the Corps of his Maſter? And Ariantes anſwered her, that the King of Aſſyria had made himſelf a Party among the Souldiers, and would not ſuffer Ortalques to bring it off; but he had much ado to ſteal away and ſave himſelf: Therefore Madam (ſaid he unto her) it is moſt expedient that you think upon the beſt courſe to ſecure your ſelf; for I am afraid the Commands of a living and victorious King, will be more powerful than the Orders of a vanquiſhed and dead Prince, tho he were the greateſt in the World. You may imagine, Sir, how this News grieved the Princeſs Mandana: But in concluſion, after abundance of ſad Complaints, ſhe told the Prince Ariantes ſhe deſired his Advice; conjuring him to make his Promiſe good unto you, Sir, and to die rather than to let her come under the King of Aſſyria's Power. Madam (ſaid he unto her) you need not exhort me to defend you againſt this Prince, for I am ſufficiently reſolved upon it; but the difficulty is how to do it handſomly, and not to die before you are at Liberty. In the mean time, I muſt once again tell you, that I do not believe the Order which I have from the Illuſtrious Cyrus, ſufficient to keep the Officers and Souldiers in Obedience: For Cræſus and Merſiles ſeeing their Conqueror dead, will perhaps be glad to aid the King of Aſſyria in getting the Throne, to the end they may aſcend their own Thrones. The Prince Artamas, as generous as he is, will perhaps ceaſe being Tributary unto Ciaxares, unto whom he was not ſo obliged as unto Cyrus: The King of Hircania will doubtleſs be of the ſame Mind: And I make a doubt whether Gobrias and Gadates will not make uſe of this occaſion, to make the King of Aſſyria forget all they have done againſt him. To be ſhort, Madam, ſo many new conquered People are apt to rebel: and I have good cauſe to fear that the Orders of the illuſtrious Cyrus will be but ill obeyed if your Perſon be not ſecured before the Death of the Prince be divulged.

Mandana hearing Ariantes ſpeak thus, and finding much Probability in all he ſaid, ſhe told him, that her Sorrows were ſo much above her Reaſon, that ſhe was not able to reſolve upon any courſe to keep her ſelf out of the King of Aſſyria's Power, and deſired him to tell her what ſhe ſhould do. Since you command me, Madam (anſwered he) I ſhall tell you, that in my Opinion, the beſt courſe is to depart in all haſte, and go unto ſome Port upon the Euxine Sea, which I know is not above a day's Journey from hence: that as ſoon as you are there, to provide a Ship, and make uſe of it, if occaſion be: after this, when you are out of the Aſſyrian King's reach, then to ſend unto the Troops to come and receive your Orders; if they obey, and that the King of Aſſyria do not hinder them, you may then continue your Voyage: and if they do not obey, then Madam, you may imbarque preſently, and ſecure your Perſon from the violence of the Aſſyrian King. Mandana finding all this to be full of Reaſon, did believe him; yet ſhe had a deſire to ſend for Chriſantes and Aglatidas: But Ariantes telling her that they lodged far from the Caſtle, and their Deſign requiring both ſecrecy and haſte, ſhe was contented to let them alone, though her Grief was extream; and ſhe feared ſo much to fall into the King of Aſſyria's Power, that indeed her Soul was all Sorrow and Fear: So that ſince ſhe thought no Man more fitting to truſt, than him unto whom you had truſted your Secrets and your Honour, ſhe ſubmitted her ſelf wholly unto his conduct: yet ſhe chid him much for not acquainting her with your Engagements with the King of Aſſyria: but to put that off, he told her, that he never knew of it until Ortalques told him, and gave him this Order which he ſhewed her. So that the Princeſs reſolving to follow his Advice, ſhe ſent to give Orders for her departure; ſhe did riſe as faſt as ſhe could, and departed with two Women only, believing that Ariantes had no further deſign but to ſecure her Perſon.

But, Sir, I forgot to tell you, that in caſe Mandana had not been willing to follow the advice of Ariantes, he had carried her away by force; and would have told her that he had Orders ſo to do, and to carry her unto the King her Father: yet, Sir, that needed not; for as I have already told you, the Princeſs confiding in the Man whom you truſted, Sir, and not ſuſpecting that he was in Love with her, ſhe her ſelf was acceſſary to her own carrying away: And the truth is, when the King of Aſſyria came up, ſhe believed Cyrus to be dead, and that Ariantes under the umbrage of Anaxaris was her Protector. But I pray tell me (ſaid Cyrus, and interrupted him) what is the deſign of Ariantes, and whither will he carry Mandana? Sir, replied the Man, if he have not changed his Mind, he will land at the Port of Colchis, and keep cloſe in that Province until he have brought one of theſe two things to paſs, either until he have negotiated with the Queen his Siſter, or elſe until he have declared War; for I underſtood within theſe few days that there came a Man of Quality diſguiſed unto him, who told him that his Friends had raiſed a great Party againſt Thomiris, and that the ſtate of things was ſo, as he was able to take the Kingdom of the Iſſedons from Thomiris, which he pretended that Princeſs unjuſtly detained from him.

This Scythian who came to Ariantes (replied Indatherſes, and addreſſed his Speech unto Cyrus) is certainly him, for whom I deſired your Protection, Sir. If ſo, replied Cyrus, happily we may get more light from him, than yet we know. If he do know any thing (replied Indatherſes) I am in good Hopes he will impart it to me, for he is my very good Friend, and is a little obliged to me: So as ſince I know him to be a moſt accompliſhed Man, I have good reaſon to hope he will not hide what I ſhall deſire to know, if he can impart it without betraying his Friend. For Heaven's ſake, ſaid Cyrus, let me know as much as you can concerning Ariantes; I ſhall not fail, Sir, anſwered this generous Scythian; for I aſſure you, Sir, I ſhould be as much joyed to help you in the delivery of Mandana, as I was when I had the Happineſs to help you out of the Meſſagettian Country. After this, Cyrus thanking him, and confirming the Promiſe he made unto the Servant of Andramites, he returned unto the place from whence Mandana departed; but in his way thither he met the Prince Myrſiles, who with unequall'd Sorrow, told him thus; Sir (ſaid he) ſince one that is a Subject unto the King my Father hath his Hand in carrying away the Princeſs Mandana, I may perhaps ſeem to be acceſſary: But if you will be pleaſed, Sir, to conſider what he hath done againſt my ſelf, doubtleſs you will not think me culpable. As he was ſaying ſo, Mazares overtook them, and with ſo much ſadneſs in his Face, as it was eaſy to ſee, that though he did not pretend any thing unto Mandana, yet he did very much intereſt himſelf in her Misfortunes. And Cyrus had no ſooner returned a civil Anſwer unto the Prince Myrſiles, but Mazares conjured him to tell him, whether he had heard any thing concerning Mandana? So as Cyrus eſteeming him very much, and had loved him moſt tenderly, had he never been his Rival, he gave him a moſt exact Account of all paſſages; but he had no ſooner done ſpeaking, than Mazares told him that he was exceeding generous to ſatisfy his Curioſity: For truly (ſaid he) though I never carried away Mandana but once, yet it may very well be ſaid, that I am acceſſary both unto the King of Pontus his carrying her away, and alſo unto this of Ariantes, ſince if I had never begun, they had never followed: But I aſſure you, Sir, that I would ſpend both my Blood and my Life, to recover unto her that Liberty which I cauſed her to loſe. Alas, alas, cried Cyrus, conſidering what is paſt, what may be expected from the future! After this Cyrus began to march, and muſe with himſelf until he met with the Prince Artamas, unto whom he related as much as he did unto Mazares: And after that he went ſtraight into the Caſtle, where all Mandana's Women ſtayed with all the Ladies of Thimiſcira, who were to return the next Morning, for the River which had over-ſwelled its Banks was now confined into its ordinary limits, and would let them paſs. But ſince Arianita was of their acquaintance, ſhe and Pherenice ſtayed with them, and all the reſt of Mandana's Women alſo: Cyrus deſiring Amaldea to have a care of them until their Princeſs was at liberty; and that ſhe would carry them unto Thimiſcira, where he would give orders for all things they ſhould need.

In the mean time Indatherſes went to viſit Adonacris to ſcrew what he could out of him, before Cyrus reſolved upon any courſe: But whilſt he was there, he did not only give Orders that all Honour ſhould be given unto the King of Aſſyria's Corps, as if that dead Prince were living upon his Throne, but alſo, that it ſhould be carried unto the ſtately Tomb which the Queen Nitocris his Mother had built in Babylon. And accordingly about three days after, his Corps was put in a Chariot covered with black Cloth, imbroidered with Gold, the Horſes which drew it, in magnificent Harneſs, and this Chariot was waited upon by two hundred Men in Mourning on Horſe-back, whereof half went before it, and half behind.

In the mean time, ſince it was ever the cuſtom of Cyrus to do a hundred unneceſſary things for the ſervice of Mandana, rather than neglect the leaſt expedient that might be ſerviceable ; he conveyed away Spies to Colchis, where the Servant of Ariantes ſaid he would land ; and he ſent Ortalques ſecretly in a diſguiſe to Gelonide, who had been very favourable to him when he was with Thomiris ; but ſince it was Chriſantes who had the moſt commerce with her, Cyrus deſired him to write unto her ; and deſired Aglatidas who was Nephew unto that wiſe Lady, to do the like, he himſelf intending to march ſlowly towards that Country, until he knew preciſely where Mandana was. Whilſt Cyrus was thinking upon theſe things, Indatherſes having been to ſee Adonacris, and having found him in a condition to be talked with, he conjured him to tell what Ariantes his deſign was. I can tell you, replied Adonacris, that ſince I came hither, I oppoſed as much as I was able, the unjuſt deſign of Ariantes : And truly, generous Indatherſes, I had a good mind to betray that Prince, to the end I might the better have ſerved him ; but ſince I was afraid to ruin him, by deſiring to ſerve him, I durſt not truſt Cyrus, unto whom I had not the Honour to be known ; and if it had been the pleaſure of the Gods, that you had been here when I came firſt hither, things had not now been in that lamentable Condition as they are : For truly, Sir, Ariantes hath loſt a Kingdom, to carry away Mandana, and he chuſed rather to be her Raviſher, than to be King of the Iſſedons. I do ſo little underſtand the meaning of all this, replied Indatherſes, that I cannot give any anſwer unto it; for ſince I left Thomiris, I have been always in Greece ſeeking Anacharſis, who as you know is my Uncle, ſo as I have only a confuſed Notion of what hath paſſed in both the Scythia's; and ſince I deſired to forget the ungrateful Thomiris, I would not ſo much as think upon the Country where ſhe dwelt, nor ask any news of it: 'Tis true, ſince I came into Aſia I underſtood, that preſently after my departure from the Meſſagettes, there grew a War between Ariantes and Thomiris, by reaſon of a pretention which that Prince had unto the Crown, but I have ſuch a confuſed knowledg of it, that you would do me the greateſt pleaſure in the World, if you would be pleaſed to tell me, not only all you know concerning Ariantes and Thomiris, but all the Adventures happened unto your ſelf; and if you will compleatly oblige me, let the illuſtrious Cyrus know it alſo: and to induce you unto it, I muſt aſſure you that it much concerns the Prince Ariantes (whom you love) you ſhould oblige a Prince, who certainly will one day be his Conqueror. Since I have nothing to ſpeak concerning the Prince Ariantes, which can prejudice him (replied Adonacris) but on the contrary, will rather excuſe him, I will willingly ſatisfy your Deſires as far as I can: But to tell the illuſtrious Cyrus all that relates unto Ariantes, and all that concerns my ſelf, will be a diſcourſe ſo long, that I am afraid, conſidering my Condition, I ſhall not be able to go through with it: But I have a Friend which came unto me this Morning, who knows all things as well as I my ſelf, and who ſpeaks Greek excellently well, he ſhall relate the matter better than I my ſelf can.

Indatherſes ſeeing that indeed he was not able to ſpeak ſo long together, unleſs he ſhould do himſelf hurt, though he was indifferent well of his Wounds, he accepted of his offer: So Adonacris ſending for his Friend, whoſe name was Anabaris, he preſented him unto Indatherſes, and telling him what office he deſired from him, he prepared himſelf for obedience: So that Indatherſes telling him, that he would firſt know what hour Cyrus would appoint, and then ſend him word, he went unto that Prince, and left thoſe two illuſtrious Scythians. And Cyrus, to loſe no time, deſired Indatherſes to bring Anabaris unto him that night: So that he ſent to ſeek Anabaris, and preſented him unto Cyrus, who after a very civil Reception, deſired him to ſatisfy his Curioſity. Then Cyrus, Indatherſes, and he, each of them taking their Places, he began thus.

The Hiſtory of the Prince Ariantes, of Elibeſis, of Adonacris and of Noromanta.

WHen I conſider, Sir, by what ways the Gods do bring the ſtrangeſt things to paſs, and what that indiſſolveable Chain of ſmall things with great ones, and great ones with ſmall things is, I cannot chuſe but admire their Order, and acknowledg that it is not fit for Men to pry too far into their Myſteries: Indeed, Sir, who can imagine that the violence which the Prince Ariantes hath done unto the Princeſs Mandana, had its firſt Cauſe in the Adventures which I am now to relate unto you? And that before ever Ariantes knew her, he had done a hundred things which put a diſpoſition into his Spirit of committing that Crime which now troubles you; yet it is moſt certain, that whilſt you were with Thomiris, and whilſt the Prince Ariantes was in the Kingdom of the Iſſedons with the young Prince Spargapiſe, there fell out ſuch things, as would have prevented this Accident if they had not been: Then, Sir, I do think it pertinent to tell you, that the Father of Thomiris was not born a King, and that when he became one he was already married: Indeed Thomiris, who was his then only Daughter, was four years of Age when the Prince Lypacari her Father, by his Prudence and Valor poſſeſſed himſelf of the Kingdom of Iſſedons, after the Death of the laſt of their ancient Kings: So as by this means the Prince Ariantes coming into the World two years after Lypacaris, aſcended the Throne, Thomiris was ſix years elder than the Prince Ariantes: I tell you this, Sir, that you may the better underſtand by what right Thomiris reigns in prejudice of this Prince; for be pleaſed to know, that the Iſſedons are ſo perſwaded that Prudence cannot be found in Youth, as without any difference of Sexes, they have a Law, that when their King dies, his eldeſt Child muſt raign: So as if he have a Daughter elder than a Son, the Crown is hers. Things being thus, and the Father of Thomiris dying, this young Princeſs, who was then fourteen years of Age, was proclaimed Queen, becauſe the Prince Ariantes was but eight: And ſhe found her way the more eaſy unto it, becauſe the Son unto the late King of the Maſſagettes, who was then at Iſſedon, and was deep in Love with that young Princeſs, did countenance her Cauſe by his Preſence, and by his Intereſt, that ſo he might unite in her Perſon two Kingdoms under one and the ſame Authority: And indeed, things went as he wiſhed, for Thomiris was declared Queen, and he married her preſently after: 'Tis true, they ſtayed not at Iſſedon, which is the Metropolis of our Kingdom; becauſe the King of the Maſſagettes being dead, the Prince his Son carried the Queen his Wife into his own Country, and he carried her thither in double Mourning, becauſe the Queen his Mother-in-law died alſo: So that this Prince carrying the young Ariantes with him, by this means he took him out of the Peoples ſight, leſt, murmuring that they had not a King reſident in their own Kingdom, there ſhould any Rebellion begin under his Name. In the mean time, this young Princeſs being the firſt Year delivered of a Succeſſor, the King her Husband died ſuddenly, and left Thomiris Queen-Regent during the Minority of the young Spargapiſes, and left her alſo Queen of two Kingdoms. Though this Queen was very young, yet ſhe reigned Soveraignly and Abſolutely, and in great Glory, making her ſelf ſo terrible unto all the Grandees and People, that there was not the leaſt Commotion in either of her Kingdoms. In the mean time, tho ſhe was born at Iſſedon, tho that Kingdom was more civilized than the Maſſagettes, tho we have many goodly Towns, and the others Habitations be only in Tents, yet ſhe preferred that warlike People before that which was more Civil and Polite; ſo as ſending Lieutenants unto Iſſedon, ſhe dwelt in Tents Royal with the Maſſagettes: Alſo it was her pleaſure, the Prince Ariantes ſhould ſtay with her, until the People beginning to murmur at the Exorbitancies of thoſe ſhe ſent to govern them, and then ſhe ſent thither the young Spargapiſes her Son, tho he was but a Child, to the end his Preſence might appeaſe all Tumults. But becauſe that young Prince did love Ariantes very well, Thomiris let them both go together, which Voyage continued longer than ſhe thought of. This was the Voyage, Sir, which thoſe two Princes made when you were with Thomiris, during which time all manner of Diverſions were invented amongſt us to pleaſe the young Spargapiſes, and keep him amongſt us, to the end we might ſtill have him amongſt us, who was to be our King. Since Iſſedon is a place as pleaſant as any whatſoever, it was there where Spargapiſes and Ariantes ſtayed moſt, after they had ſurveyed all the Kingdom. And tho Spargapiſes was not yet at an age to reliſh Pleaſures, yet ſince Ariantes was eight Years elder than he, the Diverſions were moſt for him; Dancings, Feaſts, Balls, and other Exerciſes of the Body were for Spargapiſes, but Walks of Gallantry, Converſation of Ladies, and Civil Society were for the Prince Ariantes; who queſtionleſs was already one of the moſt pleaſing Princes in the World. Thus whilſt he was at Iſſedon, the Court was very magnificent and glorious, ſince all the Men of Quality and Wit in the Kingdom repaired thither, and ſo of all the Ladies; inſomuch as Iſſedon did flouriſh in a high manner, at leaſt, I am ſure, that both the Scythia's were not comparable to it: Indeed we made a great difference between the Scythians and our ſelves, whom we called Barbarians: The reaſon why we were more civiliz'd than they, was, becauſe we were not very far from the Euxine Sea, and were near the Caſpian, whereby we had more Commerce with Strangers than the Scythians who lived beyond the craggy Mountains, which divide the two Scythia's. So this mixed Concourſe of many People which inhabit amongſt us, hath ſweetned the Ferocity of the ancient Scythians, and hath civilized us more than the reſt. Alſo many amongſt us do hold, that we are deſcended from the Grecians, as well as the Callipides, which are another ſort of People a-amongſt us, who are reputed Scythians as well as we are: So that whether by my firſt mentioned reaſons, or by our original, queſtionleſs we are more poliſhed than our Neighbours, as I ſaid before.

But to return from whence I digreſſed, give me leave to tell you, that Adonacris being as accompliſhed a Man as any is upon Earth, was one who had a great ſhare in the Friendſhip of theſe two Princes, eſpecially with Ariantes: and certainly, Sir, he was loved with abundance of Reaſon, for it was a moſt difficult thing to find out a Man of ſo amiable a compoſure as he: For he was not only handſom, and of great Courage and Wit, but he was one that loved his Friend as well as any Man living: And he had ſuch an Air, and Garb of the World, as he did infinitely pleaſe at the very firſt ſight; and therefore it is no wonder if he pleaſed the Prince Ariantes. But, Sir, as Adonacris pleaſed this Prince, ſo he had a Siſter called Elibeſis, who better pleaſed him; and Ariantes was ſo taken with the Beauty of this Lady, as I cannot imagine how it is poſſible ſuch a violent Paſſion ſhould ceaſe, and make room for any other in his Heart, whomſoever it was. But, Sir, before I make any deſcription of the beginning, continuance, and ending of this Love, I muſt acquaint you, how before the Prince Ariantes came unto Iſſedon, there was a Man of Quality in that Town called Agathirſes, who was deeply in Love with Elibeſis, and who was ſo happy as not to be ill in her Opinion: So as it may be ſaid, that Ariantes aſſaulted a Place which was already rendred, when he attempted to move the Heart of Elibeſis: But ſince that Paſſion was kept cloſe, this Prince did not at the firſt know, how ſhe, whom he loved, was engaged.

In the mean time, Agathirſes did carry it ſo, as it muſt quickly be known whether he loved or no; for he was of a hot and paſſionate Temper, his Deſires were ſo many Violencies, and as magnificent in all things as is imaginable; and exceedingly handſom in his Clothes. He was well proportioned, brown Hair, Eyes quick and lively; and his Face did ſo ſhew the thoughts of his Soul, as it was eaſy to know, by the ſight of him only, that he had a great and fiery Heart, much above his Quality. But that you may perfectly know this Rival of Ariantes, let me tell you, that he had a moſt excellent Wit, and a quick Fancy, ſull of delectable Raptures, which make Converſation pleaſant. The truth is, there was a kind of inequality in his Humour; for he would be ſometimes ſo unlike himſelf, that he would not ſpeak for a whole day together; and ſometimes again, he would do nothing but talk; yet it muſt be confeſſed, that this inequality was moſt cauſed by ſome Men which did not alike pleaſe him, and ſometimes alſo it was a pure effect of his Humour and Temper. However, it may be ſaid of him, that he was ſometimes Merry, ſometimes Sad; ſometimes Complaiſant, and ſometimes all Contradiction: but let me ſay thus much of him, in what Humour ſoever he was, he was always Generous, no Man in the World being more officious than he: for truly, though he loved Pleaſures with extream eagerneſs, yet he would quit them all with joy to do any good Office, not only unto his intimate Friends, but unto any of any vertue whatſoever. Moreover, as Muſick is natural unto all Men; ſo I think it may be ſaid of Poeſy; and that there is no People in the World which uſe not an even meaſure of Words, which ſweetly take the Ear, and gives an Ornament unto their Thoughts who write in Verſe.

As the Scythians, eſpecially the Iſſedons, uſe a kind of Poeſy, not unpleaſing unto thoſe who underſtood our Language; So, I dare aſſure you, Sir, that if you ſaw the Verſes of Agatherſes, and could underſtand them, you would admire the ſublimity of a Scythian's Genius. Moreover, when he is in a good Humour, his Mirth hath ſuch a kind of ſurprizing impetuoſity in it, as doth exceedingly divert, and makes him very pleaſing. 'Tis true, our Ladies do a little quarrel with him, for not being reſpective enough towards the Gods: For the truth is, if any Occaſion preſent it ſelf, he will mock at Veſta, which we call Tabiti; at Jupiter and his Eagle; at Vulcan and his Forge; at Neptune and his Trident; at Hercules and his Club; at Mars and his Paramours; and ſo at all the reſt of our Deities which we and the People adore: Not but that I think he believes all that we do; but ſince almoſt all Religions are eſtabliſhed upon things which are not of common reſemblance, Agatherſes had got ſuch a habit of Raillery, which our Ladies can hardly brook. Moreover, he made ſuch an open profeſſion of abſolute Independency, that it was eaſy to ſee that he could not ſubject himſelf unto any thing but his own Will, unleſs in being amorous. But to make a ſhort definition of him, Agatherſes was excellently accompliſhed, and deſerved a moſt rare Character: This is he, Sir, who was loved by Elibeſis, before Ariantes was Captivated with her. As for the Lady, it is a piece of extream difficulty to make an exact deſcription of her Humour and Spirit. Therefore, after I have told you, that ſhe is full, of a tall and handſom Stature; that ſhe is Pale, brown Hair, fair Eyes, and that the Air of her Countenance is Noble, Languiſhing and Pleaſing, I ſhall only tell you, that ſhe is as full of Wit as Ambition, though high in both: And though they ſay, one cannot have two violent Paſſions at once, yet ſhe was in love with Agatherſes, though ſhe had a moſt ambitious Soul. After this, Sir, you may eaſily conceive, that Ariantes was neither well nor ill received by Elibeſis, when he made his Love known unto her; for her Engagements unto Agatherſes, was the reaſon ſhe could not well receive him; alſo the ambitious inclination of her Soul would not let her treat a Man of Ariantes's quality ill: So as taking the Medium, it may be ſaid, that ſhe was neither Sweet nor Sharp unto that Prince.

But, Sir, before I engage my ſelf any further in the Sequel of this Hiſtory, give me leave to tell you, that whilſt the Eyes of all the Court were upon Ariantes and Elibeſis, Adonacris began to fall in love with a Lady of eminent Quality, named Noromanta, who was come unto Iſſedon with her Father upon ſome important Buſineſs; but he began, and none perceived it, and carried it ſo cunningly: Alſo there was ſuch conformity of Humour between them both, as there was ſcarce any need to tell each other that they were in Love; yet Noromanta was as reſerved in all things, as any Woman in the World: And to intereſt you, Sir, in her Fortune, I beſeech you give me leave to repreſent her unto you as then ſhe was, and as now ſhe is. Imagine her, Sir, a great Woman, of an advantagious Stature, her Meen, Handſom, and Noble; of a high and modeſt Air, her Complexion white, freſh, and lovely; her Eyes black, ſparkling, and ſweet; her Face round, her Mouth well made, her Neck full and plump, her Garb Haughty, without any ranting. Moreover, her Wit was proportionable to her Beauty, ſhe ſpeaks well, and perſwades with ſo ſweet an Eloquence, as one has no power to deny. She ſeems to be all Goodneſs, all Sweetneſs, all Civility, and all Sincerity; and though her Enemies do make a Queſtion of this laſt Quality, in point of Friendſhip, yet they all agree, that though ſhe be not ſo ſincere as ſhe ſeems, yet it is more pleaſing to be deceived by her, than to be faithfully loved by many others; but to ſpeak truly, I am fully perſwaded, that Noromanta is only ſo, to keep her ſelf from being deceived, for I hold her one of the beſt and moſt ſincere Women in the World unto thoſe whom ſhe really loves. Moreover, ſhe hath all requiſite Qualities poſſible to imprint a reſpect in thoſe who come unto her, and I do wonder how Adonacris durſt tell her that he was in love with her, but chance helped on his boldneſs in the diſcovery of his Paſſion; and I do believe, that if Ariantes had not been in love with Elibeſis, Adonacris durſt never have told Noromanta, that he loved her: And indeed it was a long time that Adonacris had deſperately loved Noromanta, and ſpoke not a word of it unto her; but this Beauty talking one Day unto him when he came to viſit her, ſhe told him, moſt ſweetly, how all the Beauties in Iſſedon envied Elibeſis his Siſter, for captivating the Heart of Ariantes; for the very truth was, they were all exceedingly netled at it: For my part (ſaid ſhe, after ſhe had, with much Eloquence, aggravated all the Symptons of Envy which ſhe had obſerved in the Minds of all our Ladies) I do not know any greater imbecillity in the World, than to be vexed at any ſuch thing; for if ſhe who is preferred before all the reſt has more Merit than they have, it is extreatn injuſtice to murmur at it; and if the Man who gives the precedency does make an ill Choice, it were neither glorious nor reaſonable to trouble ones ſelf for not getting the eſteem of a Man, who knows not how to make a good Choice; and in my Opinion, Love is not always a convincing Argument of extraordinary Merit in thoſe who cauſe it, ſince certainly it is more an effect of Inclination, than Reaſon. It is moſt certain, replied Adonacris, That Reaſon alone never cauſes Love; but withal, I am perſwaded, that the Love which Reaſon doth authorize, is a thouſand times more ſtrong, than that which Reaſon doth reſiſt; and that whoſoever loves forcibly, muſt be able to tell himſelf, that there is no Civil War betwixt his Heart and his Reaſon: I know very well (anſwered Noromanta) that Love would be more ſtrong, if it have reaſon for a Pillar; but I do believe that doth not often fall out. I cannot tell whether or no it often fall out (replied Adonacris) but I am ſure it happens ſometimes, and happened unto a Man who you well know. Then, certainly (replied ſhe) it is the Prince Ariantes, who indeed hath all the Reaſon in the World to love her whom he adores. No, no, anſwered Adonacris, for though there were nothing but the inequality of Birth betwixt that Prince, and her he loves, Ariantes had reaſon enough to oppoſe his Paſſion: But amiable Noromanta (ſaid he unto her) I intend to truſt you with a Secret, and to tell you, that it is my ſelf of whom I ſpeak; of my ſelf, I ſay, who before ever I was in Love, had ever in my Fancy an Idea of her whom I deſired ſhould captivate me; and indeed this Image was ſo imprinted in my mind, that I went unto no place, but I ſought whether I could find her out, of whom my Reaſon had formed an Idea. O Adonacris (ſaid Noromanta craftily, and ſuſpected ſomething of his Paſſion) I ſuppoſe that Idea is very fair: For my part, I fancy the moſt admirable piece that ever was ſeen; for I am confident, that in forming the Beauty of her whom you would love, you would have her Hair the faireſt in the World, gray Eyes, a pleaſant Air, and I do imagine, you may ſeek her in all places, but find her no where. Pardon me amiable Noromanta (ſaid he unto her) if I contradict you in all: For, firſt, I ſhall never affect a Flaxen Beauty, nor have I been ſo unfortunate as you think: For, truly (purſued he, and ſmiled) after I had fancied an Idea of the rareſt Beauty in the World, a brown Beauty, and after I had in vain ſought her in more Kingdoms than one, I found her the very ſame day you came unto Iſſedon; and directly then, when I had the honour to ſee you the firſt time. Certainly your memory fails you, (replied Noromanta, and bluſhed) for I do remember very well, that the firſt time I had the honour to ſee you, I was alone in my Chamber, when Agatherſes brought you thither. I do very well remember it alſo, (replied Adonacris, and ſmiled) but that is not incongruent with what I told you: For, ſince I muſt tell you more plainly, it was in your Eyes I found that Fire which I was in queſt of to burn my ſelf, and it was in your fair Perſon in whom I found that perfect Beauty, which I ſhall never find any where elſe. I muſt confeſs (replied Noromanta) that your Language doth ſurprize me, for either I do not know the World, or if I ſhould believe you, I muſt anſwer you as a Man who ſpeaks with too much boldneſs; therefore, the beſt courſe, both for you and my ſelf, is, not to believe you: But by way of your Excuſe, to think that you are of their Opinion, who think they never ought to be alone with a Lady, (unleſs old) without expreſſions of ſuch pieces of Gallantry, as will equally ſuit, either with the Fair or the Brown Beauties, either with the Great or the Little, and talk only with Lips, and without conſent either of Heart or Thought. O, Madam, (ſaid Adonacris, and interrupted her) my Language is not of that Nature, and it cannot ſuit with any but you only. Moreover, I do proteſt, that my Heart makes good all that my Tongue ſpeaks; and if I can be accuſed of any thing, it is becauſe I dare not fully diſcover the greatneſs of my Affection to you. You have told me ſo much already, replied ſhe, that I aſſure you I think it too much, for as much as I eſteem you, I muſt curb my Inclination of treating you as one of my deareſt Friends; I muſt, I ſay, ſhun your Company, ſet a Watch upon my Words and Looks, and indeed I muſt ſo far overcome my ſelf, as I fear to hate you.

As Noromanta ſaid ſo, the Prince Ariantes entred, and did lead Elibeſis, ſo that further Diſcourſe was broken off; whereof both of them were very glad, for Adonacris feared leſt Noromanta ſhould treat him ill; and certainly Noromanta was not angry that ſhe had no time to do it. But Ariantes and Elibeſis were no ſooner entred, than Agatherſes followed them; who obſerving that Elibeſis did not avoid the Converſation of Ariantes, was not very well pleaſed with her, but was very melancholy all that day; and it was ſuch a kind of Melancholy, as rather reſembled Anger than Sorrow, for either he ſpoke not at all, or if he did ſay any thing, it was in few words, and thoſe contradictory. Moreover, one might perceive by his looks, that the Vexation of his Heart would not permit him to ſpeak all he thought. I who came in with the Prince Ariantes, did never in my life ſee a Man whoſe Eyes did better ſpeak the Thoughts of his Soul than his; Elibeſis alſo ſaw it very well. As for Ariantes, he was ſo taken up with looking upon her he loved, that he never regarded Agatherſes; and to augment his Grief, the young Spargapiſes entred, who not knowing well what to ſay unto Ladies, began diſcourſe with him in particular as ſoon as he came in: But ſince Agatherſes was both witty and bold, he did not long endure this torment: Therefore inventing, upon a ſuddain, ſome kind of pleaſant Story or other, which he made a great Secret of unto this young Prince, and which he thought would fill him full of Curioſity, he told him, that Elibeſis did know the whole Buſineſs, and that if he would be pleaſed to ask it of her in a low Voice, ſo that the Prince Ariantes did not hear him, doubtleſs ſhe would tell it unto him: But, Sir, added he, you muſt preſs her unto it very urgently and long, for I know her Humour to be ſuch, that ſhe will never impart what ſhe knows, until after an hundred Entreaties. Nay, if that be all (anſwered the young Spargapiſes innocently) I will put her to a thouſand Entreaties, and will not leave her all this day, until ſhe tell it unto me: And accordingly, he went preſently to Elibeſis, and ſet himſelf down by her. Since Ariantes was full of reſpect unto Spargapiſes, he withdrew,and gave him the freedom of talk with her.

Thus Agatherſes parted him and Elibeſis, he not knowing the Cauſe. But the beſt of the Story is, Elibeſis knew not in all the World what this young Prince meant, and proteſted unto him, that ſhe underſtood him not. But ſince Agatherſes had told him, that ſhe would not impart under an hundred Intreaties, the more importunate was this young Prince with her, by how much ſhe ſaid ſhe was ignorant.

But at the laſt, ſhe denied him ſo earneſtly, that he believed her, and tormented her no longer: yet notwithſtanding ſince Agatherſes had ſo confidently aſſured him that ſhe did know it, he ſaid aloud, that Elibeſis had ſo aſſured him of her Ignorance, that he believed it was he which was miſtaken. I do proteſt unto you, Sir, (replied Agatherſes boldly) That there is no Perſon upon Earth which knows what you deſire to know, if Elibeſis do not: And indeed he lied not, for ſince it was a thing of his own invention, none could know it.

In the mean time, he rallied out the Matter ſo well, that his Deſign of ſeparating Ariantes from Elibeſis did take effect: for he did ſo cunningly ingage the young Spargapiſes to be urgent with Elibeſis, that his importunity laſted all the day, which he thought to be well ſpent, ſince he had interrupted his Rival. But that which gave him moſt ſatisfaction was, that in the concluſion of Spargapiſes's obſtinate Curioſity, he obſerved that Elibeſis did begin to ſuſpect his Fallacy, ſo as he went away leſs vexed than he was at the beginning of the Converſation: And yet he did not think himſelf fully ſatisfied, until he had private Audience from Elibeſis, to tell her of her new Conqueſt: Therefore, the next morning he went unto her ſo early, that ſhe was not dreſt when he entred into her Chamber: And finding her in conſultation with her a Looking-Glaſs, he asked her pardon for his abrupt entrance; but he asked it in a manner ſo little ſubmiſſive, that Elibeſis knew he was vexed in Mind: therefore ordering the Curles of Hair more negligently on that ſide than the other which was dreſſed, to the end her Woman might retire, ſhe indeavoured to appeaſe Agatherſes if ſhe could: But thoſe who dreſſed her, were no ſooner at the other end of the Chamber, than Agatherſes, with a kind of taunting Raillery, and a malicious Smile, told her that the Prince Ariantes was very happy by his coming to ſee her: For, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) if you had continued dreſſing your ſelf with the ſame care you began when I entred, he would have found you ſo fair, that he would have died with Love, before you could have had leaſure to have compaſſion upon him. In telling me (replied ſhe, and bluſh'd for anger) that the Prince Ariantes had found me fair, if he had ſeen me as I ſhould have been if you had not come; you tacitely imply, that you do not think me fair, as I am: but whether it be, that I am not very jealous of my Beauty, or that I do not think it depends upon two or three negligent Curles; if you did think to vex me, you are extreamly miſtaken. If you ſhould be in earneſt, Madam, (anſwered Agatherſes ſharply) I ſhould be very ſorry; for, Madam, you are ſo careful to diſpleaſe others, that I think it is permittable to wiſh ſometimes your care leſs. I pray Agatherſes, (ſaid Elibeſis) without any more exerciſing your Wit in taunting Terms, tell me what it is you complain of? I complain, Madam, (replied he, ſince you are pleaſed I ſhould tell you) becauſe High Quality dazles your Eyes; and becauſe you think I ought rather to ſuffer the Prince Ariantes to love you, than a Man of my Condition: Yet, Madam, I muſt tell you, that in caſes of Rivals, Quality is nothing; Slaves and Kings are all one: In all other things, I do reſpect Kings and Princes as much as becomes my Duty; but in Matters of Love, I proteſt, Madam, that I do not value their Quality: and though you make a great difference between Ariantes and others, yet I ſhall not: but ſhall look upon him as my Rival without any conſideration of Spargapiſes's Uncle, or Thomiris's Brother. And to the end you may not doubt of what I ſay (purſued he with extream violence) I ſwear unto you, by Veſta, by Hercules, by Mars, by Venus, by Neptune, and by all the Gods which we adore, that I will be as good as my word. Since it is allowable to correct ones firſt Thoughts upon ſome Occaſions, replied Elibeſis, I hope that when your Anger is over, you will alter your Mind. Nay, Madam, as for that, replied he, I ſhall not change; and therefore you may build upon what I ſay, for really I cannot indure you ſhould be capable of any ſuch Imbecility. I do proteſt unto you, Sir, (ſaid ſhe then unto him) that you have no reaſon in the Earth to complain; and if you would have me diſcover my Heart unto you, I will ingenuouſly confeſs, that it's true Ambition is the predominate Paſſion of my Soul; and that the only reaſon of my ſlight complacency unto the Prince Ariantes, is, becauſe I know that I do thereby vex all the Beauties of Iſſedon, by poſſeſſing that Prince ſo much that he never ſpeaks unto them.

I know very well, Madam, replied he, that you do vex them, in cauſing the Prince Ariantes never to ſpeak unto them: but you may know withal, that you vex me extreamly, by perpetual talking with him. Since he is not to ſtay here, replied ſhe, me-thinks it need not trouble you ſo much: and truly, how do you think I can be uncivil unto a Man of his Quality? O, Madam, cried he out, it is not Quality that juſtifies a Rival; for I have already told you, and do tell you again, that Quality is no reaſonable cauſe of Inconſtancy: And as for Ambition, Madam, believe it, Madam, that there is more glory in ſlighting a Prince, than in treating him favourably.

Moreover, how can I aſſure my ſelf of your Mind, and how can the Prince Ariantes aſſure himſelf, if you ſhould quit me for him? For, truly he is a Prince without a Principality, and there are a thouſand in the World whom you would prefer before him, if you had the fortune to know them: and if chance ſhould ſo bring it about that Spargapiſes ſhould fall in love with you, you will quit Ariantes who is never to be a King, for Spa-gapiſes who 'ere long is to have a Kingdom : Alſo, if the ſame Fortune (purſued he in a ſcoffing Raillery) ſhould let you ſee either the King of Phrygia, the King of Media, or the King of Hircania, you would for any of them quit the King of the Iſſedons; and ſo paſſing from King to King, if Jupiter ſhould take a fancy to proſtitute one of the Gods at your Feet, or to come upon his Eagle to do you Homage, you would then be unfaithful unto all Terreſtrial Kings, to entertain the leaſt of the Gods. O, I beſeech you Agatherſes (ſaid ſhe unto him) do not uſe ſuch reverent Names to ſhew the folly of your Mind, if you would have me to appeaſe you. I care not for appeaſing, (ſaid he unto her) but I would either juſtify you, or elſe make you repent of the Injuſtice you have done me. If I have failed, I will repent, ſaid ſhe unto him ; but ſince I have not, I muſt needs proteſt that you are very injurious to complain, that the Prince Ariantes did never diſpoſſeſs you of that place which you had in my heart : And unleſs he were able to make me a Queen, I will never be more unto him than I am. I pray judge then whether a Prince, without a Principality, (as you ſay) be able to give me a Crown. Since in all likelihood (replied he, and ſmiled) Fortune will never do Juſtice unto your Merit, nor find you a King to ſet you on a Throne ; me thinks you might very well ſpeak more obligingly unto me than you have done, and to tell me, that though Fortune would make you a Queen, and that a great one, yet you would not make me the moſt miſerable Man upon Earth. But, however, ſince you aſſure me that none under the degree of a King, ſhall ever ſupplant me in your Opinion, my Soul will be at ſome reſt. I will promiſe you as much, replied ſhe, upon condition you will not move me to alter my way of living with Ariantes whilſt he ſtaies here. For I muſt profeſs unto you, that I cannot endure the Reports of ſuch as envy me, who doubtleſs will ſay, that I would never have changed my way of living with the Prince Ariantes, but for the love of you ; moreover, it will much concern your Intereſt and Fortune. Alas, Madam, replied he, as for my Fortune, it is not a reaſon to be alledged unto me; for I think upon nothing but preſerving you. No, no, Madam, deceive not your ſelf, that is not the way to bring me unto your Opinion; and therefore be confident, that as long as it concerns only my Fortune, I will, with abundance of Joy, ſacrifice it all, to have ſo much ſatisfaction as to ſee you treat the Prince Ariantes ſharply: But ſtill I muſt confeſs, that if it reflect upon your Honour, I will have as great a care of it as your ſelf, and therefore I do conſent you ſhould be ſomething civil towards that Prince; provided, Madam, you have a little care of comforting me in this diſpair that I am in, and provided you do multiply your Goodneſs towards me; for if you do not, I ſhall loſe all my Patience, and be forced to do ſuch things as will diſpleaſe both you and my ſelf when I have done them. Think upon it therefore, Madam, and conſider what it is to incenſe a Lover who hath a Soul both high and ſenſible, and who in the very Center of his Heart prefers none before him, but ſuch as have more Vertue and Merit than himſelf.

The truth is, Madam, (purſued he vehemently) if you ſeriouſly conſider it, you will find, that Quality doth not infuſe any Wit into the words of him who ſpeaks, nor alters his Senſe, nor doth at all contribute unto Diſcourſe: Therefore you need not wonder I ſhould take it ill that you ſhould be perfidious unto me for Ariantes his ſake, though a Prince, more than if he were my Equal. After this, the violence of his mind being by degrees cooled, he began to talk more ſubmiſſively unto Elibeſis; and was ſo full of his paſſionate Expreſſions, as in the end he permitted her to continne her complacency unto Ariantes, as ſhe had begun, whilſt he ſtaid at Iſſedon, which he thought would not be long; ſo that they parted very good Friends; yet they continued not long ſo, for I do not think one day paſſed without a Squabble and a Reconcilement.

In the mean time, Ariantes being ſtill more and more in the Fetters of Love, and not being ſatisfied with the bare Civility of Elibeſis, he reſolved to tell her his Mind:

But ſince her Reſolution was to caſt him off, and to engage no further with him, ſhe ſhunned being alone with him; but ſtill continued her complacency: ſo as by this means, ſhe ſatisfied Agatherſes, and arrived at her propoſed End, which was, to keep this Prince ſtill in love with her as long as he ſtaid at Iſſedon, only by being complacential and civil.

Thus, as great a deſire as Ariantes had to expreſs the Thoughts of his Soul, he found it a hard matter to do; and the harder, becauſe Elibeſis had a Friend called Argyriſpe, whom ſhe entreated never to be out of her preſence as long as the Prince Ariantes was at Iſſedon. So that theſe two Ladies being continually together, this Lover could not meet with his deſired opportunity. Again, ſince Love cannot long lie hidden, he came to know that Elibeſis did not hate Agatherſes, but this, in lieu of diminiſhing his Paſſion, did augment it: and it grew to that height,that he was capable of any undertaking to ſatisfy it. Alſo he did ſo vigilantly watch his opportunity of talking in private with Elibeſis, that he found it,mauger her Intentions,a few days after he ſought it: I underſtood ſince,from her ſelf, that this Prince did expreſs himſelf as paſſionately as ever Lover did; For after he had aggravated the Grandure of his Affection, he let her know how he was not ignorant of that Eſteem ſhe had of Agatherſes: And afterwards he took an odd courſe of obliging her to prefer him before that Lover. Moreover, Madam, ſaid he unto her (after much other Diſcourſe) do not think I will blame you for the eſteem you have of Agatherſes, and for preferring him before all others; for truly it was your Choice before I had the honour to be known unto you, and Agatherſes is a moſt perfectly accompliſhed Man; ſo I cannot condemn what you have done for him before I knew you, and before I loved you: And to ſhew you that I am juſt, I do not blame Agatherſes for continuing his Affection, though he do know I love you, becauſe I know very well that you have not forbidden him. But, Madam, as I am juſt, both unto you and Agatherſes, ſo I expect you ſhould be juſt unto me, and that you will be pleaſed to take ſo much Pains as to examine both my Paſſion and his, to the end, that without any conſideration of our Conditions and Qualities, you may chuſe him who loves you beſt: But I beſeech you examine the Buſineſs very carefully; ask both him and me the moſt difficult Proofs of our Loves: And if you find that there is a greater difference between his Paſſion and mine, than there is between my Birth and his, I conſent you ſhould believe I do not love you, and that you ſhould hate me. Sir, replied Elibeſis, I will not ſay there is no intimate Affection from Agatherſes to me, or from me to him; for the honour you have done me merits more ſincerity from me than ſo; but I muſt tell you, that though I ſhould do as you deſire, and ſhould find that you love me more than Agatherſes doth, yet I ought not to caſt him off; for truly, Sir, our Qualities are alike, and it hath pleaſed Fortune to put me much below you: ſo as ſince I cannot imagine there ſhould be any innocent Affection between two of unequal Qualities; doubtleſs, to follow the Rules of Reaſon, I ought to be juſt unto your Merit, and not ſuffer my ſelf to be dazled with the Glory of captivating ſuch a Heart as yours. Truly, Madam, replied Ariantes, you cannot in more civil terms tell me, that you will not caſt off Agatherſes; but know, (too charming Elibeſis) there are no words which can make me receive ſo cruel an Anſwer without abundance of Grief and Anger: Eloquence may indeed ſweeten the harſheſt News, and ſometimes it is uſed in telling the Deaths of deareſt Friends; but when it is imployed to take Hopes out of a Lover's Heart, it is too weak to do it without abundance of Sorrow.

But that you may aſſure your ſelf it is impoſſible for me to loſe my Hopes, I declare unto you, that I will never do it: For I find ſuch an abſolute impoſſibility of living without Hopes of your Love, that my very Reaſon tells me, I muſt keep it alive in my Heart. Since ſo, Sir, (replied Elibeſis, and ſmiled) it is in vain to wiſh you would deſpair, and therefore I conceive it better to give you the liberty of believing as you pleaſe, provided I may keep to my ſelf the ſame liberty of doing what I ought, and what I ſhould. If you do what you ought, Madam, replied Ariantes, you will do nothing againſt me: For truly though it were ſo that you gave Agatherſes ſome hopes of Happineſs, it was in a time when his Happineſs would not have been my Miſery: But now when his Happineſs will be my Death, you ought not to deſire it, nor I conſent unto it; therefore, Madam, I beſeech you conſider ſeriouſly what you reſolve upon: Moreover, I am ſo well acquainted with your Inclinations, that I know Ambition is the predominate Paſſion of your Soul: So as if the poor Merits of my Perſon do not move you, yet I beſeech you let my Quality find acceptance and make amends; and let Agatherſes pay more Reſpects unto Elibeſis as a Princeſs, than he can do as her Lover.

Sir, (replied ſhe much perplexed) your Language is the moſt obliging in the World, and hath a moſt ſenſible operation, both upon my Heart and my Spirits: But ſince I muſt not diſſemble with you, Sir, I muſt tell you, Sir, I have already told Agatherſes, I will never caſt him off, unleſs it be to be a Queen. Therefore, Sir, ſince I am not your Subject, ſince you have no abſolute command over me, and ſince I have promiſed unto him eternal Affection, I beſeech you be ſo civil as to let me live in quietneſs. If you, Madam, would let me live in quietneſs (replied he, after he had ſtudied a while) certainly I ſhall let you; but ſince you will not, take it not ill, I beſeech you if I let not you: but I conjure you, Madam, to promiſe me two things, The firſt is, that you will not marry Agatherſes within the compaſs of one Year: The ſecond, that if in the mean time a King do come and proſtrate a Crown at your Feet, you will accept of it, and caſt off Agatherſes. Alas, Sir, (replied Elibeſis, and laughed) How can I give any anſwer unto ſuch an impoſſible Suppoſition? For, truly I do not frequent the Court of any ſtrange King: Long live Thomiris our Queen; and Sargapiſes is ſo young that I ſhall be old before he know how to love, and therefore I profeſs I know not how to anſwer you.

Since the thing is ſo far from Poſſibility, replied Ariantes, there can be no danger in anſwering it, ſince it is not like to happen. Truly, Sir, replied ſhe, I think you are in the right: Therefore, Sir, I will tell you, that as to the firſt of the things whereof you ſpeak, Agatherſes cannot think of marrying me within the time you have preſcribed, becauſe both his Affairs and mine will not permit it: And as for the other, I tell you again, ſince you will have me, That if a King do come and offer me a Crown, and Agatherſes do not adviſe me to accept, then I think I ſhall, becauſe I ſhould then think he did not love me, and conſequently might break off with him. And for my part (ſaid Ariantes, and interrupted her) I conceive that if he ſhould adviſe you to accept of it, you would have good cauſe to accuſe him for want of Love; and therefore whether he adviſe you or not, ſtill you ought to prefer a King before a Subject, and rather chuſe to be a Queen than the Miſtreſs of Agatherſes. Seriouſly, Sir (ſaid Elibeſis then) you ſwell my Joys to hear you talk thus; and truly I cannot be better pleaſed, than to know that all you have ſaid are but Flaſhes of pleaſant Wit. Time, Madam, will ſhew that, replied Ariantes; in the mean time remember you have promiſed me not to marry Agatherſes within one year; and that if in this time, a King comes and begs of you upon his Knees to be a Queen, you will accept of the Crown he offers you. Theſe things are very eaſy to be promiſed, replied Elibeſis, and laughed: for truly, Sir, I have no deſire to marry any whoſoever, and I am, and ever ſhall as long as I live, be deſirous of being a Queen, as far as I may deſire it without folly. After this much Company coming in, the diſcourſe changed, and Elibeſis was put into a notable Dilemma: for the Prince Ariantes was ſo full of tender Expreſſions in the beginning of their diſcourſe, and afterwards told ſuch things ſo improbable, that ſometimes ſhe feared he mocked her. But otherwiſe ſhe had ſo good an opinion of his merit, that ſhe hath ſince ſaid, ſhe had more reaſon to believe that the violence of Ariantes's Love unto her cauſed him to tell her of ſuch Improbabilities, than to think he ſpoke not ſeriouſly when he ſaid he loved her: However it be, ſhe ſpake not a word unto Agatherſes of all that the Prince Ariantes had ſaid unto her: for though ſhe did not ſee any poſſibility in the Propoſition which he made her; yet ſince ſhe did not deſire to loſe this Prince, though ſhe intended to keep Agatherſes, ſhe would not acquaint him with the Conference.

But, Sir, to the end you may not wonder as well as Elibiſis, why Ariantes ſhould ſpeak as he did, be pleaſed to know, that an Iſſedonian of great Quality had been with Ariantes that Morning, and perſwaded him to think of making himſelf King, and alſo offered him the means how to bring it to paſs. At firſt, the Propoſition ſeemed unto the Prince not only as unjuſt, but as impoſſible: Yet ſince he would not reject the Motion without more ſerious Conſideration, he preſſed the Man who ſpoke unto him, whoſe name was Octomaſades, to tell him upon what Motives he grounded ſo great a Deſign? Sir, (replied he, as I underſtood from himſelf) I firſt ground it upon Juſtice, and ſecondly upon your Courage; and upon the earneſt deſire of the People to have a King who will ſtay in Iſſedon. For, Sir, the Law by which Thomiris reigns to your prejudice, is, that the eldeſt Son, or the eldeſt Daughter unto the King of the Iſſedons, ought to ſucceed in the Throne: ſince ſo, ſaid Ariantes, the reign of Thomiris is juſt, for ſhe is ſix years elder than I. No, Sir, replied Octomaſades, and thus I will make it good: The Law of the Kingdoms ſays, that the eldeſt Child of the King of Iſſedon ſhall reign: Now when Thomiris was born, the Prince Lypacaris, your Father and hers, was not King, and in all likelihood was never like to be; ſo as ſhe cannot truly be called the eldeſt Daughter unto the King of the Iſſedons, ſince when ſhe came into the World her Father was not King: So, Sir, ſince you were born two years after Lypacaris wore the Crown, it is you, Sir, who are the King's right born, though he had a Daughter before; and to ſpeak equitably, Thomiris is Daughter unto the Prince Lypacaris, and you are Son unto the King of Iſſedons. After this, Sir, I think you need not doubt the Juſtice of your Title and Right, or at the leaſt of a very plauſible pretence. Moreover, all the People do exceedingly murmur at the Remoteneſs of that Princeſs who prefers her Tents before our ſtately Towns, inſomuch, as I am very confident, that if you will pleaſe to think of aſcending the Throne, you may do it with much eaſe; I will offer my Life and Fortunes in your Service, and alſo engage all my Friends, which are no ſmall Number.

Ariantes hearing Octomaſades ſpeak thus, ſtood pauſing a while, and returned no Anſwer: But ſince he had a very generous Soul naturally, until Love did alter his Inclination, he hearkned unto what Octomaſades ſaid, rather as a ſubtilty to make him revolt from Thomiris, than as a real reaſon to pretend unto the Crown which ſhe poſſeſſed: So not accepting his offer, he only thanked him for his Zeal which he expreſſed unto him. But, Sir, by this which I ſhall now tell you, you may admire the omnipotence of Love. Ariantes who hearkened unto Octomaſades, as I told you, did change his Mind whilſt he was talking with Elibeſis, for having diſcovered the unlimitable Ambition of her Soul, he reſolved to attempt that out of Love, which he refuſed out of Ambition; ſo as it may very well be ſaid, that his deſire of reigning only in the Heart of Elibeſis, moved him unto a deſire of reigning over the Iſſedons: And indeed this was the only reaſon of his Speech unto Elibeſis, when he engaged her to promiſe not to marry Agatherſes within one year, and to accept of a Crown if it were offered her, imagining that within the compaſs of this time, his enterprize might either be executed or fruſtrated. But, Sir, it was more than a light thought which Love inſpired into him, for it was a deſign fully reſolved upon, and a deſign which he began to ſet on foot immediately; in order to which, he ſent for Octomaſades, and that reaſon which before he hearkened unto as a ſubtilty, appeared now unto him the juſteſt Title in the World: So that conferring with him, they concluded upon the matter, and reſolved that Ariantes ſhould upon ſome pretence let Spargapiſes return, whenſoever Thomiris ſhould call him home; that in the mean time Ariantes ſhould make as many Friends as he could, that Octomaſades ſhould labour all his, that the People ſhould be diverted with publick Feaſts, and to have Men about him, who knew how to inſinuate Thoughts fit for the Execution of ſo great a Deſign: Furthermore, they framed a Declaration, to manifeſt, that the War which Ariantes undertook, was juſt, and their main drift was to make themſelves Maſters of Iſſedon. But whilſt Ariantes was buſied in ſatisfying his Love by his ambition, Adonacris, who had only the Thoughts of Love upon his Soul, did every day by degrees unperceivedly get new eſteem in the Heart of the fair and charming Noromanta: and as thoſe who have only one Deſign in hand, do execute it better than thoſe who have many ſeveral things in hand; ſo therefore, Adonacris having no other deſign, than to get the love of Noromanta, it is no wonder if he did in a ſhort time effect it, for truly he was infinitely officious; and he was ſo aſſiduous in his Viſits, that he ſaw her at all Hours when decency would permit. Noromanta on her ſide, having a violent Inclination towards Adonacris, did but faintly reſiſt him, and did inſenſibly ſuffer her Heart to be engaged in an Affection which ſhe durſt not call Love, leſt ſhe ſhould be obliged to reſiſt and overcome it. 'Tis true, this Love had all the Purity in it that was poſſible, nor do I think any Paſſion in the World could be more refined, or more vertuous than theirs: Nor would Noromanta accuſtom Adonacris to talk to her of his Love, though ſhe was very willing he ſhould love her, and give her a thouſand Expreſſions of it, but her modeſty was ſo ſcrupulous, that ſhe would not let him know her Mind.

However ſince ſhe knew her Father did not love to live at Iſſedon, ſhe could not hope that though Adonacris ſhould ask his conſent, yet he would never grant it: And Adonacris who had a Father of an imperious and fantaſtical Humour, he knew not how to make any ſuch Propoſition unto him as a Marriage with Noromanta; who though of a very Noble Family, yet ſhe was not rich enough for him. However, though neither of them could ſee any hopes of living together, yet they loved each other, and loved without telling each other of it. But yet Adonacris was not very obedient; but he complained of that which he was forbidden to complain: And the fair Noromanta, for all her demure carriage of the matter, matter; did ſometimes let Adonacris ſee the Thoughts of her Soul in her Eyes. So that whilſt Ariantes had a Heart that was ravelled both with Love and Ambition; whilſt the Heart of Agatherſes was ſwelled with Jealouſy, and whilſt Elibeſis knew not well which ſhe ſhould chuſe, and which refuſe: Adonacris and Noromanta did live Lives as ſweet as almoſt poſſible; for they equally loved each other; and they loved without being known unto any, and they ſaw one another every day. Yet Love being a wonderous unquiet and reſtleſs Paſſion, which will never let a Heart be at reſt, Adonacris had many hours of Sorrow and Melancholly: And truly when he conſidered that as well as his dear Noromanta loved him, perhaps he ſhould never arrive at his full deſired Happineſs, the very apprehenſion of the future, made him think the preſent very miſerable: But for all that, though his Fears of an uncertain Miſery did ſometimes grieve him, yet ſince he enjoyed the eſteem of Noromanta, he was comforted, and cheared up his Hopes: So that theſe two Perſons having nothing in their Souls to conceal from each other, did make ſuch a ſweet and innocent exchange of Secrets, and ſuch an agreeable and ſincere Communication of Thoughts, that their Hearts were more united than ever. Adonacris obtained ſo much favour, as to write ſometimes unto her: not but that he ſaw her every day; but ſince it often fell out that much Company was with her, he deſired ſo much liberty as to tell her that by Letter, which he would not tell her before the World: And ſince it is more civil for a modeſt Perſon to read a Letter of Tenderneſs, than to hear it, Adonacris did write ſuch paſſionate paſſages unto Noromanta, that ſhe had no mind to underſtand them: Alſo ſhe would ſometimes anſwer him, otherwiſe than ſhe durſt tell him in words. But though Adonacris and Noromanta did enjoy much Tranquillity; yet it was not ſo with Agatherſes and Elibeſis: For though this Lover did ſuffer her to continue her Civilities unto Ariantes whilſt he ſtaid at Iſſedon; yet he could not endure it, and ſometimes did forget both his promiſe unto Elibeſis, and his reſpects unto Ariantes.

In the mean time Spargapiſes being neither in Love, nor was Ambitious, he employed his time in ſuch things as Princes of his Age uſe to delight in : And whilſt Ariantes was plotting to dethrone him, to the end he might take the Heart of Elibeſis from Agatherſes, poor Spargapiſes was delighting himſelf in his Pleaſures. Things ſtanding upon theſe Terms, it was known in Iſſedon, that you, Sir, was with Thomiris, and alſo all your Adventures : So that Octomaſades, Sir, cloſing with an occaſion which was ſo favourable unto his Deſign, did cunningly publiſh to the People the Queen's paſſionate doating upon you ; how ſhe would arreſt you, and how you got out of her Power, by the means of the Prince Indatherſes ; adding many things more than truth, purpoſely to take off that eſteem which the People had of her : for he knew very well there was no better way to make them revolt, than to take away that reſpect which they had unto their Princeſs. And indeed, the deſign of Octomaſades did take effect : for aſſoon as the People knew all paſſages in the Tents Royal, they murmured ; from Murmur, they began to be inſolently high ; and from Inſolency they fell to flat Sedition ; ſo as things did grow up to the higheſt pitch of diſorder : And, Sir, you muſt know that Octomaſades did not do all this out of any Affection unto Ariantes, nor out of any hatred unto Thomiris ; but only out of his own particular Ambition. But he carried the matter ſo, that in a ſhort time he gained all the Grandees in the State, he changed or divided all the Peoples Hearts : and he knew ſo well how to make uſe both of his Friends and Enemies, that all was in a flame, and all without any danger to him : For Thomiris was ſo drowned in her Sorrows for your departure, Sir, that ſhe cared not a ſtraw what became of her Dominions. Yet before the buſineſs came to Execution, Octomaſades thought it expedient to tarry till Thomiris called home Spargapiſes : And indeed the wiſe Terez, whom you ſaw with that Princeſs, moving her to ſend for the Prince her Son and Ariantes, Spargapiſes obeyed, and Ariantes ſtayed at Iſſedon, under pretence of being ſick, and aſſuring the young Prince his Nephew, that he would ſhortly follow him. But, Sir, he was no ſooner gone, than Ariantes did ſet his deſign on foot: And Octomaſades having cajoled with the Town, and all his Friends were perſwaded that if Ariantes were once King, it would be Octomaſades that would reign under his Name. And the People were ſo incenſed, and ſo apt for Sedition, as it was very eaſy to move them againſt him whom the Princeſs had truſted with her Authority; alſo to drive him out of the Town, and make the Prince Ariantes Maſter of it. And indeed, ſince he had no Army which could come up time enough to appeaſe this diſorder: Octomaſades did happily execute his deſign of ſeizing upon Iſſedon, and began War in the very heart of the Kingdom. I ſhall not, Sir, inſiſt upon any particular Relation of the whole Buſineſs; for I have ſo many other paſſages leſs tedious to tell you, that I will only in few words tell you, that the People by the artifice of Octomaſades, did rebel: ſome ſaid according as they were inſpired, that Ariantes was their legitimate King, and that Thomiris did but uſurp the Kingdom of Iſſedons from him: others did ſecond them, and all proclaimed Ariantes King, who took up Arms, and drove the Lieutenant of Thomiris out of the Kingdom, and ſecured all the ſtrong places of the Town: And all this in ſo ſhort a time, that it had been done without any Reſiſtance, if Agatherſes had not been a rub unto his Deſign: But, Sir, ſince the paſſages were extraordinary, I beſeech you give me leave to inſiſt a little longer upon them. Be pleaſed to know therefore, Sir, that Agatherſes whoſe Mind was enflamed with Love and Jealouſy, he viſited Elibeſis as much as he could; not only becauſe he was pleaſed with the ſight of her, but becauſe he would hinder Ariantes from all private diſcourſe; ſo as when this great tumult was in Iſſedon, Agatherſes was with Elibeſis, who lodged far from that part of the Town where the Sedition began; in ſo much as Ariantes was Maſter of a great part of the Town before they knew it. But at laſt, the diſorder was ſo great and univerſal, that the noiſe of it reached their Ears, and interrupted Agatherſes, who was diſcourſing with Elibeſis, both concerning his Love and his Jealouſy: As they were much ſurprized at ſo great a noiſe, and full of Curioſity to know the cauſe; one of the Women of Elibeſis came frighted in, and told her Miſtreſs that all the Town was in Arms: That Ariantes would make himſelf King, and that none durſt reſiſt him. You may well imagine, Sir, that this News filled Agatherſes and Elibeſis with wonder; yet Agatherſes believed that Elibeſis did only ſeem fuller of wonder than really ſhe was, and that ſhe knew ſomething of the Deſign: For I forgot to tell you, Sir, that the Night before, Ariantes talked at leaſt two hours together of his Paſſion with her, and Agatherſes knew it. So that this Lover, hearing his Rival would be King, and fearing leſt he ſhould become his Subject, his Sorrows were beyond Expreſſion; and the more, becauſe he believed, or at leaſt feared, that Elibeſis was privy to the Plot, and approved of it: ſo as not knowing what to believe, or not to believe, he looked fixedly upon Elibeſis, as if his Eyes would look into the very bottom of her Heart; I have reaſon to think, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that you are acquainted with the unjuſt Proceedings of the Prince Ariantes, ſince you told me once, that unleſs you were a Queen, I was in no danger of loſing you: But know, Madam, that ſince I am as faithful a Subject as a Lover, and as terrible an Enemy as a Rival, the Prince Ariantes is not yet in a Condition to offer you a Crown; and he ſhall never ſet you upon the Throne, until after he hath ſent me to my Grave: Let me therefore leave you, Madam, and either go meet Death, or give it him, who removes me out of your Heart: For I do profeſs I can never live a Subject, either unto my Rival or my Miſtreſs: And I ſwear by all the Gods that are adored at Iſſedon, or any where elſe in the World, that I will never be your Subject or Ariantes's. After this Agatherſes went his way, though Elibeſis would have ſtayed him: for though ſhe was ambitious, and deſired to preſerve Ariantes, yet ſhe loved Agatherſes: But it was in vain to recal him; for ſince the noiſe increaſed, Agatherſes tranſported with Rage and Fury, would needs go and ſee if he could find any means to quaſh his Rival's Deſign; ſo as he went out at a back-Door, leſt he ſhould be compaſſed about with a croud of ſeditious People, and not know what to do.

But he was no ſooner got out, than he met one of his Friends, who with an hundred Men only would ſeize upon a Fort or Tower, which Ariantes was not yet Maſter of; ſo as Agatherſes, without more Delay, went with his Party to oppoſe Ariantes. But before they could get into this Tower, they met with this Prince, and fought him with incredible Valour: As for Agatherſes he did as much as any jealous Lover could, who fought with his Rival; and he made his way through the Preſs and got unto the Prince Ariantes, who ſeeing him come on ſo furiouſly, received him with the ſame Vigour; the other aſſaulted him, asking him for all the Tumult, Whether he fought as Subject unto Thomiris, or as the Lover of Elibeſis? I fight (replied he fiercely) to hinder you from being King; to hinder Elibeſis from being Queen; and to keep my ſelf from being Subject unto either her or you. After this, Agatherſes made a Blow at Ariantes which ſlightly hurt him in the left Arm; and Ariantes made another at Agatherſes which ſcratched him on the right Side, and which had killed him, had he not warded it with much Cunning and Force.

But in concluſion, Ariantes being ten times more numerous than his Enemies, Agatherſes was not able to retard the Deſigns of this Prince: For all his Men being neither Souldiers, nor Men of Quality, they ran away as ſoon as they ſaw ten or twelve of themſelves killed: So that Agatherſes fearing to fall under the Power of his Rival, or elſe to become either his Priſoner or Subject, he was forced to retreat by a back-Lane; but it was with ſo much Sorrow and Rage, that never Man was more deſperate: All he could do was to get into the Houſe of a Friend; for ſince he had aſſaulted Ariantes, he durſt not go into his own Houſe. Furthermore, he ſadly heard that nothing could withſtand his Rival; and that the tumultuous Aſſembly had declared that Thomiris was only Daughter unto the Prince Lipacaris, and that Ariantes was the Son unto the late King of Iſſedons, and conſequently King according to the Laws of the Realm. But to his greateſt Grief; he was given to underſtand, that Ariantes whoſe Wound was ſo ſlight, that he wore his Arm in a Scarf rather for Faſhion than Need, had been a whole hour with Elibeſis. And indeed, Sir, ſince the Ambition of this Prince was only an effect of his Love, he no ſooner ſaw his Deſign executed, but maugre all his Buſineſs, he would needs viſit her whom he loved and adored; and he might the better do it, becauſe the main weight of this great Enterprize did moſt depend upon Octomaſades. I underſtand that when he firſt entred into Elibeſis's Chamber, he found her very ſad, yet ſhe received him very lively.

Now Madam, (ſaid he unto her) the King which means to preſent you with a Crown, will very ſhortly be in a capacity to put it upon your Head, and to do Juſtice unto your Merit: But Madam, It is to you only I owe my Thanks for the Obedience of my Subjects; for if I had not been your Slave, I had ſtill been Subject unto Thomiris: Yet ſince I would not ſeat you upon an ill-eſtabliſhed Throne, I come now only to make a tender of it unto you, and that you will be pleaſed to prepare your ſelf 'ere long to aſcend it; and to beſeech you not to make any Prayers which may move the Gods to forſake me, or to protect Thomiris to my Prejudice, and Advantage of Agatherſes.

I muſt confeſs Sir, replied ſhe, that my Reaſon is at preſent ſo diſtracted, that I am not able to give an Anſwer; and therefore I beſeech you give me ſome time, not only to recollect into my Memory what you have ſaid unto me, but alſo to conſider what I ſhall ſay unto you; for truly Sir, I am yet ſo unreſolved, that I know not well whether I ſpeak unto the Prince Ariantes, or unto the King of Iſſedon. You will 'ere long know it Madam, (ſaid he unto her) and if you will not thwart your own Fortunes and mine, you ſhall know that I am King of the Iſſedons, and by my ceaſing to be your Subject, you may begin to be my Queen.

After this, Ariantes retired, and left Elibeſis in a great Uncertainty; for truly ſince ſhe loved Agatherſes, it was not poſſible ſhe ſhould be a Queen unleſs her Conſtancy was ſhaken: But ſince the Throne of a new King did but a little charm her, ſhe reſolved upon nothing, but would determine upon the matter hereafter according to the Event of Things. Thus not knowing whether ſhe had more Love or Ambition, her Mind was in much Uncertainty.

In the mean time Agatherſes, who was hid in his Friend's Houſe, was in a moſt horrid Deſpair; Can I live, ſaid he, and ſuffer my Rival to be a King? and my ſelf to be a Subject both unto him and Elibeſis? Fie, fie, I cannot be ſo baſely unworthy: I muſt either find out a way to hinder my Rival from being King, and my Miſtreſs from being Queen, or elſe I muſt and will die with Deſpair and Grief. Afterwards falling into a profound Study, he remembred that there was ſome places in the Walls of Iſſedon which were broken, and the Breaches ſo great, that he might eaſily get out with Horſes: So as conceiving that the multitude and weight of Buſineſs which lay upon Ariantes and Octomaſades, might keep them from any thoughts of repairing thoſe Breaches, or from guarding them, he thought his Deſign not impoſſible; for ſince no Army was on foot, they had more reaſon to think upon Levies, and to ſecure themſelves in the Town, than to attempt any thing without it: ſo that Agatherſes believed, that if Elibeſis pleaſed, he could get her out of Iſſedon by the help of his Friends through one of theſe Breaches: And by this device reſt quietly, without being ſubject either unto his Rival or his Miſtreſs. But not to make a vain Propoſition, he provided as many Men as was neceſſary for her Guard: He ſent to view the places, and he was ſo induſtrious, as in all likelihood he wanted nothing but the conſent of Elibeſis: So that having put all things into good order, he writ that ſame Night unto Elibeſis to give him a private Audience, which conſidering the preſent juncture of things, ſhe durſt not refuſe. For ſince ſhe knew him to be of a very violent Temper, ſhe feared leſt he ſhould either periſh in ſome deſperate Attempt, or elſe cauſe Ariantes to periſh: ſo as thinking ſhe ſhould at leaſt perſwade him unto patience, until ſhe was fully reſolved in her ſelf, ſhe reſolved for the preſent to go the next Morning on a Viſit to his Wiſe, in whoſe Houſe Agatherſes lay hid; and to ſee him with more ſafety than at her own Houſe.

But, Sir, before I acquaint you with the Diſcourſe of theſe two Perſons, I muſt needs acquaint you with the cruel ſeparation of Adonacris and Noromanta: for at the beginning of this Tumult, the Father of this fair One being faithfully devoted to the Service of Thomiris, and ſeeing the Deſign of Ariantes, he would not ſtay any longer in a Rebellious Town: Therefore, as ſoon as he ſaw Ariantes was like to thrive in his Deſign, and not being able to oppoſe him, he went out of Iſſedon in diſorder, and carried his Daughter with him; and before any Guards were ſet upon the Gates, and whilſt all was in a tumult, he put Noromanta in a Coach, and got out before any could acquaint Adonacris. You may imagine, Sir, how this went to his Heart, and how he was wonderſtruck, when after he had followed Ariantes all the day, and paſt all the Peril, he heard that Noromanta was not in Iſſedon; yet ſince he imagined that her Father would carry her to his own Houſe, his Sorrows leſſened, in hopes to hear from her if he ſent an Expreſs: And indeed he writ unto her the very ſame hour, and ſent his Letter by one of his own Men; for conſidering the ſtate of things, Honour would not permit him to abſent his Perſon, being engaged in the Prince Ariantes's Party.

But to return unto Elibeſis and Agatherſes, be pleaſed to know, Sir, that Elibeſis was with the Lady, in whoſe Houſe ſhe was to ſee Agatherſes, and where indeed ſhe did ſee him. But to the end this Meeting might be cloſely carried, Elibeſis carried with her only one Woman, and that Diſcourſe might be more free, Chance ordered it ſo, that the Lady of the Houſe being ſick, Elibeſis could ſee her but a while; and the Lady left her with Agatherſes, and the Woman which followed her: And as ſoon as this Lover ſaw himſelf at liberty to ſpeak his thoughts; I know not, Madam, ſaid he unto Elibeſis, whether you will hear me without hate; but I am certain you cannot deny me what I ſhall ask, without deſerving I ſhould leave loving; for, not to trouble you with any long-winded Story, if you refuſe to go out of Iſſedon, and to get out of the Power of my Rival, I ſhall have reaſon to think you prefer him before me, and that you will willingly ſubmit unto him: And to remove all difficulty, I ſhall tell you in few words, I know an infallible way how to get you out of Iſſedon this very Night enſuing. I have Men ready for your Guard; a Lady of your Acquaintance and Friendſhip, hating this rebellious Town, will go out of it with you; and I will carry you both unto the Queen, begging nothing from you, but that you will not expoſe your ſelf unto the Tyranny of an Uſurper, who doubleſs will preſently fall, and ruin you, if you ſhould be ſo unjuſt as to forſake me for him. I aſſure you, Sir, (replied Elibeſis, with much aſtoniſhment) that I would go out of Iſſedon with all my heart; but ſince I cannot do it with my Honour, I muſt ſtay here; for truly how can I with any handſomneſs go out, having a Father and a Brother engaged with the Prince Ariantes? but truly (added ſhe ſubtilly, and purpoſely to appeaſe him) I cannot tell whether I ſhould be able to deny you, if I were ſure his Deſign would proſper; but, I pray, Sir, conſider that Ariantes will know of my departure; and knowing, will follow me, and ſending Men after, will bring me back: and I ſhould be extreamly ſorry to ſee you killed before my Face, or at leaſt made a Priſoner, and therefore it's better to ſit ſtill, than to run ſuch dangerous Hazards. Do not deceive both your ſelf and me, Madam, (replied Agatherſes ſharply) for you can never perſwade me that it is fitting a Woman of your Beauty ſhould ſtay under the Power of an Uſurper, who is in love with you, when as you may, if you pleaſe, get out: And I muſt go a little further, Madam, and tell you, that though I were not your Lover, though you had never made me any Promiſes of eternal Affection, and tho you had no other inducement to go out of Iſſedon but your own Honour, yet you ought to go, if you could, and ſteal away, even from your Parents if they ſhould oppoſe it; unleſs you were reſolved to obey the Prince Ariantes in all things, without any Exception: you know, Madam, he loves you as much as poſſible, and yet you will remain under his Power. Tell me, I beſeech you, Madam, what Safety can you have of your Perſon, when you are under the Command of a Prince, who to pull the Crown off his Siſter's Head, doth violate all manner of Rights, ſtifles all the Laws of Nature and Juſtice; and who, to ſatisfy his Ambition, cares not to ſet two Kingdoms in a Flame, to make Rivers of Blood, and Mountains of dead Men: Conſider, Madam, what he will do to ſatisfy his Love, which is a more quick, lively and active Paſſion; yet you think your ſelf ſafe under the Power of ſuch a Lover, but do not conſider that he will be tranſported into the moſt violent Extremities if you reſiſt him: If you do not apprehend all this, Madam, it is becauſe you are reſolved not to reſiſt him, for otherwiſe you would quickly take me at my word, and get out of Iſſedon this very Night: However I muſt tell you thus much, that to be the Wife of a wicked Uſurper, who doubtleſs will e're long be overwhelmed in the Ruins of his new ill-gotten Throne, is a moſt miſerable piece of Fortune; and according to all probabilities, Ariantes will ſhortly be in that Condition. But the truth is (added he, and lifted up his Eyes to Heaven) that if he be not Miſerable until after you have made him Happy, he will die with Glory, and I with unequalled Deſpair.

Conſider therefore, Madam, I conjure you, what Anſwer you will give me: Think ſeriouſly what an amorous Tyrant will deſire, who is Maſter of her he loves; moreover, I ſwear unto you, by all the Deities of Heaven and Earth, that if you will not do what in all reaſon you ought, I will do all that Love, Rage, Jealouſy, Hatred and Revenge can make a deſperate Lover do, either to ruin his Rival, or to be revenged upon his Miſtreſs. For I do profeſs, once again, I will never be a Subject, either unto Ariantes or Elibeſis. You expreſs your ſelf ſo violently (ſaid ſhe unto him) that, Sir, I know not how to anſwer you. And you anſwer me ſo coldly, replied he, that I may well enough underſtand you; but ſince my Love is above my Reaſon, I will not believe what your Eyes do tell me, and what your Words do make me underſtand: Therefore, to give you a little time of repentance, conſider my Affection to you. I am violent, it's true; but the ſame Fire which inflames my Anger, when I am wronged, the ſame makes my Love ſo zealous; and therefore do not upbraid me with my Impetuoſity, I conjure you, unleſs you will augment it; and if it be poſſible, cure your Mind of ſo much weakneſs, as to be dazled with the deceiving glittering of Grandure, though it be a legitimate Grandure, and not uſurped as that of Ariantes, which is but a Bubble of the People, and will vaniſh to nothing in a little time. Conſider well, too ambitious Elibeſis, and act not both againſt your ſelf and me; and do not drive a Man into deſpair, who is not maſter of his own Thoughts when his Love is injured: Speak, Madam, I beſeech you, but be ſure you ſpeak as you ought to do. Doubtleſs I ſhall ſpeak as I ought to do, replied ſhe, but I do not think I ſhall ſpeak as you would have me; for, the truth is, I cannot ſuffer my ſelf to be violently carried away. O, Madam, (replied he, and interrupted her) this word Violently does not ſuit with my Intentions, ſince I am ſo far from offering any violence, that I would have you avoid it; but I ſee you do not fear what the Prince Ariantes will do, when he is Maſter of your Heart.

But, Madam, ſince he hath driven me out of it, you muſt give me leave to do what I can to drive him out of the Throne which he hath uſurped, though I cannot drive him out of your Heart. And therefore give me leave to do the Duty of a true Subject and a faithful Lover, in taking the Queen's part: Yet let me firſt acquaint you, that whenſoever you hear any Troops are marching againſt Iſſedon, know that I am certainly at the Head of them; and when you hear that Ariantes is wounded, or like to be, be ſure it is I, who will do what I can to kill him: In ſhort, Madam, you may be ſure, that if the War continue, my Rival or I muſt die: And be confident, I will uſe the utmoſt of my ſtrength and power, to leave loving you, and to become all Hate and Revenge. Theſe, Madam, are the Thoughts which you have inſpired ſpired into a Man, who could have no other Deſign but to adore you,if you would not change him for another. You are ſo very violent (replied ſhe) that I know not what to ſay. You are ſo unreaſonable, anſwered he, that the moſt patient Man alive would be tranſported more than I am.

For, Madam, what one obliging word do you give me? I tell you (anſwered ſhe) that I eſteem you as much as ever I did, yet for all that I muſt act with prudence; and therefore though I ſhould be glad to go out of Iſſedon, yet I muſt not, ſince I cannot without a Crime, and without expoſing my ſelf unto the Anger of my Father, my Brother, and expoſing them to be ill uſed by the Prince Ariantes, who would ſuſpect them Acceſſaries to my flight. You are a very good Daughter, Madam, (replied Agatherſes coldly) and a good Siſter, but believe me a very bad Lover. I beſeech you, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) do not unjuſtly complain againſt me, but wait upon the Event of things; you tell me that the Prince Ariantes will ſhortly be hurried from the Throne; ſtay then, and expect his Fall with patience, and let both you and me live at reſt till then. I do very well underſtand you, Madam, (replied he haſtily) you would have me let you alone until you may make your Choice according to the Event of things; that is to ſay, if the Deſign of Ariantes ſucceed well, you are reſolved to cloſe with him, and look upon me as your Subject; and if it ſucceed ill, then perhaps you will admit of me for your Slave. But, Madam, the Heart of Agatherſes cannot ſo baſely cloſe with Time: I have loved you, and you have not hated me; keep in that mind ſtill I beſeech you, or if you cannot, give me leave to try if I can fall off alſo. For, truly Madam, (purſued he with much vehemency) I wiſh Hercules may beat my Brains out with his Club, that Neptune may puſh me into the bottom of the Sea with his Trident, and that Jupiter may blaſt me with his Thunder-bolt, if ever I depend upon the good or bad Succeſs of the War. Therefore, Madam, chuſe now which you pleaſe, or never; but conſider I beſeech you, that Ariantes is an Uſurper of four and twenty hours ſtanding: That his Throne ſtands but upon looſe Sand, and that I am a moſt faithful Subject to the Queen, and the moſt faithful Lover in the World. Moreover, Ariantes did not love you till of late, and I have both lov'd and ador'd you many Years: Ariantes will not love you till he enjoy you, but I will love you till I die: But to oblige me unto this, you, Madam, muſt quit Iſſedon. If the Gods, whoſe Names you uſe, replied Elibeſis, were not extreamly good, doubtleſs they would puniſh you for all your Prophanations and your Injuſtice: But to give you a direct Anſwer, I will peremptorily tell you, that I will not go out of Iſſedon; and becauſe your Violence doth authorize mine, I muſt tell you further, that if you had loved me without ſelf-Intereſt, you would never have grudged my being a Queen; but had rather have been my Subject than my Husband; but it is no Argument of a ſuperlative Love, to deſire the enjoyment of her he loves, and not to endure a Rival ſhould poſſeſs her. Whoſoever does not deſire the enjoyment of her he loves, (replied Agatherſes) is not any ſuperlative Lover. Ah, Madam, truly I cannot love ſo; and whoſoever can be contented to part with her he loves, loves but imperfectly; but, Madam, ſince you will not do as I deſire, I muſt do as you would not have me.

After this, Elibeſis finding more Love in her Heart than Ambition, expreſſed her ſelf as well as poſſibly ſhe could to appeaſe him, to mollify him, and to delude him: yet not telling him that ſhe would go out of Iſſedon, nor directly promiſing ſhe would not marry Ariantes. But Agatherſes having Wit at will, did know the Thoughts of her Heart, as well as if ſhe had ingenuouſly confeſſed them: and indeed he did ſo plainly ſee, that ſhe would neither loſe him, nor keep him, that he was tranſported more than before: And Elibeſis alſo having her turn of Anger, did, upon a ſudden, leave him; and ſo they both parted very ill ſatisfied with each other. Agatherſes told me ſince, that he intended to deſire the Man with whom he lodged, to keep Elibeſis in his Houſe, to the end he might have carried her away the Night following whether ſhe would or no: But this Deſign being very imprudent prudent, he thought that neither his Friend nor his Wife would ever conſent unto it; ſo as he rejected that thought, as a thing impoſſible to be executed. In the mean time, after he had in vain perſwaded Elibeſis to go out of Iſſedon, he began to think of getting out himſelf, and the rather, becauſe he was advertiſed that the Prince Ariantes cauſed a ſearch to be made for him, and would ſecure his Perſon: therefore without further delay, he diſguiſed himſelf, and the Night following he went out of Iſſedon through the Breaches in the Walls; and he went out ſo happily, that if he had deferred it one day longer, he had miſſed of his Aim; for Octomaſades cauſed thoſe Breaches to be repaired the very next Morning. But at parting he writ unto Elibeſis, and in ſuch an odd manner, as never was Love-Letter in the like: for my part, I think I have given a hundred Copies of it, and I have writ it ſo oft, that I think I am able to repeat it Word for Word: And thus this deſperate Lover writ unto his Ambitious Miſtriſs.

Agatherſes unto Elibeſis.

Madam,

I Could not chuſe but tell you at parting, that ſince Fortune and Love could make People miſerable, they never left any in ſuch a cruel incertainty as you and I: For, Madam, you ſtay in Iſſedon, not knowing whether you ſhall be Queen, though you have a moſt ambitious deſire of being ſo: And I depart out of it, not well knowing whether I can hinder my Rival from being King, nor whether I can baniſh you out of my Heart, as you baniſh'd me out of yours: But I am ſure only of this, that if I do continue loving you, it ſhall be againſt my will: And though I ſhould love you as long as I lived, with the ſame zeal I did when Ariantes came firſt to Iſſedon, yet I will never tell you ſo as long as I live: This, Madam, is the very laſt Teſtimony of my Love you ſhall ever receive from me: But my going into the Service of Thomiris, ſhall not be the laſt Teſtimony of hatred, which my Rival ſhall receive. Adieu, Madam, I know not whether Fortune will ever give you any Subjects; but I am ſure Love gave you a Slave that deſerved to be kept, and the Chains he wore perhaps would have been more glorious to you, than the Crown you hope to wear will be.

Agatherſes.

Though this Letter was ſomething ſharp, Elibeſis yet was not much moved at it; but ſince Ambition was then predominant, ſhe would not anſwer it: And Agatherſes underſtanding by him who delivered it, that ſhe ſaid ſhe had no Anſwer to return, he entred into a new Deſpair, which made him paſs for one of the faithful Subjects in the World: For, Sir, he went unto the Tents Royal, and offered Thomiris to levy Men at his own Charge, and to ſpend both his State and Fortune in her Service. And ſince that Princeſs could not find a Man of more Courage and Spirit than he, ſhe made him Lieutenant-General of the Army which ſhe intended to ſend againſt Iſſedon; and which ſhe would not lead her ſelf, becauſe ſhe fell ſick of Sorrow for your departure, Sir.

But whilſt Thomiris did ſtrive to hinder Ariantes from making himſelf King, Ariantes ſtudied how to keep the Crown he had got, and how to make Elibeſis Queen. Whilſt, I ſay, Adonacris did wait with much impatience for the return of him he ſent unto his dear Noromanta, that Lady was in a ſtrange conjuncture of Troubles. For, Sir, be pleaſed to know, that her Father, whoſe Name was Targitas, and who was an imperious and violent Man, after he came to his Houſe, be-thought himſelf how to ſignalize his Fidelity to Thomiris: and this Houſe of his being very ſtrong, he made a Garriſon of it, and prepared himſelf to go unto the Army, as ſoon as the Queen had begun her march.

But, Sir, ſince in the beginning of theſe Troubles every one looked like an Enemy, and every one ſtood upon his Guard, he whom Adonacris had ſent unto Noromanta, could not carry himſelf ſo, but the Father of this fair One diſcovered that he had ſome ſecret Buſineſs: ſo that cauſing him to be ſtopped and ſearched, they found the Letter which Adonacris writ unto Noromanta: which, as he told me ſince, was very long, and very tender: For ſince he foreſaw that he ſhould be long from her, and knew not whether he could have opportunity to write afterwards, he deſired to put her in memory of his zealous Paſſion: but this Letter which he hoped would produce ſome good Effects, proved quite the contrary; for, Sir,the Father of Noromanta, no ſooner ſaw it, but he was extreamly angry, for he ſaw his Daughter did not hate him who writ it. So as imagining this Affection to be of another nature than it was, he applied all violent Remedies to break it off: For though he eſteemed Adonacris very much, yet he would not have him marry his Daughter, though upon no other reaſon, but becauſe he ſided with Ariantes: So that this violent Man, without more delay, reſolved to marry her to a Man of good Account, called Sitalces, who had been long in love with her, and asked the Queſtion before ever he went to Iſſedon, but he intreated him to ſtay for an Anſwer until his return: And ſo reſolving that the firſt news which Adonacris ſhould hear of Noromanta, ſhould be of her Marriage, he kept the Man who brought the Letter under the Notion of a Spy; and gave as favourable an Anſwer unto Sitalces as he could poſſibly either expect or deſire. After which he went unto Noromanta's Chamber, and commanded her to receive Sitacles as the Man whom ſhe was to marry within the compaſs of eight dayes, without any Ceremony; it not being fit, ſaid he, to Feaſt it at the beginning of a Civil war. You may imagine, Sir, how Noromanta was ſurprized at this, and troubled at this Command: for being naturally of a ſweet, mild, and modeſt Temper, ſhe knew not how to reſiſt Targitas, yet ſince Sitalces was one that made open profeſſion of Bravery, and to be the firſt always in all Dangers and Attempts, ſhe beſeeched her Father to conſider, that to marry her now unto Sitalces in the beginning of a Bloody War, was to put her preſently into Mourning; and therefore deſired him to ſtay till things were compoſed betwixt Thomiris and Ariantes. But Targitas knowing very well her real Reaſon, he was very angry at her, and told her, that without any more ado ſhe muſt obey, and obey preſently, and with a good Will. And that you may the ſooner reſolve upon it, (ſaid he in a tranſport of Anger) let me tell you, that though you ſhould not marry Sitalces, yet you ſhall never marry Adonacris. You may imagine, Sir, how Noromanta wondred her Father ſhould know of any paſſages in Iſſedon; but her wonder increaſed, when ſhe offered to juſtify and excuſe her ſelf, for he charged her not to ſpeak; telling her, that ſhe could no better way juſtify her admittance of Adonacris without his leave, than by marrying Sitalces at his Command. Noromanta did not yet yield; but at laſt yield ſhe muſt, and ſuffered Sitalces to viſit her as the Man whom ſhe was to marry.

And indeed within eight days after, he did marry her, much againſt her will: for, Sir, you muſt know, that Targitas was a Man ſo peremptory, and had in his Face ſuch a Terror, as cauſed Fear; ſo that Noromanta was excuſable in not reſiſting him, and the rather, becauſe ſhe obeyed him with extream Sorrow and Repugnancy. But that which rendred her moſt deſerving pity, was, becauſe ſhe had an extream natural Averſion againſt Sitalces, as ſhe had an Inclination unto Adonacris; yet fear and Vertue together moved her to obey Targitas. But to compleat her Grief, the next morning after the Marriage, her Father came into her Chamber, and ſhewed her the Letter which Adonacris writ; I would not ſhew you, Daughter, (ſaid he unto her) what Adonacris hath writ unto you, until I had put you into a condition of anſwering as I would have you. But now ſince you are Wife unto Sitalces, I cannot think you will be the Miſtreſs of Adonacris. And therefore, ſince I would have all manner of Gallantries end betwixt you, and have no ill Conſequences, I pray write unto him in my preſence; but write as I ſhall deſire you, and as Vertue requires you ſhould, which is, that you are the Wife of Sitalces; that you would have him never to write unto you again; and that you forbid him ever to ſee you again as long as you live. To tell you, Sir, how Noromanta grieved at the ſight of Adonacris his Letter, and at his apprehending the ſad News of her Marriage, is not an eaſy matter; yet ſince her Father was a Man that would not be dallied with, reſolve ſhe muſt, to write or not to write; did ſhe follow her own Inclination, write ſhe would not, ſince ſhe would not write ſuch bad News: But afterwards, conſidering ſhe was married unto Sitalces, and it was not fit to hold any longer Commerce with Adonacris, therefore ſhe thought beſt to overcome her ſelf, and not anger her Father, who being all Violence and Haſte, had acquainted him that married her with the Buſineſs.

Thus, Sir, though the fair Noromanta had her Soul full of Affection to Adonacris, though her Eyes did ſwim in Tears, her Heart beat, and her Hand tremble, yet ſhe did write as Targitas would have her. 'Tis true, that maugre the trouble of her Mind, ſhe called ſuch words to expreſs what her Father deſired, as it was eaſy to ſee her Soul was full of Sorrow. However, as ſoon as this Letter was writ, Targitas delivered it unto the Man whom Adonacris ſent; And not permitting him to ſee Noromanta, he cauſed him to be conducted a day's journey from the place where he was.

All this while Adonacris was in a moſt impatient perplexity, and expectation of his return, whom he had ſent unto her. But alas, his return was much more grievous unto him, when he underſtood how he had been arreſted, ſearched, and Targitas ſeen his Letter: But much more ſtill was his ſorrow, when he heard that Noromanta had married Sitalces, when he read her Letter: Since I was the Confident of his Sorrows, I am able to aſſure you that they were in a moſt high degree: but ſince he knew that Noromanta had an averſion unto Sitalces, he could not charge her with Inconſtancy, only of a little Weakneſs, though it was ſuch as Vertue might excuſe, ſince ſhe did it only in obedience to her Father: But ſince this was a Miſery without remedy, he complain'd ſometimes in ſuch feeling expreſſions, as moved me to pity him very much.

Alas, alas (ſaid he the day he received Noromanta's Letter) into what ſtrange deſtiny am I reſerved? If I had a dozen Rivals, and all preferred before me, I ſhould be much leſs miſerable than I am, though Noromanta doth not hate me, and hath a Husband whom ſhe loves not. For ſuch a Miſery, though great, yet was not without a Remedy: But that Noromanta ſhould be Wife unto one whom ſhe hates; and that ſhe ſhould be a Woman of a rare Vertue, this is a thing which leaves me nothing to do but complain and pity both her and my ſelf. Yet ſurely her Affection unto me was not great, ſince ſhe was able to obey ſo ſoon; and I wiſh unto the Gods that mine to her were no more violent. However, Sir, Adonacris had a deſire that Noromanta ſhould know his Sorrows; and therefore as ſoon as he heard that Targitas and Sitalces were gone unto Thomiris, three dayes after the Marriage, and that they had ſent unto a Town called Typanis, with intention to continue there as long as the War laſted, he diſpatched one of his Servants unto the place where ſhe was. Yet Sir, ſhe would not read this Letter, but ſent it back ſealed, together with his Note, which had neither Superſcription nor Subſcription unto it.

Since I am not now the ſame I was when I permitted you to write unto me, forbear writing unto one whom decency will not allow ſo much as to ſee your Letters, much leſs to anſwer them: I have not opened this you ſent, for I do not love to hear of Miſeries which I neither can nor ought to eaſe: And I deſire you, with all my Heart, never to write to me again as long as you live; And to believe confidently, that I can never do any thing more advantagious for you, than not to excuſe my ſelf, and permit you to hate me, if you cannot ceaſe loving unleſs you paſs from Love to Hatred. After this, ask no more of me, for I do profeſs this is the laſt time of writing unto you; and I would not have written now, but only to deſire you to write no more unto me.

After the reading of this Letter, Sir, the miſerable Adonacris had nothing to do, but to ſtrive with his Sorrows, and to ſuffer them without ſeeking a Remedy. Yet he was vexed with a freſh inquietude; for you muſt know that after Thomiris had her Army up, and Ariantes in the Head, Agatherſes upon the firſt occaſion killed the Brother unto a Lady of high Account, called Argiriſpe, whom I told you was a Friend unto Elibeſis; ſo as by this means Argiriſpe being one of the richeſt Matches in all Iſſedon, the Father of Adonacris and Elibeſis, whoſe Name was Tyſſagetties, had a fancy to marry his Son unto her; and he was ſo earneſt upon it, that he never let him injoy any reſt. Alſo he imployed the Prince Ariantes, and Octomaſades to perſwade him unto a Marriage with her: For in thoſe Times of Tumult, Ceremonies were not ſtood upon; and therefore the Mourning of Argiriſpe was no hindrance unto her Marriage: And as for Argiriſpe, ſhe was not unwilling to marry ſuch a well-accompliſhed Man, who was Brother unto her who was ſhortly to be a Queen: So as the whole Family of Adonacris being met together to perſecute him, and to tell him that he did not love the Grandure of his Houſe: he was ſo chid by them, that in the end he told them, he would do as they deſired.

Thus was the Marriage made in four days, by the Authority of Ariantes; but to tell you truly, his greateſt Inducement was, becauſe I perſwaded him to ſtifle a Paſſion in which he had no hopes; and becauſe he hoped that perhaps the Beauty of Argiriſpe might by degrees root Noromanta out of his Heart. Thus though Adonacris did ſtill love Noromanta, and not love Argiriſpe; yet he lived very lively towards her. But to his comfort, the Prince Ariantes having viewed his Troops, departed from Iſſedon, with intention to meet the Army of Thomiris, which was advancing with deſign to decide the matter by Battel; and by this means Adonacris was delivered from his conſtraint of being with Argiriſpe. Thus Sitalces and Adonacris were engaged in two contrary Sides; for Sitalces followed his Father-in-law, and went to Thomiris three days after his Marriage with Noromanta: And Adonacris engaged with Ariantes; ſo as they were on contrary Sides, as well as Ariantes and Agatherſes, who, as I told you before, was Lieutenant-General of Thomiris her Army, which the young Spargapiſes commanded, by the advice of the prudent Therez, by reaſon of the Queen's Indiſpoſition. But to ſpeak truth, ſince Spargapiſes was but a Child, and his Name only uſed to prevent the pretention of others; and ſince Agatherſes was more forward than any other, being exaſperated by the Whet-ſtones of Love, Hatred, and Revenge, it was he who indeed was General of the Army.

In the mean time, the Prince Ariantes before he went from Iſſedon, did ſet Guards upon Elibeſis, leſt during his abſence the Friends of Agatherſes ſhould attempt any thing againſt her. But, Sir, I forgot to tell you, that before he went away, he courted Elibeſis as earneſtly as he could to marry him; for though he had told her that his Throne was yet but ill eſtabliſhed to ſet her upon it, yet ſince his Love increaſed, he preſſed her unto it; yet all in vain, for ſhe was reſolved to marry none under a King, and a King quietly ſettled in his Dominion; It being certain, that of all Subjects ſhe loved Agatherſes beſt, and much better than Ariantes, though a Prince.

Thus finding ſeveral Pretences which did not incenſe this Prince, ſhe denied his Deſire, and he was forced to retire without Marriage: So as by this means Agatherſes was not in ſo bad a condition as Adonacris, for he had a Rival to fight with, whoſe Death might be advantagious to him. But as for Adonacris, though Sitalces were killed, he were never the better, ſince Argiriſpe was his Wife: ſo that I think none could be in a ſadder condition than he was during all that War. I will not make any particular relation of this War unto you, Sir, leſt I ſhould abuſe your patience; yet I muſt needs tell you, that when both Armies met, and many Subjects of one Princeſs ready to kill each other, the moſt prudent of both Sides, and the leaſt intereſted, did make ſome Overtures of an Accommodation, and began to talk mildly upon the matter before they fell to blows: So as the wiſe Tertz and Targitas, did ſo negotiate the Buſineſs, mauger both Agatherſes and Octomaſades, who were all for War; one out of Ambition, the other out of Love, that they brought the Buſineſs to a kind of Treaty.

And within a few days after, it was reſolved to meet at a certain place and confer, and each Side give their Reaſons, and thereupon to adviſe upon the beſt Expedients of compoſing the difference. The place of Conference being reſolved upon, Ariantes nominated Octomaſades and ſix other Commiſſioners on his ſide: Agatherſes carried the matter ſo well that he himſelf was chief Commiſſioner for Thomiris, to the end he might tranſact againſt Ariantes, as well during the Conference as the War; and certainly he did moſt worthily acquit himſelf, for I do not think it poſſible any could bring ſtronger Reaſons to maintain, that though Thomiris was born before her Father came to the Crown, yet ſhe ought to be looked upon as the eldeſt Daughter unto the King of the Iſſedons, and not only as the Daughter of Lypacaris; and conſequently ſince the Laws of the Land made the eldeſt Child of the King to reign without any difference of Sex, Thomiris was lawful Queen, and Ariantes an Uſurper.

Octomaſades maintained very ſtrongly, that though the Laws of the Land made the eldeſt Child of the King to raign, yet it ought to be the Prince Ariantes, ſince he only was Son unto the King of the Iſſedons, and Thomiris the Daughter of a Subject, though ſhe was his eldeſt Siſter, and by conſequence incapable of raigning; ſince it was the eldeſt Child of a King whoſe due it is: The truth is, ſaid he (to maintain the right of Ariantes) Ariantes pretends not to the Crown, as Son unto Lypacaris, but only as Son unto the King of Iſſedons: For truly a forced Expoſition ought not to be given unto that Law which gives him for the Scepter; it muſt be underſtood according to the Letter, and be known, that thoſe who made it, had ſufficient Reaſons to authorize it: Certainly there is all the Equity in the World, that the People who can never have too much reſpect unto thoſe who ought to command them, ſhould have another kind of Perſon over them than themſelves, to wit, a Perſon that is incapable of raigning, and ſubject to the ſame obedience they are: To avoid which inconvenience, it muſt not be Thomiris which muſt reign, ſince all the People knew her born in a private Condition, when her Father was no King; but on the contrary, it ought to be the Prince Ariantes, whom the People ſaw born upon a Throne. But what if it will be objected, Why, though the Prince Lypacaris was a Subject, yet he made himſelf King? 'Tis true indeed, he did ſo, but it was after another manner; for the Prince Lypacaris did make himſelf King by the right of Conquerors, but his Succeſſors cannot be King, but by the Laws he eſtabliſhed: So it muſt be the Son or Daughter of a King, and not of a Subject, who ought legally to ſucceed. Moreover, there is one Reaſon which moves me to expound the Law thus; for certainly a Throne ſtamps a new Character of Grandure upon thoſe who are upon it: And thoſe who are born Kings, have more Royal Inclinations, more worthy of a Scepter, than others who are born in a lower Condition: And to ſpeak rationally, the firſt day of a Man's Life who makes himſelf King, is the firſt day that he ſteps upon the Throne, ſo as all before it were not his, and it muſt be ſince he was the Father of his Subjects, that he can be called the Father of his Children.

Thus I conclude, that the Law which ſays that the Firſt-born of the King of Iſſedons ought to raign, ought to be expounded as I have done, though Lypacaris had had a Son elder than Ariantes in lieu of Thomiris, from a more forcible Reaſon; therefore it ought to be thus, ſince it is more advantagious to the People to have a King, than a Queen. Furthermore, every thing argues in favour of the Side which I maintain; for Thomiris in yielding the Iſſedonian Crown unto the Prince Ariantes, remains ſtill Queen of the Maſagettes: on the contrary, the Son unto the King of Iſſedon, who only ought to reign over them, will be without a Kingdom, and indeed the Iſſedons will have neither King nor Queen; for ſince the Marriage of Thomiris, ſhe never comes amongſt them, and ſhe ſufficiently makes it known, that Nature hath not infuſed into her Heart that tender Affection which Kings ought to have unto their People, ſince ſhe never honours them with her Preſence; and it may be ſaid, that ſhe rather treats them like a People which ſhe ſubjected by Uſurpation, than Subjects which a legal and ſucceſſive Right did give her, ſince ſhe governs them by Subſtitutes, and never comes her ſelf amongſt them. But not to uſe Reaſons and Arguments where the Authority of the Law is ſufficient, I will maintain, that ſince the eldeſt Child of the Iſſedonian King ought to raign, it ought to be the Prince Ariantes. And I will further affirm, that it would be more glorious unto Thomiris to be the Wife, the Mother, and the Siſter of a King; than to have one Crown more, and have a Brother that is ſubject unto the Prince her Son: So as I conclude, that if ſhe will have the Wars to ceaſe, ſhe muſt reſtore the Crown of Iſſedon unto him, to whom legally it belongs; and that ſhe let him be her Brother by Nature, and her Alley by intereſt of his Crown, and not a Subject. After this, Sir, the eloquence of Octomaſades went a little further, and enlarged it ſelf in Commendations of the Prince Ariantes, but concluded that he would rely wholly upon the Law, which was, that the eldeſt Child unto the King of Iſſedons ſhould raign.

I willingly conſent (replied Agatherſes after Octomaſades had done) that the Law be punctually relied upon, which would have the eldeſt Child unto the King of Iſſedons to raign, ſince that is the Foundation upon which the right Title of Thomiris her raign is built, and by which Ariantes ought to be looked upon only as an Uſurper: And to prove that Thomiris is the eldeſt Daughter unto the Iſſedonian King, though ſhe was born when he was only the Prince Lypacaris, I need only ſay, that Lypacaris and the King of Iſſedons, being all one and the ſame Perſon, Thomiris cannot be the eldeſt Daughter of the one, but ſhe muſt be the eldeſt Daughter of the other. Alſo, if you tell me ſhe is not the Daughter to the King of Iſſedons, I will tell you again that Ariantes is the Son of Lypacaris, and you cannot deny it by the ſame reaſon: For truly Lypacaris in aſcending the Throne, did not ceaſe to be the ſame he was before in all things directly relating to his Perſon, he was ſtill brave and generous, he was the Husband of his Wife, Father to his Daughter, Couſin to his Kindred, and indeed all the very ſame he was before his being King: The elevation of his Fortune did not ſubvert the courſe of Nature, it did not break the Ligaments of Proximity, and all his Power cannot make that which is, never to have been: So ſince Lypacaris had a Daughter before he was King, ſhe is ſtill his Daughter, though afterwards he aſcended a Throne. I would gladly know, if ſhe be not Daughter to the King of Iſſedons, whoſe Daughter is ſhe? For as ſoon as the King her Father was upon the Throne, it ſeems he was no longer Lypacaris, but Lypacaris was ſo mixed, incorporated, and confounded with the King of Iſſedons, that none ever knew how to ſeparate them. So that ſince Lypacaris is King of the Iſſedons, ſince the King of Iſſedons is Lypacaris, and ſince they are both but one and the ſame, it muſt follow by neceſſary conſequence, that Thomiris is eldeſt Daughter unto the King, and her unto whom the Laws gives the Crown: That the Prince Ariantes is her Subject, and that he moſt unjuſtly takes up Arms, by giving an Interpretation unto the Laws of the Land, which they will not admit of. To ſay, that the People before they can reſpect thoſe who ought to be their Maſters, muſt obey Ariantes before Thomiris, becauſe they had ſeen her a Subject like themſelves, this in my opinion is the ſtrangeſt thing in the World: They might as well ſay, that the People, becauſe they had ſeen Lypacaris a Subject like themſelves thirty Years together, ought not to obey him after the Gods had placed him upon the Throne. But there are ſtronger Arguments and Reaſons why they ought to obey the Daughter of their King, unto whom the Law gives more right unto the Crown of Iſſedon, than force did unto Lypacaris. Moreover, there is much ſhallowneſs in that Argument which ſays that Thomiris hath more Crowns than one, and therefore may well part with the other, for if ſhe had a hundred, yet the Crown of Iſſedon is hers, and no reaſon but ſhe ſhould keep it. Private Perſons may ſometimes doubtleſs yield ſomething which deſcends unto them from their Fathers, but Kings never ought to yield Kingdoms. And though it be ſaid, that it is not more glorious unto Thomiris to be the Daughter of a King, than to be the Siſter of another; yet I ſay ſhe ought to inſiſt peremptorily upon her right unto the Kingdom of Iſſedon, over which ſhe hath raigned with ſo much Glory, that her Preſence was not neceſſary to make her People obedient, ſo wiſely did ſhe govern them. But not to diſpute whether a King or a Queen is more advantagious unto the People: I ſay, as I ſaid before, that ſince Lipacaris and the King of Iſſedons are both one and the ſame Perſon, and ſince Thomiris is elder than Ariantes, and eldeſt Daughter to the Queen, ſhe ought to continue her Reign, as ſhe began, ſince the Laws of the Land require it, and ſince ſhe aſcended the Throne by the Peoples conſent. And indeed, to ſpeak rationally, what a ſtrange Chimick diviſion would it be to divide Lypacaris from the King of Iſſedons? It was the Virtues of Lypacaris which made him King, and he did greater things to get upon the Throne than he did afterwards: So as it would be great Injuſtice to put ſo great a difference between what he was when he deſerved to be King, and what he was after he was a King. In my opinion, whoſoever is ſo happy as to make himſelf a King, may be looked upon as King even from his Cradle to his Grave: For as it may be ſaid, it is the Gods who give Crowns as beſt pleaſeth them; ſo it may be ſaid, that whoſoever is to be a King, is ſo from his Birth, becauſe it was ſo decreed from the beginning: So though Men did not know that Lypacaris was to be King, yet by an infallible Fatality he was to be ſo, and from his Cradle indued with all high Qualities, fit to be ranked in the Catalogue of Kings, by that Power which Soveraignty diſpoſes of Monarchies and Empires, and which, before he was born, knew whether Thomiris or Ariantes ſhould reign.

Lypacaris then being by the Gods put into the rank of Kings, as ſoon as he was put into the rank of Men, though it ſhould be granted that Thomiris is only Daughter unto Lypacaris, yet it muſt of neceſſity follow, that ſhe is alſo Daughter unto the King of Iſſedons, ſince he was marked out for ſuch a one by thoſe who have right to give unto Men ſuch Characters as beſt pleaſeth them. But not to fly unto any Subtilties to maintain the Equity of a Cauſe which nothing can weaken, I ſhall tell you only in two words, that the Law ſays, the Kingdom belongs unto the eldeſt

Child of the King, without diſtinction of Sex; that Thomiris is five Years elder than the Prince Ariantes; that as ſoon as Lypacaris ceaſed being a Subject, and began to be a King, Thomiris alſo ceaſed to be the Daughter of a Subject, and began to be the Daughter of a King; and that unleſs it can be ſaid her Father was never King of Iſſedon, they cannot take from her the Quality of a King's Daughter, ſince ſhe cannot change her Faher, as he changed his Fortune. So that being his, and brought up with him, ſhe is as he is, and by conſequence is legitimate Queen according to the Laws of the Land; and by the ſame conſequence, the Prince Ariantes cannot pretend unto any thing but a pardon for his Crime, and to be the prime Subject unto this great Queen. I believe, Sir, you will think, that a Conference of Men who affected not Peace would come to nothing; but that on the contrary, it would exaſperate their Spirits: for ſince Agatherſes hated Ariantes, he uſed many offenſive invectives; and ſince Octomaſades feared nothing more than to come under the laſh of a Queen, whom he had wronged, he was full of tart Expreſſions againſt her Paſſion, to the end he might hinder the War from ceaſing.

Thus after three days Conference and Repetition of things, rather againſt Peace than for it, the Treaty ended, and the War began. But, Sir, the thing moſt remarkable was, that whilſt Octomaſades and Agatherſes conferred together, Adonacris accompanying Octomaſades, and Sitalces Agatherſes, the miſerable Adonacris had the ſorrow to ſee the Poſſeſſor of his dear Noromanta, whom he yet knew not; for Sitalces was one of the Grand Signiors in his Country, who was well contented with his Quality, who came into the Wars when it came to him, and who never came at Court but by chance, ſo as Adonacris had never ſeen him: And that which moſt amazed him was, that ſince Sitalces did not know that he had any intelligence with his Wife, that he was in love with her, or any acquaintance between them, he addreſſed himſelf always unto him, to propoſe ſuch Expedients as he fancied: So that ſince it was not poſſible he ſhould ſee the Poſſeſſor of his dear Noromanta, without extream Grief, he was in a moſt perplexed condition, and the worſe, becauſe his Love encreaſed: For Sitalces being one of thoſe who think they can never talk too much of their Wives, and ſince it was ſo ſhort a time ſince he was married, that he talked of her more like a Lover than a Husband, it chanced one day, whilſt the Commiſſioners were conferring together, a Friend of Sitalces told him, in the preſence of Adonacris, that he had more reaſon than any other to perſwade Agatherſes unto an Accommodation, and to end the War; for, truly, ſaid he unto him, it is one of the hardeſt Adventures that can beſal a Man, who having been ſome Years in love with a Beauty, ſhould part from her three days after he had married her. 'Tis very true, replied Sitalces, the Adventure is very croſs; and I muſt confeſs, I wiſh an end of the War, as much becauſe I would return unto Noromanta, as becauſe I am a lover of my Countries Peace.

Whilſt Sitalces talked thus, Adonacris ſpoke not a word, but ſighed in ſecret: Yet this Friend unto Sitalces being a Man that would put a hundred Queſtions, and Sitalces being one, who though he had wit enough, yet was not ſo delicate as to know one needs not anſwer preciſely unto every Queſtion which is asked: Such Queſtions, and ſuch Anſwers, paſſed between them, as made Adonacris deſperate; for this impertinent Friend did oblige Sitalces, not only to relate his Paſſion unto Noromanta, but all Paſſages ſince his Marriage; which Sitalces did aggravate in ſuch terms, as ſo ſadded the Soul of Adonacris, that he was ready to loſe his Patience, and utter ſuch things as might make it known that he was the Lover of Noromanta; yet he could not part from the place where he was, becauſe Reſentments of Love would not let him forbear audience of all that could be ſaid concerning Noromanta. But at the laſt he gathered ſome Comfort from the words of Sitalces; for his Friend asked him (after a hundred impertinent Queſtions) whether Noromanta was not as ſad at parting, as ſhe was glad of his Company? And whether ſhe did not water her Cheeks with tears? Sitalces anſwered him, that it ſeemed he never knew Noromanta, ſince he did not think her able to miſtreſs her ſelf in all things: For, truly, ſaid he, ſhe hath ſuch a command over her ſelf, that when I married her, there was not the leaſt ſign of any joy in her Eyes; and when I parted from her, there appeared not the leaſt ſorrow in her Countenance; And I am perſwaded ſhe can love and hate to the height if ſhe pleaſe, without being diſcovered; and when I parted from her, ſhe did ſo well hide her Thoughts from me, that ſhe ſeemed to be neither glad nor ſad, only modeſt and ſerious.

As ſoon as Sitalces had ſaid ſo, the Diſcourſe changing Subject, Adonacris retired, to injoy the Conſolation of thinking that Sitalces never ſaw any Joys in the Eyes of Noromanta ſince he married her; and this thought was the ſweeter, becauſe he remembred how often he had ſeen joy dance in her Cheeks and Eyes, when he had given her any teſtimony of his Love, and how, by a ſweet commuication of Looks, without any Words, ſhe imparted her Heart unto him. So that not doubting but Noromanta was capable enough of Joy, and knowing by experience that ſhe was not always a Miſtreſs of her ſelf, ſince ſhe had more than once in vain ſtriven to hide her Thoughts, he therefore thought, to his comfort, that ſhe did not love Sitalces when ſhe married him; and that perhaps ſhe loved him ſtill, at leaſt grieved for him. So that his Love increaſing, he was ſo vexed that he was married, as he had almoſt as much ado to keep himſelf from hating Agiriſpe, as from loving Noromanta. For, truly (ſaid he in himſelf) ſince my Affection to Noromanta is not brutiſh, only grounded upon Senſe; if I were ſure that Noromanta loved me as well as I loved her, though ſhe be the Wife of Sitalces, and as abſent as I am, yet I ſhould entertain my ſelf with many a pleaſing thought, and injoy many a ſweet Minute. But, alas, how ſhould Noromanta ever believe I love her, ſince I married Agiriſpe? ſince ſhe knows not how I was forced to it: nor can conſider that my Affection to her is the cauſe of it: Perhaps ſhe is glad that my deſign of marrying did not take effect, ſince I was ſo apt to change; but, alas, Noromanta, you are very much miſtaken if you think ſo; for Heavens know I never loved Argiriſpe, but ſtill you, and ſo I ſhall do ever. But, alas, what ſhould, or what would I have Noromanta do? Sitalces injoys her; ſhe is all Vertue, and I ſhall never ſee her again: ſtifle a Paſſion, Adonacris, which will do nothing but torment thee; and be not ſo fooliſhly fond, as eternally to deſire things impoſſible, and to love where there is not the leaſt hope. Adonacris had good reaſon to conſult with his Reaſon how to quench his Flames, for I aſſure you his Love augmented by ſuppreſſing it, and he was the more overcome by ſtriving againſt it. In the mean time the Treaty being ended, as I told you before, Octomaſades and Agatherſes parted, both very glad that nothing was done.

But as Adonacris was going away, Agatherſes came to him, and (ſpeaking in his high and excellent Tone) I pray Adonacris ſaid he unto him, do me the favour to tell the fair Elibeſis, that it is not long of Octomaſades, but me, the Peace is not concluded; and that I hindred Ariantes from being King, by a Paſſion leſs intereſted, than that by which Octomaſades would hinder Thomiris from being Queen, ſince his is Ambition, and mine Revenge. Since perhaps you ſhall be the Subject of Ariantes, Sir, whether you will or no (replied Adonacris) I will do you ſo good an Office, as not to tell my Siſter a thing which may offend her, but will tell it her from my ſelf. Alas, (replied Agatherſes in a fury, and went away) if ever I be Subject unto Ariantes, be confident, that I will be a very rebellious one. After this Adonacris returned a ſharp anſwer, but Agatherſes did not hear him: And the truth is, he did ſo diſlike the proceedings of Elibeſis with Agatherſes, that he retained the one half of his reſentment, out of a thought that ſhe had done him wrong.

In the mean while, as the ſtate of things then ſtood, a Battel had decided the Buſineſs, and quite ruined the Side which loſt it, and therefore both Sides were very cautious of fighting, until they ſaw a great probability of being victorious. But ſince both Sides had Officers admirably well known in Martial Affairs; ſince Ariantes of his Side, and Agatherſes of the other, were both very circumſpect; it was not eaſy for either Side to ſuppreſs the other.

Moreover, ſince Thomiris hoped every day to recover of her languiſhing Diſeaſe, which her ſorrows for your departure, Sir, had cauſed, ſhe would not hazard her Army: And to tell you truly what I think, I am perſwaded ſhe had a mind to keep her Forces for another Deſign, than to puniſh Ariantes, whom ſhe always believed would be reduced unto his Duty when ſhe deſired him. So that Spargapiſes and Agatherſes having ſeveral Orders from Thomiris, to attempt nothing raſhly, they were conſtrained to hazard nothing raſhly, nor be ſo forward as otherwiſe they would. Thus both Sides often skirmiſhed, but never came to any deſiding Battel. Again, ſince the Army was not far from Iſſedon, Ariantes often ſtole a day to go and ſee Elibeſis, whoſe Soul was much unſetled: for the Truth is, ſhe loved Agatherſes whether ſhe would or no: But Ambition having a greater prevalence in her Soul, than Love had, ſhe could not treat Ariantes ill, in hopes of being Queen: ſo as when he came to ſee her, ſhe received him with all poſſible ſweetneſs. Yet ſhe ſtill enquired concerning Agatherſes, and would often tell one of his intimate Friends whom he left in Iſſedon, many obliging paſſages concerning him, in hopes of bringing him back unto her, in caſe Ariantes was not King.

On the other ſide, Argiriſpe who loved Adonacris more than ſhe was loved, and who was one that made a Miſfortune of every thing, ſhe was in continual fears of his being killed, or at leaſt being wounded: for ſince ſhe was ignorant of his being in love with Noromanta before his Marriage, and ſince he behaved himſelf very civilly towards her, ſhe was not at all jealous, tho her natural Temper was very apt for it as well as Sitalces. As for Noromanta, ſhe droned away in a very melancholy Life; yet her comfort was, that her Husband was not with her; and that ſhe could be ſad and no body ſee her; for the truth is, ſhe had ſo great a tenderneſs of Soul towards Adonacris, which all her Vertue could not overcome.

come. Yet ſhe was vexed at heart to hear he was married, though ſhe knew very well her Anger was ill-grounded, and that ſince ſhe never intended to ſee Adonacris again, it was no matter whether he was married, or not married. But for all that, Love being a Paſſion which will never be ſubject unto Reaſon, Noromanta, with all her Reaſon, could not chuſe but murmur in ſecret, that Adonacris was married as well as her ſelf: yet ſhe murmured, without any hatred, and accuſed him only of the ſame injuſtice whereof ſhe accuſed her ſelf.

As for Sitalces, he had no other ſorrow upon his Soul but for being at ſuch a diſtance from her he loved: the truth is, his Sorrow proceeded more from ſparks of Jealouſy than Love, though he knew not whom to be jealous of: and this was his very reaſon why he could not be abſent from her he loved.

As for Agatherſes, he was in a worſe condition than all the reſt; for his Love, his Hatred, his Jealouſy, and his thirſty deſire of Revenge, would not let him enjoy one minute of reſt: and which is ſtrange, he did what he could to hide his love unto Elibeſis; and to perſwade all he talked to, that he hated his Rival, and ſlighted his Miſtreſs; yet at laſt, I made him confeſs he loved her, and made him confeſs in a very odd way: for telling him one day that I thought he was ſtill in love with Elibeſis, he ſharply interrupted me as if I had done him a very great Injury. How Anabaris (ſaid he unto me) can you think I am ſtill in love with Elibeſis, ſince ſhe hath preferred Ariantes before me? Since you know very well (ſaid I unto him) that it is not the perſon of Ariantes which ſhe preferrs; and that it is only the gliſtering of that Crown which he hath promiſeth her, which dazles her Eyes, you need not be ſo angry; but look upon her rather as Weak than Inconſtant. I look upon her, (replied he angerly) as Inconſtant, as Weak, and Perfidious: I look on her as one, whom I am ſorry I ever loved; and as one whom I never ſhall love. Should you hate your Rival any leſs, replied I, I ſhould think you loved your Miſtreſs leſs, but as long as I ſee ſuch hot ſparks of Hatred, and ſuch ardent deſires of Revenge, I ſhall ever think that you either diſſemble your thoughts, when you ſay you do not love Elibeſis, or that your ſelf doth not know them: for, as ſoon as Love ceaſeth, Jealouſy will ceaſe alſo; and that Hatred which it cauſeth, will at leaſt grow leſs, if not quite extinguiſh. When any diſputes againſt me, replied Agathyrſes, they muſt not alledg general Rules, for I declare I ſhall except againſt them all; ſince it is certain I do not build upon any thing but my ſelf, eſpecially in matters of Love. So as without examining whether Jealouſy ceaſe in the Hearts of others when Love ceaſeth, and whether Hatred diminiſh, I only know, that though I do not love Elibeſis, yet I do ſo extreamly hate Ariantes, that I wiſh his ruin, and that I were in a condition to go and ask Elibeſis, whether it were more advantagious to be over-whelmed under the ruins of a ſhattered Throne, than to wait quietly at the foot of that Throne: And, mauger her Ambition, I would there were in her Heart one ſpark of that Fire which once I kindled, and that it might flame higher and hotter than ever, to the end I might have the pleaſure of being revenged upon her Weakneſs and Inconſtancy, by telling her ingenuouſly that I will never love her again. Time will tell you (ſaid I unto him) which of us two are in the right. After this, I ſaid no more unto Agathyrſes, becauſe I was reſolved to put a Trick upon him, and make him ſee that he did love Elibeſis ſtill, though he did not think he loved her. And indeed, about four days after this Diſpute, as I was one Evening in his Tent, I cauſed a Letter to be brought unto me by one of my Men, which I my ſelf did forge, and which I received in his preſence, and which, after I asked his leave, I did read in a Corner of the Tent: He knowing that I had a way to receive Intelligence from Iſſedon, he asked me if it came from thence? and I being then alone with him, I told him, that it did, and added, with a ſerious Countenance, that I wiſhed all he told me four days ſince were true. I had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but he earneſtly asked me why I ſaid ſo? Before I give an Anſwer, (ſaid I unto him) you muſt tell me whether you are ſure you do not love Elibeſis: for if you do not, then you may read this Letter; but if you do love her, never read it, unleſs you have a deſire to die with grief. If only that aſſurance be requiſite (replied he haſtily) give me the Letter; and as he ſaid ſo, he took it, and began to read theſe words.

SIR,

WE know not here yet, whether or no Fortune will have Ariantes to be King; but in all likelyhood the Gods will not let Elibeſis be a Queen, for ſhe is extreamly ſick, and I cannot tell whether at this hour I write, Death hath not driven all Ambition out of her Heart: Some ſay, that her Sorrows to ſee ſo much incertaintiy in the Fortune of that Prince whom ſhe hath preferred before Agatherſes, is the cauſe of her Malady and Death: But for my part, I think her Mind hath no ſhare in the Malady of her Body; and I can aſſure you, few Men know whether ſhe grieves more for the loſs of a Crown, or for the loſs of Agatherſes. However it be, you ſhall receive further upon the firſt occaſion.

I obſerved him all the while he was reading this Letter, and ſaw that he changed colour twenty times as he read it; yet having a high and proud Soul, tho a lump of Sorrow did hang like Lead upon his Heart, yet he gave me the Letter, and would not ſeem ſo much as troubled, but told me that now he began to be revenged; after which he was ſilent, and began to walk. But he no ſooner took a turn in his Tent, but forgetting I was there, he began to lift up his Eyes unto Heaven in a Fury, to ſtamp his Foot upon the Ground, and to walk ſometimes faſt, and ſometimes ſlow, and to ſhew all the ſigns of a moſt diſtempered Man when any thing diſquiets his Soul. But ſince I had a mind to pleaſe my ſelf with my own Trick, and deſired he ſhould know I perceived his Sorrows, I told him that I was very ſorry he was miſtaken, and that I had ſhewed him the Letter which cauſed ſo much Sadneſs.

I had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but he told me that I was much miſtaken in him, if I thought his Sorrows proceeded from any Tenderneſs unto Elibeſis; and ſince I muſt explain my ſelf, know, that my Rage proceeds rather from this, that it is not Ariantes in lieu of Elibeſis which is going to the Grave. I believe it, replied I: but ſince Ariantes may alſo die in this War, I ſee no reaſon why you ſhould grieve now, for yeſterday you were not at all troubled; and therefore I muſt conclude, that it is the malady of Elibeſis which troubles you. Yes cruel Friend (ſaid he then unto me in as much Anger as Sorrow) it is the malady of Elibeſis which troubles me, ſince you will dive into my Heart, and ſince I cannot hide it: Yes, yes, it is the malady of Elibeſis which goes near my Heart, and her Death will certainly be mine: And I muſt confeſs, that as weak, as inconſtant, and as perfidious as Elibeſis is, I muſt follow her to the Grave as ſoon as I have my Rival thither: I had much a do to live and not love her, but I cannot ſee her die without renewing my flame. After this (pittileſs Friend) you may triumph over my weakneſs, and with reaſon upbraid me as the weakeſt Man alive. I ſhall not, Sir, upbraid you with your weakneſs (ſaid I unto him) but I ſhall chide you for keeping it ſo ſecret from me: Yet, Sir (added I and ſmiled) I muſt confeſs I was deceived as well as you, for if I had thought you had loved Elibeſis, I ſhould never have put ſuch a trick upon you, as to forge the Letter which I ſhewed unto you: How (ſaid he) is not Elibeſis extreamly ſick? No, Sir, replied I, but I am ſure you are ſick of that diſeaſe which hath ſo long tormented you: Oh moſt cruel Friend, ſaid he unto me, tell me truly what I muſt truſt unto, and deceive me not again, for it concerns me to know in what condition Elibeſis is, that I may regulate my Thoughts accordingly; for if Elibeſis die, I plainly perceive that my Paſſion will revive, and I muſt die with her; but if Elibeſis be living and in Health, I muſt hate her if I can, or at leaſt ſeem as if I did. I muſt confeſs, I could not chuſe but laugh to hear Agatherſes talk ſo: Truly, Sir, ſaid I unto him, if you do love Elibeſis, you will love her living as well as dead; and if you hate her, you will hate her Memory as well as her Perſon. No, replied he, you are but a Novice in Love, if you know not how to make a diſtinction between theſe two things; for Elibeſis in her Grave can never be enjoyed by my Rival; ſo as pity molifying my Heart, I ſhall look upon her as one who ceaſed to be perfidious in ceaſing to live; as one who loved me, as one who loved not Ariantes, nor ever could love him. But Elibeſis living as an unconſtant Woman, who hath forſaken me, and one whom I ought to forſake, one who may make my Rival happy by his fruition of her, and one who to ſatisfy her Ambition and Vanity, cares not if ſhe make me miſerable; and therefore I conclude, that I can love Elibeſis in her Grave, and hate her living. You may conclude what you pleaſe, Sir (ſaid I unto him) but if you will ſpeak truly, you do love Elibeſis living, and you know it as well as I do. 'Tis true (replied he haſtily) I love her more than I thought I did, and I am ſo angry both againſt her and my ſelf, that ſhe ſhould have ſo much power over me whether I will or no, that I hope very Shame will cure me, and chaſe her abſolutely out of my Heart; and though I had no other reaſon but to hide my weakneſs from you, yet I were obliged in point of Honour to cure my ſelf, to let you ſee my Generoſity is above my Love. Yes, yes, you your ſelf ſhall cauſe me to cure my folly, and hold me for the weakeſt and baſeſt of Men, if before the War end you do not ſee me hate Elibeſis. If the War ceaſe not before your Love (replied I, and laughed) it will be long before we ſhall have Peace. After this, I ſeriouſly asked pardon for cauſing ſo much Sorrow in him, and he very earneſtly entreated me not to tell any living that he ſtill loved Elibeſis; for truly, ſaid he, my Affection to her is of ſuch a nature, that though I had turned Ariantes out of his new erected Throne, though I had killed him, though I had taken Iſſedon, and though Elibeſis were in my power, yet I had rather die than give her any Teſtimony of my Love, though I ſhould love her better than ever I did. I do believe you think as you ſpeak, Sir, replied I, but for my particular I do not believe you; for whoſoever loves, would be loved again, and do any thing in the World to obtain it; therefore I aſſure my ſelf with much reaſon, that if Fortune do make you the Conqueror of Ariantes, yet ſtill you will be a Slave unto Elibeſis. After this, Sir, our Diſcourſe ceaſed, and ſince that day I have been the Confident of his moſt ſecret Thoughts, though he knew I was a Friend unto Adonacris. 'Tis true, he was not abſolutely out with him, for he knew very well that Elibeſis did not follow the counſel of her Brother in all things, and that ſhe only truſted to her ſelf.

But not to be over-tedious in particularizing this War, let me only tell you, Sir, that the Year being far ſpent, both Sides endeavoured to take up their Winter-quarters in their Enemies Country; and in purſuance of theſe Endeavours, there was more Blood ſpilt, than in all the Year before. The Conteſt, Sir, was ſo ſharp at the paſſage over a little River which Spargapiſes would maintain, that the very Water ſeemed as if turned into Blood; but at laſt Ariantes was forced to leave the Paſſage unto his Enemies, and to retreat with his Troops towards Iſſedon: Yet ſince this Victory did coſt Spargapiſes very dear, and ſince he had more Men killed than Ariantes had, he ſaid, that true it was, he had loſt his Baggage and the River, but yet that Spargapiſes had loſt ſo much Blood in gaining it, that ſuch another Gain would ruin him: 'Tis true, maugre this Raillary, that this Paſſage which we got was the cauſe of this Prince his ruin, becauſe this obliged him to quarter himſelf ſo near Iſſedon, that all about it were undone; the Inhabitants murmured, and this cauſed us to ſeek for better Quarters, and a more fertile Countrey.

In the mean time, Sir, Adonacris was taken Priſoner by Agatherſes, and Sitalces by Ariantes. Ariantes ſent Sitalces unto Iſſedon, and Spargapiſes ſent Adonacris unto a Town called Typanis, where that Prince would quarter in the Winter, for he would not return to the Tents Royal, becauſe it was too far from his Army. Thus, Sir, Fortune brought Adonacris and Noromanta together, who as I told you before, had orders from her Husband to ſtay there until the end of the War: I being the Friend of Adonacris, did him all the good offices I could; 'tis true, he ſtood in no great need of me, for Agatherſes moved Spargapiſes to treat him ſo well, that he was ſuffered to go about upon his Parol as ſoon as he came to Typanis. You may well conceive, Sir, that Adonacris did not think his Confinment very rigorous, ſince he was ſo near his dear Noromanta; and on the contrary, you may well think that Sitalces who loved his Wife very well, and who was of a jealous Temper, did reſent his with abundance of Grief. Yet Adonacris was much vexed at the loſs of his Baggage, becauſe all the Letters which Noromanta writ unto him before ſhe was married, were amongſt it; yet ſince he had found her, he cheared up himſelf, and could not imagine the Souldiers could do him any ill office. Argiriſpe alſo was much troubled at the Impriſonment of Adonacris; but as for Noromanta, Sir, I muſt needs tell you a little more preciſely how ſhe knew that her Husband was Priſoner unto Ariantes, and her Lover unto Agatherſes, for truly this ſtrange Chance did produce ſuch a fine Adventure, that I think fit not to omit the leaſt Circumſtance. Be pleaſed to know then, Sir, that the news of this great Fight being carried unto Tipanis, it was there publiſhed, as commonly they uſe to do all great Actions, to wit, with a thouſand falſe Circumſtances; ſometimes Men are killed, who are ſtill alive; ſome are mortally wounded, who are only Priſoners; and ſome are reported to be Priſoners, who are at liberty; and ſome again who are never ſpoken of, are Priſoners wounded and dead: Inſomuch, as after the rate of ſuch confuſed uncertain news, where Truth and Lies are ſo all mixed together, that nothing is certain: As ſoon as it was ſaid in Tipanis that the Armies had fought, it was reported that Sitalces was wounded and taken Priſoner, and that Adonacris was dead: You may imagine, Sir, how this news ſurprized and grieved Noromanta, ſhe that was all Vertue, of a moſt tender Soul, poſſeſſed with a violent Paſſion, could not hear her Husband was wounded and a Priſoner without ſome Sorrow. though ſhe did not love him; nor hear Adonacris was dead without extream Grief; yet it was an advantage to her, that ſhe had now ſome pretence for her Sorrows, and an apparent cauſe to ask News, and ſatisfy her ſelf in all Circumſtances, which indeed ſhe did with extream Earneſtneſs: So that ſince there was no place where ſhe could ſo ſoon and certainly know News from the Army, as from the Wife of the Governour of Tipanis, whoſe name was Eliorante, and who was one of the moſt accompliſhed Ladies in the World, and the moſt generous, ſo ſhe went immediately unto her: Yet ſince ſhe was not fully ſatisfied of what ſhe deſired to know, ſhe reſolved to go thither every day until certain News came from the Army: But ſhe durſt not ask any thing concerning Adonacris, and though ſhe knew that their Affections had been carried very cloſely, yet ſhe had not the boldneſs to inquire, but hoped that in asking of all the Dead, the Priſoners, and the Wounded in general, and of her Husband in particular, ſhe ſhould hear ſome certainty of him ſhe deſired to hear: So as in this hope, ſhe went, as I told you before, unto Eliorante, not only the ſame day the News was divulged, but the next day, and the day after that.

As ſhe was with this Lady, there came a Poſt, which confirmed the News of the Fight, and of Spargapiſes Victory; and who aſſured Noromanta that her Husband was a Priſoner, but not wounded: So that Eliorante in rejoycing with her, told her, ſhe had reaſon to be glad it was no worſe with her Husband, ſince the worſt half of the bad News was not true. Since Noromanta was very rational, ſhe would have conſented unto what Eliorante ſaid, if nothing elſe had diſquieted her Mind; but being moſt ſenſibly troubled at what ſhe durſt not make appear, ſhe was glad ſhe had a colour for the Melancholy, which ſhe could not baniſh from her Eyes do what ſhe could; and therefore ſhe told Eliorante, that though ſhe was very glad to hear that Sitalces was not wounded, yet ſhe could not chuſe but grieve at his being a Priſoner: However, ſhe cared not ſo much what ſhe ſaid unto Eliorante, as ſhe hearkned, with an attentive Ear, unto what the Poſt ſaid unto the Governour of Tipanis, whoſe Name was Aritaſpes, and who was then in his Wives Chamber: And ſhe confuſedly heard him ſay, that the Priſoners were coming, and that there was one whom Spargapiſes would have let go about the Town upon his Parol, and be uſed very well. But as ſoon as ſhe heard this, there was heard a great noiſe of Men who talked loud in a great Plain before the Governour's Houſe; Preſently after, the Noiſe drew nearer, and paſſed from that Plain to the Court, from the Court to the Stairs, and from the Stairs unto the outer Chamber; at laſt they came to tell Aritaſpes, that the Priſoners which Spargapiſes had ſent, were come, and that there was ſome Men of Quality amongſt them, who were in the outer Chamber. As ſoon as this was ſaid, all the Ladies that were with Eliorante, except Noromanta, preſſed her to deſire Aritaſpes that the Priſoners might come into the Chamber. But as for Noromanta, ſince ſhe always feared to hear of Adonacris his Death, ſhe was not deſirous of it; but on the contrary, not daring to truſt her Conſtancy, ſhe offered to go away; ſaying, She had no intereſt in the News, ſince ſhe knew of Sitacles as much as ſhe deſired to know: But Eliorante ſtaid her, and told her very gallantly, that it belonged unto her more than any other to entertain the Priſoners very well, ſince her Husband was in the ſame condition: For, ſaid ſhe, it's credible, that the ſame uſage we ſhall ſhew unto thoſe which are ſent unto us, the ſame will the Prince Ariantes ſhew unto thoſe under his Power: So that Noromanta not daring to reſiſt any longer, ſtaid: And Eliorante deſiring Aritaſpes to ſatisfy the curioſity of all the Ladies who had a deſire to ſee the Priſoners, he told them, ſmiling, that though he ſhould thereby more expoſe them to be their Priſoners, than the Priſoners of Spargapiſes, yet he would ſatisfy them. And then commanding them to enter, the Lieutenant of Spargapiſes Guard, who conducted them, appeared firſt; after him, Adonacris entred in the head of ten or twelve Officers, and he entred with ſo good a Grace, and ſuch a noble Air, as it was eaſy to know he had ſold his Liberty very dear, and that his Captivity was no ſhame unto him: You may well think, Sir, how Noromanta was ſurprized at the ſight of Adonacris, whom ſhe thought dead: to ſee Adonacris whom ſhe had not ſeen ſince they were ſo kind together, ſince they were both married, and ſince they thought never to write unto each other again, nor ſee one another as long as they lived. The ſurprize of Adonacris was as great, for though he knew Noromanta was at Tipanis, yet he did not think to find her in that place.

Moreover, ſo it chanced, that the firſt Perſon who ſaw Adonacris, was Noromanta, and alſo he ſaw her very ſad: And though he knew not the true cauſe of that ſadneſs which appeared in her Countenance, yet he was well ſatisfied that ſhe ſeemed diſpleaſed at her Fortune; for he did not then think that ſhe could be ſo melancholy for the impriſoment of Sitalces; but thinking to make this moment of happineſs to himſelf, he interpreted that Bluſh which appeared in the Cheeks of Noromanta, when ſhe firſt ſaw him, unto his own advantage; and indeed I underſtood by a Lady who was my Friend, and preſent at this Enterview, and who knew all the Secrets of this Affection, that Noromanta bluſhed in ſuch a manner, as it was eaſy to perceive, that ſhe who bluſhed was not diſpleaſed, for her Eyes grew more lively, and ſuch a Joy did ſpread it ſelf ſo all over her Face, that it preſently made a deep impreſſion upon the Heart of Adonacris: Indeed, Sir, there was ſomething ſo paſſionate, and ſo ſignificative in the looks of theſe two Perſons at this unthought-of meeting, that they told each other, without deſign, that they loved one another ſtill, that they would love always, and that they were both very miſerable: However, the firſt unpremeditated thought, which laſts not long, being over, the virtuous Noromanta, after ſhe had bluſhed for Love, did bluſh again for Shame at her weakneſs, and did ſo ſtrive with her ſelf, that ſhe ſhunned the Eyes of Adonacris, and aſſumed unto her own the ſame ſadneſs which appeared in them before he came in; and it was the more eaſy to be done, becauſe her Joys to ſee Adonacris living, whom ſhe thought to be Dead, were tempred with her Sorrows, that ſhe could not innocently either love him, or be loved. And this thought did ſo imprint it ſelf upon her Soul, as it coſt her many a ſigh. Think upon it, Noromanta, (ſaid ſhe then unto her ſelf) conſider well what thou wouldeſt do, and what thou oughteſt to do: Adonacris is amiable, it's true, and thou doſt love him more than thou oughteſt to do: But for all that, ſince thou doſt love him without power of doing otherwiſe, thou loveſt him without a Crime, provided he know it not, and provided thou never letteſt him know it; but on the contrary ſhun him, as if thou didſt hate him. Conſider Noromanta, that it concerns thy Glory, and to preſerve thy Virtue, conſider that thy Father knows Adonacris loved thee at Iſſedon, and that if thou doſt ſuffer him to ſee thee at thy own Houſe, he cannot chuſe but have thoughts which will be diſadvantagious to thee: But eſpecially conſider, that Adonacris will eſteem thee leſs, if thou ſhouldſt give him any teſtimonies of thy Affection: then if thou beeſt only upon terms of indifferency with him; and out of a more noble reſentment conſider, that thou wouldſt eſteem thy ſelf leſs; and that whoſoever does not eſteem themſelves, can never be happy, nor merit the eſteem of others.

Whilſt Noromanta was thus reaſoning with her ſelf, one would have thought ſhe ſtudied ſo profoundly, that her ſtudy had no Object, and as if her Mind was far off any thing about her: So that after Aritaſpes had ſpoken unto all the Priſoners, and told Adonacris that he had Orders to lodg him at his own Houſe, and to give him all the Town of Tipanis for his Priſon, and to let him paſs upon his Parol, he turned towards Noromanta, who, as I told you, ſeemed to be in a deep ſtudy: For ought I ſee, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) you care not for ſeeing the Priſoners of the Prince Spargapiſes, but I believe you think more upon thoſe that are Priſoners unto the Prince Ariantes, and think more upon Sitalces whom you ſee not, then upon Adonacris whom you do ſee, though I think you knew him at Iſſedon. 'Tis very true, Sir, (replied Noromanta, with a trembling Heart, though not ſeeming ſo) that I am thinking upon Sitalces; And I am thinking alſo upon Adonacris, (added ſhe, with incredible reſolution) but it is how to get an exchange between him and Sitalces.

The diſcourſe of Noromanta did ſo much ſurprize Adonacris, that he knew not what to anſwer: 'Tis true, his ſilence was not obſerved, for Eliorante beginning to ſpeak, ſhe gave him time to recollect himſelf. The Deſign you have, Madam, of releaſing two ſuch gallant Men at once (ſaid ſhe unto Noromanta) is ſo noble and worthy your ſelf, that I believe there is none but will do you what Service they can unto Thomiris, and Spargapiſes: And, if the Friends of Adonacris will ſolicite with yours, it is to be hoped you will very ſhortly have the Joy of ſeeing Sitalces, and the Sorrow of parting from Adonacris. If his Impriſonment be no worſe than mine (ſaid Adonacris) a Liberty which will be diſadvantagious to his ſide, is not to be wiſhed: So, that, Madam, ſince Sitacles is more conſiderable in the party of Thomiris, than I am in Ariantes, I ſhall not murmur though I be not exchanged for a Man, who may more hurt my ſide by his Valour, than I can ſerve it by mine; And therefore I ſhall never ſolicite for my Liberty, but leave it unto the conſideration of the Prince whom I ſerve.

This anſwer is ſo modeſt, ſo generous, and ſo gallant (replied Aritaſpes, and ſmiled) that you could not be more ingenuous if you were a Priſoner unto one of theſe Ladies: However, Sir, (added he, and gave him no time no reply) though the Fetters you are to have will not be ſo heavy, as thoſe which they perhaps would impoſe upon you, yet I think it's fit I carry you unto a place where you may reſt your ſelf: And accordingly Aritaſpes preparing himſelf to go out, did put Adonacris before him, though a Priſoner, and conducted him into a very noble Room.

After which, he took all requiſite Orders for the reſt of the Priſoners, who were not to paſs upon their Parol as Adonacris was. But, Sir, I forgot to tell you that Noromanta did hold her countenance ſo reſolutely, when Adonacris ſaluted her in going out of Eliorantes Chamber, that he ſaw no more in her Eyes than when he firſt entred; only a cold and ſerious Civility, which had ſtruck him into deſpair, had he not remembred her paſſionate tenderneſs which he ſaw a quarter of an hour before. Alſo he thought, that perhaps the preſence of ſo many Perſons made her reſtrain her ſelf: but he was quickly deprived of that Conſolation; for being lodged in a Chamber which opened into the Court, wherein was a Balcony not very high, he ſtaid in it in hopes to ſee Noromanta as ſhe went out: And indeed his hope was not deceived; for ſhe having more diſquiet thoughts than ſhe imagined ſhe could maſter, ſhe went out as ſoon as Adonacris came into the Balcony: But though he ſaluted her with all imaginable reſpect, and followed her with his Eyes, not only till ſhe was in the Coach, but alſo till the Coach was out of the Court; he could obtain no more from her, but only a civil Congy, without any looks of her Eye, or ſign with her Head, or wagging of Hand, which he could interpret to his advantage: ſo that he went out of the Balcony very ſadly. However, the firſt looks of Noromanta made ſuch a ſenſible impreſſion in him, and ſo well perſwaded him that ſhe did not hate him, that he knew not what conſtruction to make upon this laſt coldneſs. Let it be as it will (ſaid he to himſelf, as he told me ſince) the beſt I can think of it is, that Noromanta would have me know ſhe doth not hate me.

But alas, my dear Noromanta (added he) If I be ſo happy as not to be hated, all your hollow cold Treatments will be in vain; for I ſhall diſcern whether your expreſſions of hatred be cauſed by a reall averſion, or by prudence only. After this, Adonacris began to caſt about how to ſee her, and to ſee her in private; for he ſtill found her ſo fair, that his Love ſtill augmented; yet this Love, as violent as it was, ſtill was all purity: And Adonacris was ſo well acquainted with the Vertue of Noromanta, that he ſet moſt ſevere limits unto his Deſires; ſo that being fully perſwaded of the innocency of his Affection, he thought Noromanta might and ought to anſwer him: And imagining an unexpreſſible joy, if he could once in his Life hear from the Mouth of Noromanta that he was not hated, he thought upon nothing elſe but how to ſpeak with her when none could hear but her ſelf. But whileſt he was contriving how to bring this to paſs, Noromanta was thinking how to avoid all converſation with him: as for ſeeing her, ſhe ſaw he could not. And indeed ſhe could not go out of Tipanis, during the War; nor could ſhe leave off her Viſits unto Eliorantes and the reſt of her Friends, without giving them cauſe to ask her Reaſon: All ſhe had to do, was, not to ſee Adonacris at her own Lodging, and to ſhun him if ſhe met him any where elſe: yet ſhe found ſo great a repugnancy to take this courſe, that any other Vertue beſides hers would have ſubmitted unto a Paſſion ſo tender and ſtrong. However Noromanta did ſurmount her ſelf, but not her Inclination, though ſhe did all ſhe could to overcome it, untill now ſhe only indeavoured to love Adonacris: but now ſeeing the danger greater, ſhe indeavoured to force her Heart unto a love of Sitalces, but alas, ſhe could not.

But her Vertue finding an ample Subject to make it ſelf appear, ſhe reſolved to do as much for Sitalces, as if ſhe had loved him better than her ſelf: but to do nothing for Adonacris; And ſo neglect no means which might procure an exchange for her Husband, though his preſence was moſt grievous, and the preſence of Adonacris moſt agreeable to her. Noromanta did not reſolve upon this raſhly and tumultuouſly, but upon mature examination and conſideration of it a whole Night together, without a wink of ſleep, untill at laſt, the wearineſs of her Spirits compelled her. But when ſhe awak'd ſhe received, in one quarter of an hour, three Letters of different Stiles, which came from three different Perſons: For a Poſt from Agatherſes which came to advertiſe Aritaſpes, that the Prince Spargapiſes and himſelf would ſhortly come unto Tipanis, did bring her one from Sitalces at Iſſedon, whither Agatherſes had ſent the Man to inquire of one of his Friends, who could not be found either amongſt the Wounded or Dead, or amongſt the Living on his ſide: the ſecond was from Argiriſpes, who conceived her to ſolicite as zealouſly at Tipanis for the liberty of Adonacris, as ſhe would do at Iſſedon, for the liberty of Sitalces: And the third was from Adonacris, which a Servant unto this Priſoner had given unto one of her Women by another Name than that of his Maſter's, and without ſtaying for an Anſwer: for Adonacris feared leſt Noromanta ſhould ſend it back ſealed as ſoon as ſhe ſaw the Character of the Superſcription. So that the vertuous Noromanta finding all at once, a Letter from her Lover, one from her Husband, and another from Argiriſpe, ſhe was in a ſtrange perplexity; had ſhe honoured her own Inclination, ſhe had opened that from Adonacris, and had looked upon that from Sitalces the laſt: Yet, this virtuous Lady, ſurmounting her ſelf, reſolved not to open the Letter from Adonacris at all, to reade that from Sitalces, and, then that from Argiriſpes: So throwing upon the Table that Letter which came from the hand of him that was moſt dear unto her, ſhe opened her Husbands, but opened it with a Sigh, and was long before ſhe was able to read it, ſo ſad was her Soul: but at laſt, having read it, ſhe found ſome expreſſion of Affection, and ſome of Civility: but Sitalces having no polite faculty in writing, though he had Wit enough, theſe Civilities had neither any Tenderneſs nor Gallantry in them; only as much as might come from a Husband, who naturally was not gallant, and from one who valued his Liberty more than any thing elſe; yet indeed there was ſome expreſſions of Love in his Letter, but truly very little obliging: for he bluntly intimated unto her how he was troubled that Spargapiſes and the whole Court would winter at Tipanis, and that ſhe was like to have ſo much good company: Adding afterwards ſeveral directions concerning his Liberty, and his Eſtate, with as much familiarity as if they had been married ten Years, though, the Gods know, they had been only three poor Days together.

So after Noromanta had read it, with many a Sigh, and looked upon the Letter from Adonacris which lay upon the Table; Alas (ſaid ſhe to her ſelf) what a difference is there between that Letter and this I have read? yet I muſt not look into it, but do all which this I have read appoints me: Upon ſecond thoughts, ſhe found ſome danger in truſting any one to carry it back unto him; and thought it more convenient to give it handſomly unto him her-ſelf, the firſt time ſhe met him at Eliorantes, where ſhe imagined to meet him ſooneſt: So that taking up the Letter, ſhe put it in her pocket, and began to reade that from Argiriſpes: But as ſhe confeſſed ſince, ſhe read it with a trembling Heart; for as oft as ſhe found the Name of Adonacris, ſhe bluſh'd, and could not chuſe but entertain ſome thoughts which had ſomething of hatred and jealouſie in them; and wiſhed that Adonacris loved Argiriſpes no better than ſhe loved Sitalces: yet in a minute after, ſhe condemned theſe Thoughts, and not ſhrinking a jot from her Vertue and beſt Reſolution, ſhe went unto a publick Sacrifice which was that day offered upon a little Hill full of Trees which was within the Town: For you know, Sir, we never uſe to ſacrifice but under the great Canopy of Heaven; our Fathers believing that Men cannot build a Temple worthy of the Gods; nor do we uſe to ſacrifice ſo often as other People, it being only once a moneth that theſe publick Acts of Piety are performed: So that Noromanta going that day unto the Sacrifice, and principally to ask the Gods Power to overcome the Paſſion of her Soul; ſhe came unto the foot of the Hill, about which was built great magnificent Galleries, under which the Ladies uſed to ſhade themſelves from the heat of the Sun: our Religion requiring only the Sacrificers, and thoſe who aſſiſt them to be under the open Heavens. Yet ſome of our Ladies who are of a preciſe Piety and ſcrupulous Conſciences, never go into theſe Galleries, but when it is either exceſſively Hot, or exceſſively Cold: So that Noromanta, who was very full of Devotion, placed her ſelf that day amongſt the Multitude, with many other Ladies of Quality. Her devotion was not diſturbed by the preſence of Adonacris, for Aritaſpes kept him with him: but ſhe prayed unto the Gods, with ſo much ſerenity of Soul and tranquillity of Spirit, that ſhe thought ſhe obtained from them a new ſtrength, and went home with intentions to go unto Eliorantes as ſoon ſhe had dined, purpoſely to find a fit opportunity of giving back the Letter unto Adonacris; and accordingly as ſoon as ſhe did riſe from the Table, ſhe commanded her Coach to be made ready: And to the end Adonacris ſhould not think ſhe had the leaſt deſign of kindling any flame in his Heart, ſhe went in a very careleſs and negligent dreſs, pretending the impriſonment of her Husband; But though her Habit was ſimple, and though ſhe wore only five or ſix careleſs Curles of her Hair on either ſide, yet ſince ſhe could not chuſe but be handſom, ſhe appeared to be as handſom without, as with a Dreſs: But as ſhe looked her ſelf in a Glaſs, to ſee if ſhe was as negligent in her Dreſs as ſhe would be, ſhe did hide ſome of her Curles under her Hood, thinking them too gallant for one who had a deſign not to pleaſe, though ſhe wiſhed in her Heart that Adonacris would not hate her.

But whilſt ſhe was conſulting with her Mirror, to ſee her ſelf dreſt careleſly enough, ſhe ſighed, remembring how circumſpect ſhe had formerly been at Iſſedon to pleaſe Adonacris: But at laſt ſhe left her Glaſs, and went into her Cloſſet, to ſee, out of the obſervance of her Women, whether ſhe had the Letter in her Pocket; and found that the Seal had been cruſhed open in the Preſs during the Sacrifice; ſo that ſhe could not reſtore it unto Adonacris ſealed. At the firſt, ſhe was extreamly vexed at her ſelf, and held it a long while in hand before ſhe would read it: But, at laſt, conſidering though ſhe ſhould reſtore it back unread, yet he would think ſhe had read it, therefore ſhe reſolved to reade it. But, firſt, ſhe examined her ſelf what reaſon ſhe had ſo to do? For, (ſaid ſhe to her ſelf) canſt thou think Noromanta, that Adonacris would ever have writ unto thee to tell thee of thy Injuries, and to give thee cauſes of hating him? Haſt thou not ſeen in his Eyes, that the ſame Paſſion which is in thy Heart againſt thy will, is alſo in him? Why then ſhouldeſt thou reade this Letter? Wilt thou thy ſelf tempt thy own Vertue? Thou knoweſt that thou haſt reſolved to die a thouſand Deaths, rather than to do any thing unworthy of thy ſelf; and yet thou art ready to reade a Letter from a Man whom thou knowſt does love thee; and which is ſtrangeſt, from a Man, whom thou knoweſt thou doſt not hate. After this, Noromanta fell into a deep ſerious ſtudy, afterwards reſolving to keep cloſe unto her former Principles, what tenderneſs ſoever ſhe found in the Letter: ſhe did read it, and found theſe words:

Madam,

DID I not know that I have not the leaſt thought which is unworthy of your Vertue, I ſhould never aſſume the boldneſs to beg a private Audience, that I may tell you what my Heart thinks upon the Injuſtice you have done me.

But being ſure that I do not entertain one thought that can offend you, I conjure you, Madam, to grant me ſo much favour, as once before I die, to tell you what I have ſuffered, and what I do ſuffer for you. And to oblige you, not to deny me, I do ſolemnly proteſt unto you, Madam, that I love you without any Deſires or Hopes; and if you pleaſe, I will never ſpeak unto you of that Paſſion, which is, and ever will be in my Soul as long as I live: provided you will give me leave, only to put you in memory of what it was, when once you thought it innocent. Thus asking you nothing, neither for the preſent nor the future, and deſiring no other favour, but only to talk with you of a thing that's paſt, doubtleſs you would be unjuſt if you ſhould deny me. But, Madam, if you will deny me, I beſeech you forbid me your ſelf from telling you that I do love you ſtill, more than ever any did or could. For, Madam, I muſt profeſs, that if you ſhould, by your ſilence, make me underſtand, it is not your pleaſure I ſhould tell you as much, I would not obey you. No, Madam, though your fair Eyes, as powerful as they are, ſhould tell me as much a thouſand times, in that mute and rigorous Language. The truth is, Madam, it is ſo difficult a thing, not to ſpeak of a Malady unto the Perſon, for whoſe ſake it is endured, that I had need to receive this Commandment in ſuch a manner as may force me to Obedience. You know, Madam, what Power you ever had over me: I proteſt it is not leſſened; and whatſoever you command me, I ſhall obey, provided I receive the Command from your own Mouth, and provided you do not forbid me to love you, until the Death of Adonacris.

This Letter being full of tenderneſs and reſpect, Noromanta could not reade it without a Sigh; and ſhe hath told me ſince, that ſhe was never in all her Life, in a greater perplexity than after this: But for all that, this Letter which at firſt ſhe would not reade, ſhe now read it thrice over; and read it with ſuch reſentments as ſhe was never able to expreſs: for ſhe was extream ſad after the reading it, but it was ſuch a ſadneſs, as had ſuch a ſatisfaction in it, as made the ſame thing which grieved, not to diſpleaſe her. However, after ſhe had ſpent a quarter of an hour upon the Love of Adonacris, ſhe revived out of her weakneſs, as out of a Lethargy of Spirit: And tearing the Letter in pieces, I would to the Gods, ſaid ſhe, I were as well able to tear my Tenderneſs unto Adonacris out of my Heart, as I am to tear this Teſtimony of his Affection,

After this, altering her deſign of going unto Eliorantes, ſhe ſaid, that ſhe would not go abroad, nor ſee any Body, having no mind to expoſe her ſelf ſo ſoon unto the ſight of Adonacris. But to vex her, one came to tell her from Eliorantes, that if ſhe would write unto Sitalces ſhe could ſend her Letter; ſo it was written preſently. Thus Noromanta, whoſe Fancy was filled with the conceit of a Letter from her Lover whom ſhe loved, was forced to anſwer her Husbands, whom ſhe loved not; and did ſo with much ado. She began her Letter five or ſix ſeveral times before ſhe could end it; for though ſhe had Sitalces's Letter before her, purpoſely to give a punctual anſwer unto every Article; yet that from Adonacris was ſo imprinted in her thoughts, that ſhe writ rather unto Adonacris, than Sitalces: But at laſt being angry againſt her ſelf, ſhe overcame it, and writ unto her Huſband with much reſpect; alſo anſwered Argiriſpes with much civility: After which ſhe undreſt her ſelf and went to Bed, as a pretence of ſeeing no Body, no not ſo much as her own Women. And to that end, ſhe ſaid ſhe was troubled with an extream pain in her Head, which Silence, Darkneſs, and Sleep would cure: So as her Women ſhut up all the Windows, and drew the Curtains very cloſe, and ſo left her at liberty to think upon the Malady which tormented her. To tell you, Sir, all that Noromanta did, both againſt her ſelf and Adonacris, would be a very hard task; for truly all that a Perſon of a great Spirit, great Courage, and of great Vertue, could think or do to quench the Flames of a violent Paſſion, Noromanta did; and carried her ſelf towards Adonacris, that he could not ſo much as gueſs ſhe deſired he ſhould love her.

In the mean time, ſince ſhe thought it not expedient to let him know her mind at the firſt by her Proceedings; ſhe ſhunned ſeeing him, and told it the next day, that ſhe was not well, and that ſhe would ſee no Body: So that by this means Adonacris came many times to ſee her, and miſſed of his Aim; nor could he ſo much as know whether or no ſhe had received his Letter. And he feared extreamly, that he was deceived when he believed that Noromanta did not hate him. On the other ſide, Aritaſpes being advertiſed that the young Spargapiſis would come the next day, he went to meet him with all the Gallantry of Tipanis: But though all the Honours of the Victory were done unto Spargapiſes, yet it was Agatherſes who deſerved them: for Spargapiſes was ſo young, as he was abſolutely uncapable of any high Actions, or Commendations for them, but only followed the Advice of the wiſe Terez and Agatherſes: So that as ſoon as he came to Tipanis, Agatherſes, who, to oblige Adonacris the more, and to make Elibeſis the more aſhamed, he preſented him unto Spargapiſes, who, as he was adviſed, received him very civilly. Thus the Conqueror, and the Conquered, lived together with extream civility; and Adonacris was more obliged unto that young Prince, than if he had given him his liberty: for, be pleaſed to know, Sir, that Agatherſes telling him it was fit he ſhould viſit Noromanta, whoſe Husband was Priſoner in his Cauſe, he went the ſame hour unto her, and offered unto her his beſt Service in getting the liberty of Sitalces.

And Adonacris having that Evening had a great deal of diſcourſe with Agatherſes, aud letting him know that he never contributed unto the ambition of Elibeſes, there was ſuch a correſpondency between them, that Agatherſes asked him if he would wait upon Spargapiſes unto Noromanta? Adonacris joyfully accepting the Offer, did accompany this young Prince unto this fair One, who faining to be ill, did ſit upon her Bed to receive this viſit, little thinking Adonacris had been there: But when ſhe ſaw him, and had looked him in the Face, her diſorder was ſo great that ſhe changed colour, imagining that he would interpret all her thoughts to his own Advantage. But being a Perſon of a moſt reſolute Spirit, and a great Soul, ſhe inſtantly recollected her ſelf: And ſeeming to take no notice of Adonacris, ſhe anſwered unto the Civilities of Spargipiſes concerning the Impriſonment of her Husband. But to do it in ſuch a manner as might let Adonacris know, (whom ſhe ſaw hearkning very attentively) that ſhe had all the thoughts, which a modeſt Wife ought to have upon the like occaſion, ſhe thanked Spargapiſes with a moſt reſpective Civility, for all his Offers; conjuring him, with abundance of earneſtneſs, to do all he could for the liberty of her Husband.

But, Sir, added ſhe, it is not here I ſhould make this Petition to you, the firſt day I ſtir out, ſhall be to beſeech you, you would be pleaſed to grant me one of your Priſoners, that I may propound an exchange unto the Prince Ariantes, between him and Sitalces. You need not ſtay ſo long, Madam, replied Agatharſes, (ſeeing Spargapiſes knew well how far he ought to ſatisfy Noromanta's Requeſt) for, I ſuppoſe the Prince hath already granted your Requeſt. Spargapiſes then imagining by what Agatherſes ſaid that he ought not to deny her, did confirm what Agatherſes ſaid; and asked her the Name of that Priſoner whom ſhe deſired to propound unto Ariantes in exchange for Sitalces. Sir, ſaid ſhe then, and bluſh'd, I ſhould have ſome hopes of my Husband's Liberty, if you would be pleaſed to grant me Adonacris, ſince it is very probable Ariantes will not let the Brother of the fair Elibeſis, be a Priſoner: As Noromanta could not name Adonacris without a bluſh; ſo Adonacris could not hear himſelf named without a bluſh alſo, eſpically upon ſuch a croſs conjecture. However, he knew not how to oppoſe his Liberty directly; and his expreſſion of Gallantry which he uſed in Eliorantes Chamber, when Noromanta ſpoke of his exchange for Sitalces, was not fit to be ſpoken ſeriouſly: Yet being a Buſineſs which he could not conſent unto, nor indeed reject, unleſs in Raillery; he addreſſed his Diſcourſe unto Noromanta; Truly, Madam, ſaid he unto her, and ſmiled, I believe that Sitalces will not be pleaſed at your Motion, and he had rather be a Priſoner than be exchanged for me. This Modeſty is ſo ſtrangely exceſſive, (replied Noromanta, but looked not upon him) that I have reaſon to think you ſpeak by Contraries: but be it as it will, ſince the Prince is pleaſed to grant me my Deſire, it ſhall be the Prince Ariantes who ſhall decide the Matter, who, I believe, will decide it according to my wiſh; ſince it is not credible he can deny the fair Elibeſis to break off your Fetters at the inſtance of one, who doubtleſs hath zealouſly importuned him to it: So as I beſeech you give me leave to hope that you will very ſhortly be at liberty, and that I ſhall very ſhortly ſee Sitalces return.

After this, Spargapiſes not uſing to make any long Viſits, eſpecially when they are only Ceremonies, he did riſe up, without giving Adonacris any time to reply unto Noromanta; and he went to view ſome places in the Town which Agatherſes thought fit to be fortified; and Adonacris not thinking it fit for him to follow him unto that place, he ſtaid, with ſome others, at the Door of Noromanta's Houſe: But ſince it was the cuſtom of Men to part without any Ceremony in ſuch Occaſions, thoſe who ſtaid talking with Adonacris, having ſome Buſineſs to go about, they left him alone with his own Men at the Gate where he was; ſo that ſeeing it ſtill open, and imagining that Noromanta might expect his re-entry, and that ſhe would not deny him entrance into her Chamber, he went in boldly; and going up the Stairs, he ſaw the Door of Noromanta's Chamber open; ſo that, without any more delay, he went towards the Bed where ſhe was ſitting. But to delude her Women, and indeed her ſelf conſenting, Madam, (ſaid he, upon his firſt Addreſs) the Prince Spargapiſes hath ſent me back unto you, to talk of ſome things which concerns you to know, before he ſend unto Ariantes concerning the exchange of Sitalces: and therefore, I beſeech you, Madam, permit me a quarter of an hours audience. Noromanta did ſo wonder to ſee Adonacris again, as in that diſorder ſhe had not a handſome pretence of denying that Requeſt: And fearing that her Women would think her not Zealous for her Husband's Liberty, if ſhe did not hear him, ſhe was forced to anſwer him as though ſhe did believe him, though indeed ſhe did not: And indeed I am perſwaded, that Noromanta, for all her Vertue, was not very ſorry ſhe had found an occaſion of talking once again in her life in private with Adonacris, her ſelf not contributing unto it: So that ſeeming, as I told you before, to believe Spargapiſes ſent him, ſhe made him ſit down, and prepared her ſelf for Audience. And to make this Confereuce more free, her Women, who were extreamly deſirous to tell others, that Spargapiſes had promiſed to ſet their Maſter at Liberty, went into their Miſtreſs's Wardrobe to talk with other Women who were there. So that leaving the Door open that they might hear Noromanta if ſhe called; Adonacris ſaw them go into the Wardrobe, and that he had all the liberty he could deſire of talking with his dear Noromanta; who not taking notice of her Women, had ſuch a trembling at her Heart, that ſhe neither knew what ſhe ſaw, nor what ſhe ſhould think of her ſelf.

But at laſt, after Adonacris had ſilently looked upon her with as much Grief as Love: I hope, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, with a Sigh) that ſince Fortune hath brought me unto you, you will not baniſh me: I beſeech you, Madam, conſider of your injuſtice to me, and treat me not ſo. If I were ſtill the ſame I was at Iſſedon, (replied Noromanta modeſtly) doubtleſs I ſhould be unjuſt in doing ſo; but, Sir, ſince I am not now what I was then, no nor you your ſelf the ſame, certainly I muſt do nothing but what becomes my Duty; and if I have any Power over you, I both conjure and beſeech you, with all my Heart, to go away, to come no more at my Houſe, to ſhun ſeeing me any where elſe as much as you can, and to endeavour your Liberty with as much zeal as I ſhall. Your Power over me, Madam, is ſuch, replied he, that if it be your poſitive pleaſure to do as you ſay, I ſhall endeavour to do what I can to obey you: But, firſt, Madam, dam, I beſeech you hearken unto all my Reaſons: Let me acquaint you with the preſent ſtate of my Soul; examine your own a little, and by calling to memory what is paſt,you may the better know what to do in the future. Moreover, Madam,I beſeech you deny me not what I ſhall ask, for if you do, I profeſs, though I would, yet I cannot obey you. Then you have written me a Lie, replied ſhe, when you ſent me word, that provided I did my ſelf forbid you ſeeing me, you would obey. I ſay it again, Madam, (added he) but before you do forbid me any thing, I beſeech you hear me. Upon condition that this ſhall be the laſt time, (replied ſhe) I will hear what you pleaſe. I ſhall tell you then, Madam, replied he, That you have done me the greateſt injuſtice in the World, in forſaking me for Sitalces; for, truly Madam, I am fully perſwaded, that when I had the honour to ſee you at Iſſedon, you did not then diſſemble your Thoughts, when your Goodneſs was pleaſed to teſtify, that thoſe thoughts which I had of you did not diſpleaſe you: Alſo I remember very well, that the laſt day I had the honour to ſee you, your Eyes did then beſtow more obliging glimſes upon me than ever before; inſomuch as their Language permitted me to hope for Happineſs: But when Fortune once ſeparated me from you, Madam, you made me the moſt miſerable Man alive; and Sitalces, who certainly knows not the excellency of that Treaſure which he enjoys, was preferred before me. Had I voluntarily preferred Sitalces before you, Sir, (replied ſhe) certainly I had been much to blame, though you had been much his Inferior in all Accompliſhments; for then I ſhould have been branded with Inconſtancy and Perfidy. But alas, Adonacris, (purſued ſhe, and ſighed) I am not ſo; ſince ſurely I ſhould be much happier than I am, if I were more blameable; and I am afraid, that if I were more blameable towards you, I were more innocent: For, truly, you have no reaſon to upbraid me, and I obeyed my Father with ſo much unwillingneſs, and married Sitalces with ſo much repugnancy, that I may very well doubt, you had a little too far engaged my Heart; and I have the more reaſon to chide my own weakneſs, by how much I know you have been charmed by the fair Argiriſpes. Alas, Madam, ſaid he, can you blame me for marrying Argiriſpes, after you had married Sitalces? I do not accuſe you, Sir, of any Crime, (replied ſhe) but truly I do accuſe my ſelf, leſt you ſhould. Nay, nay, Madam, replied he, I will not excuſe my ſelf, but confeſs, that I did not love Argiriſpes when I married her, and that I did not marry her until you had firſt married Sitalces, and was ſo uncivil as to forſake me.

I do ingenuouſly confeſs, (I ſay) that I ought not to have married her, but ought to have diſobeyed both Ariantes and my Father, and rejected the Advice of all my Friends: I confeſs alſo I did you wrong, in hoping that the enjoyment of Argiriſpes could never comfort me for the loſs of you, but ought ever to continue deſperate of all Comforts. But for all this, Madam, though I have failed in my Duty, yet I failed with abundance of ſorrow, and have failed without any inconſtancy or perfidiouſneſs. However it be, Sir, (ſaid Noromanta, and interrupted him) ſince you are now the Husband of Argiriſpes, and I the Wife of Sitalces, I ought not to entertain the leaſt Spark of your Affection, nor give you the leaſt Glimpſe of mine; but ought, if poſſible, never to ſee you again. O, Madam, (cried Adonacris) you never did love me, if you be able to do ſo.

To teſtify unto you, replied Noromanta, that I exact no great Difficulties from you, Sir, I will with a Bluſh confeſs, that I did love you more than ever I did tell you, and that you are ſtill not ſo indifferent unto me as you imagine, or as you ought to be: But let me tell you, after all this, that though I loved you more than ever any did, and though I hated Sitalces worſe than a Toad, yet I ſhall do what now I am reſolved upon, out of a Reſentment of Honour: and indeed I ought to do it out of another reaſon than it; for, truly Adonacris, what ſweetneſs can you find in ſeeing me eternally miſerable? and what pleaſure can I have in ſeeing you for ever unfortunate? And therefore it is much better to do what I ought, than otherwiſe; for ſince it is the pleaſure of Fortune, that I muſt never be Happy, yet let me however be Innocent, and let me know that I did not deſerve ſo bad a Fate. To hear you to ſpeak, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) would make one think that you ſuſpect my Affection to be of ſome vitious ſtrain; but know, Madam, I beſeech you, that my Soul is not capable of any ſuch Thoughts; know that I do really love you, without the leaſt pretence or hope, but only not to be hated. I am contented, if you pleaſe, that your Affection to me may be only a kind of tender Amity, provided only you will let me love you more zealouſly than ever any did: Live ſtill eternally happy with Sitalces, ſince it is the pleaſure of the Gods you ſhould be his; and if I can, I will live well with Argiriſpe, ſince my croſs Fate hath obliged me unto it: But, Madam, ſince I can never give her my Heart, let me keep it for you: let me do that, I ſay, which you cannot hinder me from doing, and put me not to a neceſſity of diſobeying you. What I deſire, Madam, is, me-thinks, but a ſmall thing, ſince I am contented with your being only my Friend, with a proviſion of letting me to be eternally your Lover. You may phraſe my Love by what Epithite you pleaſe; call it Eſteem, Friendſhip, or Tenderneſs, if you will, provided you will let me ſee you, let me love you, and let me think it my chiefeſt felicity to be near you. Of ſo many Beauties which Sitalces enjoys in you, I ask only ſome of thoſe favourable Looks which heretofore were wont to afford me ſo many ſweet Minutes: O, Madam, I beſeech you, conſider well upon what I ask; your Eyes by looking favourably upon me, will not be leſs ſweet unto Sitalces; and when he looks upon you, he will never find my Image there; if I ſhould happily deſire any thing that were Criminal, you may have ſome handſome pretence of ſome denyal; and if I ſhould deſire often occaſions of talking with you in private, any ſuſpicious Meetings, though happily Innocent, you might then tell me that I did hazard your Reputation: But alas, Madam, I deſire nothing from you, but that you will not hate me, that you will not diſſemble your Thoughts, that you will let me love me, and that you will not turn away your fair Eyes, when they accidentally look upon mine: In ſhort, Madam, do not ſeek me, nor do not ſhun me, ſuffer me only to ſee you, and do not complain againſt me: Let me, I ſay, ſee you without any affectation, as a thouſand others do, and that I may talk to you when chance lends me occaſion: If you will, I will not, ſo long as I live, tell you that I love you, only content my ſelf with ſaying, that once I did love you: But, truly Madam, if you ſhould turn me to deſpair, I may haply do ſuch things as will diſpleaſe you; therefore I beſeech you be not ſo zealous in your ſolicitation for my Liberty, in exchange for Sitalces, for it would be a piece of inhumanity to break thoſe Chains which fetter me as a Priſoner of War, ſince you can break thoſe Chains which fetter me as a Priſoner of Love: Leave the Buſineſs unto Fortune, and oppoſe not my comfort of ſeeing you: You have already done enough as the Wife of Sitalces; and if you will do as you ought, you muſt not negotiate any more for him, ſince you cannot ſolicite for him unleſs with ſtrange inhumanity you ſolicite againſt me: The Truth is, Madam, I ſhall die if you deliver me; I much more deſire Death, than Liberty, ſince I cannot have it without loſing you.

Whilſt Adonacris was talking thus, Noromanta looked down with her Eyes, and was in a moſt unconceivable torment of Thoughts. However, ſince Glory did exceedingly quaſh the tenderneſs of her Soul, ſhe would not be perſwaded, and ſhe told Adonacris ſo reſolutely, that ſhe would earneſtly ſolicite for the delivery of Sitalces, that he plainly perceived he could not prevail with her: But, Madam, ſaid he then, ſince you will have Sitalces releaſed, I beſeech you ſolicite for his Liberty, and not mine: There are ſo many other Priſoners in your Party, for whom you may get his Exchange, that unleſs you be obſtinately reſolved to deny me all things, you will not deny me this. Ah, Adonacris, replied ſhe, I perceive you do not know the depth of my Heart; for, truly (if I could ſpeak it without a bluſh) I ſhould tell you, and confeſs, that if Decency would permit it, I would ſolicite your return unto Iſſedon, ſſedon, without bringing Sitalces back unto Tipanis, and would eaſily be out of his ſight, ſo I might never ſee you again. However, you ought to be ſo far from murmuring at what I ſay, that you are much obliged to me. But Adonacris, after I have confeſſed that your preſence is terrible to me, and that it is a matter moſt hard to ſee and to hate you, I muſt reſolve never to ſee you again, as long as I live, but when I cannot prevent it; and therefore I muſt even now begin to conjure you to be gone. Let me tell you, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that I cannot go until you have promiſed not to ſtifle your light Inclination to me, and until you promiſe not to be offended if I do not endeavour my liberty ſo earneſtly as you do. But, Sir, ſaid Noromanta, if you do not endeavour it, People will have great reaſon to wonder, and dive into a Cauſe ſo extraordinary; therefore, Adonacris, you muſt endeavour it. Ah, Madam, ſaid he, you can never move me to it: And ſince, by denying me all, you give me a right to deny you ſomething, I aſſure you that in this I cannot do as you deſire; and if I be releaſed, or to ſay better, baniſhed, it ſhall be only your Act, not mine. After this, Adonacris expreſſed himſelf ſo tenderly unto Noromanta, as that fair and virtuous Perſon, not being able to hear him without much tenderneſs of Heart, ſhe began to be angry with her ſelf, and commanded Adonacris ſo peremptorily to retire, that he was conſtrained to obey her. But, Madam, ſaid he (as he roſe up) when will you give me leave to ſpeake unto you? I will give you leave to bid me farewel, (ſaid ſhe unto him) the ſame day you are to depart from Tipanis to Iſſedon in exchange for Sitalces. O, Madam, ſaid he, the limits of your Vertue are too harſhly narrow, and you are all Cruelty in ſaying ſo. I know not whether it be Cruelty to ſay ſo, but I am ſure my Thoughts tell me that I ought to ſpeak as I do. Then, Madam, ſaid he unto her, tell me how I ſhould interpret your words. Interpret them as you pleaſe, replied ſhe, ſo you will be immediately gone, ſo you will not return hither again, and ſo you will never ſeek for me any where elſe.

I promiſe you, Madam, replied he, to do all I am able to obey you; but in promiſing that, I promiſe nothing; for I cannot chuſe but court all Opportunities of ſeeing you. After this Noromanta did ſo expreſly command him to go out of her Chamber, that he did obey her: But he obeyed not till after he had looked Noromanta in the Face a long while, without giving one word; and till he diſcovered in her fair Eyes, that her Heart and Tongue did not agree, and that ſhe baniſhed him with much ſorrow. But away he went, the ſaddeſt Lover in the World, and left her alſo in the ſame condition: For, the truth is, ſhe loved Adonacris more than ever: But for all that, having a high and Vertuous Soul, ſhe check'd the tenderneſs of her Affection; and the next Morning ſhe claimed promiſe of Spargapiſes, and ſolicited Agatherſes to ſend immediately unto Ariantes about the exchange of Adonacris for Sitalces. And the amorous Adonacris, ſeeing how earneſtly Noromanta ſolicited, his Grief increaſed.

But ſince Love is a Paſſion which can find Expedients for all Occaſions, Adonacris found one out to hinder his own and Sitalces Liberty: for it was a grand Cordial unto his Paſſionate Soul to be near Noromanta, though he never ſaw her but inceuſed: ſo that to hinder the happineſs of Sitalces, and to make himſelf a little leſs miſerable by hindring his liberty, he ſent ſecretly unto Iſſedon, and writ unto Ariantes, to tell him, that Spargapiſes would addreſs himſelf unto him, and offer him in exchange for Sitalces; but his Zeal unto his Service would advice, not to releaſe him till the Spring when the Army was in the Field, where he might fight in his Quarrel. For conſidering the juncture of Affairs, he thought, that if he remained a Priſoner all this Winter-time, he ſhould be able to diſcover many of the Enemies Deſigns, much to his advantage. He told this Prince further, that he hoped to make him ſome Creatures in Tipanis; adding, that it concerned him not to releaſe Sitalces until the end of the Winter, becauſe if he were preſently releaſed, he knew that being very rich, he would make new Levies to recruit the Army of Spargapiſes.

gapiſes: Furthermore, he told him, that he was well able to do him this Service, becauſe his Impriſonment was not harſh; but to the end his Plot might better take, he told him alſo, that Argiriſpe and Tyſſagette ſhould not have any knowledg of this Secret, and that his beſt way would be only to draw the Buſineſs out at length, without either conſenting or refuſing.

Thus the Winter being very long in that Country, Adonacris hoped for much comfort from the length of his Impriſonment: and indeed his Plot did take admirably well, as I ſhall preſently tell you. Again, he writ unto Argiriſpes, as if he were in ſome hopes of his ſpeedy releaſe, though he had indeed ſome fears that it would not be ſo ſoon as ſhe deſired: But whileſt the Man whom Spargapiſes would ſend unto Iſſedon was preparing for his departure; whileſt Noromanta was ſoliciting for her Husband's return, and the departure of Adonacris, ſhe was extreamly grieved, for asking two things ſo contrary to his own Inclinations. Whilſt Adonacris was doing all he could to hinder his own releaſment, and Sitalces alſo, Agatherſes, whoſe Paſſion was ſtill violently high, was buſy in making all the World believe that he was not in love with Elibeſis, to the end the Fame of it might reach as far as Iſſedon, and that Elibeſis might not think he loved her; thinking it a thing unworthy of himſelf to continue loving one, who had preferred her Ambition of being a Queen before her Affection. So that he was extreamly buſy in giving inſtruction unto him who was going unto Iſſedon, leſt he ſhould contradict his Reſentments; and in order to that, he made choice of a Man who depended abſolutely upon himſelf. But at the ſame time whilſt he was inſtructing him to ſpeak nothing which might make it believed that he loved Elibeſis; and that he did not act againſt Ariantes, but only as a true Subject unto Thomiris, he ordered him alſo to enquire very circumſpectly, in what manner Elibeſis behaved her ſelf towards Ariantes: However, not thinking his revenge upon her to be enough in perſwading her that he loved not her, unleſs he made her alſo believe that he loved another, he reſolved upon a full ſatisfaction unto his Revenge, in ſeeming to be deſperately in love with ſome Lady in Tipanis. And there being no Beauty of a greater luſter than Noromanta, nor more fit to raiſe a belief that he was in Love, he determined to counterfeit Addreſſes to her, and all the Winter long to court this Beauty with continual Feaſts, and to cloſet up all his real Reſentments in his own Heart, that the leaſt ſign of any Sorrow ſhould not appear in his Face. In order to which, he began his frequent viſits unto Noromanta, and to make many Addreſſes unto the Governour's Wife of Tipanis, at whoſe Houſe all the Ladies did rendezvous.

In the mean time, Noromanta thinking it unfit for a Wife, whoſe Husband was a Priſoner, to be frequenter of ſo many Diverſions: ſhe would needs excuſe her ſelf from them; but ſince Spargapiſes, at the ſolicitation of Agatherſes, was very importunate with her, ſhe was forced to be leſs ſolitary than otherwiſe ſhe would: For all the Friends of Sitalces told her, that there was no prudence in the World in incenſing a Prince, who might hinder the releaſement of her Husband: So that Noromanta, as melancholly as ſhe was, yet was obliged to be in pleaſant Company. And thus, though Adonacris could not ſee her at her own Houſe, unleſs when he went with the young Spargapiſes; yet he ſaw her very often in other Places whether ſhe would or no, ſo as he received ſome conſolation: Alſo he carried the matter ſo handſomly, that ſhe not contributing unto it, he found ways how to talk with her a quarter of an hour together, when no Ears but her own could hear: ſo that though ſhe ſaid nothing unto him, but what was worthy of her Vertue, yet he did oftentimes break into expreſſions of his Paſſion.

But the counterfeit Paſſion of Agatherſes, ſeemed the greater wonder unto Adonacris: for ſince he took that fancy up, he was almoſt perpetually with Noromanta: and by conſequence it was very hard for Adonacris to talk with her in private.

Again, as fair and charming as Noromanta was, yet Agatherſes took no other delight in ſeeing and talking with her, then his thoughts of ſpighting Elibeſis: For he knew very well it would vex her to the Heart when ſhe ſhould hear he loved any other after her. Thus Agatherſes diſturbed the Minds of theſe two Perſons without receiving any great ſatisfaction unto himſelf, or at leaſt any tranquile ſatisfaction. But (ſaid I one day unto him, ſeeing the conſtraint wherein he liv'd) I cannot underſtand why you ſhould ſo diſſemble; for what matter is it what Elibeſis thinks of you? What matter? (replied he ſharply) why it doth ſo much concern me, that ſhe ſhould believe I do not now love her, that I ſhould be even deſperate if ſhe ſhould not think me in love with Noromanta. For, truly, I cannot endure ſhe ſhould ever ſuſpect me of any puling Weakneſs; but on the contrary, I had rather ſhe ſhould think me a thouſand times more in love with Noromanta, than ever I was with her.

But (ſaid I unto him) in ſatisfying your Fancy, you do but ill Service unto the Side you have taken: for do you think that Sitalces, when he is releaſed, will take it well, that you ſhould be in love with his Wife? Provided Elibeſis take it ill (replied he, very ſharply) I care not a ſtraw how Sitalces takes it; Yet (added he) I had never made choice of Noromanta, had there been any other in Tipanis, whoſe Beauty was fam'd enough to make Elibeſis fully believe I quit her for the other.

But ſince there is none ſo fair and charming as Noromanta, ſhe muſt be the Object of my pretended Love, which muſt ſatisfy my Revenge: And more than this, (added he) I will do all I am able to perſwade my ſelf, that I do love Noromanta. Noromanta being moſt Vertuous (ſaid I unto him) I am perſwaded that you will not be a jot the happier if you ſhould be really in love with her: Ah, my dear Anabaris, (ſaid he unto me) that rigour which is cauſed by the virtue of the Perſon loved, will never fill a Soul ſo full of Sorrow, as will the inconſtancy of an ambitious Woman, who loves nothing but a Chimera of Grandure which ſhe fancies: So that though Noromanta ſhould treat me ill, yet I ſhould be leſs miſerable then I am, and ſhould have this ſatisfaction at leaſt, to know that ſhe whom I loved did deſerve to be ſo, whereas by continuing my Love of Elibeſis, I ſhould continue loving one, who deſerves not ſo much as my eſteem. If you do not eſteem her (ſaid I unto him) you do not love her, for I cannot ſee how Love can ſubſiſt without Eſteem: I did eſteem her when I firſt began to love her, (purſued he) and did ſince long eſteem her; but let me tell you withal, that now I do not eſteem her, nor ever will, though I am ſtrangely afraid, that I ſhall love her ſtill: I ſee ſhe is as fair as fair can be, that ſhe hath as much Wit as is attributed unto the very Gods, and that ſhe hath ſuch a ſtrange kind of engaging Charms, when ſhe pleaſes, that it is a matter moſt difficult to defend ones ſelf againſt them: But for all this, it may be ſaid, that I eſteem in her what is eſtimable, but cannot truly ſay that I eſteem her; for truly when I look upon her as a Perſon blinded with Grandure, one who would prefer a Man that is defective, both in Body and Mind, ſo he be upon a Throne, before the moſt accompliſhed Man, I cannot eſteem her: But, Sir, ſaid I unto him, the Prince Ariantes is no ſuch Man as you ſpeak of: 'Tis true, replied he, but ſhe does not value his Merits no more then mine. Then, Sir, replied I, if ſhe be ſuch an ambitious Piece, Can you think ſhe will care whether you love her or no, or will be ſorry if you ſhould love another? At the leaſt, ſhe will not be glad if I love another, (replied he) So that though I cannot make her grieve, yet I ſhall deprive her pleaſure to think that I can love none but ſhe; and therefore though Sitalces ſhould change Sides, I would not change my Thoughts: And indeed, Sir, Agatherſes began his Gallantry in ſuch perſpicuous manner, as it was impoſſible but to make a great Noiſe in the World; but yet, in the midſt of all, he had ſuch inward frettings of Heart, which he was not able to maſter, as that they appeared in ſpite of his Teeth: For my particular, I have ſeen him when all the Ladies were aſſembled to Dance, to ſtand all the night in the Corner of the Room, never ſo much as minding what they did, no not Noromanta her ſelf. However, this did not undeceive thoſe who thought his ſadneſs proceeded from Noromanta's not anſwering his Affection: She her ſelf thought as much, and whilſt his Mind was all upon Elibeſis, they thought that Noromanta's rigour racked his Thoughts. On the other ſide, Adonacris was ſo grieved at this high kind of Gallantry, that had not I given him ſome Cordial, I think he had died: but being his intimate Friend, and might impart the Secret of Agatherſes without any prejudice to him, I did let him know that Agatherſes did not love Noromanta, but only did ſtrive to love her. Ah, my dear Friend, (ſaid Adonacris to me) if Agatherſes would love Noromanta, certainly he will, for ſhe is too too fair and lovely, not to anſwer the Deſires of all that would love her. As you cannot love Elibeſis, though you would, as fair as ſhe is (ſaid I unto him) though ſhe were not your Siſter, ſo Agatherſes cannot love Noromanta, though he deſire it. I wiſh it with all my Soul, replied he, but I am afraid my wiſh will not prevent it: But, Sir, (ſaid I unto him) I muſt confeſs, that I cannot underſtand this ſtrain of Jealouſy which now poſſeſſeth you; for methinks when one is in love with a Perſon who hath a Husband, he never need be jealous of a Lover which is not loved. Alas, Anabaris, (ſaid Adonacris) you are an Ignorant in matters of Love, if you do not know the difference between being jealous of a Rival, and jealous of a Husband. I cannot tell whether I am an Ignorant in amorous Matters, (replied I) but I believe I am in the right when I ſay, that it is a much greater vexatious matter to ſee the Perſon whom one loves enjoyed by a Husband, than to ſee her only loved by a Rival. If the husband were her Lover when he married her, replied he, I muſt confeſs nothing is more hard to be endured; And when a Lover becomes a Husband, the caſe is altered: for a Rival, who is not loved, troubles me no more if I ſhould ſee him talk with Noromanta, than Sitalces doth by enjoying her; for a Husband, who is not loved, will never be, but a hated Lover may be hereafter loved. Thus you ſee a vaſt difference between a Husband and a Rival: Therefore I think my ſelf infinitely obliged unto you for acquainting me that Agatherſes is not my Rival. Thus, Sir, you ſee what the Reſentments of theſe three Perſons were, Agatherſes loved Elibeſis ſtill, and would ſeem as if he loved Noromanta, and not her: Adonacris ſtill loved her whom he loved at firſt, but durſt not either ſay or be ſeen ſo to do: And Noromanta, though ſhe could not chuſe but ſtill love Adonacris, yet ſeemed as if ſhe dearly loved Sitalces, and not him.

In the mean time, the Man whom Agatherſes ſent unto Ariantes in the Name of Spargapiſes, not arriving at Iſſedon until after the Meſſenger which Adonacris ſent unto that Prince, he did not ſpeed ſo well as he hoped; for the Prince Ariantes really beleeving Adonacris, did protract the Buſineſs, and diſmiſſed the Envoy from Spargapiſes, without either a Denial or a Conſent unto his Demands. So that Argiriſpe hearing that Ariantes did not conſent unto this exchange ſo readily as ſhe hoped, ſhe addreſſed her ſelf unto her Siſter-in-law, and deſired her Favour in obtaining her Husband's Liberty of this new King: But Elibeſis told her, that ſhe had already ſpoke unto Ariantes, who ſaid he would firſt conſider upon it: Adding, that ſhe did ſolicite in her behalf, with all imaginable care. But, Sir, you muſt know, that Elibeſis indeed had ſpoken unto the Prince Ariantes for the Liberty of Adonacris, and he fearing to deny the liberty of her Brother, without telling her the Reaſon, he ſhewed her what this Priſoner had writ unto him, upon condition ſhe ſhould not ſpeak of it unto Argiriſpe or any other: She ſeeing this, that her Brother deſired not to be releaſed, that his ſtaying at Tipanis, would be advantagious to the new King's Affairs, and prejudice the Queen's; ſhe deſired Ariantes to deny her very peremptorily, as often as ſhe ſhould, at the inſtance of her Siſter-in-law, ſolicite him for the Liberty of Adonacris: So that by this means the Deſign of this Lover and Priſoner, did take admirable effect.

On the other ſide, Sitalces underſtanding that the Prince Ariantes did make it ſome difficulty of exchanging him for Adonacris, was much perplexed at his being abſent from his Wife at a time when ſo many Gallants were at Tipanis: So that jealouſy obliged him to write in anſwer to his Wife's Letter, that he had appointed her to offer Agatherſes any thing, which much conduces unto the continuation of the War, ſo he would procure his Liberty. Furthermore, Argiriſpe not contenting her ſelf with the Anſwer of Elibeſis, did write unto her Husband, that ſhe was reſolved rather to offer the half of all her Eſtate to procure his Liberty, than to let him lie a long Winter in Priſon; for ſhe being naturally of a jealous and unquiet temper, and loving her Husband very dearly, his abſence was intollerable to her. So that Sitalces not knowing that Adonacris was in love with his Wife, or that his Wife did not hate him, alſo Argiriſpe not knowing theſe things neither, they were both of them in a moſt unquiet condition, and they partly ſhewed it; for Sitalces being upon his Parol, as well as Adonacris, he went ſometimes to viſit her, and confer upon the beſt Expedients, for the recovery of her Husband's Liberty and his own: And thus the equality of their Intereſts did beget a confidence in each other: But whilſt theſe two were plotting for Expedients to advance their Deſigns, Elibeſis was a little perplexed in reſiſting the Prince Ariantes, and refuſing to marry him without angring him. However, being reſolved not to marry under a King, and ſeeing his Throne yet in a tottering Condition, ſhe held him ſtill cunningly in hand, but ſtill intended, that if Ariantes were not a King, then to renew with Agatherſes, not doubting but that he would return to her, if ſhe would return to him. And indeed ſhe tampered ſo cunningly with Ariantes, that he believed the reaſon why ſhe would not marry him, during the War, was in reſpect of his own Intereſt: for having Wit at will, ſhe told him, that ſince her Quality was inferior to his, if he ſhould then marry her, it would give the adverſe Party a colour for ſaying many things prejudicial againſt him: So that ſhe going thus ſubtily to work, Ariantes thought himſelf obliged unto her for denying him.

On the other ſide, the Meſſenger which Spargapiſes ſent to this Prince, being returned to Tipanis, with an Anſwer nothing ſatisfactory; Noromanta was not a little aſtoniſhed, for ſhe could not imagine why Ariantes would not releaſe the Brother of her he loved, by releaſing Sitalces: ſhe began to ſuſpect that Adonacris was himſelf an obſtacle unto his own Liberty; but ſince ſhe could not imagine which way he ſhould do it, ſhe could not poſitively believe it. However, though ſhe ſhun'd meeting with Adonacris as much as ſhe could, and ſolicited hard to ſend him further from her by releaſing him, yet ſhe was not ſorry in her Heart that Sitalces (ſhe not contributing to it) was ſtill at Iſſedon; and Adonacris yet at Tipanis. Yet notwithſtanding all this, as ſoon as ſhe received her Husband's Letter, which appointed her to offer any thing in the World unto Agatherſes to obtain his Liberty, ſhe reſolved upon Obedience.

Furthermore, Adonacris ſeeing his Plot did ſo happily hit, he was infinitely joyed at it. But to the end Ariantes ſhould not diſcover his Drift, but ſtill let him continue a Priſoner all the Winter, he did really ſpie ſo narrowly into the Deſigns of Agatherſes, and all the Cabinet Intricacies of Tipanis, and likewiſe of the Tent Royal, that he did often ſend Intelligence of great importance unto that Prince; inſomuch as there was no need of giving any new Reaſons why he ſhould not be releaſed; becauſe the Intereſt of State was reaſon enough.

On the other ſide, Agatherſes in continuing his Mask of Love unto Noromanta, he was nothing ſo circumſpect as he might be in hindering Ariantes from the Throne: But his greateſt Grief was, that Thomiris during her languiſhing Diſeaſe, did ſend ſuch ambiguous Orders, as it was eaſy to know that her Soul was troubled at ſomething elſe than at the War, and that ſhe had ſome other Deſign, ſince ſhe would not hazard her Forces; and indeed Noromanta's Father, who was with that Queen, did one day write, that he heard her ſay, She had rather loſe the Kingdom of the Iſſedons, than her Army: However, ſend what Orders ſhe would, Agatherſes was reſolved to give Battel as ſoon as Winter was done, or elſe to force Ariantes into Iſſedon. But Winter being very long in that Country, he muſt endure a long Torment; yet it was ſome conſolation unto him to hear from Spargapiſes his Envoy, that the Reports in Iſſedon was, Elibeſis would not marry Ariantes until the end of the War. But ſince the Paſſion of his Soul was ſuch as uſeth ordinarily to inſpire him with Thoughts quite oppoſite unto one another, he would ſome days wiſh that Ariantes had married Elibeſis: Yes, Anabaris, (ſaid he one day unto me) I ſwear unto you by all the Gods, that if I were ſure to vanquiſh Ariantes to morrow, I would have him marry Elibeſis to day; for it would be the greateſt delight in the World unto me, to ſee a Scepter fall out of the Hand of this perfidious Woman; and my Revenge would not be to the full, if the fall of Ariantes's Throne did overwhelm only himſelf; and if I did not ſee Elibeſis a Queen without a Crown; or to ſay better, the Widow of a vanquiſhed Uſurper, and by conſequence without Honour, without Rank, and without Support, in neceſſity to have recourſe unto me, to obtain for her ſome ſmall Corner in that Kingdom which ſhe hopes to poſſeſs. Should you ever ſee her in ſuch a deplorable condition, (ſaid I unto him) I am confident your Joys would be mixed with much pity. Fie, Anabaris, (ſaid he unto me) I cannot pity thoſe who cannot pity me; and as my Miſeries never moved Elibeſis, ſo hers ſhall never move me; or if they do, it ſhall be only out of meer generoſity, and out of my ſatisfaction to let her know, that ſuch a Subject as my ſelf does better merit her Affection, than ſuch a Soveraign as Ariantes.

In the mean time, Noromanta, in obſervance of her Husband's Orders, did ſpeak unto Agatherſes, according as he deſired her; but ſince he ſeemed to be in love with her, he thought fit to anſwer her in ambiguous Terms, though he did intend to do what he could to releaſe Sitalces. And ſince he would have her think him to be really her Lover, to the end, that ſhe being firſt deceived, others alſo might be the ſooner; he told her very wittily, that her Deſires of ſeeing Sitalces releaſed, had blinded her, ſince ſhe made ſuch Propoſitions as were diſhonorable to him: For truly (ſaid he) if it ſhould be known you offer ſo much for his Liberty, it would be thought, that his ſide did not much value him; and therefore it is requiſite to manage his Honour a little better, and give Ariantes time to adviſe upon it; for his Anſwer was not ſo clear, but that it was requiſite to ſend a ſecond time unto him, without making any new Propoſitions: Therefore, Madam, have a little patience, and let Time bring that Deſign to paſs, which perhaps would be ruined with haſte.

This, Sir, was the Anſwer which Agatherſes gave her, who being glad of a pretence to ſend again unto Iſſedon, that he might hear News of Elibeſis, and publiſh it, that he was in Love with Noromanta, he moved Spargapiſes to ſend thither the ſecond time: So that Noromanta writ unto Sitalces all that Agatherſes ſaid unto her. Adonacris alſo anſwered Argiriſpe, and wiſhed her to be wary in her Offers for his Liberty, becauſe if things changed not, he had an infallible way of getting his Liberty, which now he could not write. In the mean time, whilſt theſe Deſigns, which had ſo many ſecret Obſtacles, were in agitation, Adonacris was very vigilant, to take all opportunities of ſeeing and talking with Noromanta, who, for his part, ſhunned him as much as ſhe could, though ſhe did very tenderly love him. But when chance only brought them together, and when Adonacris could not ſuſpect that ſhe gave him any opportunities of talking with her, then ſhe could not chuſe but be much joyed, and take great delight in hearing him talk to her; yet theſe Delights and Joys, had ſome Bitter mixed with their Sweets, for ſhe was ſo extreamly careful of being over-obliging in her Language, that ſhe ſo ſtifled the thoughts of her Heart, as put him into a cruel qualm, ſhe was ſo fearful it ſhould be known, that he did, and ſtill doth love her, as ſhe oftentimes did contradict the moſt juſt things; and if he at any time did hold an Argument with another, ſhe would alwayes take his adverſe part; ſo ſcrupulous and careful was this vertuous Lady of her Reputation; Yet Adonacris knew very well, that whenſoever ſhe was oppoſite to him, She did it not out of hatred. But as the great prudence of Noromanta did deprive him of an hundred innocent Delights, in depriving him of all private Conference with her; ſo he chanced one day to argue againſt Eliorante in the preſence of Noromanta, upon a Subject, which obliquely had ſome coherence with the Adventure which grieved him: For be pleaſed to know, that there were two Ladies in Tipanis, whoſe Vertues and Reputations were very different: For one, whoſe Name was Menopea, was poſſeſſed with moſt violent Paſſion in her Heart, and ſecretly held correſpondencies of Gallantry with a very bravely accompliſhed Man; but ſhe carried her ſelf with ſo much prudence, ſuch ſtrict reſervedneſs, and ſo modeſtly, that except very few who knew the truth, all the World thought Menopea to be the moſt vertuous Perſon upon Earth, and the leaſt capable of any correſpondencies of Gallantry with any one. There was alſo another Lady, whoſe Name was Orique, who was as really vertuous as ever any was, yet extreamly expoſed to Scandal, becauſe ſhe had a conceipt, that it was ſufficient to be vertuous without ſeeming ſo. So that being only cautious leſt any of her Actions ſhould be eſſentially ill, and never caring for appearances, by which the World in general uſeth to judg, ſhe expoſed her Reputation unto ſo much Slander and Envy, that all the Town (except a few who knew her very well) did think that all Men were her Lovers, yes, her favoured Lovers. Thus ſhe, who was the Gallant, paſſed for Severe and Vertuous, and ſhe who was the Vertuous, paſſed for the Gallant, and ſeemed to do many things againſt the Rule of Vertue.

Falling then into diſcourſe of theſe two Ladies, whom ſo few did rightly know; Eliorante, Noromanta, and Adonacris being together, and Agatherſes coming alſo in, Noromanta began to blame that vertuous Lady, who truſted too much unto her own Goodneſs, and who was not enough obſervant over her Actions. I could never have thought (ſaid Adonacris, and ſmiled) that of two Perſons, the one only ſeeming Vertuous, and not being ſo; the other being Vertuous, and not ſeeming ſo, that the fair Noromanta would take her part who was not vertuous. I do not take her part, replied Noromanta, and yet I am againſt her who is Vertuous, and is not careful of ſeeming ſo alſo: For, truly if a Woman love not her Reputation, I cannot be well ſatisfied with her Vertue, nor know I well whether ſhe truly merits the name of Vertuous: It is moſt dangerous to ſubject ones ſelf unto cenſure, and I will maintain, that though one be not vertuous, yet they ought at leaſt to endeavour to appear ſo, and much more ſhe who really is vertuous. For my part, replied Adonacris, I am perſwaded it is ſufficent if one do nothing againſt Vertue, and one needs not to inſiſt ſo preciſely npon endeavours to take away all manner of pretences of ſlander: for as thoſe who are moſt aſſiduous in frequenting Sacred Duties, are often accuſed of Hypocriſy; ſo it muſt be concluded a thing impoſſible to prevent all ſcandal and cenſure: And ſo ſince malicious and envious People will be talking and belching out their venome, do what one can, it were a piece of unjuſtice unto ones ſelf to be all their life long rigid and ſevere, for fear of being talk'd of: Much better it is, to let ones mind ſore above all that Malice can ſay, than to ſtand eternally upon a watchful guard againſt all Tongues. For my particular (ſaid Agatherſes then) I think Adonacris to be in the right: For to carry ones ſelf ſo, as nothing can be ſaid againſt them, is a thing almoſt impoſſible: And indeed, we ſee every day, that one and the ſame Action is both commended and condemned, according to the ſeveral Humours of Men; and to juſtify what Adonacris hath ſaid, Hypocriſy is commonly called Piety. They do ill who do ſo, ſaid Noromanta, and interrupted him: But for all that, what is good muſt appear ſo, and ill Habits ought to be concealed. Your Opinion is ſo reaſonable, ſaid Eliorante, I cannot believe any is able to contradict it. Yet I ſhall, Madam, replied Agatherſes; for there is nothing worſe becomes an heroique Soul, than to ſtudy how the World ſhould ſee all their good Qualities; yet, according to your Tenents, a Man muſt never do any brave Action, but firſt he muſt call for ſome Witneſſes unto it; he muſt never be liberal but in publique, and he muſt do all the good he can, only becauſe People muſt know it, and talk of it. No, no, replied Normanta, you put an ill Expoſition upon my words. How then muſt I expound them, replied he? To underſtand me rightly, anſwered ſhe, I would not have any do good with a deſign it ſhould be known; but in things which may reflect upon ones Reputation, I would have one never to do any thing which may ſtain it: For example, I would have a Man ſo regulate his Life, as none can think but that he is Valiant: I would have a Woman live ſo prudently, that none can ſuſpect her Vertue; and not to content themſelves only with being vertuous, but be careful to avoid all things which may make her believed otherwiſe. Alas, Madam, ſaid Adonacris, your Rule is moſt ſevere, for all the pleaſure of Life conſiſts in ſuch things as may be ill interpreted according to ſeveral Humours. I do confeſs it, ſaid ſhe; but ſince they cannot be done without hazarding Reputation, I will affirm, that the Sorrow for loſing it, is greater than all the Delights that can be found. But, Madam, (replied Agatherſes pleaſantly) you muſt do nothing as long as you live, but in your Chamber; nay, I know not whether ſuch a Retreat would not be alſo ſubject unto Scandal; for it would be ſaid, that you would never live ſo, but becauſe Sitalces would otherwiſe be jealous. 'Tis true, ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled, but they would then ſay, that I did not give him any cauſe of Jealouſy. By your Rules, added Agatherſes, a Lady muſt carefully avoid all private Conference with Men, whom others think do love her; She muſt never walk under a hundred Women at once, and in a Garden be always in the throng of Company, and never go aſide to talk with any Friend about any Buſineſs; She muſt always talk aloud, and never talk of the Beauties of the Time, or of Shadows, or Walks, leſt it ſhould be thought you talk as if you were in Love; certainly ſhe muſt talk more with Men ſhe hates, than with Man ſhe loves, leſt otherwiſe ſhe ſhould be ſcandalized: So a Lady who is ſo chary of her Reputation, muſt live ever without any Friends of either Sex, leſt it ſhould be ſaid, they are either her Lovers, or her Confidents. None of all this, replied ſhe, for I allow her Friends of both Sexes; but I would have a Wife live ſo, as none can accuſe her of having any favoured Lovers; and therefore as ſoon as ever a Lady knows that any Man is in love with her, ſhe muſt carefully avoid both ſaying or doing any thing, that he may take any advantage to himſelf by it, but live ſo reſervedly, that none can ſo much as ſuſpect her favourable to him; and to avoid all occaſions of his ſpeaking to her, leſt it ſhould be thought he ſpeaks of his Love: For my part, I who am as little apt to ſlander as another, muſt confeſs, that I cannot ſee a Lover hold long diſcourſe with his Miſtreſs, but I muſt needs think, he is talking neither of State Affairs, nor Martial Matters. So that ſince ſhe may draw a great inconveniency upon her ſelf, for a little Pleaſure, I muſt conclude, ſhe ought never to run the hazard of it. To inſtance in the fair Orique, for an Example. All the World knows that ſhe is moſt horribly ſlandered with keeping private conference with a Gallant in a Garden; yet I do know, of a moſt infallible certainty, that all the while he was with her, he only related his Affection that he bore unto a Lady who was with Thomiris. Do you think that the pleaſure of the Story did merit the hazard of her Reputation, in paſſing away a whole Afternoon with a Man whom ſhe loved not? I muſt confeſs, ſaid Adonacris then, that ſince Orique did not love the Man, and ſince he had nothing to ſay unto her which concerned her ſelf, ſhe had better to have let that meeting alone.

But ſtill I muſt ſay, that when a Woman eſteems a Man in an extraordinary manner, it were weakneſs in her to deprive her ſelf of the pleaſure of talking in ſecret, only becauſe perhaps ſhe may be talked of, and it's enough if ſhe do nothing againſt the Laws of Vertue; for if ſhe do love very well the pleaſure of free Diſcourſe with him ſhe loves, 'twill be above the talk of ſpiteful Tongues. One that hears you talk, would ſay, replied Noromanta, that you do not value Honour, and that you do not underſtand the Sorrows of ſuch as are injuriouſly diſhonoured; yet I aſſure you, there is nothing more hard to be endured, than Slander, when it reflects upon ones Honour; as that which reflects upon ones Wit or Beauty. I am one who of all the World am leaſt concerned; for truly ſhould they ſay of me that I am Simple, or Ugly, it would not anger me at all; but ſhould they ſay of me, that I was addicted to Gallantry, and a Goſſiper, this would moſt ſenſibly grieve me, nor could I endure to be the Subject of any Injurious Raillery. To live after your mode, (replied Agatherſes) were to live more unto others than themſelves. It ſeems (replied Noromanta, and laughed) that in all your Actions you would ſtrive only to pleaſe your ſelf, without any ſatisfaction unto others. Since others care not for contenting me (replied he) I never trouble my mind with contenting others; for ſetting the intereſt of her I love aſide, and the intereſt of my Friends, which is ever dearer unto me than my own, neither thoſe who are above me, nor thoſe who are below me, ſhall ever hinder me from doing what I have a deſire to do, provided it be but honeſt; and it is the greateſt folly in the World to do every thing according to the fancy of all our acquaintance; for Courtiers and Citizens ſee things with different Eyes, old Men and Young the like, Melancholy and Merry Men are of ſeveral minds: Such as we call Libertines, and pious People, have thoughts quite contrary; Women who are fair, and ſuch as are ill-favoured, have often very various thoughts. So that whoſoever will content all ſorts of People at once, will certainly ſpend their time to very ill purpoſe. For my particular, replied Noromanta, I ſhould ſpend it much to worſe purpoſe, if all theſe ſorts of People you ſpeak of ſhould unite themſelves to wound my Reputation, as doubtleſs they would, ſhould I give them cauſe; for certainly there is a kind of Malignity that raigns in the Minds of all the World in general, which makes them apt to interpret in an ill ſenſe, all things that may receive an Expoſition of that Nature: But, Madam, replied Adonacris, what hurt doth any ill expoſition of any of your Actions do you, when it is ſpoken out of your preſence, and never to your Face? Though I ſhould have no other Grief, replied ſhe, but to think that People will ſay the worſt they can of me; and to think they will ſay of me as they do of others, it were enough to blaſt all the Pleaſures I ſhould take in the preſence of that Perſon I loved beſt in the World: However, ſaid Agatherſes, Do we live for others, and not for our ſelves? Yes ſure, for our ſelves in the firſt place; if ſo, why are we not contented with the ſecret Teſtimony of our own Conſciences, and never torment our ſelves at any People who love us not, nor eſteem us, nor whom we know not, let them think or ſay what they will? The reaſon why I will live as I do intend to do, replied Noromanta, is, becauſe we are to live for our ſelves; for it is the ſtrangeſt thing in the World, that one ſhould loſe their Reputation without a Cauſe; and my Humour is ſuch, that I would ſooner pardon the Misbehaviour of a Perſon, whoſe Manners are really irregular, than I would the Misbehaviour of one who is Vertuous; and truly I cannot conceive why one ſhould manage their Reputations careleſly, when they know they deſerve well, nor why one ſhould not take a little pains to appear ſo, ſince it is eaſy to be done, and dangerous not to be done.

Though you ſhould appear never ſo good, (replied Agatherſes) yet all Appearances are no Armor againſt Slander: For, as you know by experience, that Menopea with all her vertuous Appearances, yet is not ſo: So I could ſay, if I would, that all your Actions are but Diſſimulations, and that I know ſome things which do give all your Actions the lie. When I have done all I can (replied ſhe) I cannot chide my ſelf if my Reputation be ſcandalized, nor ſhall I be expoſed unto a thouſand Dangers, as thoſe are, who think themſelves above all that can be ſaid or thought; for thoſe who deſpiſe the Thoughts of others, will in time come to deſpiſe the Thoughts of themſelves: However, I muſt tell you, Madam, (replied Agathoſes) your Life will be extreamly tedious to you, if you ſhould live always in a conſtrained courſe. The Example of Menopea and Orique do clearly ſhew it unto you,for though Menopea doth both love, and is beloved ; and by conſequence enjoys all that is requiſite to make the happieſt Perſon in the World, and enjoys all imaginable Pleaſures, yet her cloſe reſervedneſs, which ſhe obſerves to hide her correſpondency with her Lover, doth daily bring a thouſand Inconveniencies upon her, for ſhe dares neither look nor ſpeak unto her Lover, but with moſt intolerable Precaution ; and as ſhe lives, I am confident that ſhe has not one hour of a thouſand which is abſolutely agreeable unto her wiſh ; but on the contrary, Menopea, though not in Love, nor in any particular Correſpondency with any, yet ſhe lives the moſt pleaſant Life in the World, only becauſe what ſhe does, ſhe does without conſtraint. If you be more a Lover of your Liberty than your Glory, replied Noromanta, you then had good reaſon for what you ſay ; but for my part, ſince I value my Honour above my Liberty, I have good reaſon for what I ſay, and to maintain that a Woman who cares not for her Reputation, but is contented with the eſteem of her ſelf, not valuing the eſteem of others ; She does deeply expoſe her ſelf to do things againſt Vertue, more than one who ſets a price upon her Honour. Truly, Madam, ſaid Agatherſes, you would have our Ladies more reſerved than ſome of our Goddeſſes, for I would have you not ſpeak thus againſt the Reverence which is due unto the Gods, (replied Noromanta, not giving him time to tell on) and if it be poſſible, leave off that ill cuſtom of uſing the name of the Gods always to juſtify every trifle : I had rather you would ſwear by Agatherſes and by Eliorante, ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled, then by Mars, and by Hercules, were I of the opinion which many of our young Court Gallants are, who ſcarcely think they were ever Men, much leſs Gods : For ought I ſee, Madam, (replied Agatherſes, and ſmiled alſo) you think me an abſolute Libertine : No, replied ſhe, for if I did think you ſo, I promiſe you you ſhould not be any Friend of mine ; but I blame you, and with reaſon, for accuſtoming your ſelf unto an ill habit of ſpeaking over-ſight-ſlightly and irreverently of things in our Religion; yet truly in my opinion the Argument is but weak, to ſay we ought to believe no further than we underſtand, ſince there are a thouſand things in nature we cannot comprehend. I have heard ſay, that Cræſus, amongſt his Rarities, had a Stone, which made thoſe who wore it inviſible: Yet it is a much harder matter to believe what is ſaid concerning the Power of our Gods, than what is related concerning the Vertue of this wonder the Heliotrope. Commonly thoſe who jeſt moſt at ſacred things, do but imperfectly know what it is which hardens the Hail, and whitens the Snow; nor know they at all what that boyſterous Wind is which often diſroots the ſturdieſt Oaks (though it touches them, and ſometimes blows them over) yet theſe Men muſt be prying and medling with the Cabinet-ſecrets of Eternity, they will be Reformers of the beſt eſtabliſhed Religions, and out of their capricious fond Fancies, deſtroy all the Temples and Altars of the World; and all this, becauſe not believing that there is a God, they think all that pleaſeth them is permittable: But as for you Agatherſes (added Noromanta) whoſe Manners are both innocent and virtuous, and who is not of their opinion, who think that the Gods do neither puniſh nor reward, only becauſe they may live in more Liberty; I adviſe you as a Friend, not to be carried away with the ill Cuſtoms of the World. Your Zeal, Madam, replied Agatherſes, makes you ſo eloquent, that I cannot tell how to deny you, but will promiſe you, (moſt charming Noromanta) that I will do as much as I can to believe, that Mars is jealous, that Vulcan is a Cuckold, and that Venus did equally delude them both.

As Agatherſes ſaid ſo, the young Spargapiſes entred, who broke off this diſcourſe, and hindred Noromanta from anſwering Agatherſes. But ſince he ſtayed not long with Eliorante, he carried Agatherſes with him, and Fortune was ſo favourable unto Adonacris, that one having ſome buſineſs with Eliorante, ſhe went into her Cloſet, and deſired Noromanta as her intimate Friend, to entertain Adonacris until ſhe returned. At the firſt Noromanta told her, that ſhe deſired her Excuſe, becauſe ſhe was to be gone her ſelf; but ſhe ſaid this in ſuch a faint manner, that Eliorante imagining ſhe had no Reaſons which really induced her to be gone ſo ſoon, did tell with all freedom of Friendſhip, that ſhe would not bid her adieu, and that if ſhe found her not with Adonacris at her Return, ſhe would quarrel with her: So that Noromanta, who indeed could not part from Adonacris without Sorrow, ſhe had not power to deny Eliorante, who not ſtaying for her Anſwer, went unto her Cloſet, and left her alone with her Lover. But Eliorante had no ſooner left them, but Adonacris began diſcourſe.

I wonder, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, and ſmiled) that you will not rather venture a Quarrel with Eliorante, than ſtay with a Man who infinitely adores you: Certain I ſhould do ſo, (replied ſhe, and both ſmiled and bluſh'd) if I did not fear Eliorante would conceive ſome ſuch thing if I ſhould quit you. Oh, Madam, ſaid Adonacris, as long as your care of your Glory obligeth you to things of this nature, I ſhall never murmur: But, Madam, ſaid he (and aſſumed a moſt ſerious Aſpect) to loſe no more of this precious time, but to ſpeak more ſeriouſly, I beſeech you, why are you ſo reſolute of my Baniſhment by your getting my Releaſe? Alas, Sitalces will ſee you all the Days of his Life; but I, Heavens know, perhaps ſhall never ſee you again after I am releaſed: Allow then, Madam, of a thing which Fortune hath brought to paſs without your Conſent, for truly, Madam, you ſhall not releaſe me ſo ſoon as you imagine: Therefore I beſeech you, let me not have any cauſe to complain againſt you for any rigour as long as I am with you; I deſire only to ſee you, and talk to you when none hears but your ſelf, do not anſwer me if you pleaſe, and let me only tell you that I did love you, and not that I do ſo ſtill. Since I can talk this day unto you (ſaid ſhe unto him) and not upbraid my ſelf for giving you any occaſion, I will conſent unto your Deſires; but Adonacris it ſhall be ſtill to tell you the ſame things over again, and to aſſure you, that ſince I cannot baniſh you from my Heart, I will do what I can to baniſh you from Tipanis. Since I hope, Madam, replied Adonacris, that Fortune will be more favourable unto me than you are, and not baniſh me ſo ſoon, I am contented you ſhould continue your Solicitations for the Liberty of Sitalces, and by conſequence for mine: But, Madam, that which I do requeſt, and requeſt with abundance of Zeal, is, that you will be pleaſed as long as I ſtay here, to let me talk to you, and ſee you often. I do allow it but too much (ſaid ſhe unto him) and if you did but know how I chide my ſelf for my indulgency towards you ——— Alas, Madam, (ſaid Adonacris and interrupted her) if you call your Behaviour to me indulgency, I wonder what you will call your Rigour? What I do (replied ſhe) is certainly more than I ought to do; for truly Adonacris, that Affection which might have been innocent at Iſſedon, is now become vicious at Tipanis, that I am now more faulty in ſuffering you to love me, than I was before in loving you: And truly I intend (added ſhe and ſighed) to conjure both you and my ſelf to do ſo no more; but Adonacris, I muſt confeſs, I know not whether I have power to execute my Intentions.

As he was going to reply, Eliorante returned, who gave Noromanta as many Thanks for ſtaying there, as Adonacris did unto her in his Heart for ſtaying her. The truth is, her ſo ſoon return did a little take off the good Offices ſhe had done him, and as he had a deſire to thank her, ſo had he alſo to complain againſt her. But, Sir, whilſt theſe things paſſed at Tipanis, other Accidents fell out at Iſſedon, which put new Faces upon things: For be pleaſed to know, that when Adonacris was taken Priſoner, he thought, as I told you before, that all his Baggage was plundred by the Souldiers: So that though he was very ſorry for the loſs of his dear Noromanta's Letters which he valued above his moſt precious Jewels; yet he hoped, that they would be loſt unto all the World, as well as unto himſelf; and that thoſe who plundred the Baggage would never trouble themſelves with ſuch trifles as would not be worth any thing unto them, but would either tear or burn them: So that though they were never like to be any comfort unto him, yet at leaſt they would never hurt him. But Fortune did otherwiſe diſpoſe of them, and cauſed unhappily for him, that one of his Servants who was moſt zealouſly devoted unto his Service, who ſeeing the Army routed, and Baggage like to be loſt, reſolved to get his Maſters things into ſome Safety, and to execute his Deſign, he ſaved the Carriage, by ſeeming to be of the other ſide: Yet as ſoon as Night was come, he fell extreamly ſick, and the Inhabitants of the Town where he quartered, did pillage him of all he had, and left him nothing conſiderable, but a little Cabinet of a Fiſhes-Skin, which was both handſom and rich, and in which was Noromanta's Letters.

This Servant after his recovery, believed that ſince he was much nearer Iſſedon than Tipanis, it was beſt for him to go thither, and ask Argiriſpe what ſervice ſhe would command him, and whether he ſhould return to his Maſter, or take ſome other courſe? This Deſign of his being very reaſonable, he did execute it, and returned to Iſſedon; and to let Argiriſpe ſee his Fidelity, he ſhewed this Cabinet unto her, not knowing what was within it; and it is to be ſuppoſed, that thoſe who ſtole all the Baggage from this Servant, finding this Cabinet to be but little and light, and thinking no matter of Money in it, did either ſlight or forget it, as a thing of no worth. But, Sir, as it is the nature of all jealous Perſons generally to be full of Curioſity, though there be no reaſon for any jealouſy in the World: So Argiriſpe had a ſtrong natural Inclination to open this Cabinet, and to read theſe Letters, yet not knowing any reaſon why: And indeed, I have heard one of her Friends ſay, that ſhe never was in the Chamber of any one whom ſhe viſited, but if ſhe were alone, and found any Letters upon the Table, ſhe would open them, or at the leaſt had a great deſire unto it: You may eaſily imagine then, Sir, conſidering the humour of Argiriſpe, as I have deſcribed it, that ſhe could not ſee this Cabinet, but needs muſt open it. But, Sir, the worſt was Sitalces, whom I told you, was a frequent Viſiter of Argiripſe, was then preſent with her, and ſhe being naturally of an impatient Temper, ſhe opened this Cabinet in his preſence, and he who opened it, being forced to uſe ſome ſtrength unto it, it broke all in pieces, and the Letters opened in falling out, and one of them falling unhappily upon Sitalces, he took it up to preſent it unto Argiriſpe, not thinking it was from his Wiſe: But he was ſtrangely ſurprized when he ſaw the Superſcription, and knew it to be the Hand of Noromanta, his diſorder was ſuch, that altering his Intention of giving it unto Argiriſpe, he now deſigned to keep it, though he knew not any handſom pretence for it.

But Argiriſpe ſaved him the labour of ſeeking out for an excuſe, for ſhe ſeeing and knowing the Hand, was alſo much ſurprized, and Jealouſy beginning to rouze up her Heart, ſhe was as full of Curioſity as Sitalces: I never knew (ſaid ſhe unto him) that ever there was any ſuch intimacy between Noromanta and Adonacris, as to write Letters unto each other, but I believe, Sir, you know more than I do. Sitalces hearing Argiriſpe ſay ſo, was much puzled for an Anſwer, but at laſt did ingenuouſly confeſs, that he was as ignorant as her ſelf of any Letters that Noromanta writ unto Adonacris, but he ſpoke with ſuch trembling of Heart, that he ſcarce knew what he ſaid. But in concluſion, theſe two jealous Perſons agreed to read theſe Letters, and to ſee of what Nature they were: For truly, Sir, ſaid Argiriſpe, ſince theſe Letters were written by your Wiſe, it is but juſt you ſhould ſee them, and juſt alſo, that ſince they were written unto my Husband that I ſee them. But, Sir, I beſeech you admire a little at the oddneſs of Deſtiny in this Buſineſs, and to add unto your wonder, be pleaſed to know, that though all Noromanta's Letters were only Matters of Civility, yet they are ſo indited, as if they had ſome Characters of Love in them. Moreover, they were not dated, ſo that Sitalces and Argiriſpe knew not whether they were writ beſore, or after their Marriages: So that by this means Sitalces and Argiriſpe thought that they had matter of Accuſation enough againſt Noromanta. But to return from whence I digreſſed, Argiriſpe and Sitalces beginning to read them, with ſuch Reſentments, as you may well imagine: The firſt Letter was thus indited.

NORO-

NOROMANTA unto ADONACRIS.

SIR,

IT ſeems I am not ſo ſincere as you are, for I would not that you ſhould be able to divine my Thoughts, as you ſeem to deſire I ſhould yours; yet do not think that I do entertain any which are diſadvantagious to you, nor any which are much to your advantage; but I am of an humour, which perſwades me to let none have ſo much power over me, as I my ſelf have: But be contented with ſo much as I do give you, and without diving into my Thoughts, let it ſuffice, I give you leave to interpret all my Words in the moſt obliging Senſe you can.

NOROMANTA.

Though this Letter was indeed only civil and gallant, yet it ſo netled the Soul of Sitalces, that it turned it all at once into Jealouſy, Hatred, and Fury; nor did it move leſs Diſorder in the Soul of Argiriſpe, when ſhe read another Letter, which if my Memory fail not, contained theſe Words.

NOROMANTA unto ADONACRIS.

SIR,

COuld I write that I do conſent you ſhould love me, and not tacitly tell you at the ſame time, that I do love you, doubtleſs I ſhould do it: But ſince my Permiſſion may be interpreted ſo, I will not allow it; all the Favour you ſhall receive from me, is this, That I do leave you at liberty to love me, or not to love me, as you pleaſe, without any permittance or forbiddance from

NOROMANTA.

After the reading of this Letter, Argiriſpe looked upon Sitalces, and ſaw his Thoughts ſo well in his Eyes, that ſhe thought it unneceſſary to ask him. I underſtood ſince by a Woman who was with her, and who ſtood in a Corner of the Chamber during all the Conference which ſhe had with Sitalces, that both of their Countenances changed, their Eyes were ſo full of Fury, and their Souls ſo troubled that it was eaſy to ſee their Hearts were diſordered with more than one Paſſion. I ſhall not trouble you, Sir, with a Relation of what they ſaid unto each other, tho this Woman made an exact Relation of all unto me; for indeed their Conference was ſo full of Anger and Fury, that it would be no great pleaſure unto you to hear it: However, they read all Noromanta's Letters, and tho they found none more engaging than theſe two which I have already related, yet they drew out of them very vexatious Conſequences. As for Sitalces, he told Argiriſpe in the heat of his tranſport, that knowing Noromanta ſo well as he did, he took all theſe her Civilities to be ſo many ſigns of Love: And Agiriſpe alſo told Sitalces, that knowing her Husbands Diſcretion ſo well as ſhe did, ſhe was ſure he had burned the moſt obliging of Noromatan's Letters, and kept only ſuch as were moſt indifferent: Sometimes they concurred in their opinions of Things, and ſometimes again they differed, and their exceſs of vexation made them ſometimes jar with one another; and indeed Argiriſpe did almoſt down-right tell Sitalces, that his Wife had ſtollen the Heart of her Husband from her, becauſe he had not merit enough to get hers: And Sitalces told Argiriſpe, that Adonacris would never have loved Noromanta, but becauſe he did not think his own Wife amiable: Yet ſince their Intereſt were alike, and ſince they were both wholly bent upon Revenge; after the heat of Fury was a little cooled, they agreed to make thoſe two Perſons miſerable who cauſed their Sorrows. And at laſt they began to conſider why Ariantes ſhould make ſuch a difficulty in accepting upon the Exchange which they had propounded, to conſider the ſlight Sorrows which Adonacris expreſſed in his Letters at his not being releaſed; and thereupon concluding, that it was Adonacris who had writ unto his Siſter to retard his Releaſement; and afterwards concluded, that Noromanta was of the Plot, and conſented unto it, and that Adonacris and ſhe did ſpend whole Days together in laughing and mocking at their Sorrows, and at all the pains they have taken to procure the Exchange. Sitalces for his particular, did not now doubt of the reaſon why Agatherſes did not ſollicit Spargapiſes to make any large Offers unto the Prince Ariantes for his Exchange, for he knew it was his Wife who hindred him, and who did not negotiate as he deſired her: And Argiriſpe alſo believed, that the reaſon why her Husband ſent her word not to offer any thing for his releaſment, becauſe he knew an infallible way to procure it, that the reaſon was, becauſe he deſired not to be at Liberty: So that both of them being in one Mind, there was no violent Courſe which they did not both of them reſolve upon. And after they had well examined what courſe to take, they concluded it beſt to let Adonacris and Noromanta know that they were not ignorant of their Affections; and to drive the Nail ſo home, that this their Intimation to them ſhould oblige them to remove thoſe Obſtacles which hindred their Exchange, reſolving after this to proceed further when they ſhould ſee their Anſwers. So that the ſecond Meſſenger from Spargapiſes being ready to depart from Iſſedon, without doing any thing more than at firſt time they writ by him. But, Sir, I forget to tell you that ſince this Meſſenger from Agatherſes, had private Orders from his Maſter to publiſh at Iſſedon, How it was reported in Tipanis, that Agatherſes was in love with Noromanta, to the end Elibeſis might know it; ſo it chanced that the poor Sitalces came to the knowledg of it alſo: So that believing then his Wife had two Lovers in one place in lieu of one, he was in a moſt miſerable Condition: But tho this was very ſad News unto him, yet it was not ſo unto the Prince Ariantes, but on the contrary, he much rejoyced at it; and thinking it to conduce much unto his Advantage that Elibeſis ſhould know it, he made her a Viſit, purpoſely to acquaint her with it. But, Sir, his Deſign did not hit ſo happily as he hoped, for Elibeſis could not hear that Agatherſes had left loving her, and that he loved another without abundance of Grief; and Ariantes told it unto her in ſuch a ſurprizing Manner, that he plainly perceived how this new Paſſion of Agatherſes did trouble her; and not being able to forbear ſome Expreſſions of his Thoughts: If I ſhould believe your Eyes, Madam (ſaid he unto her) I ſhould think that your loſs of Agatherſes his Heart doth as much trouble you, as if I had loſt a Battel, or as if you had loſt a Crown: If my Eyes have diſcovered any Sorrow unto you (replied Elibeſis wittily, and bluſht) they have very ill interpreted the Thoughts of my Heart, ſince I aſſure you Agatherſes hath not any ſhare in them: But I muſt confeſs, that ſince I do not love Noromanta, I am not very glad, that a Man whom heretofore I have communicated ſo much unto, ſhould now go and tattle all our paſſages unto her: Yet, Madam, (replied Ariantes) I could never diſcover the leaſt falling out betwixt you and Noromanta all the while ſhe was here: 'Tis true (replied Elibeſis, a little non-pluſt) there was no viſible Quarrel between us: But, Sir, (added ſhe with a marvellous Vivacity of Spirit) when two are near of the ſame Age, of the ſame Quality, pretend unto the ſame Eſteem, and the ſame Commendations, and when they are neither old nor ugly, it is not a queſtion to be asked, Whether there be any Quarrels between two ſuch? For though they live together in all Civility, yet believe it, Sir, if you look well into their Hearts, you will find but little Friendſhip there to each other: Oh, Madam (ſaid Ariantes in looking fixedly upon her) your Cares to perſwade me that you are capable of Envy, makes me ſuſpicious: I am fearful to diſcover, that all your Affections are upon Agatherſes, and that you only held me in hand out of Ambition: Truly, Madam, I conceive it not juſt, that ſince I became a Rebel unto Thomiris, only out of love to you, ſince I began a War, only to Crown you, that I ſhould loſe your Eſteem by loſing a Battel, and that if I ſhould loſe a Crown, to loſe alſo all hopes of enjoying you: I beſeech you, Madam, ſince Agatherſes does not now love you, but loves another, let me have the happineſs to poſſeſs his room: Be not ſo unjuſt, as to love him who loves not you, and not to love a Prince, who loves you more than himſelf. I have already told you, Sir, (replied ſhe) that Agatherſes hath no ſhare in that Anger which my Eyes againſt my Will diſcover unto you; but to ſtop all your Complaints, let me tell you, that if you had told me Agatherſes had been in love with any other than Noromanta; you ſhould have ſeen leſs diſorder in my Looks. I wiſh I could believe you, Madam, (replied he) but if I be not much miſtaken, I do rightly underſtand the language of your Eyes, and unleſs you give me ſome more obliging language than yet you have, but will ſtill perſwade me that I am not loved, I ſhall give over all Matters of War, and ſtrive no longer to crown a Perſon, who grieves more for a Slave that hath broke his Chains, than for me, who hazards my Life to ſet her upon a Throne. Truly, Sir, (replied Elibeſis craftily, whoſe Ambition revived in her Heart) you are moſt ſtrangely earneſt: But ſince it is fit I ſatisfy you, I will acquaint you with the true cauſe of all the Sorrow you ſee in my Eyes, though I ſhall hardly do it without a bluſh; for truly, Sir, ſince you will needs have me confeſs the truth, I muſt tell you, that I cannot hear of Agatherſes his ceaſing to love me, but I muſt needs think that perhaps the Prince Ariantes will one day do the like, and conſequently muſt extreamly grieve at the very thought of it; and judg, I beſeech you, if I have not good cauſe for it. Your language, Madam, is ſo favourable (replied Ariantes) that I had rather accuſe your Eyes of an untruth, than not to believe you, and, Madam, I had rather believe what pleaſeth me, than what grieveth me, though I be deceived by it. However, ſay what Elibeſis would unto Ariantes, yet ſhe was extreamly vexed that Agatherſes did not love her, and her hopes of his being one day her Subject, did not countervail her Sorrows for his not being her Slave, though then ſhe had no Intentions of making him happy. But whilſt Elibeſis had more Thoughts than ſhe was able to miſtreſs, and whilſt both Love and Ambition did tear her in pieces almoſt with equal Violence, ſhe knew not that Agatherſes in counterfeiting not to love her, did yet love her with extream Zeal, and he ſuffered more in loving her, than ſhe could do in thinking he did not. But as great as her Sufferings were, they were but ſmall, in compariſon of what Noromanta endured when ſhe received her Husband's Letter. And indeed, Sir, this Letter was writ in ſuch a cruel ſtile, as never did Letter contain more bitter Marks of extream Jealouſy and Anger, for he did not only hint unto her that he knew of the correſpondency with Adonacris; but he told her alſo in moſt tart Expreſſions, that ſhe hindred his Releaſement, purpoſely to be out of his ſight, and with Adonacris. After this, he mentioned ſomething concerning the pretended Love of Agatherſes, mixing ſometimes amongſt his injurious Hints, ſome Reſentments of Love, and ended his Letter with a Declaration, That if ſhe did not find out ſome ways that Adonacris might be within a few days at Iſſedon, and that he might return unto Tipanis, he would never ſee her again; but make it known to all the World, that the reaſon of it was becauſe ſhe loved Adonacris. You may judg, Sir, how this Letter troubled the virtuous Noromanta, and how a Perſon who loved her Glory with ſo much Paſſion, could not ſee her own in ſuch imminent Danger without extream Sorrow. Then did ſhe plainly ſee, that to be innocent was not enough to have Tranquillity of Mind, ſince though ſhe never did any thing againſt the Rules of Vertue, yet was ſhe extreamly troubled that her Husband ſhould ſuſpect her, and that he would publiſh her Suſpicions, and ruin her Reputation. But her greateſt torment was, that maugre all theſe unjuſt Aſperſions, ſhe ſtill loved Adonacris moſt tenderly, who for his part was as angry as Noromanta was grieved; for Argiriſpe in her Letter to him, did intimate, that ſhe knew of his Affection unto Noromanta, that ſhe had ſome Letters of that fair ones writing in her Hands, that ſhe believed him to be moſt tenderly loved, that ſhe thought he had been an Obſtacle unto all her Endeavours for his releaſe, and that he choſe rather to be a Priſoner with Noromanta, than at liberty with her; adding further a thouſand Inducements to repent of his Infidelity, and as many Menaces to be revenged upon Noromanta, for making Sitalces uſe her hardly, if he did not change his Mind. But that which moſt pinched him was, Argiriſpe intimated unto him, that Sitalces knew he loved his Wife, and that he had ſeen her Letters; for ſince he loved her in as Noble and Honourable a way as was poſſible, and ſince he was none of thoſe Lovers who care not for the Reputation of thoſe Perſons ſons whom they love, it grieved him to the Soul that Noromanta's Honour ſhould be brought in queſtion for his ſake: But that which put his Patience to the higheſt teſt was, that the vertuous Perſon who was ſo ſevere, and had carried her ſelf with ſuch cautious Reſervedneſs, when ſhe had none to ſatisfy but her ſelf, would not now ſo much as ſee him, when ſhe underſtood her Huſband knew of his Affection to her. Moreover, he feared that ſhe would moſt horribly hate him, becauſe her Letters had fallen into ſuch dangerous Hands; ſo that as pleaſing as the ſight of Noromanta was unto him, yet his Fears of ſeeing her incenſed againſt him, did fill him full of ſtrange Apprehenſions. On the other ſide, Agatherſes having received a Letter from one of his Friends at Iſſedon, which intimated unto him, how Elibeſis was extreamly angry when ſhe heard that he did not love her; he was as much joyed at this, as heretofore he had been, when ſhe gave him the greateſt Teſtimonies that his Affection pleaſed her. And indeed, as I came unto him the next Morning after he received this Letter, he no ſooner ſaw me, but coming towards me with a pleaſant Aſpect: Come my dear Anabaris (ſaid he unto me) I am now arrived at that point I would be, and have received the beſt news in the World: Is it (ſaid I again) that we ſhall ſhortly have Peace or Victory? No, no, replied he, I aſſure you neither Peace nor War have any ſhare in what I am about to tell you. It is only Matters of Love which I ſhall relate: Then aſſuredly, replied I, you will tell me that the Prince Ariantes is fallen out with his Miſtreſs, and Elibeſis is perſwaded, that the Crown which he would give her, is not comparable unto the Affection you bear unto her: No, ſaid he, but Elibeſis believes I love her not, and is vexed at it to the Heart. But, Sir, (ſaid I unto him) if her Anger ſhould turn unto Hatred, would you be ſo well pleaſed as you ſeem to be? If it ſhould, ſaid he, I know not what I ſhould be, but ſure I am, that it joys me much ſhe is angry, and I never took more pleaſure in perſwading her that I loved her, than I have in making her believe, that now I do not love her: And if after all this, I can throw down the
